EDUCATION

The Revival of the Classics

THE classics of Greece and Rome are not entirely bereft of champions. Princeton University has embraced their cause and given good reasons for its loyalty in the volume recently referred to in AMERICA, "The Value of the Classics." Two other American universities will not allow themselves to be outdone in veneration for these masters. Narrowing the scope of their studies to "The Greek Genius and Its Influence" (Yale University Press, $3.50), a series of papers edited by Lane Cooper, of Cornell University, they have entrusted the task of explaining the legacy which Greece has left us to such scholars, among others, as Sir Richard Jebb, Maurice Croiset, Basil Gildersleeve, Ulrich von Wilamowitz-Moellendorf and Gilbert Murray. At the same time an Irish Jesuit, Henry Browne, in "Our Renaissance: An Essay on the Reform and the Revival of Classical Studies" (Longmans, $2.60), points out the best methods to quicken the appreciation of ancient life and literature. To crown this classic feast, Professor D'Alton sends forth from Maynooth "Horace and His Age" (Longmans, $2.00), a study in historical background.

THE CLASSIC SPIRIT NOT UNPRACTICAL

ONE of the common objections against the study of the Greek and Latin authors is that these writers themselves were unpractical men, idle singers of an empty day, poetical dreamers of impossible utopias, and that the study of their works molds their votaries to the same fanciful and airy aspirations and ideals. In the second of the triad of the books mentioned, the Jesuit author maintains that from any human standpoint the Greeks were the greatest people ever known, a thesis which some will declare a little too sweeping. But not a few will agree with him when he says that they knew how to translate their ideals into reality, that they were not a nation of dreamers, but an extremely practical people.

It must be remembered that poetry, eloquence and philosophy cannot be divorced from the interests of life. They cannot be, as Father Browne says, "a sort of graceful recreation or exotic bloom of beauty." To look upon them or to use them as such is to trifle with our responsibilities. Pericles and Demosthenes were great orators, they were also practical statesmen. The former strove for the hegemony of Athens in Hellas. He sought to overthrow Sparta from whose militarism and crude civilization he augured but little good. The other sought to rouse his country from its indifference to the Macedonian danger and for some time was its soul and voice. Socrates and Plato were not idealists and dreamers of unsubstantial theories. They brought into the daily life of Athens the ideas of patriotism, self-control, justice, virtue, truth, obedience to law, fidelity to conscience and duty. The poets fostered, in a different way, the love of beauty and kept alive the aspirations of the people towards the noble and the true. The drama of Athens, in the days of the struggle against Persia and Sparta was a school of patriotism and courage and the citizens went forth from the "Persae" of Aeschylus breathing battle and war against the common foe. Poetry, philosophy then only deserve the name when they can be translated into the terms of ordinary life, common duties and needs. It is true, says Croiset, that Cleon, according to Thucydides, reproached the Athenians with being "spectators of words and auditors of actions," triflers who looked upon the oratorical contests of the tribune as a spectacle and the great events of their national history as a drama. But this was the defect of their splendid faculties and a natural if reprehensible complacency in the development and display of their powers. Their intellectual and artistic gifts while of the highest order from the esthetic point of view, were as a rule eminently practical.

"HELLENISM AND AMERICANISM"

FEW men today are better entitled to discuss questions of Greek classical scholarship than Professor Basil Gildersleeve. His contribution to the Yale volume is an essay on "Hellenism and Americanism." He sees certain analogies between the history of Hellas and that of the American Republic. In Hellas there was a loose confederacy of individual States, jealous of one another, with the same root ideals and religion in common, though Sparta was monarchical in tendencies and government, while Athens was the champion of the republican or rather oligarchical idea. At war with each other when no common enemy endangered their existence, they could on occasion unite to face Persia and its hosts. The American colonies, though like the Greeks separated by petty rivalries, could in face of a common foe band together and thus become conscious of a common national life. The Greek of old was resourceful, bold, witty, self-confident. Such too is the American. Both commonwealths had the same substratum and foundation of democratic ideals and principles. Both have the same assimilative powers. Both nations are at the same time versatile and practical.

It would be ridiculous to push the parallel too far. For at first sight no men could seem to be so far apart as the citizens of Athens under Miltiades and Themistocles fighting against the hosts and navies of Persia that liberty might not be crushed, and the men of the American Revolution, both in the Senate and the field who spoke and fought the cause of democracy and human freedom in the New World. But Greece, where the citizen idea was first perfected, does not present to the world a finer example of the citizen than the first President of our Republic, as brave on the field and as stainless in the councils of the State as the immortal Theban, Epaminondas. We have built no Parthenons like Athens, written no dramas like Aeschylus, no epics like Homer. But in the short space of our national life, we have lived more dreams and put more of them into execution for the benefit of the world, acted a more thrilling drama on the stage of life, fought and bled in a more epic struggle for liberty and democracy than ever haunted the minds of the teachers of the Academy or the Lyceum, or than was given to the heroes of Marathon or Salamis to face. The Greek is an idealist. With all his seeming materialism, the American will leave the plow in the half-finished furrow, like the minute men of Concord, that an idea fruitful for the welfare and happiness of mankind may march to victory. The Greek was intensely practical. So is the American. Greeks "were bent on getting results." As a rule the American gets them. He has everything to gain from the contact of the great minds of Athens. At many points his spirit is in close contact and communion, unconsciously, perhaps, with the Greek genius. With the Greek the practical and the ideal were in perfect balance. With us the practical overlaps the former. Greece should teach us to blend them in perfect harmony. To do so we must sit long and reverently at the feet of Greek masters.

HORACE AND EVERYTHING

THIS sounds like a bit of Belloc. But it will crystalize the reader's thoughts as he puts down Professor D'Alton's interesting study of the most genial and humane of Rome's poets. A master work of art should be the reflex of a period, a society, a soul. The Horace of the Odes, of the Epistles and the Satires is the perfect mirror of the Augustan Age. As such he is one of the most fascinating historians of his times. A line, a word, from that incomparable artist has done more for an accurate knowledge of Rome in the days of its glory than the formal works of Velleius Paterculus or Valerius Maximus. Only Tacitus can equal in vigor the broad and powerful sweep of the Horatian brush. One of the claims made for the classics is that they bring the past vividly before us and that without that knowledge we are marooned on our little island in the midst of the sea of time, out of hailing distance with our fellows and with no means to reach them. The reader of the splendid monograph of the Maynooth professor, especially if he takes down his Horace from its dusty corner, will be saved from his isolation and thrust into Rome on the very hour when the bore button-holed the poet on the Appian Way. Horace will tell him everything worth knowing of the news in town, of the doings and movements of Augustus and Agrippa and Tiberius and Drusus. He will ask him to shed a tear with him and his loved Virgil, over the best of friends, the model of critics and citizens, that soul of honor, Quintilius Varus, and thrill him with the despairing cry of hopeless paganism by the grave of the friend whom he cannot hope to see again.

Horace is Rome's best historian. You have only to open Professor D'Alton's pages to be reminded of it. Horace outlines the social problems of his time. He bewails the loss of the old Roman virtues of thrift, modesty, manly self-restraint, chastity and frugality. He has sympathy for the poor tenant evicted by the unjust landlord who with one foot in the grave builds marble mansions by the waters of Baiae. Astrologers, mimes, clowns, upstarts, slaves, thieves, informers, witches, statesmen, consuls, soldiers, haughty and frivolous Roman dames, courtiers, gamblers, tipsy bargemen, cultured artists and literateurs and dilettanti, necromancers, wags, parasites, triflers flit through his pages quickly, all with their brief but telling message, all photographed to the life in their many moods, and with the discriminating but kindly humor of the old bard, thoroughly pagan, but uttering at times those cries of the soul naturally Christian, cries of tenderness and generosity which warm you to his genial figure and make you love him for his wisdom, his noble enthusiasms and for that part of him which was absolutely and thoroughly Roman. To know Horace is a liberal education. He is brief, terse, dramatic, picturesque, full of color, warmth. He is modern in the best sense of the word. The same loves and hates beat today in New York and Paris that stirred under his toga as he warmed his hands at life's sinking fires in his humble home among the Sabine hills. An author who, like Horace, can so depict his own age of well-nigh 2,000 years ago is one of the best guides to the study of our own.

Catholics and Prohibition

ONE week before Christmas, after ratification by the Senate of the United States, a constitutional amendment designed to make "prohibition" part of the supreme law of the land, was submitted to the States. If accepted by thirty-six States, the amendment will forbid, after one year from the time of its approval, "the manufacture, sale or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into, or the exportation thereof from, the United States, and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof, for beverage purposes." It is further provided that this article shall be inoperative, unless ratified by the States within seven years from the date of its submission by Congress. This is a peculiar proviso, and one which, in the opinion of so able a jurist as Senator Borah, throws grave doubt upon the constitutionality of the proposed amendment.

Chaining the "Demon Rum"

WHAT has finally been done by Congress marks the culmination, and very possibly the victory, in a battle that has been waged for more than fifty years. In the wild fight against the "demon rum," good arguments have been strangely marshaled with pleas whose absurdity was exceeded only by their fundamental heresy. In this conflict the world has seen champions so able, so persuasive, because so eminently reasonable, as Cardinal Manning, and in our own country, the Archbishop of St. Paul, and has listened, perhaps with tears, to the eloquent, if not always solid, arguments of emotional speakers like the late John B. Gough, Moody and Sankey, and Jerry McAuley. Fanatics of the type of Carrie Nation, with her little hatchet and her erratic, though perhaps studied, disregard of the conventions, have moved the profane to merriment, while they made the judicious grieve. Finally, many a well-meaning advocate of prohibition has gone beyond all bounds, in proclaiming that every weary workman who after a hard day of toil indulged in a sober glass of beer, merited thereby the eternal torments of hell.

But it is undoubtedly true that many flagrant evils connected with the liquor traffic, evils too often winked at by delinquent public officials and encouraged by stupid members of the trade, have strengthened the hands of the prohibitionist. Of this, the record of any police court is ample proof. Furthermore, the growing conviction among all classes that the less any man had to do with alcoholic beverages, the better both for himself and for the community, has invested the arguments for prohibition with a force as powerful as it is legitimate.

The Catholic Position

THROUGHOUT the vacillation of public opinion, Catholics in general have clung to a position founded not on emotionalism, but solid reason. It need hardly be restated that no Catholic can hold anything that exists, to be the creation of the devil. Everything that is, including even alcohol and the various substances from which it is derived, is the work of God, to whom pertains exclusively the power of creation. Nor can any Catholic argue that the use of alcohol, taking the term in the sense of "intoxicating liquor," is prohibited either by the natural law, the Commandments of God, or by the Church. Since this is true, neither the manufacture, sale nor use of alcohol is, in itself, morally wrong. In this connection the maxim of the moralists, "abusus non tollit usum," "an abuse does not destroy legitimate use," is fully applicable. Although all may be, and frequently are, employed, for murder and other malign purposes, the State does not prohibit the manufacture of revolvers or dynamite, or the preparation of poisons. In themselves these things are indifferent. "Morality" attaches to them, only in an extended sense, drawn from the good or bad will of the user.

My Right and the Public's

NEVERTHELESS, it is clear that under given circumstances an act, indifferent in itself, becomes morally wrong. A physician may mercifully give cocaine to relieve the pain of a minor operation, and; on finding that he has been made the grateful patient's heir, may administer such a quantity as will place the sufferer beyond the reach of worldly troubles, and himself in the secure possession of a fortune. It is the constitutional right of every American citizen to bear arms, but he may not bear them concealed about his person, and in New York, he is prohibited by the Sullivan law from retaining any deadly weapon even in the fastnesses of his own home. The reason for these restrictions, and for similar legislation regarding the sale and use of drugs, is plain. Drugs and weapons may be used alike for good and for bad purposes, but because they lend themselves with facility to purposes that are bad, the welfare of the community may demand that their manufacture, sale and use be restricted. The application of the principle to the problem of State prohibition is readily made. Theologians and ethicists hold, and have held generally, that it is within the competence of the public authority to forbid the manufacture of alcohol, should its use become a source of public or private disorder, not to be checked by the customary regulations. Nor is it clear that in this case, the community is bound to make any restitution for the property, either destroyed or rendered worthless, at least if due notice of such action has been given. Conceivably, then, while it may be my "right" to quaff unlimited flagons of brown October ale, a process which I should find exceedingly repugnant, the State may lawfully command me to relinquish that right, if its exercise is contrary to public order.

The Danger to the Church

MORAL principles remain unchanged by the shifting decrees of human legislation and of public opinion, and the story of the campaign against the strongholds of the "demon rum" may now be left to the historian. Two points, however, connected with the proposed amendment, should be seriously considered. The first is of particular interest to students of political science, the second, to all Catholics. As to the first point, it may be observed that we have had quite too much oratory on the "tyranny," whereby under our Federal Government, a two-thirds majority may force its will upon an outraged minority. Very little reflection is required to bare the fact that this alleged "tyranny" works both ways. If the prohibition amendment is adopted by two-thirds of the States, it undoubtedly becomes part of the supreme law of the land, binding with equal force the twelve Commonwealths that have rejected, and the thirty-six that have adopted it. Yet however just and earnest the desire of thirty-five States to prohibit the use of intoxicating liquors in all the United States, their combined wills can be effectively brought to naught by the recalcitrance of thirteen States, refusing to yield. It may be true that, in some sense, this peculiar condition may be reckoned a hardship, yet in the present question the difficulty is removed, even if the proposed amendment is rejected, by the fact that the individual States are free to regulate within their own borders the trade in alcohol as seems best to them, or even to suppress it. Recent decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States protect the State in its right to prohibit the manufacture, sale, or even possession by an individual for personal use, of intoxicating liquors, and to prohibit their importation into the State by any individual or common carrier. Indeed, by upholding the "bone-dry law," the Court has affirmed the wide powers possessed in this matter by the individual States, and through this decision, in my opinion, the prohibition campaign is linked with at least the possibilty of a grave and continued inconvenience to the Catholic Church. If a State may forbid any citizen to keep an intoxicating beverage in his possession, it is hardly a further step, in the estimation of many prohibitionists, to forbid him to import and use wine, for sacramental purposes.

Prohibition and the Holy Sacrifice

NO danger is to be apprehended, as it seems to me, from the proposed Federal amendment. The prohibition there contemplated, refers to alcohol to be used for "beverage purposes." Nor does it seem probable that in this matter, any State will care to put itself in the base position of refusing to permit the free exercise of the Catholic religion. But since any State may do that precise thing, if it so wishes, it is not wise to rely on "probabilities," while the excessive unwisdom of believing that the Federal Constitution "guarantees religious liberty to every citizen" has been stressed more than once in these pages. As Carl Zollmann, in his "'American Civil Church Law," just issued by the Columbia University Press, points out, the first amendment "means exactly what it says, and no more." He continues:

> It is a restraint on the action of Congress, and is not a restriction on the action of the various State legislatures. "The Constitution makes no provision for protecting the citizens of the respective States in their religious liberties; this is left to the State constitutions and laws. Nor is there any inhibition imposed by the Constitution of the United States in this respect upon the States." (Permodi v. Municipality, No. 1, 3 How., 589, 689.) The States may, therefore, so far as the Federal Constitution is concerned, establish some religion and prohibit the free exercise of all others. (People v. Board of Education, 245, Ill., 334; 92 N. E., 251.) As a matter of fact, many of the original States retained an established religion for a longer or a shorter period after the adoption of the Federal Constitution. (Op. cit., pp. 9, 10.)

It is to the constitutions and laws of the respective States, then, and not to any fancied guarantee of the Federal Constitution, that the citizen must look for the protection of his religious rights. In these days of social legislation and "quack" legislation, it is imperative that every Catholic should bear this fact well in mind.

The Only Safe Policy

FOR in view of opinions prevailing in some States in which neither education nor culture is well advanced, and among citizens whose hostility to the Church is quite incurable, it is easily conceivable that to procure genuine wine, vinum de vite, for the Holy Sacrifice, may be made an almost impossible task. Courts in these communities could hardly be expected to regard the use of wine in the Mass, as protected by the guarantee of religious freedom contained in the State Constitution. Against the objection that such action would not be upheld by the Supreme Court of the United States, it is to be said that in this matter the Supreme Court could claim no jurisdiction. As Zollman well remarks, so far as the Federal authority is concerned, any State is free to prohibit the exercise of any religion, being bound in this matter, only by the construction of its own constitution. If this be true, and it can hardly be disputed, it would lie fully within the jurisdiction of the State Courts to decide whether or not the law of the State, forbidding the use of wine for any purpose, should prevail over the law of the Catholic Church requiring vinum de vite, wine from the grape, for the validity of the Holy Sacrifice. It would demand no prophetical spirit to forecast the decision in many States.

I believe it was Newman who said that bitter disillusionment had taught him to beware of vague, unwritten "understandings"—such as have been offered to Catholics by certain friends of legal prohibition. Safety can be guaranteed only by inserting into the State prohibition laws a clause specifically authorizing the use of wine for sacramental purposes.

NOTE AND COMMENT

The Catholic Chaplains

IN a report lately submitted to the American Bishops by the Rev. Lewis O'Hern, C. S. P., he announces that there are now 37 priests serving as chaplains in the regular army, 10 of them being stationed in France, and the navy is furnished with 19. Taking spiritual care of the Catholics in the national army are 59 Fathers, and besides these 37 Knights of Columbus chaplains, who are maintained by that organization, are working among the men of the army camps and naval stations. The bill which it is hoped will be passed by Congress this session provides for the assignment of a chaplain to every 1,200 men.

A New Altar and a New Saint

DEVOUT clients of Blessed Joan of Arc will rejoice to know that their heavenly patroness has been raised to the altars of the Church. Their joy, however, will be tempered on learning that her canonization was effected not by the Catholic Church but by St. Paul's Protestant Episcopal Church in Brooklyn. According to the Living Church, an altar has been erected in St. Paul's, "a Franciscan altar, where the Holy Sacrifice should be offered for the victory, in this war, of the Franciscan spirit." This dedication probably expresses the holy wish that the beautiful spirit of St. Francis, which was the spirit of Jesus Christ, may reign in all hearts, rather than the chronicle of an actual victory over the powers of evil.

The wall back of the shrine is emblazoned with the lilies of France in gold on an azure background, and the small statues on the front of the altar are the patron Saints of France and Paris: St. Michael, Ste. Jeanne d'Arc, St. Denis and Ste. Genevieve. The altar is of oak and delicate gilt fret-work, picked out with scarlet and blue, and the statues are exquisitely colored in the ancient manner. The statue of St. Michael with his triple crest and armor carries out Ruskin's famous description of this battle Saint.

Artistically, no doubt, this altar is beyond reproach, for "it is one of Mr. Ralph Adams Cram's most lovely productions." May the holy ones in whose honor it has been conceived, soon lead the donor and all who worship at this shrine, out of the darkness of error into the full light of the children of God.

Sins and "Mistakes"

AS the year draws slowly into the terminus, many of us, no doubt, are busily reviewing the ground over which we have traveled. For better or worse, the old year is soon to be numbered with the past. The little act of kindness, left undone, is forever undone, the sharp word spoken in haste can never be recalled. But the majority of us will not look back upon a year of positive misdeeds, "dark red with sin." What in all probability we most regret will be our lazy omissions, and what we euphemistically term our "mistakes." But only the wise will find any ground for self-condemnation in their "mistakes," for the unthinking will regard "mistake" as almost equivalent with "excuse." But, as a trade journal, the Commerce Monthly, justly observes, more frequently than we allow, our "mistakes" are the direct results of some neglect of duty. A few of these sources are thus noted:

> Carelessness, inattention, superficial interest. Laziness, an unwillingness "to take the trouble." Accepting appearances as facts, without investigation. Proceeding without advice or discussion. Impulsive decisions, not well thought out. Lack of foresight and due preparation. Forgetfulness. Overconfidence and exaggerated hopes.

"Mistakes do not 'happen,'" concludes the Monthly. "They are the results of definite causes," and frequently of causes that are easily overlooked, or even unsuspected. An examination of our mistakes would be an admirable supplement to our customary examination of conscience, and indeed, might make that exercise of the spiritual life more real than it sometimes is. "I didn't think," "It was only a mistake," may be occasionally accepted as valid excuses from the very young, but for us who have arrived at the age of discretion, they are arguments for conviction rather than pleas in condonation.

Fresh Air and Pneumonia

THAT "within certain limits, public health is a purchasable commodity" is a maxim long urged by the Health Department of a certain Eastern city. Happily, however, as Dr. C. F. Bolduan has recently pointed out in the New York Times, the price is not always, or even primarily, paid in money. Commonsense will buy a much larger amount. Commenting on the prevalence of pneumonia in the metropolis during November and December, Dr. Bolduan writes that while pneumonia is one of the most deadly diseases in our climate, it can also "be easily guarded against." Dr. Bolduan's plan of prevention is well worth trying. "Fresh air," he writes, "is the great foundation stone of physical vitality." Therefore

> Become a fresh-air crank, even at the risk of being disliked. Keep the windows of your bed-room wide open, day and night, even in the middle of winter. You can't overdose yourself with fresh air, and disease germs can't endure it. Be sure, however, to keep warmly covered. Avoid large crowds in closed or poorly ventilated rooms. Not only does the bad air lower your resistance, but you are in danger of catching the disease from others. Vitality is reduced by too much heat as readily as by too much cold. Avoid going suddenly from one temperature into another, without either putting on or taking off, wraps or overcoats. Avoid wet feet, a most frequent cause of chilling the body, and chilling the body is a frequent cause of pneumonia. Don't ride in a crowded street car. Walk! Walk a mile in the open air twice a day. It will increase your vitality, and thus help you dodge disease; also it will add ten years to your life.

The better part of the cure is foresight. It is always dangerous to treat a "cold" lightly, for colds slip very easily into pneumonia. Once the disease has gained entrance, the mortality rate is from twenty to forty a hundred, with the chances against the very young, the very old, and most of all, against "chronic users of alcohol." With the cheery band of care-free tipplers, the death-rate is about fifty per cent.

Father Wessling's Ordination

THE numberless Catholics who have long been taking a prayerful interest in the case of Henry J. Wessling, the Jesuit chemist who was stricken totally blind more than seven years ago by a laboratory accident, will rejoice to hear that he is now a priest and celebrated his first Mass at Boston College on December 20. In a rescript which arrived the middle of this month the Holy Father granted Father Wessling leave to be ordained, so he received the subdiaconate and the diaconate from Bishop Collins at St. Francis Xavier's, New York, and on December 19 was ordained priest at the Church of the Immaculate Conception, Boston, by Cardinal O'Connell. AMERICA unites its felicitations with those of Father Wessling's innumerable friends and well-wishers.

Domestic Pets

THE versatile Dr. Walsh has contended in the pages of this review that while an over-great devotion to domestic animals may result in a kind of degrading zoophily, yet many a pup is a real blessing to his mistress, since she is obliged to take him out for a daily walk. Perhaps the pet dog has other uses as well, although the sight of him, taking the air with his mistress, frequently arouses in the beholder emotions that are truly canicidal. At all events, it would be well if many another childless family would adopt the practice of the venerable couple, reported by the New York American:

> Mr. and Mrs. W. J. Purvis, of Millville, N. J., had seventeen pets, and the other day, on the forty-fifth anniversary of their marriage, they added five to the collection. These pets are not chows or Pekingese, or rabbit hounds, or St. Bernards, or pup dogs, as you might suspect. Mr. and Mrs. Purvis have adopted twenty-two children. They report that these pets are at least as grateful as dogs, and much more intelligent.

A correspondent writes to say that in her opinion, some Catholics, easily able to adopt a homeless child, are deterred by a fear of heredity! This rather unique objection rests on the absurd supposition that every minor who loses his parents has a bad heredity. As an explanation for moral defects, "heredity" has been vastly overworked by pseudo-scientists. Physical traits are often enough reproduced from generation to generation, but only an extremist argues for the carrying-over of mental and moral characteristics.

Russians Turning to Rome

AN interesting item is given in Annals of the Propagation of the Faith, for December. It is to the effect that Russia, hitherto the land of persecution, at whose doors the Catholic missionary knocked in vain, is turning towards the Church:

> The Church is about to reap another rich harvest of souls, this time in Russia, hitherto closed to the Catholic apostle.

Rev. George Calavassy, who has been sent to the United States by the Propaganda to further the cause of the Greek schismatics, is authority for the statement that three large districts in Russia, comprising about 10,000,000 souls, have acknowledged the supremacy of the Pope. The Most Rev. Count Szeptycki, Archbishop of Lemberg, Galicia, now in the full enjoyment of his liberty, has lost no time in exercising it for the benefit of the Church. Having recovered from his severe illness, caused by his imprisonment by the Russians, he has consecrated Mgr. Theodoroff as Bishop of the Catholics of the Ukraine. If the new Government endures, the next few years may see remarkable happenings in Russia.

Father Calavassy is a man of wide and reliable information on the status of the Greek Church. Having worked for years in the Balkans he has had ample opportunity to learn conditions and tendencies, and he would not lightly commit himself to so cheering a prediction, if he had not good grounds for his opinion.

Scouting

IN seeking to instruct in the Faith Catholic children who are not attending parochial schools the first problem that will naturally perplex the earnest worker is the practical method of gathering them together for this purpose. Simple directions are given by Father Francis Cassilly, S. J., in his new "Teachers' Manual," published in pamphlet form by the Catholic Instruction League, Chicago. Those who go in quest of the children are described as "scouts." He says:

In a well-settled district the scouts, generally two ladies together, secure a few addresses of Catholic families and call on them. The families visited will give other addresses, and soon the district will be well canvassed. A time and place are appointed for the first meeting. The children are then asked to bring others with them to the next class. In this way all the children will soon be gathered. If you learn of some who do not attend, pay their parents a personal call. Do not be discouraged if your first meeting is small. Persevere and you will soon overcome all apathy and distrust.

The first place of meeting may be a private home, a church, a vacant store, or any available room. The class should not last longer than half an hour, is Father Cassilly's advice. He would have the children divided into three classes: "One of very small children who are learning their prayers, another for those of six or eight years who are preparing for their First Communion and a third for those who have already made their First Communion." It is generally advisable, he adds, not to have more than ten pupils under one teacher. A superintendent should be in charge of each center.

Delusions of Christian Science

A VICTIM of the Mary Eddy cult writes to the editor of a non-Catholic journal that she cannot say enough for Christian Science. "What it has done for us can never be told." In reply the editor strives to enumerate some of the things it has actually done for his correspondent. It has caused her to give up faith in God as a personal being and accept Him as a "Principle." It has caused her to lose her faith in the merits of Christ, by which man—though not "a sinner by nature," as the editor holds—was redeemed after the fall.

She has given up faith in the Bible as inspired by the Holy Spirit, since Mary Eddy taught that her "Christian Science" is the Holy Ghost. She has given up her faith that Christ died, since Mary Eddy taught He did not die, but was "hidden in the sepulcher alive." She has given up faith in the perfection of Christ as to His wisdom and knowledge, for Mary Eddy tells us what Jesus would have said and done "had wisdom characterized all his sayings." She has given up faith in prayer, for Mary Eddy said that "prayer to a personal God is a hindrance." She has given up faith in many of the direct assertions of the Holy Scriptures, for Mary Eddy said: "Man is incapable of sin"; "Man is perfect now, henceforth and forever"; "There is no final judgment," and "man is never sick." She has given up faith in the supremacy of God's Word as a Divine revelation, since Mary Eddy says that her book is a "higher, clearer and more permanent" revelation than Jesus brought to earth.

If it has done all this for her we do not envy her possessions or her condition. She has been wrecked in about all that it is desirable for a human being to have or to be, and has accepted most monstrous delusions and falsehoods, that insult and contradict God, and that trample into dust the claims of Jesus Christ for Himself and His saving grace.

As for the supposed curative effects of Christian Science, the editor remarks: "The same thing could have been done by some sound and scientific treatment, without the acceptance of false and unchristian positions which are antagonistic to spiritual life and health." A considerable number of cases which came under his own observation he regards as "murder or suicide."

From Army Officer to Leper Surgeon

IN his recent book, "The Path of the Destroyer," a history of leprosy in the Hawaiian Islands, A. A. St. M. Mouritz, formerly physician to the leper settlement on the island of Molokai, offers a brief sketch of the life and service of "Brother" Joseph Dutton. He had been an officer connected with the army of the Cumberland, "a handsome fellow," Colonel A. Wills described him, "and one of the best and bravest officers in the army. He was complimented in the official army for bravery." While in the service of his country he was known as Lieutenant Ira B. Dutton. But after his conversion, because he failed to find the name "Ira" in the catalogue of saints, he changed it to Joseph. Henceforth he devoted himself to the service of the lepers. Mr. St. M. Mouritz says of him:

Brother Joseph Dutton came to Hawaii in 1886, and in the early afternoon of Thursday, July 29, of that year he arrived at Kalawao, calling at my house on his way to the Catholic mission premises. He took up his residence with Father Damien, later occupying a small house near the residence of the priest. Since his arrival, now nearly thirty years ago, Brother Dutton has never set his foot outside the boundaries of the leper settlement, though he could have done so if he desired, for he is not a leper. The leper settlement is under control of the Board of Health of the territory of Hawaii, and there is no law or statute on its books that can compel a non-leper to remain at the leper settlement if he desires to leave, move, or reside elsewhere. Any nurse, kokua, brother, sister, or other employee who is not a leper is a free person. There is no such condition as involuntary confinement for a well person, yet such statements find frequent place in certain newspapers.

Joseph Dutton, although always spoken of as "Brother," never took the vows of any religious fraternity. Neither, however, did he labor for any earthly reward. His sole recompense for his heroic services were board, lodging and a few dollars a month. His devotion to the lepers was wonderful, and the skill with which he dressed their sores and performed the duties of a surgeon, though without any previous training, was no less remarkable. Within a short period he surpassed the trained physician who instructed him. "He was Father Damien's companion, secretary, servant, nurse, and did other menial work," writes the author. "He was sexton, sacristan, verger, purveyor for Father Damien's homes and his household, hospital steward, dresser, clinical clerk and later manager of the Baldwin Home, sanitary engineer, architect and landscape gardener." And all this purely for the love of God. At the Baldwin Home alone he had charge of 1,148 lepers up to the date of July, 1915. When the praises of Father Damien are sounded, as rightly they should be, we must not forget to honor with him this faithful disciple of that apostle of the Cross, the humble "Brother" Dutton.

The War.—With the exception of a violent and partly successful thrust by the Germans on a two-mile front against Welsh Ridge south of Cambrai, no action of any importance took place during the week on the Western front. In the Verdun sector German attacks were repulsed between the Caurières Wood and Bezonveaux. Severe fighting was almost continuous along the Italian lines. Here the Austro-German assault swung back and forth like a pendulum between the Asiago Plateau and the front between the upper Brenta and Piave, with an occasional effort to feel out the weaker spots of their opponents on the lower Piave. On the upper Brenta the main effort of the Austro-Germans is aimed at Valstagna towards which they are making a converging drive from Monte Grappa region to the eastward and down the Val Frenzella from the west. In the Col del Rosso and around Monte Valbella, which after changing hands several times remained in the possession of Field Marshal von Hoetzendorf's troops, the struggle was of the fiercest nature. The Austro-Germans claim to have taken more than 9,000 prisoners. In Palestine General Allenby's troops made another considerable advance north of Jerusalem, driving the Turks back two miles on a front of thirteen miles. Vice-Admiral Sir Rosslyn Wemyss has been appointed First Sea Lord in succession to Sir John R. Jelicoe, who has been elevated to the peerage.

Bulletin, Dec. 24, a.m.-Dec. 31, p.m.

The 275,000 miles of American railways passed under Government control at noon Friday, December 28, when Secretary McAdoo, acting under the President's proclamation became Director-General of Railroads and began to exercise the authority vested in him by the President to finance and direct the transportation facilities of the nation during the war. The President, on December 26, had announced his decision to take possession and assume control of the railroads of the country. In a statement accompanying his proclamation Mr. Wilson declared that as soon as Congress reassembled he would recommend legislation guaranteeing the maintenance of railroad properties in good repair and the payment of a net operating income equal to the net operating income of the roads for the three years ending June 30, 1917.

Government Control of Railroads

The President's proclamation practically mobilizes the railroads of the country and all their appurtenances. While it gives the Government possession of water-lines that figure in rail-and-water transportation, the Government does not intend to take over local water routes and those steamer lines that "do not fit into the rail problem." The Chief Executive's action is based on the authority granted by Congress on August 29, 1916, which made appropriations for the support of the army for the fiscal year, 1917, and which provided that the President in time of war, might take possession or assume control of any or all systems of transportation and utilize them, to the exclusion, as far as may be necessary, of all other traffic, for the transportation of troops, war material and equipment, and for such other purposes connected with the emergency as may be needful or desirable.

In the statement accompanying the official proclamation which announced the coming Federal control of the roads, Mr. Wilson thus gave the main reason for his action:

> I have exercised the powers over the transportation system of the country, which were granted to me by the act of Congress of August, 1916, because it has become imperatively necessary for me to do so. This is a war of resources no less than of men, and it is necessary for the complete mobilization of our resources that the transportation systems of the country should be organized and employed under a single authority and a simplified method of coordination which have not proved possible under private management and control.

The President recognizes that the Committee of Railway Executives who cooperated with the Government in the solution of the transportation problems did the utmost that it was possible for them to do, "but there were difficulties which they could neither escape or neutralize." For this reason the full authority of the Government had to be substituted.

In the official proclamation after referring to the enabling resolutions and statutes the President announces the main points of his program as follows:

> I, Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States . . . do hereby, through Newton D. Baker, Secretary of War, take possession and assume control at 12 o'clock noon on the twenty-eighth day of December, 1917, of each and every system of transportation and the appurtenances thereof located wholly or in part within the boundaries of the continental United States and consisting of railroads, and owned or controlled systems of coastwise and inland transportation, engaged in general transportation, whether operated by steam or by electric power, including also terminals, terminal companies and terminal associations, sleeping and parlor cars, private cars and private car lines, elevators, warehouses, telegraph and telephone lines, and all other equipment and appurtenances commonly used upon, or operated as a part of, such rail or combined rail and water systems of transportation—to the end that such systems of transportation be utilized for the transfer and transportation of troops, war material and equipment to the exclusion so far as may be necessary of all other traffic thereon, and that so far as such exclusive use be not necessary or desirable, such systems of transportation be operated and utilized in the performance of such other services as the national interest may require and of the usual and ordinary business and duties of common carriers.

It is hereby directed that the possession, control, operation, and utilization of such transportation systems hereby by me undertaken shall be exercised by and through William G. McAdoo, who is hereby appointed and designated Director-General of Railroads. Said Director may perform the duties imposed upon him so long, and to such extent, as he shall determine, through the boards of directors, receivers, officers, and employes of said systems of transportation. Until and except so far as said Director shall from time to time by general or special orders otherwise provide, the boards of directors, receivers, officers, and employes of the various transportation systems shall continue the operation thereof in the usual and ordinary course of the business of common carriers in the names of their respective companies.

Until so ordered by the Director-General of Railroads these systems of transportation remain subject to the authority of the Interstate Commerce Commission. The proclamation, for the present, does not affect street electric passenger railways. The rights of stockholders, bondholders, creditors having interests in the now-Federal-controlled transportation systems are not impaired. The regular dividends hitherto declared and maturing interest upon bonds, debentures and other obligations may be paid in due course.

Everywhere the question is asked whether the policy now adopted by the Government, if successful, will be the forerunner of Government unified control, or perhaps, Government ownership of railroads after the war.

The following is the substance of the statement offering terms for a general peace which Count Czernin made on Christmas Day at the Russo-German conference at

The Czernin Peace Terms

Brest-Litovsk: The delegations of the Allied (Teutonic) Powers in the name of their Governments and peoples will conclude a general peace as soon as possible and think that the basic principles of the Russian delegation can be made its basis; the delegations are agreed to conclude immediately a general peace without forcible annexations and indemnities and condemn the continuation of the war for purposes of conquest; the Teutonic Powers and their allies solemnly declare their resolve immediately to sign terms of peace on the above terms equally just to all belligerents; the proposals of the Russian delegations could be realized only in the case all the belligerents promise scrupulously to observe these terms; the Powers of the Quadruple Alliance, negotiating with Russia, cannot one-sidedly bind themselves to these terms, without having the guarantee that Russia's allies will carry them out honestly. The terms, under these conditions, are thus stated: Forcible annexation of territory seized during the war is not intended; it is not the intention of the Allies (Teutonic) to deprive of political independence those nations which lost it during the war; "the question of subjection to that or the other country of those nationalities who have not political independence cannot, in the opinion of the Powers of the Quadruple Alliance, be solved internationally; each Government must solve it with its peoples according to its Constitution"; the protection of the rights of minorities constitutes an essential component part of the constitutional rights of peoples to "self-determination"; the Allied Powers (of the Quadruple Alliance) have admitted the possibility that both sides might renounce not only indemnification for war costs, but for war damages; in these circumstances, every belligerent Power would have to make indemnification only for its nationals who have become prisoners of war, as well as for damage done in its own territory by illegal acts of violence committed against civilian nationals belonging to the enemy. The Russian Government's proposal for the creation of a special fund for this purpose could be considered only if the other belligerent Powers join in the peace negotiations within a suitable period; the return of colonial territories forcibly seized during the war constitutes an essential part of the German demands, which Germany cannot renounce under any circumstances; the Russian demand for immediate evacuation of territories occupied by an adversary conforms to German intentions, having in view the nature of the colonial territories of Germany, the realization of the right of self-determination, in the form proposed by the Russian delegates is at present impossible; the fidelity shown by the natives of the German colonies to Germany in the struggle is a proof of their intention of retaining their allegiance to Germany and in significance and weight is a proof far superior to any expression of popular will; the principles of economic relations proposed by the Russian delegations are approved by the Allied (Teutonic) Powers who see in the reestablishment of regulated economic relations one of the most important conditions for bringing about friendly relations between the Powers now at war.

The New York World sees "Prussianism in its most subtle form in Count Czernin's dubious phrases relative to the solution internationally of the problems of peoples not now independent politically," and adds that the "despotism that craftily offers this travesty of a truce peace does not have the courage or the honesty to propose it in its own name. It hides behind a vassal in Vienna and a mob in Petrograd." The New York Tribune says that the terms are "inadmissible because they make no provision for the restoration of Belgium and Northern France." The Providence Journal designates them "a proposal put forward by fools for consumption by children." The Chicago Tribune states that "such a German peace would be a substantial German victory." The St. Louis Globe-Democrat questions the sincerity of the proceeding and says that there are "enough qualifications, evasions and ambiguities in the Teutonic peace terms to spoil their superficial attractiveness." In the French Chamber of Deputies, Foreign Minister Pichon rejected any peace "based on the status quo." In a letter to the National Labor Congress Lloyd George stated that Great Britain's intentions in continuing the war are not imperialistic or vindictive but concern the future freedom and peace of the world. The majority of the London papers rejects the Czernin proposals. The Times and the Daily Mail hold that they constitute a trap for the Allies. The Express and a few others think that behind Czernin's words there is a sincere desire for peace and that the offer is genuine.

Ireland.—Under the leadership of the tireless and clever De Valera Sinn Fein is still progressing in Ireland. During the week numerous meetings were held in different parts of the country. The largest of these was convened in Cork where De Valera again stated the aims of the party. The Irish Weekly Independent reports him as follows:

Sinn Fein

Their aims, he said, were to secure recognition for Ireland as a sovereign independent State. He reminded them that Grattan compelled the British Government to recognize his claims by the Volunteers. Referring to the Peace Conference, he said there was only one section of Irishmen who could go there, and they would go there because they proclaimed they were a nation kept under subjection, which the Allies had put before the people as the reason for the present terrible war.

Proceeding, he charged, in connection with the Irish party influence in the Volunteer movement, that when they got control they pretended they were going to arm them, while in private they were arranging to get arms out of the country. They (the Sinn Feiners) were told they were preventing conciliation with the North. The people of Cork knew what the opinions of the Irish party in regard to conciliation were when the question was raised by another party. When Mr. Dillon raised an "ullagone" about the treatment the Irish people had given their leaders, he contradicted himself. Mr. Dillon said that for thirty years they were the trusted leaders; but the fact that the people had now turned against their leaders was significant. Having trusted them for thirty years, there was some deep reason why they should now turn against them. It is a hard fight, added Mr. de Valera, but the difficulties in no way daunt you or me. Our path is sure; it is difficult, but it is straight.

Proceeding the speaker deprecated the Convention, denounced those who were attempting to bring down ecclesiastical condemnation on his head and promised assistance to labor. Sinn Feiners are in high glee over the following letter sent by Bishop Fogarty to the Irish Times:

Sir, you have been very busy of late lecturing the Irish Hierarchy on the duties of their sacred office. In yesterday's issue you seem to have extended your disinterested tuition to the great Archbishop of Melbourne, the Most Rev. Dr. Mannix, this time, indeed, not in the guise of a "Bridgetown Farmer," but behind the coat-tails of that hard-pressed Australian politician, Mr. Hughes. Your readers may not be aware that the Most Rev. Dr. Mannix is one of the most distinguished of living Irishmen. He is also one of the greatest and most glorious of our churchmen. He occupies in the spacious mind of Australia a position not unlike that which the renowned Cardinal Moran held there at the time of his death. What is it in the conduct of the Most Rev. Dr. Mannix that has aroused the wrath of Mr. Hughes and the Irish Times? His attitude on the question of conscription?

We have here, not an isolated, but an additional instance of the revolting inconsistency, not to say hypocrisy, preached by the avowed champions of "liberty and democracy." Conscription is, I understand, an open question in Australia. It is being made a subject of referendum to the people. Every man in Australia is entitled to say yes or no on that important subject, according to his lights, without the imputation of corruption, sedition, "German gold," or "dirty work." Yes; everyone but a Catholic Archbishop. He and his countrymen are to be treated with insult and injury when tyranny has a free hand; but they are expected, it would seem, to act as the bulwarks of unjust government when tyranny "is set with its back to the wall." Dr. Mannix is too big and brave a man to be intimidated by injustice or falsehood. He claims the right as a member of the human family to say what he thinks of this awful war and of the policy of those who will make a shambles of the world, but will not risk a hair of their own heads in the horrid carnage.

That is the Archbishop's first offense. His second is that he seems to have become a "Sinn Feiner." If so, this is the greatest boon that Sinn Fein has got since the illustrious Dr. O'Dwyer, Bishop of Limerick, was laid in his grave. Dr. Mannix is the last man in the world to patronize either "madness" or "wickedness." All true Irishmen will rejoice to know on your authority that the national instincts of our race are as potent in this great Archbishop in far-away Australia as they are in the humblest peasant at home in Ireland. Sinn Fein has neither English nor German gold to finance it, nor does it want it. It is a natural growth in the national heart, and no power on earth can kill it. It is no longer a small section. In the main it embraces our race all over the world. They, the Sinn Feiners, want neither disorder nor bloodshed; but they are done with "the happy entente" which existed for the fooling of Ireland between English Ministers and our Parliamentary Party; and they think that the time has come for Ireland to get back the national independence of which she was shamefully robbed by England 117 years ago.

But this is but one side of the shield: the other side shows opposition to Sinn Fein. Thus for instance the Weekly Freeman continues its vigorous attacks on De Valera, picturing him as dangerous if not actually seditious. In a recent issue the same paper reprinted from the Irish Opinion an editorial in which labor negatived De Valera's request that it wait for freedom before pressing its claims too insistently. According to the latter paper labor "will claim its share of patrimony when and where opportunity offers." Thus a new complication is added to an already complicated problem.

Mexico.—Riot and robbery are still in order in Mexico. The several revolutionary leaders are still in the field making a mockery of the frantic statements of Carranza that all is well under his benign rule. Recently the Wall Street Journal printed this very instructive article under the title "T. E. Gibbon Exposes Mexican Confiscation":

Riot and Robbery

T. E. Gibbon, in an article on the Mexican constitution in the December issue of the Journal of the American Bankers' Association, gives the first clear record of national bank looting in Mexico to illustrate the broad confiscatory powers for looting foreign-owned property in that country conferred by the I. W. W. Constitution on the Carranza Government and its officials. He says:

> There is not only no hope that conditions in Mexico that have resulted in the destruction of foreign business in that country will be ameliorated, but every promise that they will grow worse as time goes on unless the United States Government shall make up its mind to require the Government in Mexico, which it has recognized as a member of the family of nations, to live up to its obligations under international law in the treatment given by it to the persons and property of our nationals, and those of our Allies, within its borders.
> As showing the predatory attitude of the Carranza Government toward the property of foreigners in Mexico in the past, and indicating what foreign interests in Mexico may expect from that Government in the future, the history of its relations to the Bank of London & Mexico, a large financial institution in Mexico City representing English capital, may be cited.
> On July 31 El Universal, a prominent daily newspaper of Mexico, published the annual report of the board of directors of that bank. This publication said:
> "It was then reported that of the amount of more than 19,000,000 pesos in gold and silver in bars and coin money which had been in the bank's vaults, there had been slowly taken away from January 18, 1917, until the present time, the sum of over 17,000,000 pesos, there remaining in the vaults, according to information received by the board of directors, only about 2,000,000 pesos. In the report it was stated that the board of directors [a board appointed by and representing the Carranza Government]ordered that the cash department and the safes should always remain open, which measure obliged the board of directors to put a corps of employees on guard in this department, day and night, to avoid responsibility for abstraction of funds from the vaults falling on those not responsible.
> "The board stated categorically that of the $19,611,141 in specie which were in the vaults of the bank, hardly $2,000,000 remain, as the board of receivers had disposed of the difference, and that the said board of receivers has sold at the lowest of prices, securities considered first class by the bank.
> "That on February 15, 1917, the Department of Finance refused to recognize the bank's board of directors, refusing to take up any matter connected with the institution with them, and ordered that the board of receivers liquidate the bank.
> "Mention was made of a communication from the Department of Finance in October last year, asking for delivery to the mint of the bars of metal which the bank had in vault, and a message from the Sub-Secretary of Finance was annexed, sent from Queretaro to the manager of the bank, categorically stating that the money coined therefrom would be returned to the bank; and it was reported that notwithstanding this assurance given by the Sub-Secretary of Finance, compliance with this written offer has never been made.
> "Finally it was stated that of 820 silver bars, taken by the Government, worth more than 1,000,000 pesos, national gold, and eighty gold bars worth 1,840,119 pesos, to be coined by the mint, they have returned to the bank, in the breach of the offer made from Queretaro by the Sub-Secretary of Finance, only 299,675 pesos for the silver bars and 200,000 pesos for the gold bars, causing the bank a deficit of 2,697,387 pesos."
> There is every reason to believe that the State Governments in their relation to foreign-owned investments, will follow the same course. We know that at the present time the Governors of the various Mexican States are almost all men who have reached some prominence in the military forces of the Carranza party. The character of these men appears to be very fairly indicated in a series of articles, lately published by Luis Cabrera, Secretary of Finance, in El Universal in the City of Mexico, which it appears were provoked by accusations that he and his friends had profited by his control of the national finances. In these articles, while admitting that large sums of money have come into the possession of military officials of the revolution as a result of robbery and confiscation of properties, he denies that this money had found its way into the national or State treasuries.
> In his explanation, Secretary Cabrera shows how this was done by the commanders of revolutionary forces:
> "By disposing of articles other than money, such as furniture, automobiles or real estate, for personal use or for profit.
> "During the Constitutionalists' revolution, the case has been repeated, with unfortuntae frequency, under the pretext of confiscating 'intervened' properties, and great quantities of private property have been seized in the beginning for the nation, but the confiscators have used them for personal profit or sold them for money. It is unnecessary to bring proofs of this, for, unfortunately, almost all of the confiscation of the enemies' properties, with honorable exceptions, have been made with the deliberate intention of converting the goods for private use. This goes from the mere 'loan' of a horse or saddle, from the requisition of grain and fodder which are not used for the troops, to the occupation of houses, property and ranches which have been confiscated and were cultivated and exploited directly for the benefit of the confiscator."
> In the above quotation we have the estimate, made by a leading revolutionist and prominent national official, of the leaders, with a few exceptions, of the Carranza party now in power in Mexico—the men who are, and will be, most prominent in the national and State governments of that country.

The truth about Mexico is gradually prevailing.

Russia.—The internal state of Russia continues to grow worse, and fighting keeps on in the Ukraine. A dispatch dated December 21 reported that victorious Cossacks entered Odessa after a six days' battle with the Bolsheviki who lost some 1,800 men in killed and wounded. Later advices say the Bolshevik troops refused to attack the Ukrainians and allowed themselves to be disarmed. From Petrograd chaotic conditions are reported. Several prominent Social Revolutionists have proclaimed their determination not to submit to Premier Lenine but to convene the Constituent Assembly. Divisions have also taken place in the Peasants' Congress which has been in session at Petrograd, one faction insisting that all power be given the Constituent Assembly and the other maintaining that the Soldiers' and Sailors' Delegates should be supreme. Plundering and fighting in the streets of the capital have continued. Colonel Kolpashnikoff, of the American Red Cross Mission, had his house raided, was himself imprisoned, and was accused by Trotsky of favoring the Anti-Bolshevik party, and of helping Kaledine by forwarding supplies to Rostov. Ambassador Francis denies the charges, for if anti-Bolshevists were approached by the Red Cross it was because they were the only authorities with whom it was then possible to deal. The navy seems as badly disorganized as the army. Eight-hundred officers of the Baltic fleet resigned after protesting against the supreme command of the warships being put into the hands of elected sailors. The latter declared the commission of Admiral Razvosoff revoked and lowered his flag. Southern Russia however seems to be successfully arrayed against the Bolsheviki, whose power is waning, according to the correspondent of the London Daily News.

Civil War Goes On

Security Against the Workman's Hazards

EDWIN V. O'HARA, LL.D.

IF sufficiency of income for normal human life is the first condition for the alleviation of labor's unrest, security against the hazards of industrial life for the workman and his family is the second. These hazards are many: they are especially burdensome upon the wage-earner; they are such that he is unable to insure himself against them; their effect is to plunge him and his family into a state of destitution, a land from whose bourne few travelers return. Security against these hazards must be provided by industry through the direction of civil society which otherwise must bear the burden of those who are thrown into the human scrap-heap of industry.

Whatever causes an interruption of the worker's income or constitutes an abnormal drain upon it must be viewed as a special menace to his family. One class of these hazards, namely, industrial accidents, has been finally taken into account by most American States, and accident insurance, so-called workmen's compensation, has become a familiar feature in our industrial organization. But accidents are by no means the only, nor yet the chief hazards of the workman's life. Extraordinary demands are made upon his income by the death of members of the family and by the birth of members into the family. Deaths and births are both expensive items in the laborer's family, and provision for them cannot be made on a mere "decent subsistence wage." A respectable funeral for his dead is the legitimate ambition of every self-respecting laborer. In fact most of the petty insurance carried in this country by the laboring classes is meant to provide decent burials. The poor will make every sacrifice to be saved the humiliation of a pauper's grave for their loved ones. Still, in New York City, after private charity has done its best, one out of every twelve who die, is buried at public expense.

The family, not the individual, is the unit of society, and birth is the chief incident in family life. As I have said, it is also one of the most costly. However eugenists may dispute, the necessity for births in the workingman's family will not be questioned by those who are keen for the maintenance of an adequate labor supply. But the birth cost in the homes of laboring men is little appreciated by the general public. In the first place, a large percentage of the births in these homes is a flat economic loss, to put it on the lowest plane, because out of the 2,500,000 babies born annually in this country, 300,000 die in the first year of life, chiefly in the homes of the poor, and because, too, there is no proper provision for their nourishment, medical and nursing care. But the cost does not end here. Each year 15,000 mothers die from almost entirely preventable diseases caused by childbirth. There is a larger toll of deaths from childbirth among women between fifteen and forty-four years of age, than that taken by any disease except tuberculosis. Besides the mothers who die and leave the laborer's children to grow up without maternal care, how many other thousands of mothers are unnecessarily disabled by lack of medical care in childbirth and become a burden instead of a help! To discuss the mortality of infants and the loss of a mother's health in terms of economic waste seems cold-blooded, but under no other aspect will these things touch the heart of the pachydermatous giant of modern industry.

Birth and death make an extraordinary demand on the laborer's income; old age and sickness interrupt the income. No one is more worthy of our pity than the man who has spent the best years of his life working steadily in industrial employment, and who, with his meager savings exhausted and his earning power gone, now faces the years of senescence as a burden upon relatives or upon the charity of strangers, his steps dogged by a great fear, the fear of the poor-house. He has given to industry his all, the best years of his productive manhood and this is his reward. Can we wonder if he is bitter? Can we wonder if others manifest an unrest when they see in his conditions of decline a prophecy of their own unhappy fate?

But the hazards we have been dealing with are only incidental compared with the hazard of sickness as a source of poverty. No informed person will contradict the statement that second only to insufficient income, sickness is the greatest individual source of destitution. Sidney and Beatrice Webb say that it is greater than all other sources combined. The recent Commission on Industrial Relations reports that each of the 30,000,000 workers in this country loses annually an average of about nine days on account of illness alone. "Much attention is now given to accident prevention," declares the Commission, "yet accident causes only one-seventh as much destitution as does sickness." It is only among the poorly paid group of laborers that sickness becomes a tragedy. Yet it is precisely among these that disease is most prevalent. "It is an accepted fact," says Dr. Irving Fisher, "that the sickness-rate prevailing among the poor is from two to three times that prevailing among the well-to-do."

Much light has been thrown in late years on the specific industrial causes of disease. They resolve themselves into harmful substances and harmful conditions. Among the harmful substances are poisonous metals and noxious gases, vapors, fumes and dust. Phosphorus, lead, mercury and arsenic poisonings are now familiar to the public. So many diseases are traceable to poisons which affect the workers in scores of occupations that it has been stated by a well-known authority that there is scarcely any one line of modern manufacture which is free from the dangers of industrial poisoning.

A vast amount of sickness among workers is due to conditions surrounding their employment. Heat, moisture, cold, bad ventilation, overcrowding, compressed air, and excessive or deficient light may be noted as having a deleterious effect on the workman's health. Over-fatigue incident to long hours of labor, or to the speeding-up processes of specialized occupations or to the unregulated piece-rate system has created a "new strain" in modern industry which predisposes the worker to tuberculosis and other diseases, as well as actively causes injurious consequences to the nervous system and special senses. The following account of shovelers in the zinc mines of the Joplin district, Missouri, gives a picture which would be recognized in many fields of industry:

> They had shoveled from two to six years; some had started when 18 or 19 years of age. Now they could shovel only 35 or 40 cans, where formerly they could shovel 60 to 70 and upward. Constant work had broken these men down so that at the ages of 22 to 30 they were already on the down grade. . . . Working thus at their full earning capacity, day in and day out, it is not surprising that with the added exposure to rock dust, these men should contract tuberculosis to an excessive degree. Especially must this be true when they start in while under age and before their bodies have fully developed.

It is unnecessary to elaborate further the hazards which surround the workingman and his family. They are beyond his power to ward off or insure against. It may be suggested that the average income of working families is adequate to pay for insurance against a considerable number of these risks. So it is; but more than half of the laboring population get less than the average. The "average man" is an abstraction, but the millions who get less than a decent subsistence-income are real human beings, with wives and little babies. These are the multitude whom destitution is staring in the face. As a matter of fact, only about five per cent of the workmen carry insurance of any sort.

The remedy will be the universal compulsory insurance of the workingman against the hazards of sickness, old age, death and maternity by the action of the State. America is the only modern industrial nation which has neglected the conservation of its human resources. It is to be hoped that the shortage of labor caused by the war will give a strong impulse to this vital movement. We usually cherish those things which are scarce and are prodigal of things that are plenty. It has been said that in older civilizations when slaves were plenty their masters worked them to death and easily replaced them with others, but when slaves were scarce severe laws were passed against inhuman treatment of them. Now that labor is scarce, Christian principles may be able to invoke cooperation of industrial self-interest to prevent further depletion of the labor supply.

Just as accident insurance gave rise to the "safety-first" movement and diminished the number of accidents —because it was to the interest of industry to diminish the cost of insurance—so also health insurance will not only indemnify the worker who is sick, but will initiate a great movement for the elimination of the causes of disease and death. It is said that forty-two per cent of the deaths now occurring in this country are unnecessary. That is, 630,000 lives could be saved annually by the application of known methods. Such a saving would add fifteen years to the average duration of human life in the United States. During thirty years of the operation of health insurance in Germany, twelve years were added to the average life span of the worker.

Nothing is more provocative of restlessness than insecurity. It is utterly hopeless to establish industrial peace without providing for the security of the workingman and his family against the imminent perils that threaten to engulf him in poverty and destitution. Until this is done men may cry "Peace! Peace!" but there will be no peace. If all the influence of the Catholic Church in America were enlisted in this cause the Church would add another title to her glorious claim to be friend and mother to those who toil and are heavily burdened.

The Code of Canon Law

JOHN J. CREAGH, J.U.D., S.T.L.

ON the feast of Pentecost, 1917, his Holiness Pope Benedict XV in his constitution "Providentissima Mater" gave to the world a pronouncement of the highest importance, one that will keep his name in remembrance as long as the Church endures, for he therein promulgated the code of canon law which had been so eagerly looked for in recent years. Naturally, among Catholics a high degree of interest attaches to this new-born code, and this interest motives the two brief articles here begun, the first of which will aim at giving a general idea of the new legislation, while the second will deal with some aspects of it, that particularly concern the laity.

Probably no better brief definition of the code can be given than that it is a complete restatement of the law of the Catholic Church. And this description, implying as it does that we have here a collection of ordinances that are new and yet old, indicates a reason why the code will command attention from others than Catholics. For in this legislation of the twentieth century mighty influences of the past live on, altered in form but unchanged in substance, rich in material for the study of men of every faith. Here in modern vesture is the same venerable law that transformed barbarism into civilization, that curbed despots and spoke encouragement to peoples, that breathed the spirit of Christianity into individuals and families and States. The historian, the sociologist, the investigator of political institutions see here the law to whose texts they have learned to turn as to the richest of sources. Most of all the lawyer feels himself its debtor; for, if his law be but a modernized Roman law, he knows that it was canonists who kept alive the Ius Civile and transmitted it to the nations, and if he live in a common-law country he cannot forget that —to use the words of so high an authority as Maitland—"English law was rationalized under the influence of the canon law, and it was by 'popish clergymen' that our English common law was converted from a rude mass of customs into an articulate system."

A restatement of Catholic Church law, then, the code is, and such restatement was confessedly required. The legal renaissance of the eleventh, twelfth and thirteenth centuries had borne fruit in the Corpus Iuris Canonici, a kind of code, though far from what today is understood by that term and utterly unlike the code promulgated by Benedict XV. Even if the Corpus had been perfect, its latest document followed the current of law only to the fifteenth century. The flow of enactments still continued. Centuries brought an almost endless volume of Papal constitutions, of canons and decrees and decisions and instructions. The student of law, seeking its sources, was compelled to make many a weary journey, to retrace his steps again and again, and often at the end of his labor to rely on the word of a commentator rather than on the law itself. Everyone, moreover, was aware that in the great mass of existing law there was much that was obsolete or contradictory or extremely difficult of actual application.

Perhaps the best evidence of the degree to which the need of restatement was felt can be discovered in documents bearing on the Vatican Council. A reform of canon law, its necessity, its method, its feasibility, constituted a principal matter of study and discussion from 1865, when preparations for the Council were begun, until its sessions closed in 1870. Many bishops, from every country of Europe and from some parts of America, addressed memorials to the Holy See, setting forth in vigorous language what they represented to be the intolerable condition of ecclesiastical law, and urging either a revision of the Corpus or the preparation of an entirely new code. Their insistence was so successful that some practical outcome seemed possible when the events occured which compelled the prorogation of the Council. It may well be doubted, however, whether in any case an ecumenical council could hope to do more than initiate a work of this kind and indicate the broad lines which it ought to follow.

The idea which had been brought forward so prominently in the Council began almost immediately to assert itself in practice. Laws subsequently made put on a new form, ordinarily appearing in brief paragraphs or articles, disencumbered of superfluous verbiage, and this code-form, as it may be called, was applied to the revision of the law in several of its important departments. Two manifest examples of this new tendency are to be found in the constitution of Leo XIII, "Officiorium ac Munerum," reforming the law of the Index, and in the decree "Conditae a Christo," in which the same Pontiff codified the law regarding religious with simple vows. But in spite of these and other essays in partial codification, we seemed as far off as ever from the desired official restatement of the entire body of ecclesiastical law. Such a project daunted even the boldest advocates of reform. In fact some of the greatest of modern canonists held that the most that could reasonably be hoped for was a kind of piece-meal revision, which should go on its slow way until the whole field had been covered.

There was some warrant in history for this timorousness in face of so gigantic a task. Some 300 years ago four Popes in succession, Gregory XIII, Sixtus V, Clement VIII and Paul V had applied themselves to a much less ambitious undertaking, an official continuation of the Corpus Iuris Canonici, a commission assigned to the work had completed its task, and the only outcome had been the refusal of Pontifical approval to the "Liber Septimus Decretalium," which has been reedited in recent years as an interesting monument of failure in a field where success was as difficult as it was desirable. And yet Cardinal Pinelli and his commission had set about the making not of a code, but of something far less comprehensive, a compilation bridging only a brief span in the life of the Church.

Lapse of time, especially as this time had to be measured by centuries, naturally increased the difficulty of codification, but equally brought home its advisability. Leo XIII listened with sympathy to suggestions that at least a beginning be made, but, realizing what years of labor must precede any successful result, believed that the glory of the new code was not for his pontificate. So it was left for Pius X to do for canon law, not only what no Pope had ever done, but what no Pope had ever attempted to do. The only thing at all comparable with the design of Pius is the work of Justinian in regard to the law of Rome, but even this comparison halts, for the present Codex Iuris Canonici is something more than a selection of texts disposed in more or less orderly fashion, and it renews the law of an empire older and farther extended than that of Rome.

Pope Pius, like Justinian, made possible a mighty work, but we all know that popes and emperors do not single-handed make a code of their own science and labor. Justinian's hopes were realized only because he could rely on the learning and zeal of his great law-minister Tribonian, and Pius X was happy in finding another Tribonian in the present Papal Secretary of State, Cardinal Gasparri. Many others, of course, collaborated, cardinals, bishops, consultors, lay and cleric—but the main burden was borne by this distinguished canonist whose influence and learning guided so novel and arduous an endeavor to success. Benedict XV, at the secret consistory of December 4, 1916, in an unusual tribute of praise openly acknowledged this fact.

Initiated by Pius X in a constitution given on March 19, 1904, the work of codification went forward systematically and without interruption. In supreme control was placed a commission of cardinals, of which the Pope retained the presidency; to this was added a body of consultors representing the best legal talent of the Church; the Bishops of the world were invited to forward to Rome the recommendations based on their experience, and moreover as each book of the code was tentatively completed a copy was sent to every bishop in order that final corrections might be made. In a surprisingly short time, after twelve years of painstaking, unremitting labor, the vast undertaking which not a few had deemed impossible of accomplishment, was completed. The term epoch-making, often enough misused, may appropriately be applied to the volume which Benedict XV now places in our hands.

For we have here a document which is the first of its kind in the long history of the Church. Take up any other collection of church law and you are confronted with a treatise like that of Gratian, or a series of constitutions and decided cases as in the Decretals of Gregory IX; you find the law only after disentangling it from much that is not law: you are disappointed that one compiler was content to group his materials simply in order of time, or that another striving at logical arrangement was satisfied with only a small measure of success. But here you find only law, admirably stated in brief, intelligible language, arranged in orderly sequence and under perfectly logical heads. Here, for the first time, is the entire law and not the law of a period. Here, too, for the first time we have a code in the actual sense of the term, like in form to the modern codes adopted by so many nations since France set an example in the Code Napoléon.

Novel, therefore, in a real sense this latest compilation is; but at the same time we must not forget what was said at the outset, that the code while new is yet old. A society like the Church, ancient but eternally renewing her youth, and whose law is mainly the expression of a life that in its essential features is unchanging, cannot be expected to sponsor any large legal innovations. Such changes as come through force of circumstances will always be only in form and in accidental details, never in what we must regard as the substantial, organic law of the Church. Unless one bear this in mind, he will open the new code too expectant of novelty, and will be disappointed.

It is the innovations of the code, nevertheless, that provoke our curiosity. Grouped together they are, in addition to the deleting effect on all other laws and collections of law; (1) the restating of all current law in brief articles or canons; (2) the exclusion of everything but law; (3) some alterations of preexisting legislation and some entirely new provisions, of varying importance; (4) the elimination of all obsolete and conflicting enactments; (5) the uniform simplicity and definiteness of the Latin text. To the canonist every one of these is significant. The layman will probably find them—apart from their value as giving a good general description of the code—of very unequal interest. His chief concern will be to know in what terms the law speaks to him. And if, to satisfy his curiosity, he take up a copy of the new law book, he may well judge the enumeration given above, regarded merely as a description, to be strikingly defective in regard to one particular—call it innovation or what you will—for it is surely worthy of mention that the law of the Catholic Church has been gathered into one comparatively small, well-printed octavo volume of only 448 pages.

EDWIN RYAN, D.D.

OF all the amazing news that is coming to us these days in such abundance as well-nigh to dull our sense of the wonderful, perhaps no item strikes the imagination more forcibly and summons up livelier memories than that the English are in Jerusalem. A new chapter is added to a story that was ancient when Christ was born and that possesses for humanity an interest rivaled only by that of the other sacred city on the Tiber. Indeed, rivaled is a misleading word in this connection, for are not the two linked by the bond of the Old Dispensation with the New? And were not the Popes the vitalizing spirit of the Crusades, those heroic ventures of faith whose superb idealism puts to shame the shallow "practicality" and selfishness of our own day? Nor can we forget such names as James, Helen, Cyril, Epiphanius, and many another, that cling to the city which thrilled at the sound of David's harp, was dazzled by the glory of Solomon and lived in the hope of weeping exiles in Babylon, the City of the Temple of the Living God where, after generations and centuries of the slaughter of sheep and of goats, was consummated the sacrifice of that Spotless Victim whose blood cleanseth us of all sin. However, it is not on these holy themes that I write. My purpose at present is to recall an event that at first may appear to have no interest for Catholics, an affair so grotesquely ridiculous that one feels almost irreverent in mentioning it at all, after suggesting the golden visions of Jewish and of Christian achievement. But one of the lessons the Catholic student of history must learn is that nothing may safely be despised, for God can make anything, even absurdity, minister unto His glory. And there comes upon us a feeling of awe that drowns any inclination to laughter when we remind ourselves that the concerted attempt of England and Prussia years ago to plant themselves and their religion in the Holy City helped to bring Newman into the Catholic Church.

The story in brief is this: Back in the thirties of the last century the Government of the Kingdom of Prussia conceived the plan of uniting the Lutheran and the Calvinist bodies in its dominions into a new national church. Certain changes were to be introduced, among others an improved form of episcopacy; for the Prussians knew that a church with bishops appointed by the State is more easily controlled than any other kind. Now this was something in the nature of an experiment and had to be gone through with care; so Prussia set about finding a way to attempt it without involving too great a risk of trouble in case of failure. At last she hit on a plan. In those days Prussia and England, far from being enemies, were filled with admiration for each other, conceiving themselves the bulwarks of vigorous northern Protestantism against the Popery of effete Southern Europe. Hence when the former Prussia wanted a model and helper in a religious enterprise to whom should she go but to her codefender of the Gospel? The matter was discussed by the two Governments with the result that in 1841 the British Parliament passed a bill providing for the consecration of > British subjects, or the subjects or citizens of any foreign State, to be Bishops in any foreign country, whether such foreign subjects or citizens be or be not subjects or citizens of the country in which they are to act, and . . . . without requiring such of them as may be subjects or citizens of any foreign kingdom or State to take the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, and the oaths of due obedience to the Archbishop for the time being . . . . [and] that such Bishop or Bishops, so consecrated, may exercise, within such limits, as may from time to time be assigned for that purpose in such foreign countries by Her Majesty, spiritual jurisdiction over the ministers of British congregations of the United Church of England and Ireland, and over such other Protestant Congregations as may be desirous of placing themselves under his or their authority.

Back of this technical legal phraseology was an agreement that England and Prussia were to take turns in appointing a bishop in a foreign country, the bishop to be a sort of link between the Prussian and the English Churches, and, if the scheme worked well, it would be fairly easy for Prussia to use it as an entering wedge for episcopal organization at home. A region at a safe distance was sought and perhaps on the principle Fiat experimentum in corpore vili the enlisted powers chose, of all places on earth, Jerusalem!

The absurdity of the whole business is apparent at once to a Catholic; it was painfully apparent to Newman. As he put it:

> We have not a single Anglican in Jerusalem, so we are sending a Bishop to make a communion, not to govern our people. Next, the excuse is, that there are converted Anglican Jews there who require a Bishop; I am told there are not half-a-dozen. . . . Thirdly, for the sake of Prussia, he (the Bishop) is to take under him all the foreign Protestants who will come; and the political advantages will be so great, from the influence of England, that there is no doubt they will come. They are to sign the Confession of Augsburg, and there is nothing to show that they hold the doctrine of Baptismal Regeneration.

Of course the Anglican Bishops tried to hush the matter up but that only increased the disgust of the Oxford group. These argued: If it is wrong to approach more closely to Catholic Rome, the Patriarchal See of the West, why is it not wrong to fraternize with Protestant Berlin? And how is one to defend the "catholicity" of the Anglican Church when she allies herself with an avowedly Protestant body and takes under her protection persons whose creed is worlds away from Apostolic and Patristic tradition? The difficulty is stated by Newman himself in the "Apologia" (American edition, 1866, Part V, ad finem).

> This was the third blow, which finally shattered my faith in the Anglican Church. . . . Such acts as were in progress led me to the gravest suspicion, not that it would soon cease to be a Church, but that it had never been a Church all along.

And then, after reproducing his correspondence with the Archbishop of Canterbury on the subject, he concludes:

> As to the project of a Jerusalem Bishopric, I never heard of any good or harm it has ever done, except what it has done for me; which many think a great misfortune, and I one of the greatest of mercies. It brought me on to the beginning of the end.

By these words he invests with a sort of sacredness what is in itself only one of those many foolish acts by which the Church of England betrays from time to time its un-Catholic character.

The rest of the affair does not concern us directly but since we have begun the story we may as well finish it. Three "bishops" were sent out, to exercise jurisdiction over all Anglicans and Lutherans in Syria, Chaldea, Egypt and Abyssinia, a rather extensive and difficult contract. The first, appointed by England, was Michael Samuel Alexander (1842-45); then Prussia's turn came, and the Germans appointed Samuel Gobat von Cremines (1845-79); then England again had the selection and chose Joseph Barclay (1879-81). With him the entente ended, though the Anglicans, no longer contaminated by Lutheran Prussia, have, or had before the war, a Bishop "in" Jerusalem, whatever that means. This arrangement dates from 1887. He seems to have run pretty well with the Oriental Schismatics; and, by an odd chance, the school the Anglicans now have, was founded by the only one of the first group of three bishops that was a Prussian. It is rather confused all round, and those with a taste for Anglican controversy will find in this episode an excellent weapon. But for myself I am content to consider it solely as one of the providential means of giving to God's Church a convert whom some consider the greatest since the Reformation. Verily, De Sion exibit lex, et verbum Domini de Jerusalem.

Whence Come They?

DANIEL A. LORD, S.J.

A FAMOUS scientist once remarked in a vaunting mood that given matter and force he could construct the universe. The boast sounds like an echo of old Archimedes' vaunting offer that, given a lever and a fulcrum, he could move the earth. Each had little fear that his boast would be taken up. Possibly both the scientist and his Grecian predecessor thought that they could make good their brag; certainly the Greek set himself the far simpler task. But in either case, the instruments needed for the contemplated operations were admittedly beyond the power of the boasters; each felt his incapacity to furnish himself with the needed material and tools. The difference between them lies in the fact that Archimedes never expected anyone to furnish him with his gigantic toys, while the scientist could take his matter and force as actually existing and patent facts.

Matter and force and the directive Intelligence separate from them were the three factors which together brought the visible universe to its present state of development. The question arising immediately is whether that Intelligence, like the boastful scientist, was "given" matter and force to work with, just as the architect is given his bricks and steel and concrete and the power of his donkey engine. Are matter and force beings which exist by the force of their own nature and quite independently of any outside agency, or do they owe not merely their direction but their actual existence to the gigantic Intelligence which ordered them?

To answer this question we must apply to matter and force the two principles without which any scientific investigation would be as futile as questioning a parrot: Nothing begins to be without some cause capable of producing it; and, nothing exists without a sufficient reason to account for its existence. These are the principles which have enabled scientists, from a handful of flint arrows and a bit of broken pottery, to ascertain pretty exactly the intellectual development and culture of races that perished before the plans of the pyramids were drawn, and to plot out, from a knowledge of the Pennsylvania coalbeds, the vast, marshy forests that bloomed at a period when fish spawned on the peaks of the Rockies. A slight variation in the orbit of some planet is sufficient to show that some unknown and as yet unseen body is drawing it from its course. The presence of a characteristic unexplained by known elements led Madame Curie to the discovery of radium. Indeed the principles enunciated are the commonplaces of every scientific experiment. So if matter and force began at some time to exist, they must have had a cause sufficient to produce them; if they have been eternal, still they must have some reason sufficient to explain their ex istence.

Our everyday experience has made us acquainted wit the constant appearance of beings in the world that hav their origin in others which in many cases are doome to disappear. We meet everywhere the constantly re curring phenomena of plant life developing and propa gating itself through seeds; we see on every side th mystery of birth and death and the passing on of lif through generations that rise and fall like successiv waves on a beach. Even the water of the seas and th rocks of the mountains were formed from the union o elements which in a prehistoric past bore but slight su perficial resemblance to the forms they assumed in com position. We are, in fact, surrounded by links in a chai of causes and effects, which traces its beginnings to period which no mathematician has as yet computed.

The mind is staggered at the idea that this chain o causes and effects has been in existence from eternity that there really was no first cause. In fact, as wa previously noted, such an hypothesis simply destroys th theory of evolution, for in an infinite duration matte and force should certainly have attained an infinite per fection, a thing which no sane man claims for them. Sup posing then that they did exist eternally but only bega to evolve themselves at a definite time in the past, w have an hypothesis which this time plays hob with th established law of inertia. For a body at rest by th force of its nature continues to stay in that state unles moved by some outside agency. A stone lying in th Grand Cañon will lie there until it is weathered into dus unless some tourist pitches it into the rushing strea or some earthquake jars it from its resting place, or som other external force rudely moves it from its positio That is kindergarten science. So the idea of matter an force, which had been from eternity quiescent, suddenl springing into motion, indicates clearly that some othe force must have been there to cause that first motio In this case we have another indication of the influenc of the directive Intelligence on the matter and forc of the universe.

The extreme unlikelihood and even impossibility o an eternal series of causes and effects force us ultimatel to a first cause which gave the rest existence or at lea set in motion that long course of evolution. This fir cause was itself either caused by some other cause, or was the cause of itself, or it always existed and this b the force of its own nature. As it was the first caus obviously it was not brought into existence by some othe cause. The problem of a thing not yet in existence bein the cause of itself makes the trick of lifting one's self b the bootstraps seem the simplest athletic exercise. So if there was a first cause, which itself had no cause, it must have had an eternal existence due to its own inherent nature.

Such a being differs essentially from any other being in the range of experience. For every being we know from actual experience has the reason for its existence not in itself but in some other being. Conceive then a chain of causes and effects stretching back as far as you wish, even into eternity: corn producing grains and the grains fresh stalks; birds laying the eggs which are nurtured into small, gaping-mouthed fledglings. In each individual case the reason for the new being lay in the fact that a previous being had produced it, and since any one of a thousand or a million possible misfortunes, the dropping of the seed on a rock or the addling of the egg in the sun, could have prevented its coming into existence, each cause might easily have failed to act, and each effect was no more inevitable than are the pansies which the amateur gardener hopes to see sprouting from the seeds he trustfully planted. In fact, whole races of plants and animals, like the famous extinct race of trilobites, completely dropped out of existence, leaving behind no trace save bits of fossil embedded in the forming rock. And man himself for all his superlative gifts of mind and will finds traces of whole nations of beings like himself which some unknown disaster swept completely from the records of the past.

Not one single link in the chain but owes its forging to some outside agency; not one link but depends on a hundred doubtful circumstances; not one link which by the very force of its nature had to come into existence. We have in consequence a chain made up of links each one of which does not have the reason for its existence in itself but which depends on some other being; and it must be remembered that no chain is stronger than its weakest link. So if no single link is self-existing, the whole chain has the reason for its existence not in itself but in something outside of itself. And unless that being is self-existing and contains within its own nature the reason for its existence we have to continue our search until at last we come to a being that does exist by the force of its nature, and that owes the reason for its existence to itself alone. Make then the chain eternal if you wish; still each single link and hence the whole chain by their very nature demand some being which does not owe its existence to someone else but which exists because it is its nature to exist. And once more we are driven back to a first cause which differs essentially from all other beings in this universe and on which all other beings necessarily depend.

So matter and force not only owe their direction to something outside of themselves, but they depend upon this outside agency for their very existence. Now comes the question of how that outside agency, that directive Intelligence brought them into existence. Obviously, it did not find them ready to hand, for if it did, then they are actually independent beings and in no way relying on the outside agency, the theory which our essay in armchair philosophy has been disproving. The directive Intelligence then must have produced them since they owe it their existence. This could have happened in either of two ways: either matter and force are parts of this self-existent Being, or they were called into existence, which they did not before possess. Certainly matter and force are not parts of the directive Intelligence, for that would drive us back once more to Pantheism with all its absurdities. So we are forced to admit that the Intelligence which directs the universe called matter and force into being, nothing but Itself previously existing. That is what we call the act of creation.

The unbelieving philosopher and essayist, whose sense of humor if often strikingly redundant, has had titillating fun laughing at the Christian God whom he loves to describe as a doddering old man seated on a glittering throne, surrounded by bored angels and saints, and occasionally breaking the monotony by wielding the lightning. Unfortunately that is humor without any point, for the essayist not only made the joke but the god as well. The Christian God is not a sort of super-minister in black coat and starched tie, with, possibly, a wabbly tiara. He is the infinite Intelligence which put order and plan into a world which without Him would be chaos. He is a being distinct from the world and hence enjoying a personal existence, an existence which He owes to none but Himself. We find Him exercising in the creative act a power which surpasses all powers we know anything about. It is not the man who adores such a God that is the fool. The fool is he who prefers no God, or a god of his own making, even if that god have clay feet, or wear the image of imperfect man.

The Seal of Consecration

JOHN WILTBYE

EVEN in New York and on Chicago's West Side, there are a great many people, I suppose, hardworking citizens and suffragettes, sane in most respects, who occasionally wonder what a Catholic priest is, and if so, why? If submitted to a process of evaporation, they would probably crystallize their knowledge in the definition that a priest is an Irishman who buttons his celluloid collar in the back, and that he is so because he was crossed in love. Beyond this point, obviously inadequate, since some priests have been known to collar themselves with the choicest of Troy's fabrics, and others are undeniably English, or even undoubted descendants of one of the twelve tribes of Israel, their misinformation does not go. They are blood-brothers, many of them, to the Exeter Hall pamphleteer who strayed into the Birmingham Oratory while Father Gordon was lighting the candles for Benediction, and by sitting down to take notes, gave Newman an opportunity to endow him with immortality.

> Another young priest came in with a long wand in his hand . . . Another young priest: he thinks we were born priests; "priest" is a sort of race or animal, or production, as oxen or sheep may be, and there are young priests and old priests, and black priests and white priests, and perhaps men priests and women priests; and so in came this "other young priest" with a wand.

Still, I am not disposed to criticize these estimable citizens and suffragettes because of their large and interesting store of misinformation. Priests do not force themselves upon the multitude, proffering a thumb-nail biography. If there is a plague or a fire or an earthquake, you will find them about, intent upon their business; for the rest they keep much to themselves, devoting their time, as befits men of their high profession, to their round of duties. "The man in the street," then, is more to be pitied than blamed for his misinformation, but he is to be blamed and not pitied at all, when he insists that his knowledge of priests, and how they became so, is identical with the ultimate truth.

Now the "celluloid collar and Celtic theory" is disproved by a glance at the "Catholic Directory," and a casual inspection of the next dozen priests one chances to meet. I saw three today, and I am sure all have a laundry bill. The "crossed in love" hypothesis, not subject, it is true, to the test of visual inspection, can be sustained by any number of sugar-and-water romances, but I search in vain the archives of my own experience and that of others, for any confirmation based on fact. It is about as true as the idea made popular by our brilliant American stage, that nuns employ most of their time in playing with cats, birds, and similar small deer, and, when astronomical conditions warrant, turn tear-dimmed eyes to the summer moon, maundering on the dear dead days beyond recall, the while they recite verses of the well-known "The hours I spent with thee, dear heart" variety. A world which accepts this sort of nun should regard with gratitude, and not with bitterness, the abbess of fiction, who was wont to immure those of her community whose conduct evinced such unconventual tendencies. From what I know of monasteries, convents and the priesthood, I have a well-grounded suspicion that the requirements of these several states of life would prove anything but soothing to a broken heart. Charming indeed is it, to individuals of a sentimental tendency, to clothe themselves in the flowing robes of religion, insisting always upon a habit of a becoming cut, and then, through an atmosphere of incense and many creature-comforts, to glide calmly and sweetly into the hollow tomb, as Mr. Micawber would say (or is it Mr. Toots?), followed by the plaudits of the good and great, and, especially, by the wild sobs of the "heart-breaker," the cause of this singular vocation. But it is quite another thing to get out of bed of a winter's morning, at an hour when even self-respecting chickens are still a-roost; it is not in any sense inspiring to spend one's God-given talents in correcting little Cissy O'Brien's firm persuasion that seven times six is thirty-five; and it is not at all like the religious odor of incense to try to induce some bottle-scarred veteran of your parish to give up the drink for the sake of the children. Next to the Church the consecrated life is the most real thing in the world. It has no root in puppy love, and no use for the soul that shrouds itself in a mist of sentimentality, which the romancers attribute to a broken heart, but which in reality is only a form of barren selfishness.

But if this sort of blighted affection never leads to the sanctuary, I can readily conceive that there are high-souled men and women who have known the best that pure human affection can give, and have rejected it, because of a call to the higher life. There is nothing of self, no trace of weak "sentiment" in giving up the dearest thing in life, and sacrifice is the rock upon which such vocations are founded. The soul knows the sweetness of human love, yet relinquishes it, to give itself completely to the most excellent love of Jesus Christ. Readers of Henry Harland will recall how this theme is developed most charmingly, and with an insight vouchsafed only to a Catholic, in "My Friend Prospero." Winthorpe, a Unitarian, cultured, of an old family, and secure in worldly fortune, becomes a Catholic, and shortly thereafter discovers a vocation to the priesthood. His betrothed, "who should have scratched his eyes out," gives instead, her approval, and employs herself in "scrubbing the floors of an Ursuline convent as a novice." "And there are two lives spoiled" says the cynical world in the person of Prospero:

> Oh, no, no, contended Maria Dolores, earnestly. Not spoiled. On the contrary. It is sad, in a way, if you like, but it is very beautiful, it is heroic. Their love must have been a very beautiful love, that could lead them to such self-sacrifice. Two lives given to God. . . . What you call an inhuman story, seems to me a wonderfully noble one.

In his recent play, "Unmade in Heaven" (Dodd, Mead), Mr. Bradford treats the same theme, although he is not so inhuman as to adopt the counsel of Hamlet, and send the lady into a nunnery. Hardinge, a believer in nothing in particular, is engaged to a devout Catholic girl, Eleanor Wade. Falling under the influence of a certain "Father White," he becomes a Catholic, a fact which prepares the wedding bells to ring out their glad message to the April skies. But the music dies in their throats, as Hardinge announces his intention of becoming a priest, and, although feeling that she shall never again know happiness, Eleanor gives her consent. The sacrifice that tears the heart-strings of both, is treated with reverence and delicacy, and the play closes with a scene which draws its rare dramatic power from the fact that it springs from truth. Their marriage, the union of two finely wrought souls, with all that it meant to each, has been "Unmade in Heaven."

I cannot accept Mr. Bradford's "Father Nelson," and I fear that the grounds of conversion advanced by the heroine's mother and finally reached by Hardinge are the basis of a pseudo-mysticism, rather than of Catholicism. Furthermore, I do not escape the feeling that in Mr. Bradford's scheme of things, vocation to the priesthood necessarily follows a keen and ardent realization of the supernatural. The primal vocation of every Christian is to advance towards union with God through charity. He finds the means best suited to attain that end, in the state of life to which he is called by Almighty God. That state is not necessarily sacerdotal. The Roman martyrology enshrines the name of more than one comedian, and from that sacred record, the butcher, the baker, and the candlestick maker are not excluded. Nor does personal sanctity, a living, ever-widening realization of the worth of the things of God, necessarily lead that happy soul into the sanctuary, as the beautiful life of Francis of Assisi, and thousands of holy persons in every state of life, bears ample witness.

No doubt, the theologian and the ascetic can detect other shortcomings in this fine play, but we have to thank Mr. Bradford for a sympathy with things Catholic, as grateful as it is unusual. His great merit is that he sees clearly the dominant Catholic idea that there can be no Christianity without the Cross. "The world of today needs just such examples of really giving up something, really giving up everything—for God only, for God always, and all in all." He that loseth his life shall find it. Our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ was no dreamy mystic, but the God-Man who took upon Himself the burdens of suffering humanity, freely, gladly. His love of the sinner, His tenderness with little children, His tears at the grave of His friend Lazarus, have invested Him in the eyes of the world, with a halo of surpassing human beauty. But the message of His life was sacrifice. He had joy set before Him, but He chose the Cross. These things He did for our salvation, our solace in tribulation, and for an example. If it is sweet to love, it is sweeter to suffer for those we love, and in the Catholic ideal, it is Jesus, God at once and our brother in the flesh through His Incarnation, who is the first beloved. Not thwarted ambition, not broken hopes, form the priest of God, but that free choice of the cause of Christ, offered to those whom He calls, and made possible by a practical realization of the first and greatest commandment.

A Spiritual Ambassador

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In your issue of December 1 a most interesting article, with the title "A Spiritual Ambassador," contains an extract from the Rt. Rev. Lord Abbot of Caldey, which is in part as follows:

> These are called late vocations. . . . At the present time, so far as we know, there is in the British Isles no place where men can be received [into a seminary or the novitiate of a religious house until they have been tested and prepared, and have acquired a knowledge of Latin], nor is there any machinery for dealing with them.

The present writer began mensa with many other men at Mount Melleray Seminary, where the Cistercian Fathers have been educating students for the missions for more than seventy years. Scores of men would never have reached the altar but for them, who, thanks to the Melleray Monks, are now good priests in the United States, Canada, Newfoundland, England, Scotland, Australia and elsewhere.

Catholic Chaplains

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The transatlantic mails work rather slowly. I have only received within the last few days the issues of AMERICA of November 3 and November 10. This will explain why it is a month after date that I send you information to correct a statement made in an article in the issue for November 3, in which it is stated by Mr. Charles Dawson that "the English troops in Salonika and Mesopotamia are wholly without priests." If this were true it would be a sad reflection on the zeal of our priests in Great Britain and Ireland, and on the organizing intelligence of the Catholic Hierarchy and the British War Office. Happily the statement is not correct.

I knew it was not correct when I read it, because I have friends acting as chaplains out East, but before replying I communicated with Archbishop's House, Westminster, and I have the following reply from the department that, in concert with the War Office, has been arranging for the supply of Catholic chaplains:

> There have been Catholic chaplains in both Mesopotamia and Salonika from the very beginning of the campaign. At the present moment there are in Mesopotamia fifty Catholic chaplains, the full strength of the War Office establishment there. In Salonika there are about forty now.
> Owing to transferences in the Mediterranean it is difficult to say at any given moment how many chaplains there are in an area, but the above for Salonika is substantially correct.

Catholics have been treated with a generous liberality by the British Government in this matter of the provision of chaplains. As for Mesopotamia, there was even a chaplain at the advanced post at Kut-el-Amara when it was besieged. He came from India with the first troops that landed in the Persian Gulf. Every expeditionary force has been accompanied by Catholic chaplains on all the fronts, and chaplains are also provided for the training camps at home. I am sure you will be glad to correct the misleading statement made in Mr. Dawson's article, with the help of this information.

Isleworth, England. A. HILLIARD ATTERIDGE.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I have been tempted to write to you after reading Father Davitt's letter, deploring the lack of chaplains in Camp MacArthur, Texas, which appeared in your issue of December 15. Great as is the need of additional Catholic chaplains at that camp, I believe there is a still greater need here in Camp McClellan. We have here about 30,000 federalized National Guardsmen, who hail from Delaware, Maryland, New Jersey, Virginia and the District of Columbia and form the Twenty-ninth Division. Of these, it is claimed by Y. M. C. A. workers, that 1,500 are Hebrews, and that there are at least as many more who profess or practise no religion whatsoever. Of the remainder, it is estimated after careful examination, that at least 13,500 are Catholics. There are fourteen non-Catholic chaplains, all in the service of the Government, to minister to the spiritual needs of non-Catholics, but there is not a single regularly appointed Catholic chaplain to look after the welfare of the men of the Catholic Faith. The only priests in Camp McClellan are the Rev. Charles O'Gallagher and the writer of this letter, both laboring under the auspices of the Knights of Columbus.

It is inspiring to witness the faith and devotion of the men, and it is heartrending to see so many kept away from the Sacraments through lack of sufficient priests to hear confessions. Four Masses are celebrated in the camp on Sundays, the last being celebrated in the open air, weather permitting. This open-air Mass is not a matter of choice but of necessity, since the K. of C. building can accommodate only about one-third of the congregation usually present at this service. On Sunday, December 16, Bishop Allen of Mobile administered the Sacrament of Confirmation to a class of fifty-five soldiers, fourteen of whom had but recently sought admission to the Church; twenty-five others had just received First Communion. Doubtless other earnest seekers after truth, and there are many such here, would become members of the Church, if opportunities were offered of coming in contact with Catholic priests. Perhaps the most saddening feature of the whole situation is that there are numerous "stray sheep" who could be led back to the fold if there were only enough shepherds to go in search of them. Unfortunately these same men, brave, noble and self-sacrificing, may soon be called upon to cross the seas and to offer the supreme sacrifice, without having had an opportunity of making their peace with God.

Some Irish, Old and New

To the Editor of AMERICA:

An old Holy Cross College boy, of the class of '61, begs your indulgence and asks for a little space in your paper to add a humble contribution to the discussion of the above-named subject. For years the Americans of Irish descent have been obliged to listen to ignorant sneers and vulgar slurs hurled at them by the "ould country Irish"; I recall a few of them, namely, "country-born," "second crop" and "Yankee-born." Our girls were contemptuously referred to as "narrow-backs" and other disparaging terms were applied to them which I am unable to remember at the present time. Internal discord has wrought great havoc on the Irish nation; years of grinding poverty put servility into the very marrow of some people, but the history of the United States proves to my mind that Irishmen, when leaving Ireland, brought more virtue than vices to their adopted land, and my reply to such types of Irish who sneer at the sons of the "old stock" is that no logic can pierce the armor-plate of ignorance. Clannishness breeds ignorance; a Catholic education is the only cure to instruct the minds of those who are steeped in provincial illiteracy. Let us hope that this excellent prescription will be widely used.

Boston. PHILIP J. LIBBY.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I trust you will allow an interested reader to express his hope that the old Irish courtesy and broadmindedness may prevail in the discussion which seems to have been opened by yourself and Thomas F. Woodlock under the title "Some Irish, Old and New."

Suppose I were to suggest that in Ireland the people are and were demoralized by the real original John Bull, whereas here we seem in many cases to cower before a second-rate imitation or understudy John Bull, would that be a violation of the counsel of perfection with which I have begun? The average, everyday American is anything but an understudy of the transatlantic cousin, as the course of the war will demonstrate; still it cannot be denied that there is a noisy and perhaps influential group in this country who think London is the place for real folk to live, when the war in the air is over.

One notices persons with Irish names who have learned, maybe in Harvard, maybe in "society," to echo the anti-Irish blunders of the Anglomaniacs. These "society" Irish probably voted for Mitchel in New York, and pooh-poohed the AMERICA and Extension protests against Mexican outrages. They take good care to keep mum about the Pope's peace proposals, and they are painfully shocked by the manly protests of AMERICA and of Cardinal Bourne against the vulgar and malignant misrepresentations of those proposals in the jingo press of London; or rather, they took their cue from the Anglomaniacs, and pretended to be shocked.

Your Anglomaniac and his imitator with an Irish name have as little use for English democrats as they have for manly men in Ireland. And when Mitchel and his supporters opened their chivalrous campaign against the New York Sisterhoods, there was quite a list of Irish names among the holier-than-thou devotees who were edified by their chivalry. Other persons with Irish names, who cannot boast of the enlightenment of Harvard or Yale, or of the fine social polish of the "four hundred," but who happen to know a little Irish history, will recall the folk O'Connell apologized for emancipating and their predecessors and successors in the Old Land. In modern Ireland the revival of the old language has given back to the people an expressive label for this whole class of ultra-respectable persons in Ireland and in America who are ashamed of their ancestry; they are bluntly named "shoneens," which merely means that they are what they strive to be, second-hand, if somewhat misunderstood, imitations of what they imagine the English aristocracy to be.

It is not of much importance whether there be a greater proportion of this class of people in Ireland, where English policy is willing and able to produce it, than in America, where no really powerful agencies work for the same end. In America, indeed, the very spirit and genius of the country acts for the most part in the opposite direction, and tends to create self-respect, self-reliance, and the highest type of manly character. At all events, that is what the manlier men of Ireland have always thought about America. It is also a merely academic question whether the shoneen in Ireland or the shoneen in America be the less excusable for being what he is. The practical question is twofold: First, we must make it our business that his tribe does not increase; and second, we must not allow him to pose as the authentic representative of our race in Ireland or in America. If we, like other races, must know our history and use it, let it warn us against the peril of false brethren at all events, so that we may insist that as they have gone out from us, they stay out where they belong. Like the outgoing Mayor of New York, they are a liability and not an asset to any side they join.

In this day of world democracy we can ill afford to have our race and our religion identified with admirers and imitators of aristocracy, whether genuine or brummagem, whether in England or in America. We owe it to ourselves, to our race and creed, and also to America, to be identified with the democratic ideal which the war will realize in Germany and also in England. Genuine friendship with England requires that all Americans be heart and soul with the democrats of England and not with the feudal oligarchy which those democrats want to abolish. And such sympathy would be one of the best safeguards against the shoneenism that weakens and disgraces our race and our creed, in Ireland as well as in America.

The Geographical Magazine's Hagiology

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The National Geographical Magazine for October, in a description of the flags of the British Empire, confesses it is at a loss to account for certain facts concerning the flag, and unconsciously the writer of the description confesses a very rudimentary knowledge of British history. The English flag has a Greek cross on it called the cross of St. George, a white saltier called the cross of St. Andrew, and a red saltier known as the cross of St. Patrick. These two decussate crosses were added to the English flag in 1801 after the legislative union of Great Britain and Ireland, possibly to indicate by heraldry the "double crossing" of the Irish by Castlereagh.

Among the many facts that the writer does not know is how St. Andrew became patron of Scotland. The article tells us St. Andrew was martyred in the year 69 A. D. at Papras. He was not. He was martyred November 30, in the year 60, by the Roman governor Æglas at Patræ in Achaia. The tradition is that the cross used was an X cross, crux decussata (decussis, the symbol for the number ten). Caimnech, a disciple of St. Colum-Cille, founded a church of St. Andrew at Kilrimont across the Firth of Forth from Edinburgh, and as early as 908 Cellach (Kelly), Bishop of this St. Andrew's, was primate of Scotland. The patron of the primatial see naturally became the patron of the kingdom.

The writer says: "The use of St. Patrick's cross is in defiance of all ecclesiastical usage and custom because St. Patrick never suffered martyrdom. . . . It is said that he was never canonized, but that his sainthood, like his cross, is due to popular error." He tells us St. Patrick was born in Scotland near where Glasgow now stands about the middle of the fifth century and lived ninety years; that he found Ireland a land of barbarism and left it a seat of learning and piety. He was born at Kilpatrick near Dumbarton toward the end of the fourth century and he died March 17, 493, at the age of 106 years.

The Catholic doctrine of veneration of the saints is as old as the Church, and from the very beginning the cultus of the martyrs was formal. Bishops or primates officially declared that a given person was really a martyr for the Faith, a saint, and this episcopal sanction was necessary for the restricted territory under the jurisdiction of the bishop. Formal recognition by the Bishop of Rome was necessary to make a martyr's cultus universal. Bishops canonically punished those who venerated martyrs before the formal recognition.

In the fourth century this technical recognition of confessors was in operation, but some authorities, Bellarmine for instance, think it is uncertain when confessors became the objects of Christian veneration. Bellarmine says we do not find confessors spoken of as such before the year 800, when the feasts of Sts. Martin and Remigius are mentioned in the catalogue of saints drawn up by the Council of Mainz. The reason St. Patrick was not formally canonized, in the modern sense of the term, is that he lived too early in the history of the Church. His so-called cross is not a popular error, but a very modern invention and not popular at all.

The saying that his sainthood is a popular error was probably not meant to be taken in its crude apparent foolishness. It seems to be an example of obscure rhetoric trying to express the notion that St. Patrick was never formally canonized. He is classed as a martyr in very early martyrologies because of the numerous attempts at assassination made against him during his apostolate in Ireland. In one of these attempts a javelin hurled at him killed the charioteer standing beside him. All authorities agree that Patrick was one of the greatest saints in the whole history of the Christian Church. His work for good has had a wider extension than that of any apostle since the first century, because the christianization of Europe from the Hebrides to Milan and southeast to Bulgaria was the work of Irishmen, the spiritual children of St. Patrick. Zimmer's essay on the "Irish Element in Medieval Culture" gives a scientific and disinterested account of this work.

The writer in the Geographical Magazine says that St. Patrick found Ireland "A land of barbarism and left it a seat of learning and piety." This is a half-truth. He left it a seat of learning and piety, but it is surprising the editor of the magazine should be so wanting in scholarship as to let pass the statement that Ireland at the advent of St. Partick was barbarous. If space permitted it would be a mere mechanical task to show the unpardonable lack of historical knowledge in this remark, but the Irish epic the "Tain Bo Chuailgne," which was in existence about three centuries before Christ, would alone overset this irritating nonsense. The only epic of growth in all human literature that approaches in excellence the Tain is the Iliad, which is largely a Greek version of the Celtic sagas in the Tain. These were left to Homer by the Grecian Celts.

When the Germanic barbarians were destroying the civilization of Europe in St. Patrick's time the single oasis of learning in northern Europe was Ireland, and it remained the chief repository of learning for all northern and middle Europe until those other Germanic barbarians, the Norsemen and Danes, ravaged it. See books like Hyde's "Literary History of Ireland" and the remainder of the library. Long before St. Patrick's time the Irish "barbarians" invented rhyme as it is now used in all the literatures of the world. The first European love songs were Irish, as was the first European dictionary. From the fifth to the seventh century the Irish preserved literature for Europe. Ferghal, the Irish Bishop of Salsburg, in 745 proved the rotundity of the earth. As Green says, from the sixth to the eighth century the Irish influence on Christianity was such that "For a time it seemed as if . . . Celtic and not Latin Christianity was to mold the destinies of the churches of the West." Ireland had the first federal government after Rome, and it had it long before St. Patrick's time. All the monasteries of middle and northern Europe in the early Middle Ages were taught music, mathematics and Greek by Irishmen, and all modern triple-phrase music is Irish in origin. The Irish never persecuted any race on the face of the earth, but they have carried the peace of Christ to the four quarters of the world. We never were barbarians and we are not such now. The last grace of genuine comedy is necessary to any great literature and every genuine comedy in the English language was written by an Irishman except those Congreve made, and he was educated in Ireland. Shakespeare's comedies are no comedies in the proper sense of the term. The Irishman Kelvin made modern navigation possible, as the Irishman Fulton made the steamboat, and the Fenian Holland made the submarine, and the half-Irishman Marconi made the wireless telegraph. The two great orators in English were Burke and O'Connell. And our soldiers, God bless them! have reddened every fair field of the world with the blood of gentlemen; and, by the Rock of Cashel, they always fought like gentlemen, never like barbarians.

St. Vincent de Paul Society

In a recent issue of AMERICA L. E. enumerates some shortcomings of the St. Vincent de Paul Society, practically admitting, since he endeavors to defend or at least excuse it, the failure of the society to provide adequate relief, to keep records and to cooperate with other relief agencies. This criticism, as well as L. E.'s admission is unjust because he cannot be in a position to know whether these conditions, existing in one or two Conferences, are verified in all. His letter sins in that he universalizes the deficiencies of one Conference. Unfortunately scarcely two Conferences seem to follow identical methods, a state of affairs which is due to the fact that each is conducted along lines which happen to suit its spiritual director. Methods of relief are as numerous as pastors.

For a number of years I have been a member of a Conference which provides adequate relief, keeps records and cooperates with others laboring in the same field. Many people have a false idea of the meaning of adequate relief. It does not mean permanent assistance. Relief is essentially temporary, i.e., during need, and no charitable organization is or can be expected to provide a constant source of subsistence for anyone. Every case is provided for adequately, if present needs are met and assistance discontinued when the needy are in a position to help themselves. Relief is not merely help; it has a purpose, namely, to tide over the poor until they can help themselves.

As for records, they are absolutely necessary for systematic and intelligent relief work. They are tabooed in many Conferences because they reflect too much of modern philanthropy; card-indexing particularly is held in holy horror. However, because this method has been subject to abuse we need not condemn it. St. Vincent de Paul himself did not disdain to keep records. "The poor should not be labeled and catalogued; their personal affairs should be sacred." So be it. In our parish a census was taken last fall; the good pastor asked more intimate questions about myself and family than would ever be necessary in any application for relief. Nevertheless my answers were checked off on a card; now I am probably labeled and catalogued but I presume it is all "sacred" as well. Up-to-date business methods do not imply the sacrifice of any rule or principle of the society; for intelligent work they are absolutely necessary and should be adopted.

The third criticism is lack of cooperation with other agencies. From the spiritual standpoint there is of course no comparison. The field is exclusively that of the St. Vincent de Paul Society, though other societies encourage affiliation with a church. From an economic point of view we can obtain as good, if not better, results, provided we see every case to a solution. In this many other agencies fail; aiming primarily at statistics, they close some cases with the statement that they have been referred to "So and So." In other words, instead of solving the difficulty it is shifted elsewhere. We, however, can keep at it until the difficulty no longer exists by using the same means as they do, but not closing the case thereat. Instead of cooperating we should anticipate. Cooperation does not mean the disclosure of private information obtained through the channels of the society to an investigator. Here, too, we have an advantage; because the information we obtain is known to be sacred, we can the more easily learn the truth.

In order to attain success in a St. Vincent de Paul sense we need a much more intelligent use of the means of ameliorating living conditions. The necessity of relief in every instance is due to some individual, either economically misplaced or personally delinquent; and for every case there is a solution. We need not therefore await the arrival of the trained charity worker. We know what "her" procedure will be; we should do it ourselves.

The Epiphany

THE recently published code of canon law, which is to become operative next Pentecost, makes the Epiphany a holiday of obligation throughout the world; and once the new legislation has gone into effect, all Catholics, no matter what their race or habitat, will be obliged under pain of sin, unless excused by a grave reason, to render to God on the sixth of January the supreme act of Divine worship which consists in participation in the Sacrifice of the Mass. With the restoration of the feast to its ancient place as one of the principal solemnities of the ecclesiastical year, it is to be hoped that the Faithful will be directed to pierce through the poetry with which the accretions of centuries have surrounded the day, and to get at the heart of the feast.

The interesting geographical and astrological questions connected with the mysterious Wise Men of the East, the mystical significance of the gifts brought by the Kings from afar to lay at the feet of the Infant Christ, the futility of the efforts of King Herod, who symbolizes mankind in general, to frustrate Divine plans, while pious and helpful and natural considerations, have absorbed too much attention and have tended to obscure the essential character of the Epiphany. These are only the royal trappings of the feast, they are secondary at best, and it would be a mistake to fix our attention on them rather than on God. The solemnity of the Epiphany has for its main liturgical function to bring out into strong relief the manifestation of Christ's Divine Kingship, and his right to the service of all mankind.

Christ, in spite of apparent weakness, is King of all men, of saints, of angels, of shepherds, of kings. All flesh is but as grass before Him. He is no respecter of persons. It is He who created the most regal offerings we can make Him; the best we can do is but a poor token of service and homage. Our gifts are not ours but His, it is condescension pure and simple on His part to deign to receive them. Potentates of this earth have no power but what He gives them; to set their might against His is to parade their little strength for a little day, and in the end to dash themselves to ruin against the rock of His omnipotence.

The meaning of the Epiphany is simply this: Christ is absolute Lord and Master, and men, whether great or small, are merely vassals, serving in different functions in His court; the duty of all men on the feast itself and throughout the cycle of the feast is to do Him homage, to proclaim His sovereignty, and to renew their fealty as liege subjects in the Kingdom which He has set up here in time, but which is destined to endure throughout the ages of eternity.

Three Christmas Messages

IT is interesting to contrast the messages written by the Holy Father, and by the Cardinals, the Archbishops of Baltimore and New York. In common they are replete with the peace to men of good-will, of which the Angels sang as the shepherds crossed the hills to Bethlehem. Cardinal Farley's words, first printed in AMERICA, exhort us to perfect confidence, particularly in times of the most trying need, in God who does all things sweetly, while in the birth of Our Saviour, the venerable prelate of Baltimore finds an exemplification, such as only God could conceive, of the beauty and necessity of obedience.

It does not seem fanciful to trace in the messages the spirit which has made these two great Cardinals pillars of strength to Church and State. "The obedient man," says Holy Writ, "shall speak of victory," and even the most determined opponent of the Church must reckon with the victories over prejudice and error achieved by Cardinal Gibbons, during a long career in which, with singular persuasiveness, he has presented to a reluctant world the claims of all legitimate authority. Similarly, nothing has been more characteristic of the Metropolitan of New York, whose spirited labors have caused this portion of the field of Christ to be enriched with an abundant and lasting fruitage, than an unwavering trust in Almighty God, childlike in its tenderness and in the reward which it merits.

Turning to the letter of Benedict XV, it is indeed touching to know that in the midst of many and heartsearching cares, the Holy Father has not forgotten his children in America. Surely God's blessing will rest upon our nation if, following His behest, we recognize in the Babe of Bethlehem the great sign of God's love for fallen man, and strive to learn at the Crib, "the lesson of unfaltering courage and self-sacrifice." The Father of Christendom as he is, the heart of Benedict XV turns with the simplicity of greatness "to the little children to whom this day belongs," and he implores them, whose voices the Child Christ will gladly hear, since they recall in some manner the lisping words of Nazareth

To pray with all their hearts to the Babe of Bethlehem that He may protect their loved ones, and give back to the world that peace which He came to bring upon earth.

May the words of our great American prelates hearten us to new energy in the task which now engages us, while the prayers of the Vicar of Jesus Christ, linked with the supplication and tears of earth's innocent ones, bring us nearer to the day desired of all, in which lasting peace shall spring forth from righteous victory.

A Federal Decision and the Mass

MANY were the friends of prohibition who had no doubt whatever that the prohibition law of Oklahoma could not possibly cause any inconvenience in the celebration of the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass. No court, they said, would uphold a contrary opinion, and statements of this optimistic tenor were obtained from "prominent lawyers." The sincerity of these advocates of prohibition need not be questioned, but it is greatly to be regretted that their attitude was shared by many Catholics, most of whom probably labored under the delusion that "the Federal Constitution protects every citizen in the free exercise of his religion." How vain were these assurances is now apparent from a decision rendered on December 24 by United States District Judge Clark, sitting at Oklahoma City. The law of Oklahoma prohibits the importation of alcoholic liquors into the State. Judge Clark has now affirmed the validity of that law in as far as it forbids railroads and other common carriers to bring wine into the State, "even for sacramental purposes."

Appeal will be taken to the Supreme Court of the United States in due form. While it is rash to forecast the possible action of that august tribunal, the grounds on which the Supreme Court can reverse Judge Clark's ruling are certainly not obvious. If a State indirectly forbids the use of wine in the Holy Sacrifice by prohibiting the manufacture, importation or possession of wine, for any purpose whatsoever, no clause of the Federal Constitution can be invoked in restraint. It is high time that Catholics should realize this fact. Oklahoma has made her law. Until such time as an enlightened public opinion obtains the repeal of those sections which can possibly affect the Holy Sacrifice, Oklahoma not only may, but must, abide by the legislation which she has created. Furthermore, abstracting wholly from any Federal question, in a conflict between the law of the Church, requiring genuine wine for the Holy Sacrifice, and a civil law prohibiting the use of wine for any purpose whatsoever, every court is bound to uphold the precedence of the civil law. For the canon law has no binding force upon American courts, which accept it, not as law, but as fact. When will Catholics learn the lesson of "resisting the beginnings"? As has been pointed out more than once in these pages, safety can be guaranteed only by securing the insertion into State prohibition measures, before their approval by the respective legislatures, and into proposed State constitutional amendments, of a clause which either specifically authorizes the use of wine for sacramental purposes, or limits the prohibition to alcoholic liquors "for beverage purposes." Otherwise, we shall face long and tedious processes of litigation, and must meet consequences of the gravest character, in case an absolute "bone-dry" legislation is upheld by the courts.

Breaking into a Convent

IT is not strange, but very natural, that the world should regard all who would live godly in Christ Jesus as fools, for it was in Herod that the world clothed the wisdom of God in robes of mockery, and Herod still lives. His closest followers cannot look for gentler treatment. They cannot hope that the world will even try to understand their motives, or justly rate their work. But out of the evil that the world plots God draws good. Some weeks ago the New York press chronicled the story of how a woman had made application for the custody of her daughter, a teaching Sister, on the ground that the Sister was either insane, or detained by force in her convent. Apparently, she could see no other reason why such institutions as convents could exist. With customary inaccuracy, the newspapers gave no hint that the mother was not a Catholic, but a Socialist. A full legal inquiry followed. The Sister is still in her convent, and bigotry has rarely met with a rebuke so keen as was administered by Judge Faber:

If love of religion is insanity, the world would be better if we were all insane. Daily on the blood-stained battlefields of Europe, those who are fighting the fight for the emancipation of the world, and who are maimed in the terrible slaughter, find solace and comfort in their sufferings, at the gentle hands of those pious ladies who wear the garb that this young woman wears. To aspire to the religious life is not mania. It is a noble ambition.

This notable example of "Romish persecution" is too valuable to be left under a bushel by controversialists whose last interest is for the truth. Doubtless the New York Sister will soon assume a place in the gallery of "convent horrors."

Catholics often wish that their assailants were more ardent disciples of the truth, and they would be, very probably, if they could arrive at some possession of a sense of humor. An English convert used to relate with amusement her first visit to a convent. She had come, not for spiritual solace, but in fear and trembling, and only because she had heard that the nuns could teach her the Roman pronunciation of Latin. Before passing through the fatal doors, she instructed her coachman to call for her in fifteen minutes. If the call were not answered within five minutes, he was to inform the police without delay that a kidnapping had occurred. Not the public authorities, but a little common-sense, came to her rescue. Searching for some possible quality in herself which might induce the Sisters to steal her, she could find none.

Despite the contrary assertion, occasionally repeated even in this day and country, few Mother Superioresses are in the habit of forcing casual visitors to become nuns, invoking, for the benefit of reluctant damosels and dowagers, the aid of chains and dungeons. Long ago it was discovered in conventual establishments, that such means rarely lead to any true or lasting love of the religious life and its practices. There is really no reason why anyone should wish to "break into a convent." It is incomparably more convenient and far less likely to attract the attention of the police to go to the front door and ring the bell. "Stone walls do not a prison make, nor iron bars a cage." It is easy to get into a convent, and easier to get out. But the only power that will keep anyone there is a brave and happy spirit which counts the things of this world as nothing, in comparison with the love given in abundance to those who leave all to follow Christ.

"The Honest Catholic"

THE Archbishop of St. Louis, whose monthly sermons have for some years been a source of strength and enlightenment to citizens of all creeds in the metropolis of the Mississippi Valley, has recently drawn an excellent portrait of the "honest Catholic." In the mind of the Archbishop the title is equivalent to a patent of nobility, and the duties which it implies and exacts are not few. He is not an honest Catholic whose religion is confined to the observation of the Seventh Commandment, or who capitalizes his Faith for commercial purposes, or who subordinates it to his social ambitions, or who prides himself on his intimacy with non-Catholics, and then comes back "to the Catholic body to tell us what we should do." Nor are they honest Catholics "who do not love the Faith, live the Faith, fight for the Faith."

The honest Catholic, on the other hand, is the man who, recognizing his subjection to Almighty God, orders his life according to his belief. To the Church, the mystical Body of Jesus Christ, he gives that unswerving loyalty which is at once her due, and his own greatest glory. He warmly advocates the founding of parochial schools, and invariably chooses them for his children "that they may become honest Catholics, and ever retain both their honesty and their Catholicism." He knows that social happiness depends upon a mutual acknowledgment of rights; he is careful, therefore, not to entrench upon the rights of his neighbor, but he insists that his own rights be respected by all. He does not make patriotism a cloak for self-seeking, but considers it "the energy of service and love taught him by his Faith."

Thus depicted, this honest Catholic may be adjudged a person of stern, even of belligerent temperament, at whose appearance the amenities of social life must suffer. Yet truth must come first, and "it is always better," replies the Archbishop, "to be right than merely agreeable." An agreeable manner is a gift of God, valuable in its place, but an instrument for evil, if it induces its possessor to a compromise or sacrifice of principle. We cannot serve God, if we would always please men. One need seek no further than the third chapter of Genesis to learn that the floodgates of the world's woe were opened, when, to please a creature, our first father violated God's command.

The Bethlehemites

DURING this sacred season Bethlehem has not been the least among the cities of Juda. The little town and its little King have been the center of the world's thoughts. Even those who do not worship as God the Child who was born in the City of David, 2,000 years ago, have reverently turned their eyes to the Crib where the Child was placed by His Virgin Mother and where the Wise Men of the East came to adore Him.

There is a Divine and irresistible attraction in the memories of the birth-place of the Man-God. There, in visible form, He began to show His love for fallen man. There appeared the benignity, the grace, the loving kindness, the humanity of the Saviour. The Crib is but His first step to the Cross. And no one can learn the stern lessons of Calvary and its Victim without passing through the lowly portals of the cave which sheltered the Child. It may interest American Catholics to learn that here in the New World a religious body of men, affiliated to the great order of St. Francis of Assisi, once bore the name of "Bethlehemites" in honor of the heavenly Babe, whom its members promised to serve in helping the sick and the outcast. The records of the congregation prove the undying charity of the Church for suffering humanity. They furnish also an eloquent refutation of the charge that the Catholic Church took but little interest in the welfare of the Indian tribes conquered by the Spaniards four centuries ago.

The founder of the Bethlehemites was Pedro de Betancourt, a Spanish nobleman, a descendant of that Juan de Betancourt who conquered the Canary Islands for the Kings of Spain. Saddened, while working in the city of Guatemala, by the wretched condition of its sick poor, he built a rude hut as a hospital and on his own shoulders frequently carried to this improvised shelter the victims of the plague and the wreckage of humanity which chance threw in his way or which his own tender charity made him salvage in the byways of the town. The work grew. Popes and kings approved and helped it and viceroys and peons gave it their alms. Exhausted by his labors, Pedro de Betancourt, still in the vigor of manhood, died in 1667.

The name of the "Bethlehemite Brethren" was a familiar and a loved one in Latin America. To the vows of poverty, chastity and hospitality, they added another vow, that of caring at the risk of their lives, if need be, for the sick, even those infected with contagious diseases. To every hospital, a school for poor children was added, a refutation of the oft-repeated accusation that Catholic Spain neglected the education of the natives of her colonies. The "Bethlehemite" hospitals were built on a splendid scale, in the solid and spacious architecture of the Spanish colonies, with airy halls and wide patios made bright with fountains and waving palms. Visitors to Havana may have seen one of the specimens of these splendid mansions for the poor and the sick in the Colegio de Belén, or Bethlehem, which passed from the hands of the Bethlehemites, on their suppression, into the hands of the Spanish Government, and was later transferred by Queen Isabella in the middle of the last century to the Society of Jesus. A chain of Bethlehemite hospitals linked Havana and Guatemala through the City of Mexico, Lima, Arequipa, Santiago de Chile and Buenos Ayres with the southernmost limits of the New World. Over thirty of their hospitals offered shelter to the sick and the homeless. When they were swept away by the revolution of 1820 Spanish America was the poorer for their loss. The history of the Bethlehemites is but one of the instances of that heroic charity of the Catholic Church which she learned at the Crib and which in varying forms she has constantly practised for the welfare of humanity. The name of Pedro de Betancourt should not be forgotten. It is one of the noblest in the history of South America. The hallowed Christmas time gives a fitting opportunity to recall with gratitude his own virtues and the devotion and charity of his spiritual sons, the Brethren of Bethlehem.

A CALIFORNIA SOLDIER-BOY

"IF I should happen to get wiped out, . . . try and have a Roman Catholic Padre plant me . . . and please put after my name on the wooden cross the bare fact that I was an American." Thus, on August 20, 1916, the youthful hero of this new war-book, "Harry Butters, R.F.A." (Lane, $1.50), wrote to the Anglican chaplain of his brigade and less than two weeks later the chaplain, C. H. Milner, wrote to the young hero's sister, Mrs. R. A. Bray, of Piedmont, Cal.: "Harry was buried this afternoon by a Roman Catholic Padre" and "at his request I shall see to it that on his cross it is stated that he was an American." "He was buried," adds the captain of his company, "beneath the Union Jack. We tried to get an American flag, but one was not procurable or he should have been honored by both countries."

This little tragedy—little in comparison with greater ones of daily occurrence—took place before America was in the war. Harry Butters could not wait for the call of his nation; he responded, with all the enthusiasm of his soul, to the call of the cause and for it he joyfully gave his life. There is another fact that explains his readiness to anticipate his own nation's call; he was a Beaumont boy and it was as such that he sought and obtained a commission in the English army. "I arrived at Beaumont," he writes in one of his letters, "at four in the afternoon and sent up my card to Father Carey (my old Master) and Captain Father Mayo (commanding the Officers' Training Corps). They both rushed down, delighted to see me—particularly Father Carey—and took me in to tea. 'Now,' says I, 'here I am. Came 7,000 miles of my own accord and it's up to you to find some way to get me the rest of the way to the front.'"

Beaumont College is a Jesuit institution, which had very little if any influence with the English Government authorities before the war, but during the great struggle she has won the respect of all parties by the generous loyalty of her old boys to the cause. On January 1, 1917, their record was as follows: Serving 509, killed 58, wounded, prisoners and missing 81, honors 135. What their record is now is not known to the present writer, but from the figures given it is easy to understand why Harry Butters applied to his alma mater when he sought admission into England's fighting legions. As a Beaumont boy he entered the service of England and served for one year, and as a Beaumont boy he gave up his young life when, shaken though he was by overwork and by shell-shock, he went up to the first line "to replace a casualty."

But as far as the practice of his religion is concerned, Harry Butters did not live as a Beaumont boy. He had, in fact, lost the faith in which he had been reared by a devout Catholic mother, in which he received special training, at Santa Clara College, in preparation for his First Communion, and in which he was further instructed by the English Jesuits at Beaumont. One might imagine that, on the eve of war, while associating with his old Beaumont masters, he would return to the Church, but there was some obstacle. "As for me," he writes to his sister, "the Church is far more impossible to return to today than it was the day I first left it, when I felt that I was no longer of its faith in articles of doctrine." The cause of Harry's fall from the Faith is not made clear in the narrative, nor was it the intention of the editor to discuss this phase of his life. But though the cause is not discussed, the fact is sufficiently evident and it is the fact that interests the present reviewer. It affords another instance of a soul won back to God by the dangers and horrors of war.

At home his sister prayed and prayed, while at the front her soldier-brother fought and fought not only against the Germans, but, perhaps, even against the grace of God, though all who knew Harry Butters will agree with those who say that it was but an unconscious resistance. The very soul of honesty in his dealings with his fellow-men, Harry cannot be pictured as dishonest, even in a small way, in his dealings with God, still he dropped away entirely from the practice of Catholicism and in spite of some very harrowing experiences of German shell-fire, his religious sense remained unassertive. "Men stand up to the strain of trench warfare in various ways," he tells his sister, "the strength of religion, lack of imagination, or natural phlegmatic temperament, a sense of humor and the ability to bluff one's self out of it. The last two are what have kept me going."

He was kept going for one year of active work on the line, but "his sense of humor and his ability to bluff himself" were put to some very serious tests and on August 22 we find him acknowledging that "to continue on in my battery" is "utterly beyond the strength that is in me." And then he adds with a touch of appreciation for his sister's religion: "I know that if I were as you are, I might be able to draw this courage from outside of me—in fact, from the Church."

It is a strange conversion; he goes back to the Church for courage in the midst of the dangers of war. "I went over and spent an afternoon with my dear friend Father Doyle and we went over it all. Before I left I even made my confession to him for I earnestly craved help of God. And," he adds, "this is the place where the little item comes in that will please. I took my rosary to bed with me, night after night, and drew comfort and consolation from its simple beads. It seemed to link me with you—and with mother—and with that other Blessed Mother—that she and you have loved so well."

The letter was written on August 22. In it he tells of "another tragedy of the war." "Father Doyle is dead. Always in the front trenches when the shelling was heaviest, he was terribly wounded three days ago tending some of the dying. . . . God will certainly rest his soul, but his regiment will miss him sorely." It is not to be wondered at that such a self-sacrificing Catholic Padre could win Harry back to his old Mother Church. Twelve days after the writing of this letter, Harry himself fell, and we may say of him what he said of Father Doyle: "God will certainly rest his soul."

We have called attention to but one phase of this "brief record of a California boy who gave his life for England." It is a phase that by many may be overlooked because there is so much war-interest throughout. Besides the "Letters" from which we have quoted there is an admirably written sketch of Harry's "Life." It is from the pen of Mrs. Denis O'Sullivan, widow of the famous Irish singer of that name. Though brief, it reveals the character of young Butters in all its variety and nobility. The "Letters," written for the most part under pressure and sometimes to the sickening symphony of exploding German shells and the roar of English cannon, are not devoid of a literary merit of their own. Always full of vigor and enthusiasm, enlivened with sallies of wit, they sometimes, especially towards the end, rise to the importance of the situation and the young officer ventures even into the realm of the philosophical. Nor is he unmindful of the dangers which threaten: he seems even to have had a premonition of death, but "We are doing the world's work," he insists, "and I am in it to the finish."

LITTLE NORRY SULLIVAN

Little Norry Sullivan, she's gone to join the nuns,
Ain't it sthrange, the convent often gets the wildest ones?
Makin' fun an' frolickin' you'll see thim here today,
Look around tomorrow an', bedad, they're gone away!
Gone away from all the fun.
Gone away to be a nun,
Faith, 'tis quare an' sthrange it is, achorra, as I say.

That's the kind that Norry was; a livelier never stept—
Do you mind how fast she ran, how fearlessly she lept?
Everything her brothers did, 'twas she could do the same,
(As for quiet Kevin, sure, she put the lad to shame.)
Out she'd be from morn till night,
Playin' ball was her delight,
Norry's side was sure to win, whin she was in the game.

Man alive, but 'twas herself was just the merriest lass,
Hardly could keep still while Father Toole was sayin' Mass;
Thryin' hard to hold her eyes upon her little book,
But the open window oft would lure her longin' look.
Then you knew her mind had slipt
From her prayer-book an' had skipt
Out among the meadows in the softly-growing grass.

Sure, it seems like yesterday I saw her up an' down,
Runnin' like a redshank through the streets o' Carrick Town.
Double-knockin' people's doors an' pullin' people's bells,
Makin' people nervous with her screeches an' her yells.
But she's all grown up today,
An' she's left an' gone away,
Gone to be a Sisther in the convent down at Kells.

Wondher what came over her? Ah, sure, 'tis hard to know.
This you may be certain, no one wanted her to go.
Naither of the parents liked the step she took at all,
An' there was one boy that felt as if he'd like to bawl.
But 'twas Norry didn't mind;
All their words were only wind;
Said she had it in her heart an' must obey the call!

Little Norry Sullivan, God mark your soul to grace!
Take my blessin' on your heart an' on your happy face!
Take my blessin' on your work, an' on your prayin' too,
On whatever task the Lord may give your hand to do.
An' whatever be His will,
May your heart be merry still—
Little Norry Sullivan, sure, that's my wish to you!

The Hostage. A Drama. By PAUL CLAUDEL. Translated from the French, with an Introduction by PIERRE CHAVANNES. New Haven: Yale University Press. $1.50.

In a letter written to Le Temps the author of this powerful drama well observed: "The demands of Christianity . . . mutilate nothing . . . they appeal to the whole man, his intelligence, his will and his feelings; they compel us to be in a permanent state of mobilization against passion, against easy doubts and, for this perpetual war, we are not over-endowed with all our faculties." That truth is demonstrated with tremendous cogency in "The Hostage," which is probably the greatest work M. Claudel has as yet produced. For dramatic intensity, forceful characterization, sustained loftiness of thought and poetic beauty of language it is probable that few plays by moderns can approach the excellence of this masterpiece. Those who wish to see with what consummate skill a Catholic author can use Catholic material to produce a Catholic play should not fail to read "The Hostage."

The scene of the drama is laid in France, not long before Napoleon's fall. In the first act Sygne de Coûfontaine is introduced, pledging her fealty to her cousin George, to whom she hands over the ancestral domains she has at last bought back from the revolutionists. George, an unbeliever, a royalist and an outlaw, has delivered Pope Pius from Napoleon's prison and brought him to the old Cistercian abbey, which is the only building left standing of the Coûfontaine estates. The Holy Father's hiding place is discovered by Turelure, the low-born Prefect of the Marne, who demands Sygne's hand as the price of his connivance at the Pope's presence in the abbey. In the second act Father Badilon, Sygne's confessor, persuades her to marry the prefect in order to save Pope Pius. He says:

> To save the Father of all men, according to the call that has come to you, may you renounce your love, your name, your cause and your honor in this world, embracing your executioner and accepting him as husband even as Christ allowed Judas to partake of His body . . . . . Father, Thou seest this lamb who has done what she could. Take compassion on her now, and lay not upon her an unbearable burden. Have mercy too on me, priest and sinner, who with my own hands have just sacrificed to Thee my only child. And you, my daughter, say that you forgive me before I forgive you.

In the third act Sygne has become the wife of Turelure, now prefect of the Seine, and defender of Paris against the Allies, and is killed by a bullet shot by her cousin George, but meant for her husband. Father Badilon is with her as she dies, and just succeeds in getting her to forgive Turelure as she breathes her last. It is an interesting fact that in the acting version of the play Claudel completely altered that scene, making Turelure rouse his dying wife to forgive him by calling out the motto of her house: "Coûfontaine, adsum!" Let the reader judge which ending is the more effective. The translation seems well done, for the most part, but Catholics do not speak of the "Sacraments" of the Holy Eucharist, and, as a rule, they say "Mass," not "the Mass." In his introduction, Pierre Chavannes well shows how the theme of "The Hostage" is a dramatic conflict of conscience, but, in trying to explain the character of Claudel's Catholicism, he is far from satisfactory. Psychology. General Introduction. By CHARLES HUBBARD JUDD. Second Completely Revised Edition. Boston: Ginn & Co. $1.80.

The author of this volume has demonstrated his continued ability to write books on the science of the soul, with the soul left out. The treatise is entirely and professedly empirical, and so far good. But the contention with which the book closes, that psychology is most intimately and inseparably connected with philosophy, seems to be in little accord with what had gone before. In his painstaking and laudable endeavor to express the physiological conditions of thought, the author has neglected the all-important psychological causes of thought. And it is the causes that the scientist seeks, much more in a science that is intimately bound up with philosophy.

The fundamental dogma underlying the whole work is the assumption of the evolution of human consciousness from animal sensation. We are led along the ordinary path through the gradually ascending scale of brute intelligence until we come to the fatal leap to ideation, and there we are left in the dark during that all-important instant, biologically speaking, while our primordial ancestor is making his lightning change into a man. Although the author elsewhere exhibits a fund of esoteric information about our presumed distant relations, at this point he is at a loss to explain the evolution of ideas and speech; and is satisfied with muddling hurriedly through a paragraph interspersed with various gratuitous "it must be's" and "we may assume's" until he emerges once more complacently into the light, seemingly innocent of the fact that he had passed over the one point where his whole theory of ideation must rest.

Apart from the fact that this psychologist has written 350 pages on the subject without one mention of the word "soul" or any of its equivalents, and has based his whole treatise on an inexplicable, unfounded and exploded assumption, there are many well-put and interesting chapters, especially on the functional view of the lower forms of mental life. But considered as a profound and penetrating study of human consciousness, as compared with Father Maher's work on the same subject, Professor Judd's "Psychology" is like a loosely written and superficially reasoned primer. Life and Literature.. By LAFCADIO HEARN. Selected and Edited with an Introduction by JOHN ERSKINE, Ph.D., Professor of English in Columbia University. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co. $3.50.

The twenty-three lectures in this volume were carefully taken down by Lafcadio Hearn's Japanese pupils, as he slowly explained to them his idea of the nature of literature, the function of criticism, the art of composition and the way to read modern authors appreciatively. The best chapters in the book are those in which he tells his hearers how to read, compose and criticize, and they will be found valuable by teachers of English. Speaking as he was to Japanese students, who were not familiar with Western literature, Hearn took pains to be very clear and to explain carefully every point he touched on. In his lecture "On Reading in Relation to Literature" the author well says: "The test of a great book is whether we want to read it only once or more than once. . . . A book that a person of education and good taste does not care to read more than once is very probably not worth much." In his lecture on "Composition" there are some good pages emphasizing the importance of taking time and pains, if anything really worth while is to be written. From many of the other lectures in "Life and Literature" Hearn's unsophisticated hearers must have inferred that to be a discerning critic it is necessary to reject Christianity as he did. He warns them, for instance, that "A pious Roman Catholic may not find beauty in a thing not written according to the medieval spirit of the religion to which he belongs." He lamentably misleads his helpless pupils, too, when he undertakes to explain "the war between the Jesuits and Port Royal." Herbert Spencer was Hearn's idol, and that now-discredited "philosopher's" influence is discernible throughout this volume. W. D.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

The system of belief or morals that hopes to compete with Christianity must make itself comprehensible to the common mind. That even theosophy is endeavoring to meet this need by means of popular manuals appears in Michael J. Whitty's "A Simple Study in Theosophy" (Kennerly). Its case, however, is more clearly than convincingly stated in the present volume. The arguments with which the author proposes to support Madame Blavatsky's "more full and more reasonable explanation of the great questions 'why, whence and whither'," are too weak to bear even forcible statement, much less examination. This weakness appears not only in such patent falsehoods as the assertion that Origen's heresy of reincarnation, though condemned by the Second Council of Constantinople, "was part of the teaching of early Christianity," but it shows itself no less clearly in the lame attempt to support the doctrine of "Karma," or the natural retribution of moral reaction, by appealing to a psychic inheritance which must for that purpose be restricted to the immediate parents alone. So, too, the average man will find it difficult to see how his will can be free to determine the conditions of a future life on earth, and at the same time absolutely helpless to modify the conditions of a present one; and the natural consequence in practice will probably be what Professor James delicately termed "a moral holiday."

In the seven papers which Mr. Henry Van Dyke, until recently our Minister to Holland, has brought together in a volume entitled "Fighting for Peace" (Scribner, $1.25) there is little that is new regarding the war. He tells about the mysterious difficulty he had during the spring of 1914 in interesting Germany in the Hague Peace Tribunal, describes how he helped American and Belgian refugees when the great conflict began, reviews the record of Germany's broken pledges, tortuous diplomacy, and ruthless methods of warfare, and indicates by means of allegories what his opinion is of the Kaiser.——Captain Gilbert Nobbs' "On the Right of the British Line" (Scribner, $1.25) is a plain and vivid account of his experiences at the front from the time of his leaving England through the heroic days on the Somme till his frightful suffering as he lay blind and abandoned in a shell-hole in No Man's Land. For months he was given up as dead; his days in German prison camps are faithfully described and his return on exchange to his native land.

"The Green Mirrors" (Doran, $1.50), by Hugh Walpole, is a psychological study of a family, hidebound in the extreme insularity of English ancestral traditions. A young man, thoroughly imbued with the modern spirit, enters the charmed circle, wins the love of the eldest daughter, and by his infusion of the new ideas forces the family to readjust their notions to changing conditions. The story is well and carefully told, and takes on the character of an allegory, foretelling the changes which the author thinks England must inevitably adopt in her attitude towards other nations and modern life.——That Indians have not ceased to be interesting, two new books for boys prove: "The White Blanket" (Putnam, $1.25), by Belmore Browne, and "The Blue Heron's Feather" (Lippincott, $1.25), by Rupert Sargent Holland. The former tells of Indians in modern Alaska, the latter of those original Americans in old New Netherland, and they both inculcate that interest in the great outdoors that Captain Scott so wanted for his boy. The "White Blanket" is full of snow-covered areas, diamond glaciers, ice-mountains, and all the frozen mysteries of the North; "The Blue Heron's Feather" describes wooded tracts and running waters nearer home. In the former, by an Indian's aid, some boys go on an adventurous hunt for gold and also meet with hearts of gold. In the latter a Dutch boy, again by an Indian's aid, succeeds in uniting the Mohawks and the Netherlanders, thus averting bloodshed and teaching by example the lesson of forbearance and respect for others' rights.

"Mary, Mary," "Rothschild's Fiddle," "A Hazard of New Fortunes" are three elegant and tastefully bound books from the "Modern Library" of Boni and Liveright ($0.60 each). In the first, James Stephens sketches the fortunes of Mary Make-believe, the poor little Dublin drudge, and her doting and idealistic mother, with genial humor and pathos. Stephens knows his dear old Dublin well and loves its people. The author of "Rothschild's Fiddle," the physician-novelist, Anton Chekov, is said to be one of the masters of the Russian short story. He has the gift of keeping his readers puzzled and of filling in his canvas with quick, broad strokes. But there is too much black in the picture. There is something depressing and morbid in the general atmosphere of the stories, too much of the physician diagnosing and analyzing his case. If the picture of Russian society drawn by the writer is a true one, we can understand something of the kaleidoscopic changes which have lately taken place in his native land. Now and then a tender note comes into the work of the story-teller reminding us that he felt for the suffering of his people. The reprint of "A Hazard of New Fortunes" shows William Dean Howells in some of his best qualities. The book has been called the most "important" of the author's works. In it Howells shows that he had foreseen, though dimly perhaps, some of the great social problems which our new democracy would soon have to face. Viewed in this light, the novel, though suffering from the limitations of its author, will prove interesting to those who like to study the problems of today in their earlier symptoms. Mr. Howells is undoubtedly a literary artist. He sees things clearly and makes his characters speak and act as we can imagine they would do in real life, without affectation or unnatural posing.

The December Month, which was slow to reach this country, opens with a most interesting article by Father Martindale on "St. John of the Cross," there are papers on the novels of Monsignori Bickerstaffe-Drew and Benson, and on the text "As Little Children," there is a Christmas poem, of which the first two stanzas are these:

And every year when Christ doth come:
  A little Babe from Heav'n above—
So helplessly in need of home,
  So innocently sure of love;
I think the silent child that sleeps
  In every soul—with some sweet mood
Of sympathy—awakes and leaps
  In answer to His Babyhood.

Then we would make a holy game
  Of all that happened long ago;
With cave and manger just the same,
  And cotton wool for winter snow;
And tinsel star, and paper hay,
  And kings and shepherds—all of them—
Surely to God who loves us so,
  We are as little ones at play,
Who take each other's hands and say:—
  "Oh! Let's pretend it's Bethlehem."

EDUCATION

The Management of Parochial Schools

IT is a more or less culpable defect in our present conception of the parochial-school system that we seem to consider inevitable the lack of schools in the smaller parishes whose financial resources are insufficient to permit the maintenance of a school.

Our practice is quite inconsistent with our principles. The parochial school system is founded on the principle that the parish school is necessary for the preservation of Catholic faith in the majority of the coming generation. Nevertheless, our practice today permits a large proportion of the children of Catholic parents to be deprived of the essential benefits of a Catholic school.

Not a Local Interest

STATISTICIANS warn us that approximately one-third of the children of Catholic parents in this country reside in districts where, under present requirements, it seems impossible for the local parish authorities to maintain a school. The resultant loss to the Faith is not merely a local loss, a loss to the parish only; it is a loss to the diocese, and to the universal Church, as well. Yet we continue to consider the school question in such parishes a purely local problem, and to visit the responsibility for its solution upon the hapless pastor, as though he alone were affected by the loss or gain of souls to the Faith in his vicinity. Our principles demand that this, to him, insuperable burden, be lifted from the conscience of the local pastor, and placed where it rightfully belongs, in the keeping of the diocese.

An Outworn Policy

OUR parochial-school system, in its present form, is an inheritance from the pioneer past. In the days of its origin, when all the nascent parishes had similar physical needs to be provided for out of approximately equal incomes, it was necessary and just that each parish should depend upon its own resources. The continuance of that policy today, operates to deprive the smaller parishes of schools, although physical conditions in the larger parishes warrant the adoption of a policy quite the reverse, and more in accordance with the beneficent principle of Christian unity upon which the whole Catholic edifice is reared.

Today organized co-operation takes the place of independent effort. In other fields, particularly in works of charity, diocesan organizations of more effective scope usurp the place and do the work of the old societies, whose activities were confined to their own parish limits. But the schools remain today, practically as they were in the beginning. There has been, indeed, a certain increase of diocesan supervision, but what we have erroneously called a "system" of schools continues to be only a series of sternly independent parochial units, limited in each case by all the limitations, financial, temperamental, and otherwise, of the pastor and his parish.

The many and grave handicaps in the cause of Catholic education, inherent in this state of affairs, indicate the wisdom of a change. If we are to realize to the full, the purpose of the parochial schools it is inevitable that the diocese shall adopt its many separate schools, embody them in a tangible, practicable system, under an authoritative head and assume, together with the direction of their educational activities, the responsibility for their finances.

Suggested Changes

THE essential outline of the executive organization that would be necessary under diocesan administration, is clearly visible in the forces that operate our schools today, while the personnel of the new organization could be made practically identical with that of the old. The burden of expense would continue to be borne by the parishes, but by all the parishes of the diocese without exception. The disbursement of funds, however, under the plan proposed, would become the province of the Bishop, or his representative School Board, rather than of the local pastors as at present. It would thus be possible for the diocese to provide funds not only for the maintenance of schools already existing, as it does in effect today, but also to establish schools in the smaller parishes where they are necessary, but under present conditions, altogether lacking. Other desired improvements in the school system would result automatically under diocesan administration. Probably increased expense would also result, but not in greater measure than our educational responsibilities warrant, and consequently, such expense should not prohibit the adoption of the plan suggested.

That difficulties exist in the way of its adoption cannot be gainsaid, but merely to propose a difficulty is no proof of impracticability. Indeed, it is safe to say that no objection to the plan can be proposed that cannot be satisfactorily answered. In the last analysis, it is nothing more than a wise application to the parochial-school system, by the diocese, of the methods used by the State in the support of the public-school system.

SOCIOLOGY

Lying and Society

NOT so long ago the newspapers reported that a certain minister of the Gospel informed his congregation that, upon occasions, it is lawful to tell a lie. He seemed to think, for instance, that it would be justifiable to lie in order to save a woman's honor. Half the difficulties of life come from a misunderstanding; and more than half the misunderstandings come from the lack of a good definition. If the gentleman in question had taken the trouble to set down clearly what a lie is, and had further thought what the act of lying implies, he would hardly have made the statement attributed to him. Unless we begin with a definition, we can have no common starting point, no rendezvous where our arguments meet and compare merits. We may dispute with much ado, and at any length, but the result will be very like that of an orchestra when there is a divergence of opinion among the players as to the next number on the program.

WHAT IS A LIE?

NOW, as commonly, and indeed properly, understood, a lie is not the same as a false statement. Harold, let us say, has visited New York for the first time. In his account of the wonders he has seen, he places the Public Library on Fifth Avenue at Forty-Third Street, because he believes the building stands there. No one would accuse Harold of lying. None the less, he has made a false statement. But it was not wilfully false, and that makes all the difference in the world. We say Harold has made a mistake, not that he lied. He had not one thing in his mind, and another on his lips. His utterance does not contradict his thought. He is in like case with the novice in arithmetic who writes that $7 + 5 = 11$. It is simply a blunder. It is false, but not a lie.

A lie, then, is a statement which the speaker believes to be false, but which he deliberately utters as true. His intellect conceives the reality to be affirmative, yet he wilfully declares that his concept of the fact is negative, or vice versa. His intellect declares that the case is thus and so. His will commands a denial of what his intellect believes and inwardly asserts. There is a contradiction, therefore, between the inner word of the mind and the outward utterance of the lips; so that intellect and will are opposed, the one pitted against the other.

INTELLECT AND WILL

THE intellect may be termed the eye that guides man in his rational actions. And just as a man of ordinary prudence uses his eyes to direct his footsteps, and guard himself against unnecessary risks, so in matters of the mind does his intellect examine the move he would make, and conclude whether he may wisely start or continue. "Safety first" is a sound principle in every business. Is there a street to be crossed? The eye takes in the situation, the intellect decides "It is safe" or "It is unsafe." The will commands "Go ahead," or "Wait," as the case may be. Is it an investment to be made? The mind's eye, the intellect, reviews the market, reckons the capital on hand, the expenditure called for, the chances for profit or loss, and sees whether it is well to proceed or better to withhold action. The will then issues the fiat, "Buy," or "Sell," or "Stand Pat."

A PERVERSION OF NATURE

WHENCE it appears clearly enough that normally the intellect and will are intended to act together in concert; and that the opposite procedure is abnormal and directly opposed to the intent of nature itself. For we do not strive after knowledge merely for the sake of knowing but in order to attain some further end, to gratify some desire, to sate some yearning. The financier studies the stock market not merely to know what is going on, but that he may the better direct his own activities, and add to his gains. Even in matters of art, we wish to acquire knowledge of pictures and other art objects, in order to cultivate and gratify our esthetic sense. Once more, then, it is clear that our nature calls for unity of action between intellect and will; and that whatever perverts this order and hinders this cooperation is against the demands of our rational nature. This is one element in the sin of lying, the will denies what the intellect affirms. Faculties destined by nature to be helpmeets, are set one against the other. There is a perversion of our natural powers. It is the sin of dividing brethren of one household.

MAN'S SOCIAL NATURE

AN intelligent workman examines his tools, and considers the purpose for which each is intended and fitted. He will not try to turn screws with a highly tempered chisel, or to carve with a screwdriver. We must apply to speech the principle herein involved. All experience proves that man is forcefully drawn to live in company with his fellows. He needs their aid. He cannot properly develop his faculties alone. To get assistance from others, to cooperate with them, he must communicate his thoughts to them in some way; and the instrument which nature has given for this purpose is speech. If the purpose of speech were to conceal thought, words would become but a meaningless jumble of sounds, and nature would have made a sad and irremediable mistake. For everyone knows how hard it is to keep a secret, and how often and how easily one is betrayed by words, even while trying hardest at concealment. A ready example is had in the case of criminals who so often unwittingly confess what they are most anxious to hide. If nature intended that our thoughts should be concealed, it would have made us as dumb as stones.

A SIN AGAINST SOCIETY

FINALLY, admit the principle that lying is sometimes licit, and what will result? No one will implicitly believe another. The liar is always caught in the long run. Let a man be ever so reputable, if once convicted of lying, he loses caste. Admit that it is ever lawful to lie, and mutual trust and fidelity will go for nothing, because no one will be able to know when his neighbor will not say to himself: "In this case I am justified in telling a deliberate falsehood." It is true that there are secrets we are bound to keep, but that is a further question. Lying is always a poor, as well as an illicit, escape from a difficulty. Every lie is a sin against our rational nature, against the purpose for which the power of speech was given us, against society at large.

NOTE AND COMMENT

Decline of the Press

WRITING in the January Atlantic on "Press Tendencies and Dangers," Mr. Oswald Garrison Villard finds that "The decreasing number of newspapers in our large cities is due to the enormously increased cost of maintaining great dailies." He asserts that one New York paper cheerfully loses some $500,000 every year, calls attention to the fact that cities as big as Cleveland, Indianapolis, Detroit, St. Paul and New Orleans have only one morning paper each, and quotes "Ayer's Newspaper Directory" to prove that during the past three years 300 weeklies, semi-weeklies and tri-weeklies have discontinued publication, and that 76 dailies died peaceful deaths since January 1, 1917. Mr. Villard notes a growing tendency to group together a number of papers under one ownership, and an increasing distrust of the press on the part of the people, because the leading papers seem to set forth the views only of capitalists and the privileged classes. Certainly the results of the recent mayoralty contest in New York show that the power of the metropolitan press is not what it once was. Catholics should make it a religious duty to see that, owing to the lack of generous support, none of our diocesan weeklies ceases publication in these trying times.

Keep the Old Resolutions

STUDENTS of human nature have observed that most men pay but scant attention to the really important things of life but devote by far the greater part of their time, means and energy to what is of little moment. When it is considered how much of the average man's life is passed in amusement, in self-indulgence, in adorning and pampering his body, but what little pains he takes to train his mind, cultivate his taste, keep his heart clean and his soul strong, it is clear that the less-important things of life are his chief concern. While complaining of life's brevity we act as if we were to live here forever; while discanting on the necessity of dying well, we defer till the latest moment doing what will help us make a good end; we believe that faith, contrition, purity and lowliness are the warring Christian's best weapons, but we walk with eyes wide open into familiar temptations and rush all unarmed into well-known occasions of sin, where the enemy easily conquers our weak resistance. Most of AMERICA's readers have no doubt already made what seems to be an altogether fresh set of New Year's resolutions, which have actually lasted unbroken, perhaps, until now. But, on closer examination, these high resolves of 1918 will probably be found to be quite the same as those we took last year, the year before that and even the year before that. So we need only to realize that old weaknesses are with us still and to pray confidently for the grace to avoid, with more success during the coming year, the old occasions of sin.

Three Distinguished Educators

THE hand of the Lord has been heavy on the Maryland-New York Province of the Society of Jesus during the past few weeks. Three of its most distinguished members have been called from their earthly labors into their eternal rest. All three were well on in years, but their active service seemed to be far from finished. The Rev. John D. Whitney, S.J.; the Rev. Michael A. O'Kane, S.J., and the Rev. John Scully, S.J., the first named of whom died several weeks ago, and the other two on the same day, December 26, were all rectors of Jesuit colleges, all added or completed important groups to the buildings of the institutions they directed, and all lived to see them develop beyond their fondest expectations. Father O'Kane's memory is perpetuated at Holy Cross College by the O'Kane building; Father Scully, in the words of his successor, left the record of his presidency at Fordham written in monuments of stone. Father Whitney's life ran out, as was fitting in the case of an ex-naval officer and a native of Nantucket, with the ebb of the tide, and took place in New England, of which he was one of the most distinguished scions by reason both of lineage and achievement. Father Scully died in New York, his native State, where he gave the best years of his life to education and to the upbuilding of the Shrine at Auriesville. His death cut short his aspirations to go to France as a chaplain, a post for which his military character, his zeal and his knowledge of languages especially fitted him. Father O'Kane, also, died under the shadow of the great building which his own initiative and courage had raised, and his last words were uttered in the very city where the golden stream of his eloquence, known throughout the eastern States, first compelled attention. They were three typical Jesuits, pioneers in a sense, tirelessly zealous, strong, kindly, distinguished.

Jubilee of a Danish Bishop

ON September 8, 1917, the Rt. Rev. Johannes von Euch celebrated his silver jubilee as Bishop of Denmark, where from the year of his ordination, in 1860, he has exercised his exalted mission as a priest. Bishop von Euch, who is by birth a German and received ordination in Osnabrück, during his long residence in the capital of Denmark has become one of the most honored men in Copenhagen. A striking figure among the Catholic clergy of today, with eighty-three years behind him, his energy appears unabated and his care for his flock undiminished. When he arrived at Copenhagen fifty-three years ago, there were but two Catholic churches in the whole country; today there is scarcely a city without one. The secular priests are assisted in the diocesan work by a number of Orders, among them Jesuits, Franciscans, Redemptorists, Lazarists and others. Teaching Brothers assist the Fathers in the school work and seven congregations of Sisters are kept busy in the classrooms and in the hospitals, where their work is much appreciated and carries with it a notable percentage of conversions.

On his arrival he found a people, bitterly opposed to Catholicism. The entire Catholic population did not number over 800 souls, drawn mostly from the foreign embassies; and the bitterly fought war between Denmark and Germany, 1863-64, did not add to his comforts, but Father von Euch was a priest and not a politician, and as the years passed he grew in popularity. He was eminently fitted for his post, and, when Prince Waldemar of Denmark later married the Catholic Princess, Marie of the House of Bourbon, Father von Euch found a powerful ally, who, like himself, was armed with extraordinary personality and took the Danish hearts by storm. From that period on the success of the Catholic cause rapidly increased. As usual the Church, so wrongly accused of fostering crass ignorance, appealed to the intelligent classes, who found in Mgr. von Euch a man of singular attainment and rare talent; prominent laymen soon yielded him support, and one of his staunchest supporters is the Danish author, Johannes Jorgensen, well known to American Catholics through translations of some of his numerous works. In 1892 in recognition of the advancement of the Catholic Church in Denmark, chiefly owing to the efforts of Mgr. von Euch, the prefecture of Denmark was raised to a bishopric, and Johannes von Euch was consecrated at Osnabrück the first Bishop of the Danish See after a lapse of over 300 years.

The War.—Along the lines from Ypres to Verdun there has been constant raiding and counter-raiding, but with one exception, the fighting has not been of a severe character nor productive of substantial gains to either side. South of Cambrai in the region of La Vacquerie the Germans carried out a series of attacks against the British lines. The British held the high ground west of the village and clung to it desperately, the heights changing hands several times. The initial thrust of the enemy had carried him into the British trenches, but toward the end of the week a realignment of the battle-front left both the defenders and the attacking troops practically in their original position.

Bulletin, Dec. 31, p.m.-Jan. 7, a.m.

In Italy, where the belated winter has begun in its full severity in some parts of the Carnic Alps, the Austro-Germans are meeting great obstacles on their lines of transportation. Fighting in the north is becoming more and more difficult for the Allies and their opponents alike. The most striking events were the French attacks on Monte Tomba, just south of Alana, and the Italian attack near Zenson and Fossalta on the lower Piave. The French attack was a surprise attack a little north of Monte Tomba which, because of its elevation, is considered one of the key positions between the Brenta and the Piave. The Italians have so far stubbornly resisted all attempts to take Monte Tomba, though the Austro-Germans have apparently approached to its lower slopes. In their movement forward the French took over 1,400 prisoners, some guns, and a vast supply of military stores. Along the lower Piave, the Italians stormed a "machine-gun nest" which the enemy had established and strongly entrenched at the only point at which they had reached the west bank of the stream. Like the French attack it was a surprise and accomplished its purpose. The west bank of the Piave has now been cleared and the Italian position is here intact. Several German air-raids on Padua have caused severe damage to its famous cathedral and to the shrine of St. Anthony. Against these raids the Holy Father has vigorously protested.

General Allenby's troops are making steady gains north of Jerusalem.

President Wilson addressed Congress in joint session on January 4. In his short speech he defined the Government's position in assuming control of the railroads and recommended legislation to finance the carriers and protect the stockholders during the period of the war. Shortly after the President's address the Administration bill, framed to carry out his recommendations, was introduced both in Senate and in House. The bill embodies the policies announced last week in the Presidential proclamation transferring the railroads to Federal control. The indications are that there will be no prolonged debate over the Administration bill unless it arises over the last section in the bill, which provides that "The Federal control of transportation systems herein and heretofore provided for shall continue for and during the period of the war and until Congress shall thereafter order otherwise." Republican members of the House think they see in this provision the beginning of a government-ownership policy.

Railroad Control Bill

The Russian demands at the Brest-Litovsk conference contained fifteen clauses. They proposed: The evacuation of all Russian territory occupied by Germany, autonomy for Poland, the Lithuanian and Lettish provinces and Turkish Armenia; settlement of the question of Alsace-Lorraine by plebiscite, with a guarantee of perfect freedom of vote; the restoration of Belgium, Serbia, and Montenegro, with indemnity provided out of an international fund; Serbia to have access to the Adriatic; Bosnia and Herzegovina to have complete autonomy; contested Balkan territories to have autonomy until a plebiscite is taken; Rumania to recover all territory within her previous frontiers, after promising to give autonomy to the Dobrudja and guaranteeing their rights to the Jews; autonomy for the regions of Trieste and the Trentino inhabited by Italians, until a plebiscite is taken; Germany to receive back her colonies; restoration of Persia and Greece; neutralization of all maritime straits leading to inland seas, including the Canals of Suez and Panama; torpedoing of commercial ships on the high seas to be forbidden by international agreement; belligerents to renounce war indemnities and commercial boycott after the war; peace conditions to be settled by a peace congress composed of delegates chosen by national, representative bodies; all secret diplomatic treaties to be declared null and void; gradual disarmament on land and sea, and the reestablishment of militia to replace standing armies.

By January 2, the chances of a separate peace between Russia and the Central Powers seemed to dwindle away because of what Russia considered Germany's unreasonable demands. Leon Trotzky, the Bolshevik Foreign Minister and his associates, maintained that the Baltic Provinces were in reality under military pressure as long as German troops were in control and that their votes on peace must be ignored since they are virtually German Provinces. On their return from Brest-Litovsk to Petrograd the Russian delegates laid Germany's demands before the Council of Commissioners. The Council did not favor their acceptance. Detailed elaboration of the German peace terms showed that the Germans held that Poland, Lithuania, Courland, Livonia and Esthonia had already "defined themselves nationally" within the meaning of the peace terms and insisted that they should not vote again. The Germans also explained, through General Hoffman, that Germany could not evacuate Riga, Libau and other occupied points, until certain that all Russia sanctioned peace. Otherwise Germany's enemies might assist the Ukraine or other disaffected sections in opposition to the Central Powers.

The second article of the German peace terms, over which the split occurred between the delegates of the Central Powers and the Russian Commissioners reads:

> The Russian Government having in accordance with its principles, proclaimed for all peoples, without exception, living within the Russian Empire, the right of self-determination, including complete reparation, takes cognizance of the decision expressing the will of people demanding a full state of dependence and separation from the Russian Empire for Poland, Lithuania, Courland, and portions of Esthonia and Livonia. The Russian Government recognizes that in the present circumstances these manifestations must be regarded as the expression of the will of the people, and is ready to draw conclusions therefrom. As in these districts to which the foregoing stipulations apply, the question of evacuation is not such as is provided for in Article I (in which Germany declared herself ready as soon as peace had been concluded and Russia had demobilized, to evacuate her present positions in occupied Russian territory, in so far as no differences resulted from Article II), a special commission shall discuss and fix the time and other details in conformity and in accordance with the Russian idea of the necessary ratification by plebiscite on broad lines and without any military pressure whatever of the already existing proclamation of separation.

The Bolshevik organ the Izvestia, denounced the German terms. For while these terms in principle admit no annexations, they declare that the provinces mentioned in Article II had already asserted their independence of Russia and that the Russian Government in accordance with its principles must recognize that fact, and that German troops would not therefore be withdrawn from those territories.

To the German proposals the Russians countered by a set of resolutions embodying the immediate evacuation of occupied territory pending a referendum, the evacuated districts to be governed by locally elected representatives of the people who are to be aided by the militia. The situation reached a crisis on January 4, when in the main committee of the Reichstag, the Imperial Chancellor Count von Hertling stated that the German Government must return a negative reply to the Russian proposal that the peace conference should be transferred from Brest-Litovsk to Stockholm. He also declared that Foreign Minister von Kuehlmann had been instructed to inform the Russian delegates at Brest-Litovsk that Germany could not accept their demand for the evacuation of the occupied provinces before a popular vote to decide their status was taken. On January 7 it was reported that for the present the peace pourparlers were temporarily suspended.

Great Britain's answer to the Czernin peace terms of the Central Powers as announced during the negotiations at Brest-Litovsk was delivered by Premier Lloyd George

at the recent conference of the British Laborites. He declared that England and her allies were not fighting a war of aggression against the German people, and that the destruction or the disruption of the German people had never for a moment been their aim. "Our wish is not to destroy Germany's great position in the world but to turn her aside from schemes of military domination to devote her strength to beneficent tasks." Great Britain, he said, would stand by France to the death in the demand for the "reconsideration" of Alsace-Lorraine. Referring to the Austro-German peace proposals at the Brest-Litovsk conference, he said: "It is impossible that any permanent peace could be erected on such a foundation. Mere lip service to the formula of no annexations, no indemnity and self-determination is useless." He declared that an independent Poland comprising all genuinely Polish elements who desired to participate was an essential to peace. Great Britain and her allies were not fighting to destroy Austro-Hungary or to deprive Turkey of its capital or of the rich lands in Asia Minor and Thrace which are predominantly Turkish. "Our viewpoint," the Premier declared, "is that the adoption of a democratic government by Germany would be the most convincing evidence that the old spirit of military domination was dead, but that is a question for the German people to decide." He found it difficult to speak of Russia without suspension of judgment. Her only salvation, he thought, must come from her own people. The Dardanelles should be neutralized and internationalized. "Arabia, Armenia, Mesopotamia, Syria and Palestine are entitled to recognition and separate national conditions. The days of the treaty of Vienna are long past. We can no longer submit the future of European civilization to the arbitrary decision of a few negotiators." Government with the consent of the governed must be the basis of settlement.

Brazil.—Another nation has sent an official answer to the Pope's peace proposal. His Excellency, Don Carlo Magalhaes de Azevedo, the Minister of Brazil to the Holy See, on November 20 forwarded to the Cardinal Secretary of State his Government's reply to the Pontifical note. The delay in its publication is due to the fact that it was sent by a special courier, and that at the time when the note appeared Brazil was still neutral.

Reply to the Pope's Note

The President of Brazil declares that his country has entered the war from no motive of conquest, bound as it is by its republican Constitution to have recourse to arbitration for the settlement of disputes with foreign nations, and actuated by a desire to preserve amicable relations with other powers, and to extend hospitality to the strangers who seek its borders. Had Germany not extended to America its war of violent aggression and its interference with the commerce of neutral peoples, Brazil, the President declares, would have remained outside the conflict, in spite of the manifest sympathy of its people with the cause of the Allies. In entering the war Brazil had for its motive neither hatred nor profit, but the sole purpose of defending its flag and its fundamental rights. Being one of many nations menaced in their sovereignty, Brazil could not remain aloof, but has joined its forces with theirs in the interests of humanity.

Nevertheless there is not a single Brazilian heart which has not been profoundly moved by the eloquent appeal made in the name of God by his Holiness in behalf of peace. Although Brazil, under its present free Constitution, is not officially committed to any religion whatsoever, it cannot forget that it occupies the third place among the Catholic Latin nations. For a century, more or less, its relations with the Government of the Church have been marked by a constant, uninterrupted, conspicuous cordiality. This being the case, Brazil fully appreciates the generous motives which inspired the Sovereign Pontiff to address his appeal to the heads of the belligerent Powers.

The President gives a rapid resumé of the principal points insisted on by the Pope, but declares that it belongs to the peoples directly interested to decide whether or not their honor can be maintained and tranquillity assured.

While there exists a military and political organization which has everywhere violated the respect due to right, which has destroyed everything that the human mind had thought definitely established for the mitigation of the rigors of war, which has annihilated everything that Christian sentiment had made the inspiration of the society of nations, it is for the peoples to say whether or not, now that confidence can no longer be had in treaties and international good faith, there exists a force or rather a new spirit, capable of guaranteeing peace in such a manner, that out of the evils and miseries and sufferings of the war there can arise a better world, the fruit of reason and liberty itself.

Only under such conditions, concludes the President of Brazil, will it be possible to sign a lasting peace; only with such assurances can the nations great and small take their proper place in the world, and possessing the same rights, make an exchange of thoughts, works and productions, "under the ægis and protection of justice and equity." The communication ends with the graceful loyal compliments to the Holy Father which are usual in the dealings of Catholic countries with the Holy See.

France.—The Holy Father, in a letter sent by Cardinal Gasparri, has expressed his hearty commendation of the program of the French "Corporation of Christian Writers," who have pledged themselves to strive by all means in their power to defend the family, to secure the repeal of laws tending to loosen the marriage tie, to secure punishment for those who propagate iniquitous doctrines, to work for the cause of Catholic education, and to obtain for religious Congregations the right to teach. Commenting on the program and especially the part which refers to the rehabilitation of the religious, the Irish Catholic quotes a declaration which is making the rounds of the Catholic French press and is said to have been made by M. Clemenceau some months before his appointment to the Premiership of the French Republic:

Clemenceau's Declaration

It would be monstrous to drive out of the country once more persons to whose care we were happy to confide our too numerous wounded soldiers, who, very often without them, would have received none. The Separation law and the law on the religious Congregations, at least in their present form, constitute a heavy fault. The war may furnish opportunities to repair them. It would be iniquitous, and consequently impolitic, to let them slip.

The opinion with which the French Premier is credited is only one of the evidences of the growing recognition of the need France has of the religious, and of the crying injustice of depriving of their rights as citizens those who throughout the war have given an example of the highest type of self-sacrificing patriotism.

Rome.—The attempts made to involve the Holy Father in the Caillaux scandal, which have been given currency in certain sections of the French and the Italian press, have been effectually answered by the following authorized statement in the Osservatore Romano:

Caillaux and the Vatican

The Parisian correspondent of an evening newspaper telegraphs that it appears from the documents transmitted to the Commission that Madame Caillaux had an interview at Rome with Cardinal Gasparri, and that M. Caillaux had interviews with a certain number of prelates, in which he invited them to work for a separate peace for Italy. M. Caillaux promised in return the reestablishment of diplomatic relations between France and the Vatican. We are authorized to state in the most absolute manner that the Cardinal Secretary of State had no interview whatsoever with Madame Caillaux either at the Vatican or elsewhere. Similarly the alleged meetings of M. Caillaux with a certain number of prelates are wholly imaginary. The same correspondent also declares that M. Sembat states in the Lanterne that Cavallini presented the wife of a French deputy, M. Lebous, to the Holy Father. We are likewise authorized to say that this statement is quite without foundation. The Holy See vigorously protests against this disloyal effort to involve it in the affair.

Catholics would do well to remember this emphatic denial of the rumors which are being circulated by the enemies of the Church with the object of discrediting the Pope and the Vatican. It is downright falsehood to declare that the Holy See had any part in the disgraceful intrigue.

Russia.—Reports keep coming of fighting in the South. The Ukrainians took the towns of Kharkov and Alexandrovsk from the Bolsheviki, disarming the garrisons. Revolutionary forces still occupy parts of the Don mining country but are unable to send coal to Petrograd. Late last week a Kieff dispatch reported that the Ukrainians had sent the Bolsheviki an ultimatum demanding that the latter's troops be withdrawn from the regions within twenty-four hours, and that they should state whether they consider themselves at peace or at war with the Ukraine. The Bolsheviki decided to negotiate with the Government of the Ukraine provided it does not hinder their military operations against General Kaledine. The entire population of the Don valley is said to be mobilized, all men of military age being under arms, women and youths being employed on the fighting line, and thousands of regular army officers having joined General Kaledine, whom the Cossacks have selected Hetman by a vote of 562 out of 638. Advices dated January 6 announced that the Bolsheviki and the Ukrainian legislative body have come to terms, the former expressing a readiness to withdraw their troops from the Ukraine and the latter agreeing to cease supporting Kalendine and his Cossacks.

The Civil War's Progress

On December 27 the Red Guard, acting under the orders of Finance Commissioner Menshinsky, seized the private banks in Petrograd including the branch of the National City Bank of New York, the manager of which was arrested for a time because he refused to give up his keys. In most cases no resistance was offered the Commissioner's agents. He asserts that his high-handed action was necessary, because the banks were sending in false reports to the Government of their business activities. The banks are to be permitted to open again after their books are inspected. The Workmen's and Soldiers' Delegates have approved a decree nationalizing all private banks and making banking a State monopoly. The authorities are empowered to examine the contents of safes and to seize all gold and bullion. The Government appears to be practically bankrupt, as all its sources of revenue are cut off, and the capital is suffering from a grave shortage of money.

Further Revolutionary Measures

The Constitutional Assembly, it has been announced, will open on January 18 provided a quorum of 400 is present. The Bolsheviki, it seems, are not opposed to the Assembly's gathering, but as yet there have not been enough accredited delegates in the capital to begin deliberations. The Petrograd correspondent of the London Daily News writes that "The Bolshevik Government is extremely efficient, energetic and decisive, though faced by noisy opposition from the privileged classes, who are doing all they can to check it by sabotage and libel. The people may not like the Bolsheviki, but they obey them with startling alacrity, and the Government is based on real force."

Mr. John F. Stevens, Chief of the American Railway Commission to Russia, arrived at Nagasaki, Japan, on December 19 from Vladivostok, and after announcing that he intended to return to Russia soon he made the following statement:

Mr. Stevens' Report

Russia at present presents a completely chaotic condition, permeated by the most clever German propaganda in every way and everywhere among all classes of the people. Nevertheless, I believe the better judgment of the mass of the people will be asserted, and Germany will not succeed in forcing a separate peace. Such a peace cannot be concluded if the Allies promptly give their help and suggestions.

The Maximalists, now in control, are much stronger than generally credited. In any future reorganization or attempts at a stable government the Maximalists must be considered and handled rightly.

The chaos is most evident in the manufacturies and railway shops, where the Workmen's and Soldiers' Delegates are in absolute control. They work or not, as they please, and everywhere may be seen workmen loafing. Women are doing much of the work in the shops, along the railway tracks, and in the fields, and even acting as brakemen. Where one woman is working 500 men are loafing.

A hundred thousand soldiers are crowding the stations, attempting the management of the trains and supporting themselves on a small daily allowance, to which they add by thievery and smuggling.

The railways and all other industries are operating at only 20 per cent of their effective powers. Food is plenty, but is not being distributed. The peasants are holding a three years' stock of wheat and other staples, but refuse to sell because the ruble has greatly depreciated in value or is regarded by them with suspicion.

The Government evidently is unable to commandeer food and a famine threatens, for which the peasants are largely responsible. There is also a coal famine and the production is only one-third of the normal because the miners are refusing to work.

At Vladivostok supplies of all kinds are carefully guarded. The port authorities have erected large warehouses and there is not much deterioration in the supplies. The Bolsheviki are in possession and the soldiers maintain order, but laborers are uneasy at the prospect that the continuation of the good condition is uncertain.

Siberia is not so much disturbed as Russia, and it is the people's desire to support any Government appearing to be stable. The uncertainty in Russia rests in the vast preponderance of the 130,000,000 persons in the peasant class. If Germany is allowed to finance and advise them the situation is lost.

Mr. Stevens stated that everywhere he went he found the Russian people well-disposed toward the United States and he thinks our influence in the country is stronger than that of the other Allies.

Economic Freedom and Industrial Democracy

EDWIN V. O'HARA, LL.D.

IT is obvious that there can be no hope of industrial peace until labor is possessed of a sufficiency of material income to maintain its home life in decent comfort from day to day, and is moreover secured against the economic risks incident to birth and death, old age and sickness. Many who have grudgingly assented to these fundamental demands will now assert the conviction that with the granting of these requests, enough has been demanded and enough has been granted. With sufficiency and security let labor be content. But it will not be so. Sufficiency and security, as Mr. Belloc has pointed out in a brilliant essay, are quite compatible with industrial slavery and serfdom. A civilization like our own, with its Christian traditions and its general diffusion of education, will not be content with a servile State. There is no reasonable doubt that even if men were well fed they would still struggle to be free. Mr. Justice Brandeis testified in this sense before the Federal Commission on Industrial Relations:

> Unrest, in my mind, never can be removed, and fortunately never can be removed by mere improvement of the material and physical condition of the workingmen. If it were we should run great risk of improving their material condition and reducing their manhood.

What greater freedom can be desired than that which is guaranteed to every American citizen? Is it alleged that political democracy with its constitutional safeguards fails to provide adequately for the liberty of the individual? It is not a question of political, but of economic freedom. On the one hand are the small number of capitalists owning and controlling the greater part of the means of production; on the other, the multitude of dispossessed proletariat owning nothing but their labor power. This is their sole economic possession, and as labor can produce nothing to satisfy the wants of its owner except by its application to land and capital in the means of production, it has come to pass that the great multitude of workers are the economic dependents of those few who own the capital. It will be said that the laborer is free to contract the sale of his labor power in return for wages which he receives. It is true that he is legally free. But, as Dr. John A. Ryan remarks in this connection, there are other hindrances to freedom besides legal and political restrictions. Freedom does not consist in an abstract right, but in the active power to secure the possession or enjoyment of that to which one has a right. The essence of freedom of contract is the ability not to contract. The owner of capital has this power because he has a reserve of wealth and can exist comfortably for a considerable time even if no wheel should move in his factories. Moreover, he can refuse to contract with any particular workman because he has generally a choice of workers in the labor market. But the laborer who has nothing but his labor cannot refuse to contract; he cannot hesitate long to accept the terms that are offered him.

"The power of the employer to withhold bread is a much more powerful weapon than that of the employee to withhold his labor. Low wages are bad in the worker's eyes but unemployment with starvation in the background is much worse." The fact is, therefore, outstanding that in the present arrangement of society, the laborer is not free but is in a state of economic dependence on the capitalist.

Moreover, the only remedy possible to the laborer, as long as he remains dispossessed of ownership in the means of production, is very largely denied him through the combined efforts of the employing class, namely, the right of dealing with the employer through labor organization, collectively with his fellows. The laboring man had hoped by pooling his strength with others of his class to deal collectively where he could not successfully deal as an individual. And while he has been successful to a limited degree, he has hitherto largely failed through the determination of great combinations of capital to "manage their own business" and not to be dictated to by the employee.

Of course this is the crux of the whole matter, whether industry is to be managed despotically or whether some element of democratic control is to be introduced. Employers who refuse to deal with organized labor tell how freely they welcome individual workmen with grievances. In this they resemble the benevolent despot who in olden times on stated days graciously "granted audiences to which his faithful subjects might bring their complaints against his officers or agents."

Again, the legal principles invoked in contemporary economic controversy were laid down at a time when the wide diffusion of private ownership of property was considered, and rightly considered, the solid foundation of personal liberty. In that condition the safeguarding of private property rights was equivalent to safeguarding human rights and on that theory the guarantees were created. Today that condition has passed. Private property is no longer diffused among the body of citizens but is concentrated in the hands of the few, whereas the many have been dispossessed of everything except their bare labor power. Still the main business of our courts of law is the defense of private property rights, even to the disadvantage of human rights.

Not only so. The Fourteenth Amendment to the Federal Constitution has been practically appropriated by the corporations. This amendment was written as a humanitarian measure prohibiting any law which would "abridge the privileges of citizens," or "deprive citizens of life, liberty or property without due process of law." It was intended primarily to safeguard the newly enfranchised negroes. It was, says a competent authority, > aimed at restraining and checking the powers of wealth and privilege. It was to be a charter of liberty for human rights against property rights. The transformation has been rapid and complete. It operates today to protect the rights of property to the detriment of the rights of man. It has become the Magna Charta of accumulated and organized capital.

Practically every important law enacted in the United States for the amelioration of the condition of labor has been attacked in the courts as being in contravention of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution. By this means laws for the protection of child labor, for the welfare of women workers, for the protection of men in hazardous occupations, have been annulled or retarded for a decade, a melancholy story of the greed of employers and of lack of vision in courts of law.

"Most important of all," says Belloc truly, "is the fact that livelihood is at the will of the possessors." It can be granted by the possessors to the non-possessors or it can be withheld. The real sanction in our society for the arrangement by which it is conducted, is not punishment enforceable by the courts but the withholding of livelihood from the dispossessed by the possessors. Most men now fear the loss of employment more than they fear legal punishment.

What is to be the remedy? How is economic liberty to be secured? By Socialism? No, for the experience of the great war has revealed even to the workers that they would have less freedom under a bureaucratic State control than under a great corporation; even the freedom to strike would be taken from them.

Nor will the remedy lie in profit-sharing or pension systems, which may indeed improve the material condition of the employee but which operate largely, and are largely so intended, to bind him to a particular employment. There must be a division of responsibilities as well as of profits. The remedy will be found in the general recognition of the principle of collective bargaining, and in every device, legal and social, which will encourage more extensive distribution of private ownership and co-operative control of industry.

The same arguments avail for the autocratic control of business that avail for political autocracy. The same arguments and no others. There was a time when governments were considered by many to exist for the benefit of the governing class, and the incapacity of the people to conduct their political affairs has been the subject of many a learned disquisition. But while the leavening influence of Christianity with its doctrine of the dignity of the human person, and with the general diffusion of education, encouraging experiments have been made in the direction of political democracy; for example, the American commonwealth. These experiments have not been ideally successful, but few who hold Christian principles will question that they are fundamentally in harmony with Christian aspirations. These aspirations will be canalized in the future no less by industrial democracy than by political democracy.

The argument is all away from Socialism, towards a wider diffusion of privately owned property among the working classes, an ownership of stock in corporations which will entitle them to an effective voice on the boards of directors; in any case, an ownership of productive private property which alone will make them economically free. It is only on this basis of the "ownership of lucrative property" by the head of the family, that Pope Leo XIII finds adequate provision that the members of the family may "keep themselves honorably from want and misery amid the uncertainties of this mortal life." That is the workingman's clear right.

Only in the progressive democratization of industry, in the steady growth of the cooperative ownership and control of the means of production by the workers themselves, will be found the balance-wheel which will preserve society between the extremes of individualism and Socialism, which will harmonize the demands for social stability and social progress.

Laymen and Canon Law

JOHN T. CREAGH, J.U.D., S.T.L.

THE layman who regards the new code of canon law sees in it a body of law regulating the life of the great spiritual society of which he finds himself a citizen. In this view, every title and every canon of the new legislation have an importance for him, providing as they do for his spiritual well-being. It is for his sake that Pope and bishops and priests discharge their functions, that the Roman Curia energizes in its manifold departments, that duties are imposed and rights defined and offenses penalized and laws of procedure established. For what is more or less true of some other societies, is unquestionably and fully true of the Church:—"Salus populi suprema lex." This being understood, we may attempt—what without this understanding would be apt to convey a wrong impression of the relation of the laity to the code—to direct attention to some provisions in which the layman may be supposed to have a more immediate and particular interest.

Citizenship in the Church is acquired through Baptism. Baptism supposed, a person becomes a citizen of a diocese or of a parish in two ways, either by fixing his domicile there permanently, or by what is known as quasi-domicile, which supposes actual residence in a locality with the intention of remaining there more than six months. A married woman necessarily has the domicile of her husband, and the domicile of a minor is identified with that of his parent or guardian; but it is possible for a wife or for a child over seven years old to acquire a quasi-domicile distinct from the residence of husband or parent. All these provisions have a serious practical importance in relation to rights and duties, and furnish the means of determining who is one's bishop or one's parish priest.

Good citizenship in the Church evidently means, first of all, good Catholicism. Hence the law that care must be taken to avoid not only what is clearly heretical but all errors as well that approximate more or less closely to heresy. To this end, it is the duty of a Catholic to observe, in addition to the dogmatic definitions of the Church, those rulings and decrees of the Holy See in which erroneous tendencies are proscribed. A Catholic must moreover avoid any conduct that would endanger his faith or proclaim its weakness. He is not allowed to participate in non-Catholic religious services, although the law tolerates, for grave reason, a merely passive assistance at funerals, marriages and like functions. Even in these latter cases, if there is any doubt about the sufficiency of the reason alleged, the matter must be referred to higher authority so that attendance may become lawful. He may not marry a non-Catholic or a member of a condemned society. He must provide his children with a Catholic education. He has the duty of frequently hearing sermons and catechetical instructions and of seeing that his children and servants do likewise. Even as to the books and papers he reads he must be guided by general principles of religion and by the specific rules of the Index.

But the Church makes it clear in her code that uncompromising Catholicism does not connote hostility to members of other churches. No one is to be constrained to become a Catholic. All priests are explicitly charged with a special solicitude for the non-Catholics resident in their parishes. The blessings of the Church may be given to those who are not of the household of the Faith, to obtain for them either the light of faith, or, jointly with this, bodily health. More significant, Mass may be said for any living person whatsoever or for any soul in purgatory. Even for an excommunicated person a priest may privately say Mass, the only restriction being that if the excommunication has been officially published by Rome with an intimation that all must shun the offender, the Mass must be for conversion.

Because the vigor of Catholic life depends largely on the extent to which the Faithful avail themselves of what is so distinctively a trait of the Church, its Sacramental system, a considerable section of the code is devoted to the Sacraments. Baptism must be administered to infants as soon as possible, and the clergy are commanded frequently to admonish the Faithful of this grave obligation. The name given at Baptism must be the name of a saint, and if the parents refuse to comply with this law, the minister of the Sacrament must add a saint's name. Ordinarily no one may act as god-parent who has not reached his fourteenth year; and in both Baptism and Confirmation sponsors assume a real obligation of watching over the religious well-being and Catholic education of their god-children.

The old rule requiring as a minimum the reception of the Sacrament of Penance at least once a year is reaffirmed. Freedom in the choice of a confessor is strikingly emphasized in the provision which authorizes confession to any approved priest, even if he be of a rite different from that of the penitent. A parish priest is empowered to absolve his parishioners anywhere, even in another diocese. Confession within eight days before or within eight days after a feast to which an indulgence is attached, suffices to fulfil the requirement of confession for that indulgence, and a further concession is made to those who are accustomed to confess at least twice a month, inasmuch as these customary confessions will contribute to the gaining of any indulgence except a jubilee.

The code enacts that the period for Easter Communion shall run from Palm Sunday to Low Sunday, and at the same time gives to bishops the right to extend this time, if they see fit, so that it shall begin on the fourth Sunday of Lent and terminate on Trinity Sunday. However, as the code also allows indults previously granted to remain in force, and as the United States enjoys an indult which fixes the two limits as the first Sunday of Lent and Trinity Sunday, our discipline in this regard probably will remain unchanged, especially as the reasons for the indult still exist in many places. But we are affected by the canon which directs that all should be persuaded to receive their Paschal Communion in their own parish churches, and obliges those who communicate elsewhere to inform their parish priest of that fact. For reasons simply of devotion or piety a Latin Catholic may receive Holy Communion, but not the Paschal Communion, in another rite. Of more practical importance than most laymen probably would believe is the article of the new law giving to persons unable to fast and confined by illness to their homes for a month the right to receive Holy Communion once or twice a week even when the Eucharistic fast has been broken by taking nourishment in liquid form. Both laity and clergy are affected by the requirement that priests shall strive to excite devotion toward the Sacrament of the Altar, shall exhort the members of their flock to assist at daily Mass and to visit the Blessed Sacrament, and shall encourage the practice of daily Communion.

Of interest to some will be the knowledge that the law of the Church expressly declares it a crime for any reason or in any manner to force a youth to become a priest or to hinder one called to that state of life from following his vocation. Of more universal interest is the canon condemning neglect of the Sacrament of Extreme Unction and urging the greatest care in summoning a priest before the dying person has become unconscious.

The important section devoted to marriage contains much that is familiar—like the declaration that any conditional agreement frustrating the primary end of matrimony, the procreation of children, renders the contract null and void—but it is especially interesting because of the innovations it contains, only the more important of which may be noted here. The impediment of consanguinity has been restricted to the third degree, reckoning canonically, which means that henceforth marriages between third cousins will be lawful, but not between second cousins. The impediment of disparity of worship which formerly nullified marriage between an unbaptized person and one validly baptized in any church, now applies only when the baptized person is a Catholic, by baptism or conversion, at the time of the marriage. The age for valid marriage has been raised to sixteen years completed for males and fourteen years completed for females, though the clergy are instructed to discountenance the marriage of persons who have not reached the age approved by local custom. Spiritual relationship arises only from the Sacrament of Baptism and exists only between the baptizer and the baptized and between the sponsor and his or her godchild. Children who have not completed their twenty-first year may not be married without the knowledge of their parents or against their parents' just dissent, unless the Bishop, on the case being referred to him, judge that a sufficiently grave reason makes the union advisable. Marriage may be contracted at any time of the year, but marriage at a Nuptial Mass, unless the consent of the Bishop be secured, is forbidden from the first Sunday of Advent to Christmas Day inclusively, and from Ash Wednesday to Easter Sunday inclusively. Catholics should be married in the parish church and with a Mass, and if for any reason this latter provision of the law is not observed, the parish priest should see to it that the Mass is said later and the nuptial blessing given. As a rule marriage should not be permitted earlier than three days after the last publication of the banns.

The new law on fast and abstinence allows the use of fish and flesh at a meal, thus removing the reason for some interesting subterfuges employed by the laity in the past. Also, the law distinguishes between days of abstinence, days of fast and abstinence, and days of fast, a distinction that will be of importance in the comparatively few cases in which our many indults and more numerous dispensations make its application necessary for us. Lent ends at noon on Easter Saturday. Catholics are bound by the law of abstinence once they have reached the age of seven years. The obligation of fasting begins with the completion of the twenty-first year and ceases for both men and women when they enter on their sixtieth year. Though the code as a whole is effective only from Pentecost of 1918, the section on fast and abstinence has already been made operative.

The limitations necessarily put upon an article such as this which we now bring to a close force us to be content with the foregoing summary of certain notable features of the code. Anyone who will have the curiosity to read for himself the new law will realize how incomplete this summary is. However, a book and not an article would be required if one were to attempt even a measure of completeness. Especially is this true since what has been left unremarked is, much of it, as noteworthy as the rule which requires that contracts coming before the ecclesiastical courts shall be adjudicated according to the civil law of the locality in which the contract was made; or as interesting and suggestive as another canon which obliges all employers to pay a just wage, to burden the employed with no tasks that are incompatible with their age or sex, and to see that workmen have leisure for the performance of their religious duties and the proper care of their families. But even an imperfect summary can, let us hope, serve the useful purpose of enabling the reader to form at least a general idea of the nature and content of this extraordinary law-book.

The Dream of Immortality

DANIEL A. LORD, S.J.

THE mad anxiety of certain modern philosophers to run away from the idea of immortality is what Hardy would call one of life's little ironies. Toward the beginning of the war, Haeckel took occasion from the carnage of the battlefield to remark pityingly that after all immortality is a dream, a beautiful dream, but a dream none the less. Whereat, sundry reviews nodded solemnly assenting heads.

It takes a man with the calm assurance of Haeckel to stigmatize all mankind, save himself, a small coterie of materialists in our day, and an insignificant scattering of ancients, as deluded dreamers. The acquaintance of a high-school student with the literature of Greece and Rome, the most casual dipping into Egyptian archeology, any slight knowledge of Hindu or Chinese beliefs, the burial rites of the Mound Builders, or the traditional beliefs of the American Indians show that pagan nations were scarcely a pace behind the Hebrews and the peoples of Christian Europe in their belief in immortality. But of course they were all sound asleep. How fortunate for our generation that we possess a human alarm-clock to wake us from our dream, beautiful though it be. Is not unbelief astoundingly modest?

To begin with, I freely admit that if there are no souls, there is, of course, no immortality. We are only too grimly aware of the death of the body and its consequent decay. But former essays in armchair philosophy have been love's labor lost if their readers have not been confirmed in their belief that they have souls distinct from their bodies and performing intellectual acts and free acts of the will which no mere body could perform. Naturally, though, as Haeckel does not own a soul of his own but believes himself to be blood-brother, or at least first cousin, of the bull and the chamois and that most fashionable relative, the ape, it would be simply nonsense for him to expect immortality. A plump turkey at Thanksgiving-time would have a far better chance.

But you, faithful reader, in your armchair and I in mine know that we have a soul, a something more than our shifting, changing body. We know too that that soul can understand right and justice and abstract physical and moral laws, that it can form an idea of God and of other souls, all of which no sense of our bodies ever experienced, for the simple reason that they are not material objects. One wonders, by the way, how Haeckel can talk of immortality if he had no soul, for he never saw anything immortal, and he is a thousand miles from having heard or felt the abstract thing we call immortality. We know as well that we have a free will, while our bodies are bound by the laws of physics and chemistry. So we at least have within us something which performs actions essentially higher than any action performed by our bodies. Such a soul might conceivably be immortal.

Our own experience too has shown that the destruction of the body does not necessarily mean the soul's destruction. For you will recall that every seven years the body is completely destroyed and rebuilt, while the soul remains essentially unaltered, binding in a unity of personality the man tottering to his grave and the child toddling to his mother's knee. At least during life our souls are not destroyed with the destruction of our bodies.

One infallible recipe for the making of a successful materialist is carefully to ignore or condescendingly to pity the higher beliefs and aspirations of man. If Haeckel instead of pitying his poor dreamers had given a glance at their dream, he might have felt some slight fear that his pity was misplaced. For, oddly enough, it is as impossible for a man to be absolutely original in his dreams as it is in his poetry. Dreams, much like poetry, are the fragmentary and often inconsequent reproductions of real convictions and passionate aspirations. The stuff of dreams are the things we know and the things we crave in our waking life.

Supposing then that immortality is a dream, it is a dream based on an aspiration as firmly embedded in human nature as is hunger for food or a craving for love. It is a dream which has for its basis in man's waking life a continuous, unconquerable craving for perfect happiness. May it not be that the Designer of the universe when He gave man that craving intended at some future time to gratify it?

If man is, as Haeckel would maintain, just a step higher than the beast, it is remarkable that his horizon is not bounded by a soft bed of straw and a bit of juicy meat. Instead we have a craving for a happiness greater than any that life can give us. The most terrible pain does not come from diseased limbs and an aching brain; it comes from the failure of our constant striving after happiness. Like Nevill Fanning in "Initiation," men build their dreams of happiness on love of woman or love of nature, and dream after dream fades, while the insatiable, almost maddening craving for happiness remains.

It has become part of a philosophical creed since the days of Schopenhauer to sneer at the place of happiness in the world's economy. Yet strike happiness from man's life and we would have a race of galley slaves, ambitionlessly inert save under the lash of hunger or lust; put the desire for happiness back, and you energize the world. As at the kiss of Prince Charming, the sleeping world awakes; poets write; explorers plunge through the frozen entanglements of the poles; merchants pile up fortunes; scholars add knowledge to knowledge; and soldiers seek glory at the cannon's mouth. Even the poor fool whose guiding star is a flickering red light is lured on by an insatiable craving for happiness. Every cocktail that is mixed, every hypodermic that is filled, every cabaret that makes hideous the night, is a sop thrown to man's hunger for happiness.

If in all this broad world any man at any time has found the secret of perfect happiness, he has hidden it more effectively than its inhabitants hid the fabulous city of the Cæsars. Surely experience, that safest and most expensive of teachers, should by this time have convinced men that their dream of perfect happiness is a dream indeed, if they seek it in this world. For history and the daily papers keep maddeningly dinning into our unwilling ears the fact that happiness cannot be measured in terms of stocks and bonds, nor in languages learned, nor pictures painted, nor titles conferred, nor even in souls saved. Like so much salt water, all the possessions one can heap up merely render more insupportable our thirst for happiness, for as long as men shall live, at the moment of their greatest power they will weep in tiresome imitation of Alexander, for further worlds to conquer.

Recall the fable of the fisherman and the enchanted fish; like all fables it is truth crystalized: men ask first for a cottage, then for a palace, then for a patent of nobility, and at last for the sun and moon for their playthings. Vast knowledge whets the appetite for more; the controller of a factory aims to control the whole industry; and the emperor with dominion over the earth would dream by night of an airship expedition against Mars. Even should we possess the earth for our throne and the heavens for our canopy, our ultimate and fearfully anticipated possession is a mound, deep and dark and shunned by even our best-beloved. That terrible realization is enough to turn to wormwood any pleasure that time can offer us.

Jove, said the old mythology, tortured Tantalus by creating in him a devouring thirst and yet keeping the water just out of reach of his parched lips. Jove had a small boy's love of pulling a live beetle to pieces. Yet if the Creator of the universe planted in the soul of man an unconquerable thirst for perfect happiness and made it impossible for man ever to quench that thirst, Jove would have been by comparison a merciful, beneficent deity. For Jove tortured one guilty mortal; God would be torturing the whole human race.

It is strange that persons who pride themselves on their own superlative virtues and think most kindly of their friends, will talk as if the world's Creator had neither common-sense nor common justice. We at least must grant the Person which put order into this universe the virtues we would not deny a chance acquaintance.

Yet there is no justice in God unless the soul with its intellect and will is immortal. In the heart of every man in every age and people has been that passionate craving for perfect happiness, and it has been consistently and inevitably denied fulfilment in this life. We have but two alternatives: either God has been using men for His sport, driving them on blindly, irresistibly after a phantom that fled as they approached it, or He has put perfect happiness in the power of man in a world beyond. In the first supposition, God would not be God but a brutal tyrant worse than those Oriental monarchs who chained their starving prisoners close to their own banqueting boards. Worst of all, He would have allowed all men to dream their beautiful dream of immortality while all the while He laughed them to scorn.

In the second alternative, perfect happiness inevitably means immortality. For no happiness can be perfect unless its possessor be sure that it will never end; the mature happiness of a devoted husband and wife fails just in this, that it will end. If God in common justice means to make possible the satisfaction of the thirst which He has created, He must have granted to human souls the gift of immortality.

God too has given us an intellect which no man has begun to plumb to its depth, and He has allowed us a few brief years on earth in which to fill its limitless bounds. Is that the sort of common-sense we should expect of the Designer of the universe? That would be like the act of man who, to store the grain crop of a single summer, built an elevator which covered the western continent, and when summer was over leveled the immense structure to the ground. At the end of the longest and most studious life, man has stowed away a few tiny grains of knowledge in his vast intellect, just enough to make him crave for more. It is an insult to God's intelligence to suppose that He created these gigantic intellects to end with their work but just begun.

If we are not immortal, then the lot of the snake in the grass is happier than ours; it at least has neither intellect which craves for knowledge nor will which thirsts after perfect happiness. But we cannot suppose that the God in whose universe such wonderful order reigns would raise man above the beast by his intellect and will only to use that intellect and will in making him more miserable than the lowest reptile. On the contrary, we are certain with a Divine certainty that while there is a God in the universe and while in man's heart throbs that insuperable craving for happiness, the dream of immortality shall not have been dreamed in vain.

The Quebec Problem

J. C. WALSH

THE motion introduced into the Quebec legislature concerning a possible secession of that Province from the Canadian Confederation need not be taken as indicating an approaching dissolution of the Dominion. It was presented by way of entering a protest against the violence with which Quebec was assailed during the election campaign. It goes no further than to affirm Quebec's willingness to leave Confederation if her continuance is considered by the rest of Canada as an obstacle to progress. The debate upon it may be expected to produce little more than a somewhat emphatic expression of the mind of the Province about several matters concerning which feeling runs strong.

It is true enough that the elections resulted in a curious situation. The country west of Quebec went solidly one way. Quebec went just as solidly the other. East of Quebec there was a division, and if the balance in the Maritime Provinces inclined toward the Quebec side it is to be remembered that they have a large French population, of the same origin as that of Quebec, which made its voting power felt. Will it surprise anyone familiar with the ways of politics to learn that, whereas before the election the welkin rang with denunciation of Quebec, the day after the election the victors began to inquire in what manner Quebec could be conciliated? That is what has happened. True, concern is shown by those only who have a serious regard for the future, who take the long view. True again, even amongst these there are some who advocate the methods of the strong hand. Nevertheless, the question who is to rule Canada for the immediate future having been settled, those to whom the task is delivered are very naturally seeking to make their road as easy as they can.

Before the election the language held toward Quebec was of this sort: "Close your ranks, English Canadians! Quebec declares that that Province shall hold the balance of power and swing the destinies of this British Dominion to suit its own parochial vision and its own ecstatic whims. Close your ranks! If Quebec wants to play the dangerous game of One Province Over Eight, it will find that men of British blood are not to be trodden under foot." It is interesting to note the reaction. We see it, of course, in the return of sixty-two Oppositionists out of sixty-five members, but even that does not tell the tale. In the Quebec country-districts people love party politics, the political oration in the open air after Mass being as much a part of the normal life as the Mass itself. They take sides, these serious, God-fearing farmers, and they stand fast. Election after election, unto the third and fourth generation, a parish may vote rouge or it may vote bleu, but whichever way the majority lies there is always a stalwart group on the other :side. This time, in one of the oldest counties and one of the most famous political battlefields in all Quebec, the returns ran 165 to 0; 138 to 0; 134 to 0; 410 to 1; 379 to 2; and so on, the aggregates being 2,643 to 36. In another county, the returns ran 485 to 0; 340 to 0; 416 to 3; 940 to 10; in all 5,218 to 77. One might suspect that the 36 and the 77 were strangers in the counties, or at the least outsiders to the population. Those who wanted to isolate Quebec certainly had their way as far as Quebec's own response went. It was perfectly willing to be isolated from those who proclaimed themselves its enemies and who said it must be isolated.

Two days after the election newspapers friendly to the Government, now safe again, began to take a new line about Quebec. The isolation policy had worked too well. The situation, one paper said, might easily become embarrassing. Here were sixty-five to seventy members, counting those elected by French votes outside Quebec, who by quietly watching their chance could upset ministries as easily as it was done from time to time in France. This situation was all wrong, and must be changed as soon as possible. This expression was from the Conservative side of the Union-Government support. From the Liberal side came the sage observation that there was no use trying to settle the main issue between Quebec and the rest of the Dominion by speeches which ignore the voting power of 2,000,000 people. A permanent separation being unthinkable, an attempt to reach an understanding became necessary. And so, while yesterday the part of French Canadians was to do what English Canadians told them, now the majority are conjured to show both sympathy and good sense. Yesterday the aggressive purpose was to conscript Quebec, now the desire is to reach an agreement on the quite other issue, whether Canada is a bi-lingual country or whether Canada is a country with one bi-lingual Province, namely Quebec. What is one to think of all this?

What it means is that there are some permanent problems confronting Canadian statesmen, and that while it is convenient enough in some cases to isolate Quebec, in others that is the last thing to be desired.

French Canada is Catholic, and there are elements in the Canadian population which are aggressively anti-Catholic. Their preference is to be against Quebec; but it has happened in past times that their interest has required that Quebec be with them, and in such instances they know how to be neighborly. People whose ancestors never spoke anything but French cherish the desire to have their children taught French. In Quebec English-speaking people think this natural enough for they, whose ancestors spoke only English, want their children taught English, and though they are in a very small minority their wish is honored. But in the other Provinces, when French families go there, it is found that this reciprocal principle only applies to Quebec. For their good they must be content with English, but they are not content.

In the third place, there is a difference in outlook upon the group of issues brought to the fore by the politics of British imperial reorganization. The French Canadian has been 300 years out of Europe and has no desire to be drawn back into European currents. His dislike is turned into obstinacy when those who are for dragging him unwillingly into imperialist schemes vary the proceeding by abusing him for being a Catholic and by treating him as a criminal for speaking his own language.

Finally, there are domestic questions, some of them closely related, however, to the imperialist group, as to which other sections of the community may divide according to manifest interest, and as to which Quebec, with its splendid admixture of agriculture, industry and commerce, is not bound to one side or the other. There is a Free-Trade party in the West and a Protectionist party in the East; there is a Pro-American party (in trade matters) in the West and an Anti-American party in the East; there is a Government-Ownership party, and a party against it; there are the advocates of numerous economic and other panaceas, and there are the natural, because interested, opponents of each of them. In the new Government the opposing groups on any and all of these subjects are all represented, and in Parliament their supporters are almost equally divided. Only Quebec is outside, with a block of votes big enough to be determinative if present friends became enemies, big enough, again, to keep either side from pressing its views too far for fear Quebec might favor the other. That is why a newspaper on one side of politics pleads that Quebec's isolation has gone altogether too far; why a newspaper on the other side is purring in the most friendly way; and why the usual temptations are already being put in the way of public men who, a month ago, were denounced as public enemies.

It is fair to conclude from all this that Quebec is not likely to adopt violent measures before she has been driven to have recourse to them; and also that the disposition so to drive her is apt rather to abate than to increase. The language, the religion and the institutions she cherishes she will continue to guard. She did so when all were joined together to denounce her, and she will go on doing so when they fall apart to court her. Quebec is a great static fact, and it will have to be a mighty upheaval indeed that will budge her from the rock on which she rests.

Midnight Mass in Camp

J. A. Carey, U. S. A.

TAPS had sounded more than an hour before, and sleep comes quick to the tired soldier; "lights out," and darkness reigned; traffic had ceased through the camp street and stillness prevailed; the indistinct forms of the sentries walking their posts seemed to intensify the darkness and the stillness. The vast city of tents slept in silence under the stars.

Just before midnight the soldier-boys were awakened from their slumbers and as they sat up in their bunks listening to the regimental band marching through the company streets they cried one to another: "What does it all mean?" "Listen! It's the Adeste Fideles." The Catholic boys knew. It is Christmas Eve and tonight we are to have midnight Mass. And what would Christmas be without the Mass? And how the Adeste Fideles brings back the scenes of home and childhood and a long chain of Christmas days! Henceforth for these soldier-boys it will recall for evermore Christmas Eve and a military Field Mass at midnight in a United States army camp in North Carolina.

Out from their tents they come, down the company streets to a field beyond the drill ground. "Look!" they cry again. A vision of glory appears in the sky. No, it is not the choirs of angels, but a huge illuminated Christmas tree, sparkling with hundreds of colored electric lights, and at its summit, set against the sky, gleams the Star of Bethlehem. At the base of the tree is a stage, all outlined in lights, whereon is erected an altar for the midnight Mass.

How mild and clear and still is the night as the Mass begins at the foot of the tree. The light streams down upon the vested form of the priest, and is reflected on the great crowd assembled round the altar. The regimental band begins the Adeste Fideles, and then bursts forth from the heart and throat of these Catholic boys, now indeed, "laeti triumphantes," and goes swelling and sweeping from camp to camp. Ah! how it is making their hearts beat and stirring the soul and lifting them to some higher plane! They could cry for joy. They are thrilled with a holy happiness. It is the realism of it all. For was it not in the darkness of night, at such an hour, and in such a field that the shepherds were awakened and summoned to come and adore the God made man?

Without any straining or striving for effect, how natural is the supernaturalism of the Church? To these bright, clean, manly Catholic boys, who from the purest patriotic motives are offering their lives for their country, it is all as real as the first Christmas night and with a faith as clear as the beholding of the shepherds they realize His presence and like the shepherds they mingle with angels, and bow down and adore the glory of God—the peace of man.

"Angels we have heard on high, Sweetly singing o'er the plain."

But more sweetly than the singing of angels seemed the singing of these American soldier-boys, their hearts bounding, as out there in the field at midnight Mass they sang, "Gloria in Excelsis Deo."

Then the chaplain, elevated above the throng, read the Gospel story of the shepherds, and of the angels, and Mary and Joseph, and the birth of the Saviour of the world, that story at once too simple and too sublime to be the invention or the conception of man, and under the spell of the scene, and under the charm of the Gospel story told there in the night, the men listened with bated breath and moistened eye. How real and natural and true it all seemed out there in the field at midnight! How straight from eternity, out from the heart of God came the tidings of great joy, and how it all fitted into the heart of man.

No, there is nothing paradoxical in adoring the Prince of Peace in this camp of war. "Peace to men of good-will" the Angels sang. Those who will it, have it, and for those who have it not, it is because they will it not. And these young soldiers are men of peace and good-will. There is no hate in their heart, no vengeance or bloodthirstiness. They are not brawlers and strife-seekers. They are of a peaceful nation and people and are fighting only for peace and are willing to pay the supreme price for it even as Christ paid the supreme price. And as they kneel round the altar, which is His Manger, their heart's desire, their crying prayer is for peace and good-will among men. They have weighed all with calm deliberation; they have counted the cost and accepted all that is involved in the sacrifice. Deliberately they reached their decision and came to their high resolve. Even before they have seen action they have given up freedom in order that others might be free, and in the thousand little things that are greater than the big things, and in a thousand ways that are harder than death, they are even now suffering in order that others may not suffer. And when the hour comes, if come it must, unafraid they will make the great sacrifice, and unafraid they pray for peace.

Now there rings out the old French Cantique de Noël. "Minuet, Chrétiens!—Voici le Rédempteur," and in the silence the tinkling of a little bell, and lo! He comes. "Dum medium silentium tenercnt omnia et nox in suo cursu medium iter perageret omnipotens sermo tuus, Domine, a regalibus sedibus venit." Aye, and into loyal hearts He comes as the long line of communicants approach the altar, and give Him the room He could not find in Bethlehem town and with Him comes joy into their hearts and peace into their soul and the light and blessing of God encompasses them.

Yes, the Adeste Fideles will evermore bring forth a memorable scene for these soldier-boys: the midnight Mass out there in the field on Christmas Eve; and mayhap on other nights they will have to pass and in the fields on some foreign soil, under the stars they will recall this night they spent with Him and drank deep of His peace and strength.

This midnight Mass was the thought and the suggestion of the Colonel of the Regiment, a non-Catholic, who assisted thereat with most of his officers and men. In this vast cantonment of thirty thousand men at Camp Greene, the First Marine Regiment of heavy field artillery, were to be in quarantine Christmas, and the Colonel thought that the midnight Mass would dispel some of the gloom occasioned by the quarantine; and so it did.

The St. Vincent de Paul Society

A letter in your issue of December 8, "The St. Vincent de Paul Society," signed "L. E.," is evident proof that L. E. is laboring under a serious misapprehension in reference to present-day tendencies in Vincentian work. The terms "adequate relief," "full and complete records," "social service exchange," are not mere words, but denote definite milestones in the march of social progress. For what is "adequate relief"? It is relief given to a family after a full and complete understanding of a situation, with the purpose of restoring that family to economic and spiritual independence at the earliest possible moment. A mere dole or niggardly relief will never effect this result. Our definition of adequate relief carries with it the necessity for full and complete investigation. Cases often recur where, if the first investigation has been made a matter of record, needless discomfiture to the family is avoided. Again, for one reason or another, the family may not improve, and records offer the opportunity for a complete review.

The family moves. A new conference is called to take up the work of the first conference. Unless the conferences have a mutual understanding by which they exchange confidential records, the work of rebuilding that family is delayed, and oftentimes destroyed. Hence an exchange where but the names are registered offers a ready means of avoiding this pitfall. L. E. has failed to distinguish between principles and methods. For it is not principles that the social worker of today would change, but methods. In the article which we are discussing, appear citations of the Widows' Pension and Workmen's Compensation laws, two out of the many remedies designed to aid social progress. These remedies are new, and it would seem that we require new methods to bring them into operation.

In the note appended to Article I of the Rules of the Society of St. Vincent de Paul, the following may be read: "The Society of St. Vincent de Paul has been founded by young men, and for young men." Is it altogether the fault of the younger men that they are not members of the St. Vincent de Paul Society? Has the young man who joins a Conference any opportunity to voice his ideas concerning the administration of relief? If his ideas perchance were accorded the courtesy of a hearing would the older members of the Conference ever allow them to be translated into action?

A young man's ideas were given the courtesy of a hearing, were translated into action, in one Conference to the writer's knowledge, with the result that a gentleman, a Vincentian for over forty years, and a President of a Conference for twenty, said to me:

> The first six months you were in the Conference, I did not appreciate your viewpoint or understand the basis of your criticism. I felt that you did not fully subscribe to Vincentian principles. Today this Conference, using up-to-date methods in social work and sacrificing not one iota of the revered principles of St. Vincent de Paul, is doing more and better work, with the expenditure of less money than ever before in its history.

All honor and praise to the noble sons of St. Vincent de Paul who follow so devotedly the ideals of Catholic charity even to the humblest hovel of this great city. Not one of them would be content to hide inefficiency under the mantle of spirituality. Their aim is the nearest possible approach to perfection in God's work.

Father Dunne's Newsboys' Journal

To the Editor of AMERICA:

On Sunday, September 1, 1906, Father Dunne's Newsboys' Journal of St. Louis first began life. For weeks there had been notices in the papers telling of the future journal. The editor was exultant over the atmosphere that the advertisements in the papers were creating amongst the Catholics of the city. On Saturday, August 31, the new printing office turned out 5,000 copies. The boys of the Home, and Father Dunne too, were nervous, for it was the eve of the great day. Forty of the sturdiest were to go to the different churches of the city; ten others were to remain immediately inside the printing-office door, and hand out packs as the boys hurried back for more. Another ten were to move the packs near the door. All retired early. At 3:55 a. m. all arose. Early Mass, early breakfast. Then the forty boys with packs sallied forth into the starlight morning. The hours dragged away, and no news from the "front." The sentinels at the office concluded that the others had sold out and "skipped." However, humor soon vanished. All, save the editor, despaired.

Father Dunne boarded a street-car for one of the largest churches. Midst the droves of people coming out from the nine o'clock Mass, a hoarse newsboy was shouting, "Paper, Paper." Father Dunne approached the boy. "How many have you sold?" "None," the boy replied. The priest went to another church. Yes, there was the newsboy in the midst of the multitude. He waited till the crowd dwindled away and then went near the boy who shouted, "Paper, mister?" and then, laughing, dropped his pack to the sidewalk. "How many have you left?" "Have 'em all, Father, every one of 'em." Father Dunne went home. At noon the forty returned to the Home. Not one paper sold. After lunch out went the forty packs again, and in the evening there was the same story. The forty packs were minus three papers, and a certain priest had ordered one of the boys away from his church-door.

The following week business was at a standstill at the Home. No one inquired about the journal. Father Dunne devised a scheme, or thought he did, of getting rid of the 5,000 copies on hand. On the following Sunday morning the same program was arranged, the one modification being that the papers were to be given away. But from the first morning-hour, the boys again saw failure; for many business men rushing out from early Mass and fumbling for a nickel to purchase the Globe-Democrat, said impatiently to the boy with the new journal, "Come, come, kid, get out of the way." The same priest gave peremptory command that the boy with the new journal must not give papers away on the sidewalk opposite the church-front, and warned him that if he returned the following Sunday a policeman would be there to take him away. This day, not one paper changed hands.

The next day, Father Dunne took a city directory, and mailed the 4,997 copies to the people of the city. Then he waited. At the termination of the third day, the editor and the boys began to experience great consolation, for the papers did not come back. Father Dunne grew bold. He visited several priests and requested them to mention the journal from the pulpit, which request was regarded coldly, for Father Dunne, at this time, was regarded by the people at large as a kind of visionary with his "Newsboys' Home," his Newsboys' Journal and his "gutter-rats." However, a few priests did mention the journal and at the end of three months there were 100 subscribers; at the end of one year there were 1,000, and now, at the termination of the eleventh year, besides the many thousands which the boys sell each Sunday, there are more than 5,000 regular subscribers. Father Dunne, like every one who has achieved any success, has had his Marne, in which he stopped and turned back that arch-enemy, discouragement.

The Matter with France

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The discussion in recent numbers of AMERICA growing out of the query, "Is France Catholic?" is both interesting and suggestive. It will be noted, however, that the inquiry relates to the France of today and not the France of history; to the France whose accredited and responsible legislative and executive leaders for upwards of a generation have been chosen from amongst those not only conspicuously hostile to the Church, but whose publicly avowed purpose it is to "conduct God, with honor, to the frontier, thanking Him for His provisional services." If France be indeed fundamentally Catholic, how account for the paradox? Whether or not "Catholic" may be predicated of the major part of the population of France is a question of fact. The presumption will hardly be said to be in their favor. The burden, therefore, is on those who assert the affirmative. Under the conceded facts, are there parallels or historic precedents of a defensive character that may be pleaded by way of demurrer to an indictment against France on this ground?

Was not Italy Catholic when she suffered Pope Gregory VII, who loved justice and hated iniquity, to die in exile? Is not Italy fundamentally Catholic today, even though her temporal rulers have been permitted to despoil the Church of her ancient temporal possessions? Was not England fundamentally Catholic when she suffered the grand larceny of her traditional Faith in the reign of Henry VIII? Or when, in the "Church, by law established," there was first preached in Merry England "a Gospel besides that which" Paul preached? Is not Mexico fundamentally Catholic even though her priests and bishops and religious have been assassinated with impunity and her temporal possessions looted, destroyed or confiscated? If conditions such as these are not incompatible with fundamental Catholicism, and exist, or have existed, elsewhere, can the evidence against France be declared to be conclusive of the incriminating fact? Yet somehow the evidential force of the facts, as a whole, falls short of conviction. It is difficult to shake off the feeling that the eldest daughter of the Church, like Caesar's wife, should be above suspicion.

The question, however, as put, appears to be somewhat academic. The important inquiry would appear to be: What is the matter with France? A sound diagnosis might bestir a practical interest in the prognosis. Judging France by her symptoms, a diagnostician might declare that she is not functioning spiritually. As a nation France is not responsive to the impulses of her history, her traditions, her Catholic ideals and heritage. The prognosis is not unfavorable; the treatment, clearly indicated. There must be a readjustment of her spiritual frontiers after the war. Are there grounds to hope that when the din of world-conflict shall have died away, a renascent and purged France will take her stand at a spiritual Marne beyond which the forces of materialism and infidelity "shall not pass"? Will the truth have been seared into her troubled soul that eternal vigilance is the price of religion no less than of liberty?

That the tides of religion are rising in war-racked Europe, crimsoned though they be with the heart's blood of the nations, may not be doubted. Will not their ever-increasing flow gather impetus and force to sweep from the channel of France's national and political life the sand-bars of infidelity and indifferentism that have obstructed or diverted the stream of her traditional faith? Evidences multiply that France is finding herself spiritually and that she is about to receive, under God, a new birth of religion. Even though she may have stumbled at times and, like Peter, thrice before cockcrow, denied her Lord, nevertheless her soul, we like to believe, will abide with the Saints.

Molders of Public Opinion

"NEWSPAPERS are influential in three ways," wrote Lord Bryce of the American press, as he knew it thirty years ago, "as narrators, as advocates, and as weathercocks." If this be true, the New York press qualifies for influence in one department, possibly, but no more. The District Attorney has of late discovered that more than one canny newspaper reporter was registered on the payroll of a political party, rich in financial resources, and in little else. The discovery confirms a fairly wide suspicion, which grew apace during the alleged "investigation" of the private charities in 1916, that the New York press cannot be trusted to report with accuracy so common an event as the running down of a small child by an automobile. Of course the newspapers are sometimes "right," but not so often as a stopped clock, which is correct twice in every twenty-four hours. Nor as advocates do they merit a larger faith or trust. The last elections show that in this capacity, they are as likely to succeed as a salesman peddling his ineffectual electric fans at the North Pole. Their united support would be viewed by any candidate, as an unmixed calamity and sure presage of defeat. Only one department, therefore, remains unfulfilled. With a few exceptions, the New York newspapers may serve as weathercocks. That is, if they register southerly breezes, it may be that a strong wind has set in from the north.

This deplorable state of the metropolitan press has not escaped the notice of newspapers in other cities. "Why," asks the Milwaukee Free Press, > have the Post, the World, Times . . . waited until the exposure to express their indignation over the unparalleled "slush fund"? That the campaign committee was spending money like drunken sailors, became evident as early as September. By the middle of October, the fact was notorious. . . . But the press had deaf ears. . . . They tolerated a financial orgy which Tammany could not have dreamed of. Such riotous expenditure of wealth . . . laid New York open to the suspicion that it was a purchasable city. As it is, the much maligned metropolis emerges from the election with flying colors.

The New York newspapers, on the other hand, emerge with a further depreciation of their already microscopically small influence. That many of these publications have a large circulation, seems to prove that the public patronizes them either for the advertisements, the weather bulletins, or the joke columns, not the least amusing of which are their loud and virtuous protestations of "independence."

A Sale of Souls?

MORE than a year ago a correspondent in AMERICA called attention to the fact that money was being solicited for the education of the French children whose fathers had fallen in the war. The appeal had the semblance of purest charity and many of our people, Catholics as well as others, were beguiled into contributing generously. The writer in AMERICA, however, pointed out that in reality the scheme was a subtle attack on religion. The reasons he adduced to prove his contention were convincing. The personnel of the organization was distinctly Masonic, which in France is synonymous with being antagonistic to the Church; the champions of it were professed enemies of religion; the French Bishops had warned their people to have nothing to do with the fund; and it was extremely likely that any contributions made to it would be used to rob French children of the Faith. Catholics were told to put no trust in assurances that the religious belief of the beneficiaries would be respected. Exception was taken to the letter, but events have proved that the writer was correct.

The organization, having completed its collecting, is now actively at work. The money, which was contributed under the promise that the children would be brought up in the religion of the father, is being used as a bait to lure them into the école laïque, the character of which was well described in the words of the French Academician when he said that one enters the école laïque a Christian, but leaves it an atheist. Aid is offered destitute French mothers, but on the condition that they withdraw their children from the schools where they are being instructed and trained in the knowledge and practice of the Faith, and enter them in the école laïque. When the mothers protest, the sum of 120 francs a year is dangled before their eyes, and not all of them have the courage to resist. Those who wish to see how the details of the system are worked out need but consult La Croix, of Paris, for December 15.

The mask of philanthropy is odious enough when it is assumed to make personal profit out of public calamities; we are not unfamiliar with such abominations in the United States. But the abomination is the more detestable when it is made the cover for religious persecution, nor does the subtlety of the methods employed mitigate any of its hideousness. Catholics who would not be warned, must face the fact that they have contributed toward a scheme of robbing French children of their faith. It is to be hoped that they will no longer be misled by the sheep's clothing, but will recognize the French Freemason for the wolf he undoubtedly is.

Casual Fathers

"IF I catch you about that school, I'll tan you good," said the elder Finn, to his young hopeless, Huck. "First thing you know, you'll get religion too. I never see such a son." Father's place in the family has little of the glamour that has clung to "home and mother." Few poets have striven to immortalize him in dactyls and iambics; not many novelists have written his panegyric. As for the artists, who has ever lifted a brush to depict his benign features? This neglect may be the fate that oft-times attaches to virtue, as genuine as it is unobtrusive and unappreciated, and again, some other reason, far more pertinent, may be adduced. It is just possible that fathers, as a class, have been such, that a pitying silence touching their ways and needs, has been properly deemed the truest charity applicable to the case. With the advent of compulsory education laws and zealous commissioners of correction, individuals like "old man Finn," have become rare, as a species existing outside of county jails. But he still survives here and there; and in a modified type, the father who has little interest in the mental and moral progress of his children, "leaving all that to mother," he is altogether too common.

That clever lady from Montana, Miss Jeanette Rankin, who represents a district in her State in the lower House, has recently remarked that "the father is only a casual parent." Abstracting from any biological connotation which the learned may discern, the observation has a limited field of accuracy, if taken to refer to fathers "without design," fathers wholly without a fit appreciation of their place in the family, and the grave responsibilities of their office. Usually it is the slatternly mother who has been held up in our juvenile courts as the "cause" of childish delinquency, and little blame is attributed to the father who considers his duty excellently fulfilled after he has divided his wages between the tobacconist, the grog-shop, and his family. He is not a wastrel, and has never seen the inside of a jail; but "The guilty party you've got to look for in this case," observes that excellent interpreter of social data, O. Henry, "is a red-haired, unshaven, untidy man, sitting by the window reading, in his stocking feet, while his children play in the street."

Mother is almost omnipotent, but after all, there are limits to the endurance, even of a mother. Father need not be required to wash the dishes or to patch the family wardrobe, but it does not seem to be beneath the dignity of the head of the family, to take some interest in his children as social beings. A Chicago judge once remarked, that he never feared to see in his court any boy who usually went out walking with his father on Sunday afternoon. Perhaps it is time for our preachers and our moralists, not to stop talking about the duty of a mother to her children, for that is nearly the most important thing in life, but to expound the text, that few homes are worth much without a father.

Why Foment Domestic Discord?

THE paternal solicitude of the Holy Father for the welfare of the nations of the earth has apparently aroused in a section of the Protestant press an animosity that would be amusing, if its consequences were not so serious. Thus the mere newspaper rumor that "it has been suggested to the Vatican" to establish a wireless station on the dome of St. Peter's calls forth remarks like the following from the Methodist Christian Advocate:

> Italy is a democracy, but over against the palace of its citizen King is the Vatican court, the abode of the most anti-democratic power in the world, which, in the name of religion, seeks the same dominion which the German autocracy demands in the name of commerce. Self-aggrandizement is the object of both. One uses force to spread its Kultur, the other craft. Both hoped, and perhaps still hope, to be the gainers by this world-disturbance. One has no more sympathy with democracy than the other. What messages can it be that the so-called "Vicar of Christ" is sending, that cannot be trusted to any honest man to read? Would not the Christ, who is so misrepresented at Rome, be moved with indignation if He should surprise His scheming "Vicar" at his pious plots, and overturn his wireless apparatus, as He did the tables of the money-changers in another house which was dedicated to the worship of His Father, but which, in His opinion, had been degraded to base uses?

It is needless to quote further. The same objections, that have so frequently and authoritatively been answered, are again rehearsed and the same unfounded insinuations thrown out, as if Italy, France and Belgium, with their overwhelmingly Catholic populations, were less dear to the Holy Father's heart than any of the Central Powers, not to specify Protestant Prussia or Mohammedan Turkey. So, too, in defiance of all modern history, Austria is spoken of as a "vassal" of Rome. What if American Catholics were to pursue the same methods and on their part add fuel to the fires of domestic discord by throwing suspicion upon Protestant patriotism because the Reformation was "made in Germany"?

At all times, but at the present moment especially, should charity, or at least common-sense, confine religious controversy to doctrinal issues, justly stated by both parties. There are no interests at the heart of the Holy Father except the spiritual and temporal welfare of all mankind. The eagerness with which American Catholics volunteered at the first call of democracy should make it clear for all time how absurd is the imputation that in giving their spiritual allegiance to Christ's Vicar they become adherents of "the most anti-democratic power in the world."

In Praise of Cider

"AS long as there is a single apple-tree left, New England can never be made bone-dry," is the comforting assurance that Joseph Henry Curtis avers he has received from his friend "a wise old apple." To prove his thesis the author makes a historical survey of that fruit's useful career in this country, noting that

"The first planting of the apple by the colonists of Massachusetts Bay was the orchard of Governor Endicott, of Salem, in 1628," and states that "from the early days down to 1840 every farm had its cider-mill," and then deplores

> The non-use of Cider by the people of New England of the present day, and the substitution, in country districts, of secret drinking of crude hard liquors and patent medicines rich in the vilest forms of alcohol, and in the Cities the Saloons, where the wholesome malt-liquors are tangled up with cheap alcoholic poisons, mostly whisky.

Finally, to clinch his argument Mr. Curtis quotes as follows from the renowned "Treatise on Cider," written in 1691 by J. Worlidge, Gent:

> The constant use of this Liquor [cider] either simple or diluted, hath been found by long experience, to avail much to health and long life; preserving the Drinkers of it in their full strength and vigor even to very old Age; witness that Famous History in My Lord Bacon's "History of Life and Death" of eight men that a little before his time danced a Morris-dance, whose Age computed together made 800 years; they were constant Cider drinkers. Its agreeing with our nature adds much to its salubrity, because of its innocency. There is not any Drink known to us so generally palatable as Cider; for you may make it suit almost with any Drinker. . . . For its specific Virtues, there is not any drink more effectual against the Scurvy. It is also prevalent against the Stone, and by its mundifying qualities, is good against the diseases of the Spleen, and is esteemed excellent against Melancholy.

In those last few words to what a noble climax this encomiast of cider's virtues rises! "Excellent against Melancholy" in good sooth, provided the beverage taken is cider indeed. For the art of making real cider seems to have been lost, for we are told that nowadays few Americans ever taste a perfect cider. Tradesmen sell a liquid they call cider, but in many cases it has "no trace of the apple, the stuff sold being a villainous compound of vinegar, glucose, whisky and pepper."

Perhaps the spread of bone-dry legislation will hasten the restoration of unadulterated cider, "because of its innocency," to its former place of honor on the domestic board. Though "hard cider," it must be owned, does not enjoy an unblemished reputation, apple-juice that can be made to keep all the year the palatable tang it has about Thanksgiving time ought to become so wholesome and harmless a beverage that in this country cider will again become as widely used as it was in the middle of the last century.

"Every Man a King"

"THE New Thought movement" and the names of its promoters, such as Mrs. Elizabeth Towne, Mr. Ralph Waldo Trine, Mrs. Ursula Grestfeld and their associates are familiar to our readers. The object of the movement itself according to one of its exponents, Gerda Linde, is "to develop the latent possibilities in man that he may through the concentration and the Silence (sic) bring Health, Wealth and Happiness into his life. New Thought is neither a sect nor a creed, it simply stands for understanding and inclusion." The definition of the new movement is not very clear, nor are the ends it seeks to obtain of the highest. The "inclusion" which it boasts of does not seem to be so broad as it pretends to be. For though New Thought summons under its banner all classes and creeds, and professes to attack no man's religion, a large part of its literature is filled with outspoken condemnations of the beliefs and the creeds accepted for centuries by the greater part of Christendom.

In pursuance of the campaign of propaganda which they carry on so persistently in favor of their materialistic and pantheistic views of life, the promoters of the movement have issued a book entitled "Every Man a King." We thank them for that word. But if man is a king, he has not earned that noble title through the doctrines or the influence of the new philosophy. New Thought has no commission to make man a king. Man's kingship comes from another source, far nobler than any thought of in the commonplace philosophy of the new teachers. Every man is king by the seal of kingship stamped upon him by his Creator and through that sonship in virtue of which he aspires to a kingly inheritance. He is king of the wide domain of nature. He is destined to rule as a king over the still nobler empire of his own mind and heart. The poorest beggar may here exercise a royal sway worthy of the mightiest potentates. It was with the truest insight into his own nature and its dignity that the poet sang "My mind to me a kingdom is." Here the humblest toiler is master. The prisoner in his cell, the galley-slave chained to his oar or his iron ball here reigns without a rival. That territory may not be invaded by the foe, that sacred temple no hand can profane. God placed upon man's brow the diadem of thought, and bade him act like a king, in all the majesty of self-control. "Every Man a King." The title is well chosen. But no man can become a king over the empire of his own soul and mind in the true sense through the vague and elusive tenets of the new movement which in the wake of that other delusion, Christian Science, is gaining so many adherents.

The exponents of New Thought pretend to be tolerant of all creeds and religious beliefs. Yet they tell us that Christians and Catholics will soon outgrow their childish belief in the Redemption, just as the savage gradually outgrows, under the influence of advancing civilization, the worship of his fetish. It is condescending of these new teachers to assure us of this happy consummation. But when that great central mystery of the Christian Faith will no longer energize as a living influence in the world, the royal dignity of our birth will be soon forgotten. The kingly virtues that grace the heart of humanity are but the faint reflex of the glories of our nature assumed by the Son of God and by Him exalted to the highest pinnacle to which created nature can aspire. It is only when the lessons taught by our Divine Ruler reign in our hearts, that we can really call ourselves kings.

Literature

A RECENT VOLUME ON NEWMAN

"YOU have got my copy of the Oriel Statutes," wrote Newman in 1842 to J. R. Hope, "which I suppose you can't want by this time—not that I want it myself." Only a genius could thus jog the memory of a beloved friend who chanced to be a dilatory returner of borrowed goods. "There is something else I had to say, but I have forgotten it," he continues, just as you would or I; "Tell me how you are." "Copeland," he reports to Keble, "has been preaching some very fine Sermons. They want curtailing, however." It is glimpses of this kind, and little familiar touches, that make "The Correspondence of John Henry Newman with John Keble and Others: 1839-1845," recently edited at the Birmingham Oratory, and published by Longmans, a welcome book to all who have ever fallen under the spell of Newman.

The charm with which Newman invested everything that he touched, is well reflected in this handsome volume, but its value to the historian is small. It is a chronicle of minor events in his life at Oriel and Littlemore: of the workings of his mind in that heart-searching period which at the last wrung from him the cry, "I come, mighty Mother! I come, but I am far from home," it has nothing new to tell. Two letters written to Dr. Wiseman in 1841, and five or six to Archdeacon Manning in 1843, supplement the "Apologia" in witnessing to his "increasing difficulty" in supporting the Anglican claim "to be a branch of the Catholic Church," but even these relate little that is not already familiar to Newmanites. The value of this collection is found in the light which it throws, not upon the protagonist himself, or upon those most nearly connected with him, Froude, Keble, Hope, Bowden, and Pusey, but upon three powerful, yet comparatively unrecorded, influences which shaped the life of Newman.

In the background of the great canvas of the "Apologia," are three figures, Thomas Scott of Aston Sandford, "to whom (humanly speaking) I almost owe my soul," the Rev. Walter Mayers, and Dr. Russell of Maynooth. Scott, who was born in 1747 and lived until 1821, had been converted from Socinianism by Newton, the spiritual guide of the poet Cowper. He was that odd thing among Calvinists of that time, a preacher who said little of Predestination and Justification by Faith Alone, and much on the necessity of good works. Writing Keble in 1844, Newman relates how "when I was a boy of fifteen, and living a life of sin, with a very dark conscience and a very profane spirit, He mercifully touched my heart." To Scott's writings, thoroughly supernatural and intensely practical, he attributed his early turning from the world. "I deeply felt his influence," he wrote in the "Apologia," "and for years I used almost as proverbs what I considered to be the scope and issue of his doctrine, Holiness rather than peace, and Growth, the evidence of life." These two maxims, as the editors observe, may be said to sum up the religious spirit of the Oxford movement, nor was their influence weakened in his life as a Catholic.

Less militant than Scott, but more charming perhaps, to readers of the "Apologia" is "that excellent man, the Rev. Walter Mayers, of Pembroke College, Oxford, who was the human means of this beginning of divine faith in me." Filled with zeal for the salvation of souls, this truly good man, "not without scruples of conscience" was obliged by straitened circumstances "to devote a large portion of his time to teaching." He became a tutor in classics at Ealing School, where Newman was one of his pupils. Deprived of the work for his Master which he most loved, he endeavored to awaken in the hearts of his scholars, a sense of the supernatural, and a tender, personal love of Jesus Christ. Although he seems to have received no great encouragement either from the boys or from his fellow-masters, "he had, however, reason subsequently to rejoice in the fruit of his labors." Certainly, he could have been no ordinary man of whom Newman wrote: "His was a life of prayer. The works and ways of God, the mercies of Christ, the real purposes and uses of life, the unseen things of the spiritual world, were always uppermost in his mind."

More direct was an influence that came from Maynooth, and the editors have done well to include the correspondence with Dr. Russell, who "had, perhaps, more to do with my conversion than any one else." One notes, almost with amusement, Newman's smug sense, in 1841, of "England always and inevitably right on the Irish question," against which, even in the later days when he had grown to love the persecuted faithful Irish people, he had to contend, not always successfully. But the upright, truth-seeking soul of the Oriel leader could not be closed to the learning, the charity, and above all, to the sweet and disarming humility of the young Irish priest. "Nothing can be kinder or more considerate than the tone of your letter," wrote Newman, in reply to Dr. Russell's first communication, but felt himself obliged to add in closing, "and as to our own country, O that, abandoning your connection with a political party, you would as a body, 'lead quiet and peaceable lives in all godliness and honesty.'" And this to poor downtrodden Ireland, whose chief offense, after centuries under the scourge of English tyranny, was that she had kept alive in the hearts of her people, an undying devotion to the Church and to the principles of liberty!

Intimate revelations here and there of the faithful tender-hearted Keble, to whom Jesus Christ was never an abstraction but always a dearly loved and ever-present Friend, and of the sturdy Pusey, in whom Tennyson's lines, written of Ward, were so fully verified, "So loyal in the service of his Lord," indicate how the Holy Spirit, in ways unseen of human eyes, reveals Himself to hearts that truly seek Him. The bulk of the letters in this collection, however, deal with the perplexities felt by Newman's followers, during his last years in the Establishment. Some are not without a touch of unconscious humor. Faber, for instance, writes in November, 1844, to ask that the prohibition, laid upon him of not directly invoking the Saints in the Litany, be lifted. "Oret has become almost intolerable," he complains, even as he expresses his willingness to abide by Newman's decision. "Obedience will do me more good than invocation." "I can understand, certainly," replies Newman, "that Oret may be intolerably cold," and continues on the general thesis that he does not like to mix religions or systems. That means eclecticism, and is the glorification of subjectivism in religion. Observances which may be "very right in Saints, or in a Church which creates Saints," may be very dangerous "in a communion which has them not." "I do not like decanting Rome into England," he wisely remarks, "the bottles may break," a judgment which may be heartily commended to our modern Anglo-Catholics. He ends by saying that he is far too perplexed himself "to feel it pleasant to give advice at all." Three years before, he had written Dr. Wiseman, that it was best "in all charity and meekness to state our convictions, not to stifle them." That policy was swiftly bringing him to a decision which, even in the perplexities of 1844, he could regard with nothing but repugnance. Before a twelvemonth this great soul, "one whose long-continued petition had been that the Most Merciful would not despise the work of His own Hands, nor leave him to himself," had been led to the threshhold of the "Blessed Vision of Peace."

REVIEWS

The Life and Letters of Edward Everett Hale. By EDWARD E. HALE, JR. Two Volumes. With Illustrations. Boston: Little, Brown & Co. $5.00.

The men who really deserve a two-volume biography are very few and the Rev. Edward Everett Hale does not appear to be one of them. His fame rests chiefly on the fact that he was the author of "The Man Without a Country," a short story that has enjoyed a wide vogue, and on what he has done to promote among non-Catholics the "religion of service." Though the biography is of course largely a filial tribute, and with such works reviewers naturally are indulgent, still the book would have gained by being compressed into one volume. Edward Everett Hale was born April 3, 1822, and entered Harvard College at thirteen, not an unusual age in those days, for boys were not expected to have a knowledge of as many things as is required of lads going to college nowadays. It is worthy of note that young Hale decided to become a Unitarian minister because that career offered "an interesting life of literary occupation and social enjoyment." So his "vocation" does not seem to have been a highly "apostolic" one. Regarding the value of his "message" Dr. Hale solemnly asserted on one occasion that "The Unitarian Church, naturally recognizing Jesus Christ as Leader and Lord of the whole Church, makes him the most real being in history, while the church of the dark ages has succeeded in making him the most unreal." What could be done with a person who sincerely believed that? Hale's religion "dissolved Christ" indeed, and it was quite consistent for him to print in "lower case" the initial letter of the pronoun in the foregoing quotation. Being the son of the Boston Daily Advertiser's editor and owner, Dr. Hale grew up in an atmosphere of proofs and copy and always wrote easily and abundantly; too much so, indeed, to win a great name as a literary man. He died full of days in 1909.

The Evolution of the Hebrew People and Their Influence on Civilization. By LAURA H. WILD. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.50.

Professor Wild, of Mount Holyoke College, finds that girls go to college "with no adequate conception of what the Bible stands for." She proceeds to tell them that it stands for nothing supernatural. Her book is "designed for beginners, to help them get their bearings." If any Catholic girls at Mount Holyoke College follow the bearings of Miss Wild, they are making abeam for the Scylla of infidelity, and only the strongest of outside Catholic influences will prevent their faith from foundering by shipwreck. We summarize a few of the absurdities that Miss Wild gravely puts down as facts: The Bible stands for nothing as a history of the human race and of the revelations of God to that race. Man was in an half-animal state more than 100,000 years ago. Somehow or other, we cannot just tell how, the cave-man, during the days of his neolithic snarls was attracted by life, assumed life even in inanimate things, and a "something" behind all this life. Thus his religious belief began. He was astonished by his shadow. It followed him everywhere! And so he came to believe in the immortality of his shade! He advanced to the worship of fetiches, of ancestors, of gods. Even Abraham was polytheistic; and it is not clear, "just how soon he or his descendants completely broke loose from such a philosophy (sic)." The triumph of Christianity was not that of a dynamic divinely established by Christ. No; it was, in the end, the spread of the ethical truths "that were being evolved during two thousand years of racial history." And that is the poison which Catholic parents at times oblige their children to drink in by education at such a school as Mount Holyoke College!

Portraits and Backgrounds. By EVANGELINE WILBOUR BLASHFIELD. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50.

The Little Grandmother of the Russian Revolution. Reminiscences and Letters of CATHARINE BRESHKOVSKY. Edited by ALICE STONE BLACKWELL. Boston: Little Brown & Co. $2.00.

Here are two interesting biographical works about women by women authors. Hrotsvitha, the gifted abbess of Gandersheim, Aphra Behn, the seventeenth-century woman of letters, Charlotte Aïssé, the Turkish maiden who was transplanted to eighteenth-century Paris, and Rosalba Carriera, the renowned Venetian miniature-painter, are the subjects of Mrs. Blashfield's four historical essays. The author's wide reading and attractive style enable her to give a vivid picture of the life and times of the four remarkable women she writes about. There are good critical pages, with abundant quotations, on the Latin plays which the German Benedictine nun of the tenth century wrote, and the description of the England of the Restoration period is particularly colorful. But the author seems to feel a mild regret that Aïssé had the grace of a death-bed repentance, and Mrs. Blashfield's opinion that Christianity "crippled woman socially by its ascetic depreciation of marriage," and that the Jesuits' teaching "emasculated the moral vigor and enfeebled the will," shows that she is quite ready to pass along historical misstatements that have been refuted a thousand times. The author has filled her pages with so many striking figures from the historical pageantry of France and Italy in the eighteenth century and tells so many anecdotes and incidents to illustrate the manners and morals of those days, that cautious readers will wonder if some of the author's assertions are not as inaccurate as the foregoing statements about the Church and the Society. Owing to its subject-matter and its graces of style, "Portraits and Backgrounds" is a good book to give those who are trying to break themselves of the "best-seller" habit.

"We may die in exile, and our children may die in exile, and our children's children may die in exile, but something will come of it at last," was the hope that gave "The Little Grandmother of the Russian Revolution" the courage to endure years and years of exile in Siberia or of detention in Petrograd prisons. Though belonging to the nobility, she is a radical Socialist who has devoted her life to fomenting revolutions and in trying to improve the condition of the Russian peasantry. When Kerensky's Government was in the ascendency last fall Madame Breshkovsky returned from Siberia and was received in the capital with wild enthusiasm, being made temporary chairman of the Preliminary Parliament. The account she gives of the hardships and sufferings she has borne during her seventy-three years of life is distressing reading, but "Baboushka" does not appear to be at all broken-spirited or embittered by what she went through. In 1904 Madame Breshkovsky visited this country and was made much of by "uplifters" who mention even Emma Goldman with respect. The material in the book is carelessly put together.

Anthology of Magazine Verse for 1917 and Yearbook of American Poetry. Edited by WILLIAM STANLEY BRAITHWAITE. Boston: Small, Maynard & Co. $2.00

The Book of New York Verse. Edited by HAMILTON FISH ARMSTRONG. Illustrated. New York: E. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.50.

No one can justly complain that the year 1917 has suffered from a dearth of anthologies. Besides the varied and numerous collections of verse reviewed during the past twelve months, in these columns, Mr. Braithwaite is now promptly on hand with his "flowers" from the year's magazines, and Mr. Armstrong has selected the best of what poets and versifiers have written in praise of New York. But Mr. Braithwaite's anthology does not seem to contain as much poetry as did his 1916 volume. Is it because the quality of the output is not so high as last year's, or has the editor permitted too much thinly disguised prose to get into his collection? He generously gives twenty-five pages, for example, to a single "poem" by Amy Lowell. James Oppenheim also secures much more space than he deserves. Carl Sandburg contrives to get in three highly unpoetical selections and Wallace Gould in a long passage from "Children of the Son," is permitted to tell the reader how an old woman gently requested the poet to "Blow your cussed old smoke this way. . . . You know very well how I like it." Edgar Lee Masters, as is shown by "Tomorrow is My Birthday," which gives Shakespeare's supposed reflections on that anniversary, seems to be the most highly gifted of this new school of American poets. From George Edward Woodberry's "Immortal Love" is quoted the first of the following sonnets, and the second is Scudder Middleton's "The Poets." They are among the best selections in the anthology:

Immortal love, too high for my possessing,
Yet lower than thee, where shall I find repose?
Long in my youth I sang the morning rose,
By earthly things the heavenly pattern guessing!
Long fared I on, beauty and love caressing,
And finding in my heart a place for those Eternal fugitives; the golden close
Of evening folds me, still their sweetness blessing.
O happy we, the first-born heirs of nature,
For whom the Heavenly Sun delays his light!
He by the sweets of every mortal creature
Tempers eternal beauty to our sight;
And by the glow upon love's earthly feature
Maketh the path of our departure bright.

We need you now, strong guardians of our hearts,
Now when a darkness lies on sea and land,
When we of weakening faith forget our parts
And bow before the falling of the sand.
Be with us now or we betray our trust
And say, "There is no wisdom but in death"—
Remembering lovely eyes now closed with dust—
"For there is no beauty that outlasts the breath."
For we are growing blind and cannot see
Beyond the clouds that stand like prison bars
The changeless regions of our empery
Where once we moved in friendship with the stars.
O children of the light, now in our grief
Give us again the solace of belief.

In the useful "Yearbook of American Poetry," that makes up the latter part of the volume, a number of literary articles that appeared in AMERICA are mentioned.

The 225 or more metrical or poetical tributes to the charms of Manhattan which Mr. Armstrong has brought together in his volume are from the pens of such authors as Béranger, Bryant, Bridges, Carman, Drake, Gilder, Le Gallienne, Lindsay, Mackaye, Miller, Pound, Stedman, Van Dyke, Whitman, Whittier, Willis, Thomas Walsh, and many others, and cover a wide range of subjects, for there are verses on the subway, the Woolworth tower, Tammany Hall, Maiden Lane, Harlem, the Tweed ring, Wall Street, etc. Drake's stanzas on the "Bronx, 1818," Bryant's "Hymn of the City" and Florence Earle Coates' "New York" will be found in the anthology, and McCready Sykes' clever parody about the Evening Post, which begins:

"Godkin the Righteous, known of old Priest of the nation's moral health" will be enjoyed, and perhaps there is nothing in the volume better than Lloyd Mifflin's "The Shadowy City Looms," with stanzas in it like these:

Huge peopled monoliths that touch the skies,
Whose indeterminate bases baffle sight.
Each with its Argus, incandescent eyes
Pierces the night;
Undreamt of heights of glimmering marble loom
Like some enchanted fabric wrought of air;
Gigantic shafts of insubstantial gloom
Lift, shadowy, there.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

In the January Catholic World Miss Katherine Brégy begins a series of papers on "Aspects of Recent Drama in English," the plays of Mr. Henry A. Jones and Sir Arthur W. Pinero being examined in the first article. Other papers in the number are Dr. Kerby's "Re-education by War," Dr. Kitchin's "French Priests in Literature," Mr. P. J. Lennox's "Canon Sheehan and Public Events," Father Earls's "A Yankee Hagiographer: Aguecheek" and Mr. Charles Phillips' "A Saint for Soldiers," "Madame Sainte Katherine," whose shrine at Fierbois, France, was much frequented by war-worn pilgrims 500 years ago, for through her intercession wonderful cures were effected.

It is clear that Dr. John Davidson, the author of "Means and Methods in the Religious Education of the Young" (Longman, $1.00), has had long experience in teaching religion, has given the matter careful thought, and holds it in high esteem. "The religious education of a child," he writes, "cannot be separated from his education as a whole." But it is too bad he drops so many flies in the ointment. He requires "That the religious teacher today must base his teaching on a conception of religion at once broader and deeper—and, it might be added, more educatively interesting—than any conception definable in the set terms of a church creed." Hardly less determinate is the author's exposition of faith and miracles. The old story is repeated: non-Catholics seem unable to understand that God is God—eternal, unchangeable, and that there is no room for our personal opinion as to what He is or is not. The author knows how to make a Bible story real and attractive. His version of "The Good Samaritan," is well worth reading.

The sixteenth volume of the Catholic Mind begins with an informing paper on "The Two Swords," by G. T. Eberle, S.J., in which he explains the theory and the practice of the harmonious relations of Church and State that obtained in the Middle Ages. In the words of Cardinal Hergenroether, the author concludes that:

> The organization of mankind will never be complete without an international tribunal provided with powers of coercion. Truly an age which is content with an artificial balance of power in politics while the most solemn treaties are despised and violated, which is forced to endure a state of war or a state of armed peace, consuming the very marrow of the nations, which even amid the mightiest social tempests, persists in holding politics aloof from religion and morality, and is ever hastening on towards terrible catastrophes, such an age has, indeed, no right to look down with insolence upon the principles and the practices of the Middle Ages.

The other article in the number is the first instalment of Father Reville's list of books for Catholic readers. He names and comments upon some of the novels Catholics of education should be familiar with, and each month during the coming year there will be published in the Catholic Mind other lists of books covering the field of history, biography, philosophy, literature, apologetics, etc. Students, teachers and educators will doubtless find the series of great assistance in their work.

"The Sands of Fate" (Houghton Mifflin, $1.50), by Sir Thomas Barclay, is an interesting phantasy in dramatic form of the personal causes and the final results of the present war. The Kaiser, the Crown Prince, and the leading men of the German nation discuss the tragedy from its very inception, and if the sentiments were true much at present hidden would be brought to light. We can hardly credit the Crown Prince with the wonderful sense given him by the author and at the same time must refuse to grant that England is the most wonderful most generous and loving nation on the face of the earth.——Patriotism has inspired Eva March Tappan to write "The Little Book of the Flag" (Houghton Mifflin, $1.00). Our banner's history is told interestingly, and a number of patriotic selections on the subject of the flag increases the book's usefulness.——"Sam Houston" (Macmillan, $0.50), by George S. Bryan, is a short and interesting account of the stirring time and vigorous life of this picturesque figure of American frontier civilization, written for boys and girls, and one of a series of true stories of great Americans. Houston's adventurous career and many heroic qualities of character are best summed up by a quotation at the close of the book: "So we leave the backwoods boy who became statesman, soldier, orator, liberator of Texas, than whom good Sir Walter himself never drew a more fascinating, a more romantic, or a braver figure."

"The Wanderers" (Houghton, Mifflin, $1.75) of Miss Mary Johnson travel a long way from the forest and the cave of early man through eastern lands, the cities of Greece and Rome, the desert with its solitaries, medieval Europe and Lutheran Germany down to the blood-stained days of the French Revolution. The various sketches of which the book is composed purport to be the story of the evolution of the love between man and woman from the dawn of history and even before, down to our present age. There is some picturesque and spirited writing here and there. But we miss the note of true romance sounded by the author in "To Have and to Hold" and the deeper interest perhaps of "The Long Roll" and "Cease Firing." The spiritual note is lacking and the writer's ideas of God and religion are just as primitive as some of the strange beings of the early chapters of the book. The evolutionary thesis which the author is trying to drive home overlaps the interest of the sketches and mars the book——November's "best-sellers" were "The Dwelling Place of Light," "Christine," "Extricating Obadiah," "Missing," "The Major" and "The Salt of the Earth." All have been noticed in these columns.

In "Louvain, a Tragedy" (Torch Press, Cedar Rapids, Iowa, $1.25), Charles V. Roberts takes an incident such as might make an item in a catalogue of German atrocities in Belgium in the dark days of 1914, and dramatizes it. The piece is hardly conceived forcibly enough to carry the external technicalities of a dramatic form. Too much space is given to epic pageant scenes, quite good in themselves but which have no immediate connection with the main story. Moreover, the dialogue often becomes declamatory, as for instance in the first act in the lines of the hero and heroine, and of the German villain, Oberhaus. Cardinal Mercier figures in the last scene as a kind of deus ex machina.

In the current American Catholic Quarterly Review there is an excellent paper by Mr. Hugh Anthony Allen entitled "What About Bazin?" He well observes:

If in the past fifteen or twenty years there has been a beneficent revival of spirituality in France, it is because the Catholic mind has begun to dominate the field of fiction in French scenes. Brunetière, Bourget, Bordeaux, Barrès, Boilesléve, Bazin, and to descend a few thousand feet, such writers as Coppée, Pravieux, Dombre, Mathilde, Alanic, Jean de la Brète, Mme. J. Reynes-Monlaur—these are the real stars in the literary firmament of the new France. I am not here concerned with the yeoman service of her fine group of Catholic poets whose leader is Paul Claudel. Of the busy B's of France, Bazin stands out as the foremost writer of today. Bazin is a true secretary of French society, and his books are but an inventory of its forces—forces he has incarnated and called human beings.

Other good articles in this number of the Catholic Quarterly are Barbara de Courson's "The French Clergy and the War"; "The Problem of the Usefulness of Christian Dogma," by F. A. Palmieri, O. S. A.; "The Works of Francis Marion Crawford," by Elbridge Colby; "A Missioner Bishop," by R. F. O'Connor, and "An Unwritten Page in the History of Education," by Marc F. Vallette.

"Tomorrow and Other Poems" (Longmans, $1.00), a slender little book in which the spiritual note is melodiously sounded by two young British soldiers named Innes Stitt and Leo Ward, contains the laiter's prayer "To the Angels of Battle," and "The Last Communion," which was written in memory of his father, Wilfrid Ward. They run as follows:

Spirits that stand among the shades of death,
Immutable, amid a world of Change,
Ye heralds of a music from the deep—
From choirs of Life beyond our mortal range—
Ye that have filled the souls of them that die
With Music, that hath broken through the spheres
And borne their spirits to Eternity,
Beyond the troubled rolling of our years:
Look down upon the prison of our tears,
And guide the souls on earth that honor them;
Lest these forget the hallowed paths they trod,
And break the choral harmonies of God.

There is a time wherein eternity
Takes rest upon the world: King Charity
Bowed to our fallen state, the God of Grace
Made visible upon a human face—
When the deep Harmony, the eternal Word,
The unfallen Wisdom, only love has heard,
Touches the troubled body, bruised and hard
With the long fight, yet now set heavenward—
When the deep argument of souls must cease,
Dying to meet the victory of peace!

The Literary Essay

THE word "essay" implies an endeavor to attain the truth, and was first used in connection with the construction and repair of [illegible] of Montaigne. In the "Epistle to Prince Henry" Bacon said. "To write just treatises requireth leisure in the writer and leisure in the reader . . . . which is the cause that hath made me choose to write certain brief notes, set down rather significantly than curiously, which I have called Essays. The word is late, but the thing is antient."

The essay is commonly shorter, less thorough and formal than a treatise. A treatise is more systematic and methodical than an essay; it is exact, professedly instructive, but not so comprehensive as an exposition. The dissertation, too, and the tractate, or tract, are sometimes confused with the essay, but a dissertation is properly an argumentative presentation of a subject; a tractate is a brief treatise, written for a particular occasion, and published separately. An essay is a cluster of thoughts lighting up certain facets of a subject, rather than a complete illumination of it; it is a series of attempts, "essays," at illumination. The essay differs from the treatise or tractate furthermore by the necessary quality of literary style, which these may lack. The treatise and exposition are serious, utilitarian efforts to get at the truth in a grave question; the essay is more an attempt to talk brilliantly and concretely on any subject than a search for truth; it will sacrifice truth to brilliancy any time. It strives to set forth profound truth, for the sake of the pleasure and glory there is in such mental energy, rather than for the love of the truth itself. The essay is as fond of pathos, quaintness, delicacy, wit, humor, comedy, as of formal truth.

An Old Form

AS Bacon said, the essay is an old literary form. We have the series of essays written by Aulus Gellius in the time of Trajan, called "Noctes Atticae," wherein he enumerates many Greek and Latin titles of essays now lost; and there are left to us the special articles in the essay mood by Xenophon, Cicero, Marcus Aurelius, Seneca, Epictetus, and Pliny the Younger.

In the Middle Ages scholasticism led men into methods of exactness, of instrumental precision in expression, which was opposed to the methods of the essay. It was an age of qualification, of perpetual explanation into extremes. The medieval writers spoke of truth as seen through a perfectly cut lens. The modern essayist sees it clearly in the main, but the edges are hazy with the prismatic aureole of spherical aberration, and he does not regret that fault. Indeed, chromatism of field, which is due to an imperfection in an object glass, is by no means ugly in itself.

The medieval scholar sought totality. He wrote his "Summa Theologica," or his "Summa Philosophica"; theology was one tangible whole, so were philosophy and religion. Modern thought, on the contrary tends toward specialism; it is losing the power of generalization. The modern mind has been busy in pulling things apart so long, that it now is overwhelmed with the chaotic debris of truth, and it sees nothing completely. But whatever the damage that method of mental work has wrought, it has made the essay possible. Once the scholar was an archangel reviewing the passing march of the worlds; now he is a coral actinozöon, spending his life in the dark to add a fragment of an inch to a barren dangerous reef; but we have the essay.

Erasmus and Montaigne

"THE Familiar Colloquies" of Desiderius Erasmus of Rotterdam, published in 1518, were perhaps the revival of the essay, but the established beginning was the publication of Montaigne's "Essays" in 1580. He died in 1592, and Bacon's "Essays" appeared five years after that date. John Florio's translation of Montaigne came out in 1603. It is interesting to note that on the fly leaf of a copy of Florio's translation of Montaigne in the British Museum, is written the name "W Shakspere"; one of the genuine autographs.

Montaigne is the first among the modern writers that had the originality to set down in a book, what he felt as a man. "Every one," he said, "looks beyond himself, I look within myself, I examine myself, I take pleasure in myself." This is in no slight part the essayist's spirit. He does not, however, make full confession; he is always hiding behind a mask of affected frankness. Rousseau said of him:

> I put Montaigne at the head of those falsely sincere persons who wish to deceive us in telling the truth. He shows himself with his faults, but he gives himself none but amiable ones: there is no one that has not odious ones. Montaigne paints his own likeness, but it is a profile. Who knows whether some scar on the cheek, or an eye put out, on the side he conceals from us, would not have changed his physiognomy?

Notwithstanding this pardonable reticence, he not only shows us himself, but he makes us understand ourselves better through him; he discloses our nature and the history of humanity. He turned literature by this process from an imitation of the ancients into a vital study of man.

Suggestion and Order

AN almost invariable charactertistic of the literary essay is a habit of brooding over common things until fancy suggests grave thought by association of ideas; and this association is so concealed from us that when it has been expressed, it moves us by a kind of startling wit, a charming juxtaposition of the incongruous. To the true essayist

> "The meanest flower that blows can give > Thoughts that do often lie too deep for tears."

Montaigne had this habit; he holds to the key, but roams at will. A phrase from Cicero reminds him of a similar thought in Seneca, and both are compared, with an experience of his own in corroboration or dissent; and thereafter he follows out the association by chiming echoes unto satisfying silence.

There is a tendency to think that an essay may be a mere rambling aimless chat provided it glitters, but a rational massing of facts is as necessary in this species of composition as in any other. Many of the best modern essays were set down with the sole purpose of giving pleasure; but to give pleasure is an end, and an ordered line of attack is more powerful for pleasure than the tumbling advance of a mob. Order is a help toward clearness and depth of impression; there is obscurity in confusion. Vitality of movement in the thought, or, what is practically the same thing, uninterrupted maintaining of interest, is possible only where there is order. If the essay is to be received as a work of art it must have form, and the chief defect in weak essays is lack of form; gems set at haphazard over a misshapen vase will never win a place on the altar.

There should be unity; the essay is to grow from one seed into a perfect plant; not homely vetch, but fruitful rice, shooting a green feather gemmed with fifty pearls. The unity of the essay does not prevent its writer from starting at any thought and wandering thence, apparently as aimlessly as a child following buttercups in a meadow. But the tone of the composition must be kept in one key to insure literary form.

Better a mood than a fact for the single source of the essay, that all may breathe with emotional concrete life; but a gentle mood, not a rough. The essayist perhaps should be sympathetic, humorous, or at the most comedic; nevertheless there are those that delight in a biting wit, or in the sneer of satire, and we are to let them have their choice.

The Revealer of Temperament

THE essayist is a good talker who roams from subject to subject, led by chance association, and if he is contemptuous, we may admire his keen mind, but we can never love him. There is no literary form in which a writer can show his own character, temperament, and style more frankly than in the essay, and if he proves himself to be a kindly gentleman so much the better for his fame. A gentleman seldom meets rude persons, and what need has anyone for contempt? I should read an essay written by St. Francis of Assisi in preference to one written by Talleyrand.

Impressionism is an ideal method for the essayist, however erroneous it is for the critic. A criticism must be objective and comparative to be of value; an essay is better, all else equal, for subjectivity, the lyric spirit. The typical essayist, then, is an impressionist, who sets any title at the head of his page, and thereafter talks of himself indirectly, as men exchange confidences, in the third person. He may be as learned as an encyclopedia, provided he carries his knowledge with charm, but a few arid paragraphs damage the bloom on his reputation. We expect sudden flashes of mental and imaginative insight from the essayist, but not much abstract speculation. His business is to give pleasure; he may interpolate wisdom if he likes, but at his peril, unless he sweetens it with wit, humor, or pathos. Macaulay is too heavy, too learned, at times; Thackeray does not give enough of himself; Leigh Hunt gives too much; Lamb is nearer the standard. The quantity of egoism tolerable in an essay is proportionate to the worth and amiability of the writer himself; or he may atone for his conceit by the beauty of his style, as Montaigne does.

The short study, which is formal criticism, is often confused with the essay. There is no reason why an essay might not be an impressionistic review of a literary work; yet it must guide itself carefully—not away from judgment, but so that it will make the field interesting for its flowers rather than its grain. In the short study, the criticism precedes the style, but there must be style to save the work from becoming a mere scientific tract. In the essay, even when it is critical, the style precedes all else.

SOCIOLOGY

The Promise of Socialism

IT may not be entirely fair to judge Socialism by the various attempts made in the past to reduce it to practice. Socialist utopias are a roseate dream in theory, but in practice have always ended in dismal failure. One of the most consistent efforts at the introduction of real Socialism is now being made by the Russian revolutionists. The scenes of carnage which are there remorselessly enacted will inevitably accompany every effort to establish the reign of Socialism. This fact leading Socialist authorities have been ready to admit and have clearly predicted. The expropriation, under one form or another, which Socialism of necessity contemplates, can never be effected except at the point of the bayonet and the mouth of the cannon. The mere fact that a victorious political majority endeavors to legalize injustice will not give stability to such a false form of government. It can be established in violence only and will end in blood.

That real Socialism can ever be successfully introduced is out of all question. Not the remotest relation exists between a reasonable government control and genuine Socialism. The former is based upon the continuance of a system of wages and private capital, with the ideal of removing its abuses and supplementing its shortcomings. The latter is a complete negation of such a system. Kept within proper limits, as circumstances prescribe, government control may be desirable. Socialism will always remain impracticable.

Socialism Triumphant

GRANTED, however, that a new French Revolution, a Bolshevist [illegible] a Mexican cataclysm of sack and rape [illegible] Historic expressions of Socialism in its first stages of triumphant power—has passed successfully and America, the land of vast opportunities, has been converted into a series of Socialist communes or industries. The firing squad has given short shrift to those who dared offer opposition; the free press that was still bold enough to speak in the name of liberty has been suppressed and destroyed for treason and sedition; the Catholic school no longer exists, for there must be Socialist schools only for all the children; owners of capital have been duly expropriated or taxed out of existence; the Stars and Stripes are lowered and the red flag of the social revolution alone waves over what had once been the capital of the country. The great Socialist dream has thus come true. There is henceforth one owner only from whom all must receive their labor and who alone can determine and distribute its produce. All able-bodied adults, men and women alike, are his employees, who toil as long as he bids them, at the work he assigns to them, and for the remuneration he decrees to give them. That sole owner, employer, distributor is the Socialist commonwealth, or whatever men may wish to call it. In practice it is the body of politicians who have succeeded in obtaining temporary power.

The Disillusionment

THE laborer, long deluded by the promise that under Socialism he would receive as wages the full value of all that he produces, will now suddenly realize that this assertion calls for many glosses. He will find that in practice he actually receives far less than he had been able to earn under previous conditions, while he must work for longer hours. The fact that we ourselves are little satisfied with many of the existing conditions and maintain the need of true Christian reform, merely lends added significance to this statement. Present evils, moreover, can readily be remedied, provided only that we apply ourselves religiously to the task; but the faults of Socialism are inherent in its very nature.

The laborer is promised that he will receive the full worth of all that he produces. If under the existing system the value of a shoe is five dollars and the laborer receives but three for his wages, he is told that the remaining two dollars represent the amount of which the employer has robbed him. Not merely is he assured that under Socialism he will practically receive the full five dollars as the reward of his toil, but that this labor itself will be restricted to four, and according to another count, to two hours only a day. A sad disillusionment would therefore await him, nor could he improve the situation by striking, since strikes would not be allowed him.

Why the Promise is False

IT is commonly stated that the price of an article, under Socialism, will be determined by the average labor-time required for its production. However this may be, we shall assume that five dollars, if such currency still existed, would be the sum payable to the Socialist common owner for the shoe Socialistically produced. How much of that actual price would the men receive who had made the shoe? Practically the entire amount, the deluded laborer is told. Let us see.

Out of this sum, in the first place, must be taken a proportionate share of the enormous outlay that will be required for the elaborate system of schools outlined by all Socialist writers. There are to be public nurseries, kindergartens, high schools, academies, colleges and universities over the entire land. Only a few children are to be committed to each teacher and every child is to have at least all the education of which it is capable. The amount for all this must clearly be deducted from the laborer's wages.

The support, moreover, of all these children, who will not begin work at an early age, must be provided for. There are to be pensions for the aged, the crippled and infirm, and vast expenses will be required for the construction and repair of the parks and public amusements lavishly promised to the people. All this will cause a further and considerable melting away of that little sum.

Further Wage Deductions

WHILE a certain amount of money is now spent for the luxuries of the rich, which we are told will then be common to all, the great bulk of the capital owned by men of wealth is at present immediately invested in productive enterprises. The same amount of capital, and even more as we shall show, will be required under Socialism, and must then as now be deducted from the wages of the laborer that the industry can continue efficiently.

There will then, as now, be catastrophies and failures. The frost will ruin the crops, and storm, fire or human carelessness will work their havoc and call for new investment. All this loss and reconstruction will draw upon the same rapidly diminishing sum of the daily wage. The wages of wasted labor must be taken out of the wages of successful labor, unless the former be permitted to starve, since under real Socialism the laborer can have no money invested that will bring him returns in profit, rent or interest when other resources fail.

There will, moreover, be a vast political army of office-holders, census-takers, statisticians who will overrun the country, administrators, clerks, caterers and all the rest whose salaries will eat still further into those illusive five dollars, that had been promised to the laborer whole and entire and of which perhaps the ghost only will finally remain.

It must furthermore be understood that the really idle rich form but an exceedingly small percentage of the population. Many wealthy owners labor harder and longer at their private business than they would do if engaged as mere employees in public works. Here then we come upon another consideration which will make evident a still further and most grievous evanescence of the value "of all that the laborer produces," which is now so generously promised him by the Socialist politician. It suggests the final condemnation of Socialism on its economic side.

The Final Reason for Failure

IN depriving men of productive property and the hope of ever acquiring capital, in making them mere cogs in a vast political machine, Socialists would of necessity deprive the ablest among them of initiative and energy. The tendency of Socialism must constantly be to the utmost equalization of all mankind, and thus to a constant state of violence against nature, if the Socialist commonwealth is not at once to end in new revolutions. Hence exceptional wages could not be given to stimulate the most active and intelligent without creating new jealousies and class divisions. The watchful care of the private owner, which furthermore provides for the largest production on the part of all in his employ would be removed. Listlessness in work on the part of some would drag others down to their level. For why should they toil harder for the same rewards? Thus there would be a general decline in production necessitating longer hours and bringing far smaller rewards than at present.

We are familiar with the Socialist answer. There is doubtless much waste under the existing system, but it can never equal the total retardation of production that would take place under Socialism. It is precisely the purpose of social reform to remove the causes of economic wastage to the utmost, and thus to bring about the only feasible improvement. Perfection can never be obtained here upon earth. It is absurd to speak of a change of human nature under Socialism. Experience has shown that if there were to be such a change under Socialism it would be decidedly for the worse. To claim that a social consciousness, aside from all religious principles, would urge every man to perform his duty is equally childish. The fact of original sin cannot be so easily ignored. Yet these are the only justifications Socialism can offer for its widely exaggerated promises.

There would finally be the appointment of citizens by the politicians in power to the various fields of agriculture and industry. Whether men would be forced to take up the different occupations by rotation, as Bebel taught, or whether the baser occupations would receive the greater remunerations, or whether wages would be paid according to the need of each one and not according to his labor, or whichever of the many plans suggested would actually be followed, the main reason for private initiative would be removed, and production would lag. Hence still longer hours and still smaller wages. What then would become of the Socialist promise? There is nothing, in fine, more impracticable than Socialism would be, nor can anything that has taken place during the present war change in the slightest degree this conclusion.

NOTE AND COMMENT

Church Unity Octave

THE editor of the Lamp again makes his earnest appeal for the observance of the Church Unity Octave to bring about that union of all men in one Fold for which the Heart of Christ so earnestly longed and prayed. An additional motive, which should lend new ardor to our prayer at the present time, is the earnest desire of all the nations of the earth for that peace which Christ alone can give to the world.

> Convinced as we are, that God will not suffer peace to be permanently established on the earth until the great world powers recognize in the Vicar of Christ God's Prime Minister and Special Arbiter of Peace, we ask all who shall read these lines to make the Church Unity Octave a special occasion of united and fervent prayer for that peace and unity, both civil and religious, which are agreeable to the Divine will, recognizing, as every Catholic must recognize, that any other kind of peace or unity must prove false and unsubstantial.

Here then is a tenfold reason for praying with increased fervor that prayer of Our Divine Lord, that they may all be one: Ut omnes unum sint. The Holy Father has given his heartiest approval to the Church Unity Octave, and by a Papal Brief extended it to the whole Church. Its observance takes place every year from the Feast of St. Peter's Chair, January 18, to that of the Conversion of St. Paul, January 25. It may be noted that the Anglican Commission for a World's Conference on Faith and Order has likewise recommended that all denominations make of this time a week of prayer for the reunion of Christendom. What more glorious object then of our Catholic prayer than that all mankind should unite in the one and only Fold of Christ.

Plagiarism Charged to Billy Sunday

ACCORDING to the Atlanta Georgian a suit for $100,000 damages was to be filed against Billy Sunday by Sidney C. Tapp, charging him with plagiarism. The specific accusation made by Mr. Tapp is that whole sentences and paragraphs from his book, "The Truth About the Bible," were inserted by the Evangelist into his printed sermons without giving any credit to the author. "I am suing him for $100,000," said Mr. Tapp, "but I am instructing my attorneys, in the event I get a judgment, to turn the money over to the orphans' home in Atlanta. It is not a question of money with me. It is a question of mental integrity." Mr. Sunday explains that he has no recollection of ever having read Mr. Tapp's book, but that material is constantly sent him which he "incorporates" into his sermons. "Much of the time I never know the authorship. Whenever I do I always gladly give credit." He adds that he never felt barred from using a good thing simply because he did not know its source. The fact, however, that the authorship of such extracts is unknown will not justify their insertion into a printed sermon without due quotation marks.

Perils of the Future

A FEARLESS editorial-writer in the December Irish Rosary, after remarking that "Politics appears to be one of the best-paying industries in Great Britain," and giving as instances the Attorney General's annual salary of £30,000, and the Lord Lieutenant's of Ireland, £20,000, writes:

It is many long years now since the philosopher of the British wealthy class propounded the doctrine that the poor were economically valueless and had no natural right to live. The war has brought it home to the dullest plutocrat that the poor have an incalculable worth at a supreme moment. The greatest proportion of the fighting and dying has been done by them. They had not the influence to obtain commissions, with safe staff-rank. They lacked the subtle ingenuity to worm themselves into non-combatant units. They were in the trenches and in the charges. Without them all was lost. . . .

But the menace of war is not going to cease with the peace-trumpet. The poor, who have so far saved wealthy Britain, will require to be propitiated. The workman, whether skilled or unskilled, will have a fit opportunity of insisting on a wage that will enable him to keep his family in comfort. May the New Year befriend him!

A note of uneasiness is already being sounded by many who think that private and public rectitude will show a frightful decline when the world has time to survey itself after the war. We are to have, it seems, the unscrupulous rich and the unrestrainable poor. Army service will have brutalized the latter. Profit-hunting will have de-humanized the others.

There is no blinking facts. It is true that already the money-making mania of the last three years has developed an upper criminal class. Plunder is to be feared from them as much in peace as during war. Violence is to be dreaded from the lower extreme, the great legion of lack-alls who will return to a civil life of hardship and misery after the rigors of the military camp.

No doubt the same social and economic problems that Great Britain must face and settle after the war will have to be met and solved in this country also. For our entrance into the world-struggle seems to be producing conditions here which are similar to those prevailing in England and Ireland, and it is none too soon for the wisest heads in the land to begin considering how these evils can be remedied.

Golden Rules for Public Servants

SIMPLICITY, democracy and honest service were the principles laid down for city employees by Mayor Hylan of New York in assuming the duties of his important office. There was no mincing of words in his outspoken criticism. Enjoining upon all simplicity in accommodation and furniture, he added: "At present many commissioners have spacious offices, altogether too large for service and manifestly occupied for display only, while the taxpayers are paying rentals to private interests for housing other departments. This must be discontinued." City automobiles, he insisted, may be used for city business only, and the full hours of service must be faithfully rendered.

There is another form luxury takes, in satisfying the vanity of public employees, and it is one we shall abolish by example and by stern repression. It is a vice of commissioners, and self-exploiting subordinates. It results in the multiplication of unnecessary blanks, and foolish and, in many instances, mischievous, because false, reports. I am convinced that a great part of the typewriting and printed form work of the city serves no useful purpose at all. We shall eliminate this. Commissioners will themselves refrain from catering to any newspaper or making alliances with any, and will prevent all subordinates from advertising themselves in this way. Just criticism will help us, false criticism will not greatly injure us, and the penetration of the people has nullified the value of puffing and systematic laudation, even to those who have a craving for it. We shall not need that kind of support if we deserve it, and if any of us fails to deserve it, he shouldn't get it.

Finally, he would have all city employees understand that they are paid by the people and that their highest self-respect must spring from the consciousness of service honestly performed.

There must be no discourtesy and no arrogance of bearing toward those who come to public offices. Nor must there be distinctions made. The touchstone of democracy is political equality, and before the servant of the people no distinctions of a social or economic nature are allowable.

These are noble words, Christian and democratic, and all public servants should be guided by them. They give fair promise for the future. May they secure for the city of New York a larger measure of social righteousness and Christian charity than has graced some other administrations.

A Great Woman Organizer

ON December 22 Mother Cabrini, founder of the Missionary Sisters of the Sacred Heart, died at Columbus Hospital, Chicago. Perhaps no woman of our time accomplished more for social service, in the truest sense of the word, than this quiet and unostentatious worker. The great tide of emigration had brought together vast numbers of Italians in many of our American cities. They were often sadly in need of assistance, and in case of sickness or accident could not be cared for in their poor homes. It was pitiable to deal with ailing or injured Italians whose language could not be understood by those in charge of them. On coming to this country, about thirty-five years ago, Mother Cabrini at once proceeded to found a series of hospitals, schools and academies for these immigrants, and in spite of discouragements of every kind achieved a wonderful success. Mother Cabrini was born in Lodi, Italy, July 16, 1850. In her ardent enthusiasm she gathered about her a group of the most zealous women workers, intent only on their task of devoting their lives to others for the love of God. Her Society was founded at Codogno, Italy, in 1880 and approved by the Pope less than thirty years ago. Yet it numbers at present about twenty centers of activity in Italy, nearly a dozen in South America, two in Spain, one in England, and one in France, besides the great work accomplished in the United States. It was at the suggestion of Pope Leo XIII himself, who had learned to admire her generous spirit of charity and zeal at the Pontifical School in Rome, of which he had given her charge, that she extended her field of labor to North and South America. The great Pontiff thus hoped to bring corporal aid as well as the consolation of religion to the Italian immigrants in these regions. The hospital system established by her soon proved its wide usefulness. Columbus Hospital, New York, was founded in 1892; Columbus Hospital, Chicago, in 1905; Columbus Hospital and Sanitarium, Denver, in 1910; Columbus Hospital, Seattle, only a few years ago, and Columbus Extension Hospital, Chicago, was established for the poor. Owing to her efforts, schools for Italians arose in New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, California, Louisiana, Colorado and Washington. True supernatural charity was the power that enabled her to accomplish so much, to win all hearts and to communicate to them something of her own zeal. Unlike our modern social workers, she withdrew entirely from public notice, though the good she accomplished could not forever be hidden. It is well that its light should shine forth, encouraging others to follow in her footsteps.

Chronicle

The War.—No operations of major importance have marked the week on the western front. But there has been almost incessant fighting from Ypres to the Verdun sector, around St. Mihiel and in the Woevre. Field Marshal Haig reports successful raids on the enemy trenches near Lens and Loos and the straightening out of the British lines in the Cambrai sector near Bullecourt. The most striking movement of the week took place east of St. Mihiel, where the French made a successful surprise attack north of Seichepray, penetrating the German defenses on a front of a mile and capturing some prisoners and machine guns.

Bulletin, Jan. 7, p.m.-Jan. 14, a.m.

On the Italian front the situation as far as the location of the battle lines is concerned is practically the same as recorded in our last bulletin. There has been a series of minor engagements along the Piave, among which was a raid by the British across the river against the Austro-German positions on the east bank, while near the mouth of the river the Italians dislodged the enemy from his trenches west of Cavazuccherina. Fighting in the north has been confined to artillery duels of some intensity in the eastern sector of the Asiago Plateau and in the Monte Tomba, Monfenera and Montello regions. Owing to the heavy snowfalls in the Carnic Alps, where the Austro-German lines of supply are through mountain passes, the transport problem for the invaders is becoming increasingly difficult.

On January 7, by an unanimous decision, the United States Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of the Selective Service act. The Government's contention that the power vested in Congress to declare war includes the power to compel citizens to render military service both in the United States and abroad was sustained by the Court. Chief Justice White, who delivered the opinion, stated that after examining the various contentions made by the contestants, the conclusion had been reached that most of them were imaginary rather than real and that the arguments brought to support them were "absolutely without merit." The decision of the Court resulted from the appeals of thirteen cases growing out of convictions under the Selective Service act, five coming from New York, three from Ohio, four from Minnesota, and one from Georgia. The decision turned on the construction to be put on the language of Article I, Section 8, of the Constitution, which provides that Congress has power "to declare war . . . to raise and support armies . . . to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces . . . to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers." With regard to the contention that Congress has no power to exact enforced military duty by the citizen the decision says:

The Draft Law Upheld

> This but challenges the existence of all power, for governmental power which has no sanction to it and which can only be exercised provided the citizen consents is in no substantial sense such a power. It is argued, however, that, although this is abstractedly true, it is not concretely so because, as compelled military service is repugnant to a free government and in conflict with all the great guarantees of the Constitution as to individual liberty, it must be assumed that the authority to raise armies was intended to be limited to the right to call an army into existence, counting alone upon the willingness of the citizen to do his duty in time of public need, that is, in time of war. But the premise of this proposition is so devoid of foundation that it leaves not even a shadow of ground upon which to base the conclusion.
> It may not be doubted that the very conception of a just government and its duty to the citizen includes the reciprocal obligation of the citizen to render military service in case of need and the right to compel it. To do more than state the proposition is absolutely unnecessary in view of the practical illustration afforded by the almost universal legislation to that effect now in force.

The Court thus disposed of the argument based on the Fourteenth Amendment: "To avoid all misapprehension we direct attention to that amendment (Fourteenth) for the purpose of pointing out how completely it broadened the national scope of the Government by causing citizenship of the United States to be paramount and dominant." The argument that an establishment of a religion, or an interference with the free exercise thereof repugnant to the First Amendment, resulted from the (religious) exemptions of the act, was passed by with a mere reference because its unsoundness was thought too apparent to require more.

On January 8, President Wilson restated before Congress the conditions which he considers necessary for a lasting peace. In the opinion of Washington, the President's speech is the final and definite statement of the purposes of the United States and her allies now fighting Germany. The substance of Mr. Wilson's peace terms is embodied in the fourteen conditions which follow:

The President's Peace Terms

(1). Open covenants of peace, openly arrived at, after which there shall be no private international understandings. (2). Absolute freedom of the seas, alike in peace and in war, except as they may be closed by international action. (3). The removal of all economic barriers and the establishment of an equality of trade conditions among all the nations consenting to the peace. (4). Adequate guarantees that national armaments will be reduced to the lowest point consistent with domestic safety. (5). A free, open-minded and absolutely impartial adjustment of all colonial claims, based upon the principle that the interests of the populations must have equal weight with the equal claims of the government concerned. (6). The evacuation of all Russian territory and such a settlement of all Russian questions as will secure for her unhampered opportunity for independent political development and national policy. (7). The evacuation and restoration of Belgium, without any attempt to limit her sovereignty. (8). The liberation of all French territory and the restoration of the invaded portions, and the righting of the wrong done to France by Prussia in 1871 in the matter of Alsace-Lorraine. (9). The readjustment of the frontiers of Italy along clearly recognizable lines of nationality. (10). The freest opportunity of the peoples of Austria-Hungary for autonomous development. (11). The evacuation of Rumania, Serbia and Montenegro, with free access to the sea for Serbia; the restoration of occupied territories; the fixing of the relations of the several Balkan States along historically established lines of allegiance and nationality, and international guarantees of their political and economic independence and territorial integrity. (12). Secure sovereignty for the Turkish portions of the present Ottoman Empire, but with assurance that the other nationalities now under Turkish rule shall have unmolested opportunity of autonomous development; the Dardanelles to be permanently opened to all nations under international guarantees. (13). Erection of an independent Polish State, including the territories inhabited by indisputably Polish populations, with free access to the sea and with political and economic independence and territorial integrity internationally guaranteed. The formation of a general association of nations under specific covenants for the purpose of affording mutual guarantees of political independence and territorial integrity to great and small States alike.

The President maintains that the program of the world's peace is our program:

We entered this war because violations of right had occurred which touched us to the quick and made the life of our own people impossible unless they were corrected and the world secure once for all against their recurrence.

What we demand in this war, therefore, is nothing peculiar to ourserves. It is that the world be made fit and safe to live in; and particularly that it be made safe for every peace-loving nation which, like our own, wishes to live its own life, determine its own institutions, be assured of justice and fair dealing by the other peoples of the world as against force and selfish aggression.

He declares that we have no jealousy of Germany's greatness and grudge her no legitimate distinction of learning or pacific enterprise, nor do we presume to suggest any alteration or modification of her institutions. But before dealing with her we must know for whom her spokesmen speak, whether for the Reichstag majority or for the military party and the men whose creed is imperial domination.

The American and Allied Press heartily endorses the President's words. The New York Times, commenting on the words of the address: "We wish her (Germany) only to accept a place of equality among the peoples of the world . . . instead of a place of mastery;" says: "That is fundamental, it is the very soul of the address." The New York Sun holds that Mr. Wilson goes beyond Lloyd George and beyond "anybody who has yet spoken with any semblance of responsible authority" in the definiteness of his proposals. The Staats-Zeitung, after stating that Germany's spokesmen have always insisted that their opponents should definitely state their war aims, adds: "It is now the Central Powers' move." The French Press speaks enthusiastically of the address. Gustave Hervé, in La Victoire, characterizes it as "one of the immortal charters of humanity." The Temps, the Figaro, the Journal des Débats, warmly welcome its utterances concerning Alsace-Lorraine. The Matin writes that "This grand message will go to the heart of all Frenchmen."

The German press, whose comments have been cabled from Amsterdam, is divided. The Berlin Taeglische Rundschau writes of it under the caption, "The Pied Piper of Washington." The Socialist Vorwaerts calls it "a beautiful, alluring program of world peace," but adds: "We must be on our guard against too ready a confidence." The Frankfurter Zeitung, while dissenting from many points in the message, says that the whole document seems inspired by the desire, which also animates Germany, of avoiding further bloodshed. The Vienna Fremdenblatt declares the President's terms unacceptable. The message, it says, "reveals clearer than Lloyd George's speech the intentions of our enemies to let Russia continue to bleed for the selfish aims of the Entente." The Neues Wiener Journal argues that the demand for the restitution of Alsace-Lorraine erects a new barrier. In England, Mr. A. J. Balfour referred to the message as a "magnificent document." Viscount Bryce qualified it as "admirable in spirit and contents." According to the London Daily Graphic, Great Britain, under existing circumstances cannot accept the President's demand for the freedom of the seas. This proposal, it says, "cuts at the very root of the power of Great Britain."

The German-Bolshevik Peace Parley

After a series of moves and counter-moves the developments in the peace situation have come to this: Leon Trotzky, the Bolshevik Foreign Minister, yielded to the Germans who refused to shift the peace parley to foreign soil. He announced to the delegates of the Central Powers at Brest-Litovsk, that to "remove a pretext for breaking off negotiations on technical grounds," the Russians would continue negotiations at Brest-Litovsk, even if the other Entente Powers did not take part. On his proposal the armistice on all Russian fronts was extended another month by agreement with the Germans. A resolution, it is reported, was sent from Austria to Count Czernin, chief representative of the Dual Monarchy, at the peace conference, urging military and economic union of Poland, Lithuania and Courland, an extension of territory at the expense of Italy, and Austrian dominance of the east Adriatic coast. According to the London Daily Mail, the British Government, though not formally recognizing the Bolshevik régime, will communicate with the Bolshevik Ambassador in London.

France.—The publication, last month, of a letter addressed by Cardinal Gasparri to the Under Secretary of State of France, relating to possible modifications of the protectorate over Catholics in the Orient, long accorded to France by the Holy See, acquires a special interest from the fact that Jerusalem has passed out of the hands of the Turks. The letter was dated June 26, 1917, but was not read to the Chamber of Deputies by the Premier, M. Ribot, but merely placed among the archives. M. Denys Cochin had asked the Holy See whether the creation of the Sacred Congregation for affairs in the Orient was intended in any way to modify the protectorate granted to France. Cardinal Gasparri replied in the negative, stating that the Congregation was meant to be a new ecclesiastical court, with no relation whatever to the French protectorate, which would remain unchanged. Hitherto the Sacred Congregation of the Propaganda had taken charge of all affairs referred to the Holy See from the Orient; in the future it would concern itself only with affairs of the Latin rite, the new Congregation would look after the affairs of the Oriental Church, Catholic as well as Orthodox, and also other Christian Churches in the Orient, not of the Latin rite.

Jerusalem and the French Protectorate

Cardinal Gasparri pointed out that it was by a special grant of the Vatican that all Catholics of all rites were directed by the Holy See to appeal for protection to France in preference to other nations, although by agreement with the Ottoman Government other nations no less than France had the right to protect their own citizens. This privilege, and others also, had been extended by the Vatican to France in part by official concession and in part by legitimate custom, and had done much to increase French prestige in the Orient.

Should the Ottoman domination in the Orient continue after the war, the Cardinal declared, there would be no change whatever in the privileges hitherto enjoyed by France; but in the event of its coming to an end, old treaties naturally would become inoperative, the order given to Catholics by the Holy See, even though it were not revoked, would be practically a dead letter, and France's protectorate would cease to exist. In the readjustment of relations which would follow on the passing of the Orient out of Turkish control, new arrangements would have to be made; but, whatever they were, the Cardinal assured France, the Holy See would be disposed to regard French interests with favor.

Rome.—The calumny against the Holy See, first published by the Morning Post of London, which charged the Vatican with having designed the Pope's peace proposals to unsettle the Italian soldiers and break down their war spirit, although refuted by the Cardinal-Archbishop of Westminster early in December, has been repeated in the journals of many countries, including Canada and the United States, without however the official answer of Cardinal Gasparri, who wrote in English to Cardinal Bourne as follows:

Calumny Against the Vatican

> It is nothing short of an atrocious calumny to assert, as has been lately done in the columns of the Morning Post, that the Vatican is implicated in the disruptive propaganda to which recent Italian reverses have been attributed.

The incident would have been closed with the failure of the London journal to produce the slightest proof of its assertion, were it not for the fact that it is still being utilized to discredit the Papacy. Cardinal Bourne pointed out in the columns of the Morning Post that the Italian Government had given unreserved praise to the clergy and Hierarchy of Italy for their open and generous help in their country's cause; that the Italian army chaplains had reported to the Government long before the publication of the note the disruptive propaganda which was at work among the Italian soldiers and the consequent growing unrest among them; that it was after the note had been given to the public that the great Bainsizza victory was gained; and that if the note had a bad effect, which, however, he did not admit, on the morale of the Italian army, the blame for it should be placed on those who were responsible for its publication, namely, the nations of the Allies, and not on the Vatican. The note was dated August 1, but it appeared in the official Vatican organ, the Osservatore Romano, only on August 17. The Vatican addressed the document to the heads of the belligerent nations, and it was not until it had been printed in part and in whole, unofficially and with official sanction in the newspapers of England, France, Italy, and the United States, and elsewhere that the Vatican authorities made known its text.

In its issue of January 7, 1918, Le Devoir of Montreal, in reply to an attack on the Holy See, based on the exploded calumny, reprints a dispatch from Rome which appeared in L'Action Française of Paris, dated November 17, 1917, which showed that notices, summaries and criticisms of the note appeared on August 13, 14, 15, 16 in the following English journals: the Daily Chronicle, the Daily Telegraph, the Times, the Daily News, the Westminster Gazette, the Evening Standard, and the Globe; in the following French journals: Temps, Debats, Petit Journal, Petit Parisien, Matin and the Figaro; in the following Italian journals: La Tribuna and Le Corriere della Sera. There is no need of mentioning the journals of the United States, for the text was common property in this country on August 16. From all this it is clear that the journalists and Governments of the Allies were responsible for the publication of the note and consequently for any supposed harm which may have come from it. If the Vatican published it, it did so only because it was forced to do so, and after it was known to all the world. In the present issue of AMERICA the lesson of the incident is pointed out editorially.

Russia.—The New York Times' Petrograd correspondent reports that "Russia is in a state of almost inconceivable and daily increasing anarchy." He writes that in the capital food supplies are failing, that rioting has been going on in the factory towns near Moscow, owing to the complete disappearance of bread, that coal, light, transportation and labor difficulties have increased the army of the unemployed who are facing besides an unusually severe winter. The official class is reported to be still on strike and trade languishes, owing to the lack of goods and ready money. Gold and silver coin is taken from its owners by the Government, all financial operations are blocked, and the value of the rouble has gone up. In Petrograd street robberies are frequent, wine shops are looted, and anarchy is spreading among the masses. Outside the capital marauding troops harass the country and traveling is a peril. The London Times's Petrograd correspondent paints just as dark a picture of conditions in Russia. He reports the capital to be full of "dirt, disorder and crime," and says:

Hopeless Anarchy

> Starvation seems to be staring us in the face. Bread riots may occur at any moment. We receive the small quantity of three-fourths of a pound of black bread per head for two days. Workmen, soldiers, and other privileged persons receive more. Some days we get none at all, and have to make shift with a few potatoes, which are also getting scarce and dear.
> Burglary, robbery, and murder in most audacious forms prevail to an extent hitherto unknown. Men and women are stripped of overcoats and shoes in the streets. At night armed marauders in military uniforms enter houses under pretext of official searches and perquisitions. Thieves in stolen motor cars hold up persons driving in sledges.

Some Russians gloomily foretell either the partition of the country among the Powers, or that the excesses of the Bolsheviki will result in the return of a monarchical despotism. Local patriotism is developing local centers like the Ukraine and the Caucasus, and Petrograd tends to lose its importance. All hope of the Constituent Assembly as a reconstructive power seems to be gone. Many of the delegates are inexperienced theorists who have lived outside of Russia and do not know their constituencies. The peasants have grown tired of awaiting the action of the Constituent Assembly to settle the land question. Every fresh disturbance in Petrograd is said to be followed by new attacks on estates, and the prediction is made that by spring there will not be an estate left intact.

The Bolsheviki's fear that Russia may again be fighting against Germany seems to be causing the civil war to peter out. A majority of the Cossacks and the population of the Don district have supported General Kaledine's military government, the aim of which is said to be the consolidation of the Don district's democratic organizations rather than any hostile movement against the Bolsheviki. Dispatches dated January 10 announced that the Don Republic had been declared with General Kaledine as President and Prime Minister. Ensign Krylenko, the Bolshevik Commander-in-Chief, has issued a call to the soldiers and workmen in which he makes the charge that

Civil War Waning

> American and French financiers are lending money to provide war material for Kaledine. The German bourgeoisie are quite prepared to use them as allies for stifling the Russian revolution. These are conditions which raise for the Russian peasants and workmen the whole question of the defense of the conquest achieved by the revolution and of the holy war against the bourgeoisie, not only of Russia, but of Germany, France and Great Britain.

The civil wars going on in Russia, it is reported, are not conflicts of one part of the country against another, but attempts, rather, to spread class warfare into those parts of Russia where the proletariat has not gained the ascendency. Though anti-Bolschevik papers keep announcing fresh defeats of the Bolsheviki, the latter seem to be constantly making a victorious advance, and spreading as they go revolutionary doctrines.

On January 8 the Manchester Guardian's Petrograd correspondent telegraphed his paper that the Bolshevik Government intends to cancel Russia's national debt, "all loans and treasury bonds held by foreign subjects abroad or in Russia" being repudiated. It is also reported that the Bolsheviki have issued a decree suspending all payments of dividends by private companies, and forbidding transactions in stocks until ordinances are issued which will have a bearing on the further nationalization of production and on the rate of interest private concerns shall pay. According to a report issued by the American-Russian Chamber of Commerce after the revolution began the Russian national debt on January 1, 1914, was $3,400,000,000. During the first two years of the war additional loans, covering war expenses, were incurred to the extent of $8,611,920,000, making a total indebtedness on January 1, 1917, of $11,011,920,000, which at 5½ per cent required $605,655,600 to meet annually. The total foreign indebtedness of Russia, prior to the war, was $2,230,000,000. During the first two years additional loans were incurred amounting to $2,430,000,000. She borrowed from the United States $275,000,000.

The Brethren of the Mystic Tie

JOHN M. COOPER

ON All Hallows' Eve, in the year 1517, an Augustinian friar nailed to the door of Wittenberg castle church a challenge to a debate on ninety-five theses concerning indulgences and some other matters. "Another bootless war of words!" might have remarked the casual passerby. Exactly two centuries later, on the feast of the Nativity of St. John the Baptist, June 24, 1717, a little party gathered in the Goose and Gridiron Alehouse in London to discuss the proposed revival of a nearly extinct fraternity. "Another of these new-fangled eating clubs!" may have commented inwardly mine host. A few weeks ago, in this year of grace 1917, a little infant was being painlessly, if not noiselessly, done to death by a Chicago physician. "Another seeker after inexpensive notoriety!" say many. Three trivial incidents! The correspondence in dates, 1517, 1717, 1917, is curious. Are the facts related? Of this later. Meanwhile let us return to the Goose and Gridiron. (Vid. Ecclesiastical Review, June-August, 1917.)

Our little group was made up partly of artisans from the building trades, partly of men more interested in the liberal arts. From so early at least as the dawn of the previous century, the declining English stonecutters' gilds had begun to initiate into their lodges a certain number of learned and professional men as honorary or "accepted" members. Little, however, came of this innovation, and in the early years of the eighteenth century the scattered and loosely organized lodges were all but defunct. The purpose of the Goose and Gridiron meeting was to revive and reorganize the expiring Masons' lodges. So a grand lodge was established, and Anthony Sayer, Gent., was elected Grand Master.

As we know from Stukeley's diary, the recrudescent Masonic fraternity met with little success at first, but with the election of John Duke of Montagu to the Grand Mastership in 1721, the society, gaining in prestige, began to grow apace. The "operative" or artisan element was before long largely eliminated, the symbolical and allegorical teachings of "speculative" Freemasonry took definite form, and the older gild's charges were profoundly modified in the new Masonic constitutions published in 1723.

Many Masons still take seriously the legends which carry back their fraternity's origin to the Templars, to the builders of Solomon's temple, or to ancient ethnic and mystery cults. Such legends are interesting, but not to that matter-of-fact dame, the Muse of History. Even the thread, tying speculative to operative Masonry, is a very slender one. The modern international brotherhood began its real career, as most competent Masonic historians themselves agree, with the founding of the Grand Lodge of England in 1717 and the compilation of the new constitutions in 1722.

By the middle of the eighteenth century, Freemasonry had spread from its birthplace, England, to most countries of the civilized world, and since then has uninterruptedly maintained its status as an international organization. It possesses, however, no supreme directing head nor central administration, but is divided both ritually and territorially into a multitude of independent bodies. It is true that all or nearly all these many bodies trace back their common descent directly or indirectly to the English Grand Lodge of 1717; all work or require as a prerequisite the first three degrees of Apprentice, Fellowcraft and Master Mason; and all are inspired by a certain loose unity of purpose centering around the ideal of morality and individual liberty. But, on the other hand, there exist broad lines of cleavage, particularly between the three great linguistic sections of the craft, the Anglo-Saxon, the Latin, and the Teutonic.

Teutonic Masonry, while in the main neither political nor materialistic, has been deeply furrowed with a rationalism that is distinctly antagonistic to Christian dogmas. Latin Masonry has been, particularly since the French Revolution, decidedly anti-clerical, and, for about the last half-century, largely political, anti-religious, and materialistic. Anglo-Saxon Masonry has abided more faithfully by the more tolerant and more conciliatory spirit of the original English founders of the craft in matters religious and political.

In the following paragraphs we shall confine ourselves to the consideration of the English-speaking Masons. Not only are they bound to us more closely by the ties of language, traditions, and citizenship, and often of personal friendship, but they constitute the bulk of the international fraternity. In fact, of the 2,000,000 and more Master Masons in the world, seventy per cent, or more than 1,500,000, owe allegiance to the Stars and Stripes, and fifteen per cent to the Union Jack. The remaining ten per cent are divided about equally between the Latin and Teutonic sections.

"No private Piques or Quarrels must be brought within the Door of the Lodge, far less any Quarrels about Religion, or Nations, or State Policy." Such quarrels and discussions engender rancor and divide men, whereas Masonry aims to conciliate and to unite men. If by religion and politics we understand particular denominational tenets and party politics, Anglo-Saxon Masons may be said to adhere pretty closely to the above-quoted provision of their constitutions. If on the other hand by religion and politics we understand belief in God and immortality and such fundamental principles of State policy as, for instance, civic liberty or representative government, beliefs and principles on which all men are supposed, a bit naively, to be agreed, the case is different. These topics are among the commonplaces of Masonic addresses both within and without the lodge. Moreover, in Masonic books and periodicals at least, some of the particular positive tenets of the Christian denominations are not infrequently touched on or even discussed at length.

"If he [the Mason] rightly understands the Art, he will never be a stupid Atheist, nor an irreligious Libertine" [that is, a free-thinker]. The great mass of English-speaking Masons undoubtedly do believe in God, and honestly and sincerely insist on such a belief from their candidates. A very few are professed atheists, but their number is so small as to be negligible, probably not more than a fraction of one per cent. Not so negligible, however, is the number of Masons, chiefly hailing from the Scottish Rite, who partly or totally reject the traditional Christian conception of a personal God, or who more or less explicitly identify Him with His universe, or who, at least, refer habitually to the Deity as the Infinite Purpose and Consciousness of Nature, the Universal Principle or Soul or Intelligence of the Universe, the Supreme Power or Ultimate Ideal, rather than as a personal Being. This group with leanings toward pantheism or idealistic monism, or whatever else we prefer to call it, represents perhaps five or at most ten per cent of the Anglo-Saxon bodies. It appears to be waxing in numbers and zeal.

While the great bulk of English-speaking Masons believe sincerely in a personal God and in the immortality of the soul, their attitude toward positive Christian tenets over and above these is much less uniform. In Masonic literature we find such beliefs as, for example, the bodily Resurrection and Ascension of Christ or the Divine inspiration of the Holy Scriptures, sometimes openly and explicitly defended, at other times just as openly and explicitly attacked. But the far more common attitude, in fact, the prevalent and predominant one, as expressed both in addresses and in writings, may be summed up as follows: As a Mason, you must believe in God and immortality and the moral law; these are the essentials of all religion, or at least of Masonic religion; what you choose to believe over and above these fundamentals is non-essential in God's sight, or at least is your own affair, a matter between your own individual conscience and your God. Less tolerant, however, and less indifferentistic is the spirit that looks upon us in the very frequent passages in which the "non-essentials" are branded en masse as outworn and hide-bound theology, as futile and hate-breeding sectarianism, or as the manacles of slavish dogmatism.

Such a widespread attitude naturally creates within the society a strong current tending to influence its members in the direction of indifferentism or rationalism or Unitarianism. As John Arthur, a Masonic writer not given to hasty expression, has well put it: "Masonry silently but surely discountenances rabid theology and insensibly inculcates Theism or a species of Unitarianism as a conception or creed sufficient unto salvation" (Tyler-Keystone, 1908-9, xxiii, 539).

Notwithstanding this, the mutual relations between Masonry and the Anglo-Saxon Protestant churches have been on the whole friendly and even cordial. The occasional scrimmages which still crop out are for the most part of Lutheran origin. The fraternity's attitude, or, to be more exact, the brethren's attitude, toward the Catholic Church is somewhat different. Many Masons are, as we know from personal experience and as their public acts and utterances make clear, unreservedly courteous and kindly toward the Church. Others, while in the main respectful of her sincerity and appreciative of her moral and charitable labors, are nevertheless annoyed and angered at what they look upon as her unfair and bigoted opposition to their brotherhood. A certain proportion of the craft, perhaps ten per cent, are aggressively or even violently hostile. They consider the Catholic Church as the declared foe of religious and civil liberties. English Masons have taken little or no part in an unflagging anti-Catholic crusade, which has been carried on by this minority section of the American brotherhood in books and in two or three of the leading American Masonic periodicals since about 1906, and which to some extent sympathizes with and dovetails into the recent non-Masonic, anti-Catholic movement that has been sweeping over the United States.

Such in brief outline are the religious views prevalent in Anglo-Saxon Masonry. But it is important to bear in mind that Masonic philosophy and religion sit lightly upon the great majority of the brethren. It would be fairly safe to estimate that fully three-quarters of the English-speaking Masons have entered the lodge mainly to enjoy its club features and good-fellowship or to further their personal interests. Beyond this they do not take their fraternity very seriously. But on the other hand a minority emphatically do.

Why has the Catholic Church consistently maintained since 1738 that membership in her Fold is incompatible with membership in a Masonic lodge? Because Masons have a ritual? But so have the Elks. Because Masonry has secrets? But these secrets are, and since the eighteenth century have been, of a trivial nature, consisting chiefly of certain grips and signs of recognition, and of some details of ritual. At any rate, Masonry is certainly very different from ultra-secret organizations like the early-nineteenth-century Italian and French Carbonari, or the Committee of Union and Progress which engineered the Turkish Revolution of 1908. The great secret of Masonry is that it has no great secret.

The fundamental reason for the Church's stand is that Masonry is deeply imbued with the spirit of rationalism. Teutonic Masons for the most part and Latin Masons almost to a man profess and preach in their Masonic utterances rationalism pur sang. The main body of Anglo-Saxon Masonry hugs more closely the shores of orthodox or liberal Protestantism, but it drifts perceptibly though gently toward a rationalistic or non-dogmatic conception of Christianity, or toward a religious indifferential limited only by belief in a personal God. Or perhaps it would be more exact to describe Anglo-Saxon Masonic religion as a blend between Protestantism and rationalism. Naturally, therefore, Catholics, even English-speaking Catholics, while respecting the honest convictions of their Masonic fellow-citizens, could not consistently with their own convictions be parties to the work of the lodge.

Let us now go back to our starting-point. Luther's ninety-five theses of 1517 heralded the coming of the Reformation, which, on the doctrinal side, held fast to many Catholic beliefs but discarded many others, and, on the ethical side, by sanctioning divorce, attacked the Catholic conception of the sacredness of marriage. The founding of Masonry in 1717 bespoke the then dawning rationalism, which, on the doctrinal side, held fast to God and immortality but discarded the rest of positive Christian belief, and on the ethical, by preaching the fair-seeming but disastrous laissez-faire economic principle, attacked the sacredness of labor. Dr. Haiselden's views, defended by so many in the year just ended, savor distinctly of modern post-rationalism or materialism, which, on the doctrinal side, holds fast to faith in humanity but discards God and immortality, and, on the ethical, by proclaiming the gospel of expediency, attacks the sacredness of human life. Three successive turns in a road leading —whither?

SHANE LESLIE

IT has always been a great mistake to try to drive or drag or even divert the Pope from the balance which his position has acquired during the centuries. The Papacy is the only existing institution, which has faced in the past what the modern States are now facing. The Papacy preceded them and the Papacy will survive them. To be true to its warrant the Papacy must also be above them.

This paper is not to call attention to the anti-Papal drive which the gross folly of a few newspapers have adopted as a substitute for a successful one in the military field, but to point out the brilliant vindication of the Papal position which has been published by the Anglican Society of Sts. Peter and Paul from an anonymous pen. One does not expect to find a defense of the Pope from George Street, Hanover Square, but nevertheless, it has appeared and in the ironic manner of the Oxford school, which touched its highest level under Newman.

Under the title of "No Small Stir" the author discusses "What the Pope really said about the great war," taking as his text from the Acts of the Apostles, "Now as soon as it was day there was no small stir among the soldiers what was become of Peter." Which we can possibly paraphrase today in such words as "The belligerents became very excited as to what the Pope was doing!"

The Pope apparently still counts in the mind of the world. What he thinks is important and what he says is even more important still. Possibly the Pope's cell is the only sane portion left in the world's mind. The world, like a fireship adrift, is aware of no immediate anchorage save in the anchorite of the Vatican. Other anchorage there may be, but the fires may have destroyed the ship first. When the time comes for peace to be discussed it seems that it will be difficult for statesmen to refuse the historical availability of the Pope. It must be understood that the Pope has the right to suggest peace, as he has the right to be neutral.

Our anonymous writer takes the meanest of war-cries that partisan or publicist has in stock, "The Pope Pro-German!" and shows that because the Pope stands on higher ground than even the Allies it is a fatuous argument to accuse him of being on the entirely lower levels of Prussianism. The amazing idea has been propagated that the Papal system of authority is the complement of militarism rather than democracy, and that the prefix of holy is all that is required to make the German Empire accord with the mightiest concept of the Middle Ages, the twin rule of Pope and Emperor! People forget that the Popes had enough difficulty in ordering one Emperor. They are not likely to wish to associate themselves with two in any scheme of world-dominion such as Pan-Germanism involves.

One of the results of the war is that the all-obtrusive prefix "pan" is dead. Pan-Germanism died in Belgium three years ago. Pan-Slavism perished on the barricades of Petrograd. Pan-Anglo-Saxondom expired as a myth when the polyglot draft-lists were published on this side. Even Pan-Americanism has apologetically made itself the handmaid of the "League of Nations." The selfish or exclusive ideas masked under the prefix of "pan" have been sunk in the general pandemonium.

Amid the chaos only one organization retains its universal claim and influence. The importance of the Papacy is that it still directs a Pan-Church. Its only rival is the Pantheon of the sects, which having the capitular advantage of the Hydra can line up not only its children, but its different heads on the different sides which the geography of the great war may compel. The children of the Church are no less on different sides, but having only one head they must agree to his neutrality.

The neutrality of the Pope is the only fixed stake in Christendom, the only security that the maelstrom will slowly lessen, the only hope that peace, when it comes, will be less furious than war. The Vatican is a Noah's Ark, politically and spiritually floating on the raging flood. As Noah kept company with all manner of animals it is only right for the Pope to keep in touch with all manner of nationalities. His only ambassador must be the dove.

To those who most violently demand that the Pope should abandon his neutrality and sit in political judgment over the battling Governments of Europe our anonymous writer suggests: "This argument is a very strong one, if those who employ it are ready to stand by their premises. Are they willing to restore the Pope to the position he held in the Middle Ages?" In other words, the critics of the Pope cannot have their cake and eat it at the same time. They cannot exclude the Pope from his position as universal referee in the moral law and then resent that he has made no Hildebrandine judgments. Under his guiding principles the Pope cannot become a political asset of the Allies any more than he can be a tool of the Germans. Because he declines to be the one it is a poor argument to accuse him of being the other. Such moral decisions as he has been led to make have, however few, been irreproachable of political intent and have moreover tended towards the principles, if not to the objects of the Allies. The Papal morality is of higher moral value to the Allied cause than if the Vatican had mobilized the Swiss Guards on Belgium's behalf. Our pamphleteer inquires, "What neutral power except the Pope has officially condemned the violation of Belgian neutrality at all?"

That the Pope remains in touch with Germany and that pro-Germans frequent the Roman Curia no more stamps the Pope as pro-German than it convicts a judge of bias who permits counsel for both sides to appear in court. The Papal reprobation of the invasion of Belgium was the only purely disinterested one issued in the world and it had a superior moral value in that the Pope had judicially heard both sides. It may be useful even at this hour to recall Cardinal Gasparri's words to the Belgian Minister at the Vatican:

> The violation of the neutrality of Belgium carried out by Germany on the admission of her own Chancellor contrary to international law was certainly one of those injustices which the Holy Father in his consistorial allocution of January 22 strongly reprobated.

The pro-German influences were not very successful in averting this statement at least. The Holy See is open to any good influence provided it is brought to bear in the proper way. It is due to the Germans to acknowledge with our pamphleteer that "The Germans have always had the sense to recognize that the Vatican is a European Power and should be approached as such."

If at times the Pope has been misinformed by one side it is always open to the other side to appeal from the Pope male informatus to the Pope bene informatus. The Allies are liable to suffer from the awkwardness of their relations with the Vatican in the past. They have a just and an undimmed cause, but they often expect the Pope to do more than the circumstances which they have created themselves will permit. The Vicegerent of the Prince of Peace was excluded from the Peace Conferences. Carnegie was more influential than Cardinals at the Hague. The moral jurisdiction, apart from the theological, was ignored. And today there is an unbalanced appeal to the former. It has been accepted that theological disunion is no bar to the progress of civilization. But moral dissension without a means of central appeal or a rectifying standard, which is spiritual rather than commercial, seems likely to prove fatal. Something is lacking in the modern State. Otherwise so excellently provided, it has been found to have no breaks. It can only move in one direction and cannot reverse even to avoid a collision. There are no breaks available in the secular outfit. In the supreme medieval time the Papal Power could have restrained Germany, guided France and saved Belgium. In their theological aspect the Popes were not always peacemakers, but in their moral function they were able again and again to allay conflicts and point out dangers that might destroy Christendom. Again and again they endeavored to face problems from the European or universal standpoint long before such problems had come upon the nations. As a rule, their warnings were neglected. The heroic Pius II died trying to meet the Eastern question. The far-sighted Adrian VI was not allowed to compose the hastening disruption of Europe. Pius IX strove to solve the question of nationalism on liberal lines before the European Empires made it each other's scourge. Leo XIII desired to Christianize Socialism before it threw every country into industrial war. Today Benedict awaits his hour to unravel the European family from the coils of militarism.

In a war like the present where there is no theological issue the moral position of the Pope is isolated and emphasized. His neutrality is still the brake upon the jarring wheels of Christendom. The indications he has given show that he is unwilling to submit to political pressure from either side. If the pro-German agencies had their way he would remain mum. If the pro-Ally influences were successful he would have issued flaming Bulls. Of far greater value to the Allies are his asides spoken in their favor.

It is unwisdom on the part of friends of the Allies to provoke or encourage anti-Papal drives out of old theological soreness or out of irritation at the Italian defeats. Whoever strikes the Pope, strikes every Catholic soldier in America. Whoever strikes the Pope, strikes the unity of the Allies, makes the war more confused in the minds of men and peace more difficult to arrange when it has been won. Even when the Allies win peace in the field there will be needed something higher than the glittering right that victory confers. It is the moral sanction which the Pope alone can give.

This has been refused to the Germans. It is reserved to the Allies to win and keep. But that he may confer it upon them the Pope must not be of them, but above them.

There has been no small stir what has become of Peter. Peter does not become anything either pro-German or pro-British or pro-American. Peter is as Peter was and shall be. Perhaps this is the only international fact which is stable today. Nations may be right or wrong. We believe they can be and are so. The advisers of Peter may be right or wrong, but to Peter is given the clearest and wisest judgment possible. When the nations accept him as their moralist he will speak what he knows. His knowledge will not be based on the propaganda of diplomacy or of newspapers. His knowledge is the high knowledge of the moral law, laid down in Scripture or Apostolic tradition, interpreted by the centuries and indirectly the last means left to the nations to receive the results of the war through a Divine agency.

Moral Immorality

DANIEL A. LORD, S.J.

THE world is so full of moralists at present that it is in imminent danger of becoming immoral. For it is seldom healthy for any man or any generation to talk too much about anything. Often enough that is a sign that a man is trying to talk himself into a belief that he has something that he would like very much to have, as a bank president boasts the unassailable solvency of his institution at a time when the thought of a bank inspector gives him cold chills. Decadent ages are usually rife with seers who propound wise maxims and grave epigrams which will serve the populace in place of otherwise forgotten virtues. In the same way that an age which is sterile in pure literature turns critical and talks about books, an age which recognizes that its own morals show best by gaslight talks learnedly and lustily on the beauty of virtue and the inner significance of morality, hoping by noise to distract a too inquisitive attention.

But our moralists—and we are inundated with novelists and playwrights and essayists and poets who play with morals as the Lake Poets played with flowers—have coined for our age a new set of moral epigrams whose burden is a consistent and insistent negation. There is no such thing as absolute morality. No act is by its nature either good or bad. Moral law is an antique that passed out with what-nots and hair-cloth furniture; like them, very serviceable in a mid-Victorian parlor, but without either use or beauty in a world of arts-and-crafts furniture and geometric wall-paper. While each literary season brings its supply of literary moralists who chatter gaily of right and wrong and the futility of moral codes, they differ chiefly in the breadth and sweep of their denials. The best moralist seems to be the one who rejects the largest section of the moral law.

In the midst of this blithe chorus of denials, a person feels forced to clap his hands to his ears and pause for a moment's silent thought. Have our devoted ancestors after all been suffering from an age-long delusion when they refused some actions the light of their countenance and bade others welcome to their homes? Our lusty-lunged moralists, with their revolutionary creeds and their literary bad manners, are shouting that they were. Poor ancestors!

All acts, comes the protest, weigh the same in either scale of the moral balance. Custom, some cry, is all that makes an action good or bad. Morals are as much a thing of fashion as the cut of a coat or the length of a skirt. Murder has been banned by custom along with the unpleasant habit of gnawing bones held between one's fists. Yet as it is not such a far reach from gnawing bones to eating corn off the cob, murder may in time become a popular parlor sport. Nay, protest others, before civil laws were enacted, men were as innocent of morals as they were of monocles. With the introduction of laws some actions became bad and others good. Wrong, all of you, shouts the moral anarchist who hides his red shirt under "immaculate linen"; the only moral man is the Nietzschean hero who recognizes no law, no custom, no morality, who rides on an iron-shod charger over the shams and shadows we call the moral law. "The golden rule is that there is no golden rule."

Under the old moral code a moral act was one by the frequent repetition of which a man became good or bad, worthy of praise or blame. A person who frayed his pockets dipping in for money for the needy was considered to be performing an essentially moral act; one who dipped into the pockets, frayed or otherwise, of others was considered guilty of an essentially evil action. On one side of their moral ledgers men wrote a list of acts for which praise should be bestowed: patriotism, continence, honor, devotion to parents. On the other they inscribed a second list for which men incurred the scorn and blame of mankind: treason, lust, lying, filial ingratitude. And in their literatures they crystalized these moral acts in Leonidas and Ephialtes, Lucrece and Pasiphaë, Regulus and Sinon, Cordelia and Regan. Were they wrong in thus cataloguing acts as one catalogues diamonds against their paste imitations?

With all due contempt for our ancestors, they were not stupid enough to think that the acts of a baby or an idiot could be moral acts. They, of course, demanded for any moral action consciousness of the action and liberty of choice. They too, quite as much as our clever moderns, recognized that custom might influence a man's mental attitude toward right and wrong; the simple matter of what constitutes sufficient raiment is an instance of that. But if custom or law is all that makes the difference between good and bad, they would have vehemently insisted that there is really no essential difference at all.

Custom, for example, determines our table manners; and it is not unlikely that the table manners of St. Simon Stylites would have inexpressibly shocked Don Juan, though no one debates about their respective morals. Law is the public expression of the will of the governing portion of the community. Yet no man feels like slinking off and hiding his head because he used his garden hose at a time of day prohibited by public enactment; nor does he expect, just because he has decorated his terrier's neck with a license tag, to have his own neck weighed down with a medal. If customs or laws favoring certain actions are all that make them morally good, and other customs or laws banning other acts alone make them morally evil, then between truth and lying there is precisely the same difference that exists between eating peas with a fork or with a knife. And while peas rolling from a knife may not delight the esthetic soul, they leave our moral sense intact.

But is this really the case? Is there no essential difference between actions which we call morally good and those we call morally bad? The answer is simply to see what would happen were customs to be reversed and the laws altered by inserting negatives wherever they are not found and deleting them wherever they occur. Promptly our attitude toward patriotism and treason, for example, would suffer a complete change, and we would be forced to shoot patriots at dawn and commemorate traitors in immemorial bronze. If laws alone make morality, then laws might, at some time in the little known but often felt past, have enforced universal fratricide, established schools for the instruction of youth in vice, forbade children to care for their aged parents, and banned as quite immoral purity and temperance and the cardinal virtues. A whim of some mighty lawgiver, a fad successfully established by some ancient culture club might have made murder praiseworthy and placed piracy among the honored professions along with medicine and law. For all actions, say our new moralists, are morally colorless until law or custom makes them either black or white or crimson. The commonest of common-sense revolts at the possibilities which this theory, logically followed out, makes possible.

On the contrary, even where custom has acted directly against what we call morality, men have recognized the real difference between good and evil. In the degenerate days of the Roman Empire, when the customs of the imperial city sanctioned an almost universal unchastity among its women and set a premium upon craven sycophancy among its men, poets, with the same pens which had written glowingly of their mistresses' shame, paid reverent tribute to a Cornelia or a vestal virgin; and philosophers paused long enough in their flattery of the Caesars to praise the unbending knee of Cato the Younger.

And one important point cannot escape even a new moralist. Laws are not the makers but the recorders of men's attitude toward the facts of life. Sanitary laws are enacted only after the public mind has been educated to a belief that dirt and unhygienic conditions are necessarily bad. So you may be sure that murder and arson are not bad because the laws forbid them; the laws forbid them because men saw that they were morally bad.

It is unquestionable, of course, that there are actions which we might call moral cosmopolites, dwelling on the hazy borderland of morality and defying all attempt at strict classification. But there are a sufficient number of obviously good or bad actions to indicate quite clearly what it is in the act itself which marks it for what it is. An action is morally good if it conforms to the nature of a man as a free, rational being. Any action, on the contrary, which perverts his nature, humbling his will and intellect under the hoofs of his wild passions is, essentially and prior to any law that may forbid it, morally evil. Charity is essentially good because it is an action which befits a being whose will has been made capable of loving his fellow-men. Lust is a crime because it allows the passions which we possess in common with the beasts to gain a dominion over the very faculties of will and intellect which make us men; though, on the same principle, these passions when controlled and ordered by right reason become instruments of untold good.

A man is worthiest of praise when he has attained through a long course of moral actions to the full heights of his manhood; and all that helps him to true manliness is morally good; all that holds him back, morally evil. The woman to whom we lift our hats in a spirit of reverence is the woman who radiates from her whole person the purity and fragrance of soul without which woman is nothing more than Kipling's three disgusting elements; and all that has tended to make her womanliness precious in the sight of God and men we call morally good; all that has dragged her down is morally evil.

The race of new-moralists, who really should be called no-moralists, will continue, I suppose, their career of feverish negation. Yet though all the laws and customs of men were suddenly to be dropped into oblivion, were chairs for the new-moralists to be set up in every university, and their play produced on every stage, men would still recognize that between good and evil actions lies a chasm which all the magic of poetic expression and all the witchery of beautiful prose can never close. And as the good man pauses for a brief, horrified glance up at that hill up which the new-moralists are mockingly leading the way, he feels in his heart the rising of a prayer like that prayer which rose from the lips of Him who taught us the meaning of morality by living and dying for it: "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do."

Hero Priests of France

BARBARA DE COURSON

THE heroism of the soldier-priests of France is a theme upon which many thrilling pages have been written. It is fraught with human and supernatural interest and emphasizes certain facts which the children of the Catholic Church, wherever found, must gratefully recognize. We have here another proof that in God's hands evil often turns to good.

The unjust law which obliged French priests to serve as soldiers, was framed in a spirit of hatred of the Church and is undoubtedly wrong, and its authors bear a heavy responsibility. But contrary to their previsions, this law has contributed to extend the influence of the Church which it was intended to injure.

Men, whose prejudices against priests rested on no foundation, learned to esteem the fighting man, whose call to a higher life, entailing daily acts of generous renunciation, paved the way for the supreme sacrifice. I have often heard it from the lips of our soldiers: the indifference of soldier-priests to danger and to death explained their influence over their comrades. Their readiness to volunteer for dangerous duties is a consequence of their indifference. It springs from habits of detachment, practised in the retirement of a country parish or in the studious atmosphere of a seminary.

But the element of danger, inseparable from the soldier-priest's performance of his duties, may be regarded as a wholesome stimulant, and the opportunities given him of exercising his ministry are a real spiritual joy. Another class of drafted ecclesiastics are deprived both of this stimulant and joy. They are men above forty and under forty-five, who, before the war were canons, parish priests, professors. They have not been appointed military chaplains because the number of the latter is limited; they are listed as "auxiliaries" and as such, are often employed as nurses and stretcher-bearers, duties which they welcome because their priesthood here comes into play. But, among them, there are many who, too old to fight, and being neither military chaplains nor stretcher-bearers, etc., work on the roads, break stones, shovel and dig and build military huts.

A Jesuit, Father ——, a talented writer, with the soul of an apostle, belongs to this class. He has published some of his experiences. They make delightful reading. He describes how a little company, in which there were seven priests, was suddenly removed from the Red Cross train, where they had acquired some experience as nurses, to a forest in the Vosges. Here, under the falling snow, they were directed to build wooden sheds and to dig trenches. In the past, these middle-aged curés had carried some distinction in their special sphere. But, as may be supposed, a professor of philosophy, even an excellent parish priest, may prove an awkward workman. The boyish lieutenant in command of the party thought so and expressed his feelings openly and looked down with juvenile impatience on these elderly and clumsy toilers. One day our Jesuit was cheered by meeting a boy of twelve who offered to serve his Mass. The boy had guessed, without being told, that this workman was a priest. The boy's own pastor was in the army and the lad had not made his First Communion. He had, however, been excellently prepared at home by his mother and grandmother, and his new friend gave him Holy Communion. This incident brightened Father ——'s monstrous task of digging in the snow and mud through the dull December days. But he and his companions never remained long in the same place and their tasks were generally changed before they had mastered them. They were now ordered to make trench-ladders. Our Jesuit owns that his efforts were not brilliantly successful and that his work was inferior to that of his teacher, a boy of twelve.

On Christmas Eve, a Sunday, the priests toiled all day. A few boys, even a little girl, joined the party as volunteers. On Christmas Day, they worked all the forenoon, no longer under the pine-trees in the forest, but in the yard of a factory, knee deep in black mud and bitten all the time by a sharp wind. A statue of Our Lady and one of St. Joseph were still in their niches, above the porch. "Under their eyes," writes the religious, "we endeavored to do small things with a big heart.." The grey-haired curés and professors, so good-tempered and docile, so awkward and so humble, unconsciously preached more eloquently in that muddy yard than in the pulpits they once filled with distinction. Deeds are ever more than words.

Nevertheless it is impossible not to notice the absurdity of putting these middle-aged ecclesiastics to tasks for which they are absolutely unfitted. Father ——'s comments on the subject are humorous, rather than bitter. Once only does he remark that the priests, employed in sawing wood and in digging ditches, feel some regret when they remember "How much work there is to be done for souls."

Doctors, dentists, bakers, carpenters, tailors, are employed in the army, according to the training they received. This is reasonable and practical. Priests alone are put to tasks for which they have no aptitude and kept from the work they were trained to do. Granted that the number of military chaplains is limited, that owing to certain changes in the organization of hospitals at the front, elderly priests are now less needed as infirmarians, would it not be more rational to send the more aged back to the hundreds of parishes which, through the length and breadth of France, are desolate because they have no pastors? To keep them as infirmarians and stretcher-bearers is reasonable. To try to make them efficient builders and carpenters is ludicrous and useless.

All realize that there are supernatural forces at work in this war as well as material ones. Never, perhaps, were "spiritual munitions" more necessary. The priests are the Heaven-appointed distributors of these spiritual forces. The Sacraments which they alone can administer bring courage, patience and the spirit of self-sacrifice in their train. All know, moreover, that the army chaplains are not numerous enough to satisfy every claim.

"Why, then," asks Father ——, "does not some enlightened spirit remember that the priest is, by his vocation, a physician of souls; that, by allowing him to exercise his ministry freely, you unlock a store of spiritual forces for the benefit of our people?"

Father ——, however, comforts himself with the hope that his own labor and that of his companions, if apparently useless, is not so in reality. "We have preached the gospel of humanity," he writes. "The hour has come when we must live it. We have meditated on the life of the Carpenter of Nazareth; we have now the honor, because it is the will of God, to live all the details of this life, even the humblest and most trying." He remembers that at Nazareth the Son of God handled the hammer and the plane and thus worked the salvation of a fallen world; that every act, if accepted from the hand of God and performed in union with His will, becomes great and precious in His sight. Pondering on these truths, and rising above the mistakes and follies of men, Father —— cheerfully continued to dig, to shovel and to hammer, while the snow fell fast over the little company of grey-haired priests, who prayed and toiled and suffered for France.

Catholics and White Slavery

It has been very gratifying to me, and I am sure also to those who regret the hideous traffic in girlhood, that my humble plea for those outraged children, kindly published in AMERICA, has not passed unnoticed, and I am deeply grateful.

That this discussion may not terminate in mere vituperation and smoke, I would like to offer some suggestions and profitable results—the end at which, despite our pyrotechnics, we are all aiming.

(1) The point at issue is not prostitution, but the traffic in innocent victims, generally simple-minded, poor and friendless, and ranging in age from nine to sixteen years. To talk, therefore, of Good Shepherd Homes in this connection is quite beside the mark, the criminal being the man, though he may be aided by female procurers, a class we are not discussing. (2) To urge that any methods outside religion are useless is proved to be false by the splendid results achieved by non-Catholic workers. In that excellent book, "Prostitution," published by the Catholic Social Guild, with a foreword by the Archbishop of Liverpool, it stated, apropos of the suppression of the white-slave traffic:

> In 1898, Mr. Coote (Secretary of the National Vigilance Association) set about this heroic task. There is no more thrilling story of supernatural strength achieving the humanly impossible than is the story of his work. It is not too much to assert that, with the official and philanthropic machinery working so efficiently, this traffic has not only been crippled, but well-nigh destroyed.

(3) To accuse those who advocate practical preventive methods, in addition to the teachings of our religion, of belittling that religion is unfair and unjust. Catholics take public action in other matters. Why not in the great cause of purity, and the defense of the innocent? We can boast our Leo XIII, defender of the worker; our Father Mathew, virile apostle of temperance; our Cardinal Mercier, eloquent pleader for Belgium. These great men were not content with the teachings of the Church alone, with the confessional or Catholic family, where temperance and humanity were already inculcated. They conducted, as well, a vigorous public campaign to impress these teachings on the world-at-large. Why then cannot we boast of any public champion of outraged girlhood, any impassioned denunciator of the male profligate? Why have we no Cardinal Mercier to expose, not the atrocities of the battlefield or the warrior, mad with blood, but the even greater barbarities of the peaceful city and the cold-blooded, prosperous civilian? (4) That Catholics are neglectful in this great work of purity is also put forward very clearly in "Prostitution," where it is stated:

> There is, however, one purely modern phase of rescue work and one which we commend to the special attention of Catholic readers, since so far as we know it has not hitherto formed a part of Catholic social effort. We refer to the part played by the educated lay-woman, rescue worker who goes in and out of the places frequented by prostitutes, makes friends with them, gains the affections of now one, now another, and by personal influence succeeds in withdrawing her from the life she is leading.

> shadowy band of girls temporarily out of touch with such influences, among them a certain proportion of Catholics, and yet, so far as we know, this modern type of rescue worker, the recipient of an especial vocation to go into the highways and byways in search of the lost, has sprung up chiefly outside the Catholic body.

Non-Catholics can point with pride to Josephine Butler, to whom every woman is indebted, since her efforts exposed the shameful State-regulation of vice in Europe, and helped to suppress this unspeakable degradation of womanhood; Rose Livingston, the plucky little "Angel of Chinatown," who, practically single-handed, has rescued over 500 children from a living death, and whose own life, like that of Josephine Butler's, has been attempted more than once by the beasts whom she robbed of their prey; Mr. Coote, Anthony Comstock, the Bishop of London and many others too numerous to mention. But where are their Catholic prototypes?

It is evident, therefore, that some action on the part of Catholics to suppress the white-slave traffic, and abolish, as far as possible, prostitution, is most necessary and urgent. I would put forward, in all humility, the following suggestions, which I hope will be improved upon by others more competent to speak: (1) A vigorous campaign against the male profligate in pulpit, press, school and society; the abolition of the complacent attitude towards male immorality, so common among many women, and, indeed, most women, and an agitation to enforce over here the Criminal Law Amendment act, which helped so materially to suppress soutenours in England. (2) Whole-hearted cooperation of Catholics in any movements for the protection of girls, equal pay for equal work, the admission of women to all employments and a chance of honorable advancement therein, so that the streets may not be the only financially profitable career. (3) A more courteous attitude towards women coming as strangers to big cities. (4) The provision of healthy amusement and cheerful surroundings for girls and women, many of whom drag out a suicidal existence in a solitary back room.

If Catholics would expend their undoubted energy and eloquence in bringing about some of these reforms, instead of wasting time in attacking one another and their non-Catholic brethren, they would be more truly following in the footsteps of Christ.

Only the Streets.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Your editorial entitled "Only the Streets" contains a serious indictment of Catholic endeavor. Yet who does not realize how well justified this indictment is! What an unthinking lot of people we Catholics are! At meetings of lodges or other societies we are brimful of social uplift, and pour forth our eloquence into the willing ears of our listeners. And when we go home, we do not seem to be aware that all we have accomplished is—words.

It has always seemed strange to me that the Church, an international body, with the experience of 1900 years to her credit, and which alone does more spiritual good to the young in one day than all "uplift" societies in a century, should not have created a Catholic counterpart of the Y. M. C. A. It is a crying need of the times. Because our great-grandfathers remained home at night, and found their amusement in the family circle, it does not necessarily follow that the young men of today are doing the same. The very existence of that powerful Protestant organization, the Y. M. C. A., rather proves the contrary. And if this influential society is so well patronized, it would seem that there is room for a similar Catholic society, to provide the same facilities for our Catholic young men. What have we done in that respect?

There is a woful leakage among the young. I do not believe in ostrich policies, and we may as well have the courage to face this fact. Every pastor can count the boys of sixteen to twenty years of age who are faithful in receiving the Sacraments. How could it be otherwise? Lest old men and middle-aged women deviate from the path of righteousness, we gather them in societies. We enrol young girls in sodalities, because experience proves they rather like to belong to one. But our boys and young men, why, they are wise enough to take care of themselves; and with easy conscience we leave them to the select society of the streets, the poolrooms, and the saloons. As chaplain of a State reformatory, where a distressingly high percentage of the inmates is supposed to belong to the Church, I have met a number of graduates from these select circles. When I had finished my cell visits one night, I found that of the fifty-four Catholic prisoners I had spoken to during these visits, twenty-eight came from the same city. The youngest of those twenty-eight was sixteen years old, the oldest twenty-five. What are their pastors doing for their young men?

Most probably this communication will be read and forgotten, like so many others. However, permit me to make a practical suggestion. We need a national young men's society, modeled after the Church Extension Society. Would to God a man could be found with the push and perseverance, and tireless zeal of Dr. Kelly, to father it. It would have all the good and none of the bad qualities of the Y. M. C. A. "Fas est et ab hoste doceri!" It should absorb all existing local or regional societies of the same tendencies. It would establish recreational and social centers in every city and village with a Catholic population, one or more according to the needs of the place. The Board of Directors would be composed of bishops, and would have the energetic backing of the entire Episcopate, and all pastors and the entire laity would remember that their religion is Catholicism, not parochialism. Now where is the man who can sponsor this organization?

Irish in the French Forces

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In a recent issue of AMERICA a contributor made mention of the fact that in 1903 the French Government published a roster of the officers and men of the French forces who fought in the War of Independence. Two Irish regiments were there, i. e., Dillon's and Walsh's. Would someone now be good enough to let us know through your columns the exact percentage of Irish in the French forces and satisfy Irish curiosity?

Culture-Hungry Audiences

I have read with interest the very stimulating letter, on the educational value of art lectures, of Mr. Andrew Fullerton in your issue of December 22. The value of such lectures is undoubted, but I do not admit that our people, or any other people, as a rule, are hungry for such knowledge. If they acquire art culture, it is too often by the route of "forceful feeding" in the form of a church event. For proof I offer my experience, of about six years, which has also been that of my confreres.

At present I am laboring in a shoe city of about 70,000 people, of whom 17,000 are Catholics, which boasts of its prosperity, high wages and the educational opportunities of its citizens. Our parish, which numbers about 5,500 souls, counts a goodly number who have had the benefits of higher education, or persons who have the leisure and opportunity to profit by art lectures. Among them, however, but little taste is manifested for even the most superficially serious lectures on art or travel. I am giving a series of five illustrated travel talks—studiously avoiding even the word lecture—on pagan Rome, Christian Rome, Florence, Venice and Naples. I have woven together the history, art, life and humor, constituting the distinctive charm of those cities with which I am entirely familiar from an Italian residence of four years. A very fine musical program is provided as an intermission. The members of the sodality, under whose auspices the talks are being given, have worked hard to sell tickets, announcements are made in church and in the local papers, yet the average attendance for three talks has been 125. Those who have attended have been thoroughly pleased and have expressed their surprise that more do not come. Does this look like "culture hunger"?

I do not criticize those whose lack of education, whose laborious work and resultant want of taste allure them to the lighter forms of amusement; but what of those whose educational opportunities should have developed some taste for art in all its branches, who pretend to be refined, and who do possess culture, but show few signs of it? The so-called educated are very often lacking in artistic sensibilities of even the most elementary sort, but patronize the "movies," cheap vaudeville, sex plays and light-clad operas. If one goes to a lecture on art or travel, he or she is dubbed a "high-brow." Amusements which entail the slightest use of the mind are not supported. Too many today seem to go through school without developing those refined tastes which alone can make one worthy of the name "educated." More genuine appreciation for art and literature can often be found in those from whom one would not expect it. We have the subjects, the lecturers, but not, as a rule, the "culture-hungry audiences."

Teach Them What to Read

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In a recent issue of AMERICA, in "Teach Them What to Read," a correspondent sets forth a very well-founded criticism concerning the work done, or rather left undone, along this line in the Catholic schools. In an earlier article, "Catholic Authors in Training Schools," Father Hogan writes in much the same vein. Others have expressed like opinions. These opinions, it seems to me, deserve serious consideration. For, surely if Catholics are to have a knowledge and an appreciation of their press, one of the best places to teach this knowledge and appreciation is in the Catholic schools. I myself am a convent graduate, and I cannot recall that in the school I attended any teaching was ever done along this line. I do not think I ever saw a Catholic periodical in that school. I know I never read one. When I left school I had never heard of our diocesan paper. I could not have named a single Catholic periodical published at that time. I had very little knowledge of any of our Catholic writers. We read, it is true, a few Catholic novels, but, with one exception, even this reading was not encouraged. This exception was Cardinal Wiseman's "Fabiola."

Conditions may have changed in this school since then; and it may not be true of other schools. However, generally speaking, a little questioning of the pupils from these schools reveals a surprisingly limited knowledge of the Catholic press. Father Blakely, I think it was, conversing with a "Julianne" from one of these schools, discovered that she had never even heard of AMERICA!

It may be that such conditions are due in a large measure to the reluctance of Catholic editors and apologists and Catholics in general to admit criticisms against the Catholic schools; though why this should be is not quite clear. If the schools are at fault, why should not attention be called to it by way of the beginning of a remedy? And surely the teachers in these schools should be the first to give consideration to such a criticism, since these schools must desire to promote whatever cause has been sanctioned by the Church for her members; and certainly no cause has been more repeatedly or more emphatically sanctioned by the Church than the cause of the Catholic press, especially by the last three Pontiffs. And if ever we needed a strong Catholic press, we need it now.

The Pope and the President

ONCE again has Mr. Wilson with an eloquence all his own given expression to the loftiness of the objects for which the United States is fighting. His address to Congress will no doubt take its place among the great Presidential utterances and will record for all time the fine spirit of democracy which animates the American people. The President's countrymen are justly proud of the document. In Europe also it has challenged the admiration of all classes, and has given Mr. Wilson another claim to be regarded as an upholder of justice. The foreign press is almost a unit in according him the distinction of moral leadership among the many millions of citizens in the nations arrayed against the Central Powers. Particularly significant is a London journal's statement that "He once more utters the unspoken thoughts of humanity—thoughts too deep for Old World politicians to utter."

These words are certainly true of politicians. But it must not be forgotten that the words of the President were made possible by the peace proposals of another friend of humanity, who though not a politician, is the ruler of the oldest kingdom in the world. The message of the President is not an unspoken message. Both in its principles and in many details of its application, it was expressed five months ago by the Pope of Peace, Benedict XV. The President's message cannot be praised too highly; but Mr. Wilson himself would be the last to sanction the conspiracy of silence which completely ignores the earlier, almost identical message of the Sovereign Pontiff.

In the archives of the belligerent and neutral nations of the world there is a Papal note dated August 1, 1917, which clearly sets forth the basis of a just and durable peace, and which whether by mere coincidence or design, is strikingly similar to that outlined by the President. The Vatican is in possession of official diplomatic answers to that note, sent by our own Government, and by Austria, Bavaria, Belgium, Brazil, Bulgaria, Germany and Turkey. The records of the legislative bodies in England, France and Italy contain discussions of it. The press of all the world is filled with comments on it, hostile and friendly. It was written less than half a year ago, and yet it would appear that no one even remembers it.

Catholics at least should not forget to compare the two messages. Both lay down as a foundation that for material force of arms must be substituted the moral right of all peoples, great or small, to enjoy equally liberty and safety. Both insist on a reciprocal diminution of armaments as far as shall be consistent with domestic safety. Both plead for a true liberty and community of the seas. Both point to a league of nations for the maintenance of the future peace of the world. Both argue for the restoration and restitution of territory and the condonation of damages. The President's message is naturally more specific than that of the Pope; but even in the concrete applications to particular nations such as Belgium, France, Italy and Poland, there is a noticeable similarity. The differences are those of omission rather than of opposition.

If anything were needed in the way of official declaration, apart from the internal evidence of the document itself, that the Pope's message was inspired by perfect impartiality and neutrality, and that it had for its underlying motive a universal love for humanity and not the promotion of the interests of any peoples, it has been supplied by President Wilson, for whether or not the President's message was influenced by the Pope's, the one is practically an amplification and completion of the other. The attitude of the Central Powers towards the general tenor of the Papal note is not denied.

The "Open Bible" Once More

"WOODROW Wilson is the greatest missionary of a hundred years. He has given to Protestantism the greatest opportunity since the days of Martin Luther." Such is the statement made by Dr. Bertrandt Martin Tipple, head of the Methodist missions in Italy. We can well imagine how calmly American Protestants, and not least of all American Methodists, would receive the announcement made by the authorities of the Catholic Church that a president of the United States is the greatest Catholic missionary to the Protestant countries of Europe since the days of St. Ignatius. Particular tact is shown by the board of foreign missions of the Methodist Episcopal Church in giving publicity to these words at the present momentous crisis of the nation.

As an illustration in point Dr. Tipple quotes the words said to have been spoken by the President in reference to the Bibles given to the soldiers leaving for France: "Men, if you want stamina and character in you, you want to read this book. It will carry you through the crisis." These words, the Methodist Doctor adds, have been translated and read by soldiers and citizens all over the world. "Think what it means in southern Europe where an open Bible has always been taboo!"

The repeated recommendation of the reading of the Sacred Book, particularly the New Testament, coming from the Vatican and the great Prelates of the Church, is completely ignored and the ancient calumny is soberly rehearsed that "an open Bible has always been taboo." Yet the Bible has been taught over the whole Catholic world during the past few centuries precisely as it was taught throughout the entire Catholic Church during all the centuries that had preceded the Reformation. So, too, it will continue to be taught to the end of time, when the countless sects of the day have passed away leaving the Church in the midst of new struggles, new schisms and new heresies. We read of them in the writings of St. John and they will doubtless exist at the coming of the Antichrist.

Catholics, above all others, know how to value the Word of God. They alone have preserved it for the world and they alone are fearlessly defending it today against those who would deny its Divine inspiration. But they likewise know that the Bible itself is not sufficient, for with it must go those Sacraments of which the Bible itself gives evidence and with it too must go all the teaching Divinely entrusted to the Church from Apostolic days.

The Cardinal and the Pope

CATHOLICS have everywhere read with indignation the slanders uttered by the London Morning Post against the Pope on the occasion of the disaster which overtook the Italian armies a few weeks ago. According to the unscrupulous writer in the London daily, the Italian reverse "was largely due to the influence of treacherous representations disseminated among the Italian armies" and "the Vatican was implicated in that propaganda." That charge was maliciously made and without a vestige of proof. But it was not allowed to pass unchallenged. With that loyalty to the Holy See which has always distinguished him, his Eminence, Cardinal Bourne, Archbishop of Westminster, immediately protested against the outrage. In a dignified but indignant letter to the Morning Post he asked for the evidence in support of such a charge. He reminded the author of the calumny that, in reply to the protest of Cardinal Gasparri against the unwarranted accusations of the London daily, no evidence had so far been produced, although the writer of the article in the Post declared that such evidence was in his possession. One piece of evidence the Morning Post attempted to give. According to its statement the German Emperor had presented $30,000 to the Vatican ostensibly for the purpose of defraying the expenses of repairing the garden walls. Such was the slender basis on which the Post based its outrageous charge against the Pope, and its evident suggestion was that the present was in the nature of a bribe.

In his reply, the Cardinal asks, whether the Morning Post has lost its sense of humor. "The Vatican," writes the Cardinal, "is popularly, though erroneously, supposed to be fabulously rich: but even if it were on the verge of bankruptcy, and were as corruptible as its worst foes declare, could any serious man believe that it would sell its honor and run immeasurable risks for £6,000 ($30,000)?"

This is the sole proof brought by a great English paper representative of modern culture and modern historical methods against the Pope at the very time when thousands of Catholic soldiers who reverence him as their spiritual head and as the Vicar of Christ are carrying England's banner to victory on the fields of Palestine and dying for her on the fields of Flanders and France. Slandering the Pope will undoubtedly fill the hearts of Catholics in England with greater loyalty and enthusiasm in the cause they are upholding against the enemies of England in the world war. But it has long been proven that any weapon is good and serviceable when the Pope is in question. Slander and calumny may be prosecuted and punished before the civil courts in England with that swift and impartial justice on which she justly prides herself. But the Pope may be slandered with impunity by any unscrupulous scrivener. The Pope has no friends! Who cares for him now, for his reputation or his name? Some cause had to be found for the Italian reverses. None could be discovered quite so plausible as to write that the Pope, an Italian, of a family that has given soldiers and statesmen to the motherland, whose near relatives are now fighting in her armies and navy, a man of saintly life, against whose honor not a syllable has ever been breathed, who has urged his countrymen to be faithful to their country's cause, Judas-like has betrayed his countrymen into the enemy's hands for thirty thousand pieces of jingling coin. It is an odious and criminal slander,

But the Pope has found a worthy champion in the Archbishop of Westminster. His Eminence has voiced the indignation of every Catholic throughout the world. They indorse his indignant protest. From the slander uttered against the Vicar of Christ we must learn the lesson of accepting with great caution anything said today about the Pope, his doings or his policies, for they are the object of constant misrepresentation or malicious misinterpretation. Let him pipe or dance, sing or weep, he is bound to be wrong in the eyes of the world. In his hour of sorrow it is our duty as Catholics to show him that manly loyalty of which the Cardinal-Archbishop of Westminster has given such a splendid example.

"Pressing Things Too Far"

"THE Compleat Protestant," one of the characters in John Ayscough's clever controversial pamphlet, tells "The Incomplete Catholic" that the chief defect of the latter's Church is that she presses things too far. "Some things are pressing, though," the new-made "Roman" murmurs. Whereupon the following dialogue takes place between the two:

The C. P. . . . If he [Newman] and his friends had just made themselves at home in the Half-way House, what a lot of ink and quarreling would have been saved. But he would go the whole way.

The I. C. One does on a journey—at least one means to.

The C. P. Ah, but why not realize that the Half-way House is the end of the journey? Why should there be any journey? Why not stop at home—that's the glory of our Church, you see. It stops half-way. . . .

The I. C. Half-way where—to heaven?

The C. P. No, no: I was merely using a metaphor. . . . Your Church had come to pressing things too far. . . . Its ideals are antiquated. . . . St. Gregory the Great, now—suppose him preaching in London now, I doubt he'd not draw much. He'd bore one of our big metropolitan congregations.

The I. C. Perhaps he would: you take it for granted he'd preach now just as he did then?

The C. P. Yes. That's the worst of your Church, it don't move.

The I. C. Rocks are rarely locomotive, and it's seated on one. . . .

The C. P. You see, your Church does press things. And English people nowadays won't stand that. They won't be pressed to conclusions: and they like to choose for themselves how much religion they shall have, and what it shall teach; your Church is too managing—it lays down the law—

The I. C. God's law?

The C. P. That's all very well; but they like to decide for themselves what God's law is.

The I. C. Not that God should say for Himself what it is?

As Episcopalianism, both in this country and in England seems to consider itself above all else a "gentleman's religion," to regard "respectability" as the most important of its nebulous "notes," and to realize keenly in what lamentable taste are "extremes" of every kind, it is little wonder that the Compleat Protestant was deeply pained by his Papistical friend's fondness for pushing principles to their logical conclusions. Like so many of his coreligionists, that Incomplete Catholic was no doubt hopelessly given, even in his daily life, to "pressing things too far." Perhaps he assists at Mass and even receives Holy Communion more than once a week, though Sunday Mass and Easter Communion, is all that the Church strictly requires of him. But he persists in pressing things too far. Perhaps he is so sensitive about the fair name of his Church that when she is calumniated in the daily paper, he actually sits down and writes the offending editor an instructive letter. Perhaps, too, out of an old-fashioned conviction that a consistent Catholic's faith ought to make him a father of the poor, a supporter of Catholic education and a reader and spreader of Catholic literature, he so perversely keeps pressing things too far that his "hours of leisure" are devoted to St. Vincent de Paul work, all his eloquence to making his fellow-Catholics see the importance of maintaining at a high standard of proficiency and attendance every Catholic institution of learning, and all his zeal to forcing other Catholics to realize what a rich heritage of good literature we have and that Catholic papers and periodicals cannot be published unless they have readers who are also subscribers. May the number of Catholics who in the foregoing ways keep "pressing things too far" go on increasing day by day.

St. Paul and the Sleeper

THERE came a great preacher to Troas, and his name was Paul, once Saul. Among those who gathered to hear him, was "a certain young man named Eutychus." Beginning well, this youth, otherwise unknown to fame, soon grew to hold this wonderful privilege lightly. He sat in a window, and "as Paul was long preaching," allowed himself the indulgence of yielding to the oppression "of a deep sleep." The further announcement in Holy Writ, that this most insensible young person fell from the third loft, and was taken up dead, must be received by all stern moralists and by most Christians, with a feeling akin to satisfaction. One who could fall asleep while St. Paul was preaching, "with an eloquence that shook the world," must have been a mere clod, unlit of any Divine spark, or at best, one of a number born solely to consume the fruits of the earth. But this view was not shared by him "whose heart was the heart of Christ." Forthwith by miracle, he called Eutychus back to life, after which, in his zeal, "He talked to them a long time, until daybreak."

It is to be hoped that the newly-born Eutychus was one of St. Paul's most interested auditors for the rest of the night. However, viewing human nature in some of its less pleasing aspects, it is also quite possible that he engaged the crowd which stood about, babbling and gesticulating, with tales calculated to heighten his importance in the eyes of this unwashed multitude. Possibly, too, the tender-hearted Saint worked more of a miracle than he knew; at least, Eutychus is still alive, and reappears in most of us from time to time. It is one of the effects of original sin, perhaps, that we too often recognize life's greatest opportunities only after they have slipped from our grasp, or even fail altogether to recognize them for what they are. A marvelous privilege truly, to hear St. Paul speak, his great heart aflame with love of God, of Jesus whom he once did persecute, but a privilege incomparably greater to approach Jesus day by day, as to a Friend, to listen to His voice, and take Him into our very hearts. Yet in the silent eloquence of the Tabernacle, do we sleep?

"Daily we Sinais climb and know it not." Daily, too, does the Almighty Creator speak to these hearts which He has made, and claims for Himself alone. So, too, not daily but often, do we go into the Garden of Sorrow, with tears that are bitter and barren, because we go alone, forgetting that He who from the depths of wo and sadness unutterable cried, as some hurt child, to His Father for mercy, is close beside us. He is very near to all of us, with us in sunshine and shadow, but closest of all, when the night comes on, and no kindly stars are shining.

THE TOWERS OF FAITH

THE world will never again give birth to works of creative genius so fair and original, so delicate and massive, so intricate and orderly, so graceful and strong, so splendid and so chaste, as the great cathedrals of the Middle Ages. There can be but one perfect monument of Christian architecture like Chartres. Kings, if they survive the fiery ordeal through which the world is passing, can never be crowned under such another glorious canopy as the arches of that high sovereign of art that once was Reims. We dare not hope for the day when a generation of master-builders, sculptors, molders, workers in iron and brass and bronze, painters and poets whose dreams were fused into the green and the gold, the azure and the crimson, of the molten glass, shall arise to build another Amiens and force the inanimate stones themselves to breathe a prayer of adoration and chant a hymn of victory.

The towers of faith, Chartres, Amiens, Reims, Notre Dame of Paris, Westminster, Beauvais, Le Mans, Bourges, their queenly and turreted sisters that looked down in solemn beauty on the fair kingdom of Christ stretching from the northern snows, past the Rhine, down to the sunny shores of the Inner Sea are the monuments of a glorious age. They were the triumphant Te Deum of the Ages of Faith. Their foundations rested on the common religious belief of a whole people, their turrets and their spires carried their hopes up beyond the sordid things of earth and left them at the throne of God. Every stone that was set in their buttresses, their storied windows as dazzling as the sea of glass spoken of by the Seer of Patmos, every carven saint or scolloped mullion, even the grinning and mocking gargoyle, told of their love.

The cathedrals of the Middle Ages are the highest triumph of religion and art. During the period of their highest perfection, from about the year 1250 to the Renaissance, when a semi-pagan taste crept in to uncrown their successors of the glory that slept in every one of their consecrated stones, they gave the world a spectacle which cannot be renewed again until the world comes back to the Faith that inspired them. They sprang from the soil of Europe as the spontaneous result of the common Faith and the common ideals which then everywhere prevailed in the Christian commonwealth. This does not mean that they sprang out of the ground—suddenly, unheralded and unprepared. For as Mr. Ralph Adams Cram says in his "Substance of Gothic" (Marshall Jones Company, $1.50) "There is no such thing, properly speaking, as a new style, and there can never be a new art cut off from the succession of the past." As far back as the days of the Baths of Diocletian in Rome, and the palace of the same Emperor at Spalato in Dalmatia, the artist can trace in embryo at least, "the structural elements of medieval architecture." These elements appear still more strongly outlined, according to Mr. Cram, in certain early Syrian churches and in the masterpieces of the Lombardian and Carolingian periods. The France-Norman developed them more fully. In the eleventh, twelfth and thirteenth centuries, Gothic architecture flourishes in all its majesty.

In the scholarly work of the great American architect, the author is not primarily interested in the technical and structural elements of the great crowning art of the Middle Ages. He writes of its substance. While he gives a brief view of its structural factors from Charlemagne to Henry VIII and studies their more striking manifestations, it is the soul of Gothic art that mainly engages his attention. The book thus endeavors to express the inner spirit of the Middle Ages.

The cathedrals of these days of faith were the product of an esthetic, social and religious inspiration which mark one of the highest points in the history of civilization. Not until we return to the spirit of those times, may we build as did the great artists of Durham, Coutances and Reims. The cathedrals of France, Germany and England were one of the highest expression of the medieval mind. We can hardly imagine them outside of those days and that civilization which gave birth to the Summa of St. Thomas, the theology and philosophy of the schoolmen, which filled the universities of Oxford and Paris with scholars from every quarter of the world, inspired the chivalrous enthusiasm of the Crusades, made Dante dream of heaven and hell and waking from his trance, tell of them as if he had descended living into the horrors of the pit and seen with mortal eyes the solemn dance of the mystic wheel of immortality. When those holy enthusiasms and that social and religious polity will be again restored, the towers of faith will again be built in all their beauty.

The Catholic Church is directly responsible for the masterpieces of architecture which then flung their mighty shadows over Europe. Her dogmas, her authority, her liturgy were the sources from which they sprang. She was then the greatest factor in European civilization. Just as all authority in the eyes of the men of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries seemed to center in Rome and to radiate from great leaders like Gregory, Innocent and Honorius, so the many-sided activities of the people crystallized round that Faith of which they were the Divinely appointed guardians.

Gothic architecture is Catholic architecture. Without the Catholic Faith, and Catholic ideals and dogmas, without a Catholic people, a Catholic sacramental system, a civilization permeated from king to lowest peasant, from clerk to unlettered franklin, by Catholic teaching, the Gothic system would never have existed. On the towers of faith, lifted up on almost every hillside of Europe like so many beacons along the sea-coast, a torch ever blazed. It was the torch of an unquestioning and simple, but not blind, faith, of an undying hope, and, in spite of many crimes and blunders, of an enthusiastic love for that Christ, whose palaces they were. Without the Mass these towers of prayer and adoration would never have soared into the skies. It was because the Eucharistic God was to repose under their arches that their builders so cunningly devised them, making them resemble in their stony vaults the Cave of Bethlehem, where He was born, but flinging into their darkness and their gloom something of the light of Paradise and reminding the humble worshiper by their stupendous heights and the majesty of their interlocking buttresses, piers and columns that they were adoring the Ruler of space and time, the King of kings and the God of Majesty and Power. And that a whole people, king and barons and bishops and peasants might assemble under their shadows, vast aisles and naves were left for the kneeling throngs. They were not the product of a day. It took generations to build them. The architect who planned their splendid proportions left the task incomplete and bade his children carry to their crown of swaying and waving boughs the deep-set pillars he had carven with the statues of angel and prophet and wimpled queen.

For these cathedrals the ground had been providentially prepared. The older civilization of Rome had been swept away by the Barbarians of the North. With its disappearance the pagan ideals of Rome had vanished. New races, stern, hardy, rude, savage, but of a vigorous and clean manhood, had succeeded to the degenerate descendants of the masters of the world. Feudalism, with its graduated scale of social bodies conspiring to mutual service and assistance, supreme respect for the priest, the Bishop and above all for the Supreme Pastor of that Church which had brought their fathers out of barbarism, the civilizing influence of the great Benedictine rule, of the Cistercian and the Cluniac monks, in whose monasteries learning, and culture had taken refuge, unity of faith and union of hearts round those two central sources of authority, the King and the Pope, all these prepared the way for the great revival, fostered its development and brought it to perfection. The "Substance of Gothic" does not consist in the use of the pointed arch or elaborate tracery or carving, nor in a finely elaborated framework of piers and column rather than in walls, nor in a nice adjustment of parts whose opposing forces neutralize each other and thus produce a perfect equilibrium. These are accidental, structural elements. It was the blood of the northern races, the artistic culture of monk-civilizers, the dawning sentiment of national life and aspirations, the realization of the men of that splendid age, that though mountains and seas might divide them, they were brothers in belief and united in a common worship, a common spiritual life and a common political system, an unquestioning devotion to Christ and the Mass, a deeply-rooted reverence for the supernatural, a vivid perception of the mysteries of faith: these are the heart and the soul of the whole system.

The towers of faith stand as the "majestic fabric of a great people, a great epoch, a consummate art." Had Catholicism done nothing else in the realm of material and artistic achievement, but to summon them from the soil of Christian Europe, it might calmly defy all the slanders and charges brought against it. They are the eloquent witnesses that it is the inspirer and the creator of art in its highest manifestation. What Mr. Cram says of the majestic ruins of Reims may be applied to the great Gothic cathedrals. They are the crowning monument in material form of Christian civilization; so perfect in all their parts that "They were perhaps too perfect as being more than man may be permitted to attain, an infringement on the power of God."

AFTER COMMUNION

Now art Thou in my house of feeble flesh,
  O Word made flesh! My burning soul by Thine
Caught mystically in a living mesh!
  Now is the royal banquet, now the wine
The body broken by the courteous Host
  Who is my humble Guest—a Guest adored—
Though once I spat upon, scourged at the post,
  Hounded to Calvary and slew my Lord!

My name is Legion, but separate and alone:
  Wash, wash, dear Crucified, my Pilate hand;
Rejected Stone be Thou my corner-stone!
  Like Mary at the Cross's foot I stand;
Like Magdalene upon my sins I grieve;
  Like Thomas do I touch Thee and believe.

REVIEWS

Recollections. By JOHN VISCOUNT, MORLEY, O. M., Hon. Fellow of All Souls College, Oxford. New York: The Macmillan Company. Two volumes. $7.50.

For the student of letters and politics these volumes will have the deepest interest. If he wishes to know what such a virile writer as John Morley himself thinks of "The Ring and the Book," or "Sohrab and Rustum," or what George Meredith thought of Charlotte Bronte's "Villette," and certain splendid passages in Hawthorne's "Marble Faun" he will find it told here in apt and illuminating words. There is a flavor of great literature about the book. It is evident that the author fed on the marrow of lions. He is a cosmopolitan in letters. He is at home with his Homer and his Euripides and loves to read sermons, whether from Newman or South. He likes sound and noble literature. He heartily loathes "the odious quality that stains and splashes the French literature and much of the French painting of the day." He is a master himself of the finer qualities he admires in the great masters. He writes with ease, naturally, too earnestly and sincerely to pay much attention to trifling artificialities of style. From a literary point of view the book is of a high order.

In his political life John Morley has been identified with almost every great movement in England for over thirty years. He probably knows conditions in India and Ireland, the two countries with which he has been intimately connected in his administrative offices as well as any English statesman. Scarcely a single one of the great political leaders of his time can be mentioned of which the name does not occur in the book with some interesting bit of information or comment. Parnell, whom Gladstone, he tells us, considered a political genius of the first rank; Chamberlain, Acton, Asquith, Balfour, Bright, Rosebery, Kitchener, the German Kaiser, who impressed him by his freedom, geniality and good humor and by his evident desire for peace; Edward VII, whose character he greatly esteems; these and many more meet us in the varied gallery to which the author introduces us. He was also acquainted with almost every man of letters and every writer of his time. For Meredith and for George Eliot he has the highest admiration. To read his book is briefly to review the history of letters of the last fifty years.

But Morley is an agnostic. His book suffers from the handicaps of his system. His creed tinges his otherwise fine volumes with a dull and chilling hue. There is little warmth in them. They record the feelings and experiences of a man who has gone through life, buoyed up with naturally high ideals but without vigorous enthusiasms and with a certain aloofness from his fellow-men. He has fine impulses, but they lack that finish, that power and the unction which are the crowning gift of faith. Viscount Morley pays an homage we find it hard to understand to Voltaire, Rousseau, Diderot and Mazzini. Yet he is naturally too just not to admire the good Irish Sisters and the splendid work they are doing for the poor and the cause of education. It is ultimately from his agnosticism also that we miss in the book that intimate note of self-revelation, that excusable auto-Boswellianism, that lets us down into the heart of the writer. Of John Morley himself, in his more intimate moods and his personality we hear comparatively little. We would like to learn more of his mother, whom he describes with one cold epithet, of his boyhood days, of his friends. Just here the book is disappointing. It is written everywhere on a high level, but it lacks that warm and human touch that puts the seal of perfect on the written word.

Thrice Through the Dark Continent. A Record of Journeyings across Africa During the Years 1913-16. By J. DU PLESSIS, B.A., B.D. With Map and 60 Illustrations from Photographs. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. $4.50.

Finland and the Finns. By ARTHUR READE. Illustrated. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co. $2.50.

By reading these volumes together, making a chapter of the first alternate with one of the second, those who like books of travel and description will no doubt be able to avoid the extremes of heat and cold and maintain instead an equable mental temperature. The author of "Thrice Through the Dark Continent" is a Protestant missionary who in twenty-six months covered some 17,000 miles of Africa, 2,000 of them on foot. Starting east from Kumasi and the Gold Coast, he reached Mombasa and the Indian Ocean. Turning west he then traveled to Maladi and the South Atlantic, and ended his long journey by toiling across the continent once more in a southeasterly direction, bringing up finally at Cape Town. Through 350 pages Mr. Du Plessis gives an account of the adventures he had, the sights he saw, and the reflections he made during his long journey. There are good descriptions of tropical storms, of the natives' habits, of the remarkable variety of big game one can view from a car-window while riding through British East Africa, of the discomforts of life in the jungle and the perils of crossing streams and swamps man-back. But the pious author does not seem able to behold with composure a Catholic native or a Catholic mission. "Speaking of the continent of Africa generally," he regretfully remarks, "we need to acquaint Protestants with the fact that the work of the Roman Catholics is on a much larger scale than that of their own missions." In another place he writes:

> As is their custom everywhere the Catholics immediately set about beautifying the sites they occupy. They build commodious houses, plant gardens, commence industries, make roads, and finally erect a stately church. At Amadi the Dominicans have put up a fine edifice in Gothic style, with stained-glass windows and an imposing tower. No doubt such a station is impressive, but does it impress the native in the right way? Does it not give him the idea of a religion of aloofness, etc.

The author's adventures have about them a sameness which a judicious pruning of his material would have corrected. As the book is for the general reader, more discretion in selecting the photographs should have been used.

The book on Finland is from the pen of the Lecturer in English at the University of Helsingfors and first appeared several years ago, this being a new edition with a chapter appended on the present war. The author traces the development of modern Finland from the beginning of the nationalistic movement in 1809, describes the Finns' quarrels with the Swedes on the language issue, the revolt against Russian rule during the present century, and writes interesting chapters on the national customs of the people, some of which must be a grave menace to social purity. The author testifies that in Helsingfors, the capital, there is an "absolute indifferentism to religious questions," and that various kinds of Socialism are rampant. Since 1907 Finnish women vote on the same terms as the men. Timber, paper and scenery are the country's main productions.

Truancy and Non-Attendance in the Chicago Schools. By EDITH ABBOTT, Ph.D., and SOPHONISBA P. BRECKINRIDGE, Ph.D. Chicago: The University of Chicago Press. $2.00.

The title of this volume, as well as certain remarks in the preface, may lead the reader to conclude that he is offered nothing more than a local survey. The authors write that their book is the result of a study of the social aspects of compulsory education and of child-labor legislation in Illinois, based mainly upon data gathered in the Juvenile Court of Cook County. In reality, however, the scope of the book is much larger, and this treatise is well worth the careful study of every teacher.

There is hardly a dull page in the book, but two topics are of especial interest, the first being the relation of truancy to juvenile delinquency. In his excellent report, published some years ago, Mr. John W. Davis of the New York Department of Attendance, pointed out the intimate connection which frequently exists between these two phenomena. Time was when truancy, or "playing hookey," meant no more than an occasional surreptitious visit to the old swimming-hole, or a happy day of fishless angling along the banks of some rural stream. Either of these occupations probably did the budding youngster as much good as his customary five hours in the little red schoolhouse, particularly since the demands of justice were always amply met by a switching at school, followed by a fervent repetition of the same at home. So benign an interpretation would today be fatal. Habitual truancy is a symptom of grave disorder, pointing almost unerringly to improper guardianship or to juvenile delinquency. The boy is not at school either because he is with "the gang"—not an innocent thing in most large cities—or engaged in acts that have no savor of salvation about them. The little girl, it may be, is trying to do the housework in a home that has no father, and which would be greatly improved by the summary removal of the "mother" with which it is disgraced. Truancy, even occasional, can never be passed over lightly, unless the cause is plainly necessary. An immediate investigation may often save the child, and perhaps reconstruct a broken family, or brace weakening family relations. It is greatly to be desired that those Catholic schools which cannot maintain their own truant officers, should cordially cooperate with the public-school attendance department. This means no subjection to the school board, and in no way weakens the pastor's control of the school. "At first, I was a bit suspicious of the truant officers," said a pastor in a western city some ten years ago. "Today, I don't see how I could get on without them."

Compulsory education is the second topic of particular interest discussed in this work. Whatever ethical complexities may once have been a source of difficulty in connection with the State's authority in education, the practical necessity of an adequate compulsory-education law, vigorously enforced, is today beyond all denial. It is now strongly urged, and as strongly opposed by some Catholic leaders, that the minimum age be extended to the seventeenth year. The question cannot be decided by an ipse dixit. Catholic families are usually large; frequently they are poor, and very often, just one day ahead of destitution. In these circumstances, it is hard to blame the father who wishes to make the child a breadwinner—"crumbwinner" might be a better term—at the earliest possible moment. Certainly, if the need is extreme, the natural law would seem to require the child to forego educational opportunities to succor the family. Yet a fourteen-year-old girl or boy at work is nearly always an economic loss in the long run. Furthermore, the rather obvious moral dangers to adolescents in shops, mills and factories, cannot be lightly disregarded.

The Divine Image, a Book of Lyrics. By CAROLINE GILTINAN. Boston: The Cornhill Co. $1.00.

These are the lyrics of a tuneful Catholic songster who has found her highest inspirations in the eternal truths. In "Over Night, a Rose," which is perhaps the best of the poems in Miss Giltinan's little book, she learns from the sudden blooming of a lovely blossom:

> So maybe I, who cannot see
> What God wills not to show,
> May, some day, bear a rose for Him
> It took my life to grow.

"The Little Maid" whom those "three Saints" endowed with such attractive virtues is prettily described and the following stanzas entitled "Achievement" tell what happens in many a soul that is struggling toward Heaven.

> The biggest thing I ever did
> Was all inside of me.
> There was a battle, hardly won,
> With only God to see.
> When I plucked out a flaming brand
> Whose evil light shone through,
> The place it burned was charred and black . . .
> But no one ever knew!

"All That I Love" and "Magic" are quatrains full of thought and feeling, but such verses as those "To My Victrola" and the laments of love-lorn women that appear in the latter part of "The Divine Image" are lower in quality than the poems named or quoted above. W. D.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

Schools or parishes that are looking for something to "put on" for an after-Easter entertainment will be glad to know that the Rev. Dr. Thomas F. Coakley has written a pageant called "The Discovery of America" (Encyclopedia Press, $0.75) which can be easily and effectively produced by amateur actors. The drama tells the story of Columbus's trials and triumphs and lays stress on the lofty motives that made him fearlessly sail toward the unknown west, and the author well brings out the part the Church had in the great enterprise. The text is written in iambic pentameters. Another drama which will doubtless appeal strongly to many a parish society is "Meg Burns, a Play of Old Erin" (St. Berchman's Academy, Omaha, $1.00), which "Gilbert Guest" has written. Each scene of the play's four acts has a strong ending and much of the characterization is good, but the average parish theater would have to modify some of the drama's scenic requirements. "Meg" breaks her resolution to "keep her temper till Easter," but Roderick, the smuggler, mends his ways.

"With the Children in Lewis Carroll's Company," (Abington Press, $0.75), the Rev. William Valentine Kelly tells of the pleasure the society of little boys and girls has frequently given him. "Lewis Carroll" acts as mentor in this land of innocents, and it is through his spectacles that we see the beauties of childnood days. Hence little girls come in for their full share of praise; the boys being represented as neither esthetically great, artists and poets having scant use for them, nor as needing our solicitude and defense. "They are able to take care of themselves." One half of the study is devoted to the religious aspect of "Lewis Carroll's" relations with children. "I tried to remember that my little friend had a soul to be cared for as well as a body. It was very touching to see the far-away look in her eye when we talked of God and heaven—as if the Angel who beholds God's face continually were whispering to her." There are good passages in the book about children's delight in the supernatural and about their ready grasp of moral and dogmatic truths. But when the author tells of "the children of a Jew receiving Christian Baptism from a Methodist minister with a Roman Catholic friend standing as godmother," the reader will wonder whether that obliging sponsor ever conned those pages in the catechism which treat of participation in non-Catholic religious rites.

The handy little pamphlets published by the London Catholic Truth Society offer an ever-ready arsenal of facts on almost every controversial issue that comes up in the topics of the day. The following, for instance, treat of the one great, pressing question, the war, from a variety of angles: "War, Loyalty, Defence," three meditations by Father Bede Jarrett, O.P.; "Pacifism," a word with conscientious objectors, by the Rev. Dr. Adrian Fortescue; "The Catholic Chaplains in the Great War," by A. Hilliard Atteridge; "A War Pilgrimage," by M. E. M. Young; "The Peace of God," by the Right Rev. the Bishop of Northampton. All the above cost a penny each. Then, bearing on the much discussed proposition of Church unity and the Anglican "branch" theory, we have "Why 'Roman' Catholic?" by the Rev. E. C. Messenger; "Authority or Private Judgment," the true issue between Catholics and Protestants, by Herbert E. Hall; "Faith and Facts," by A. J. Rahilly; "The Date of the Anglican Schism," by the Rev. Dr. Adrian Fortescue; "Old England and Her Church," by the Rev. V. Hornyold, S.J.; these are all a penny each. "Authority and Religious Belief," by the Rev. Joseph Ricakaby, S. J. (3d.); "The Compleat Protestant," some dialogues by John Ayscough (6d.); "Shakespeare and the Catholic Church," by the Rev. A. Bartlett and Dr. Edward Somers (3d.). The London Society's pamphlets can be ordered from the International Catholic Truth Society, 407 Bergen Street, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Organized Protestantism is still making sporadic efforts to credit itself with a supernatural aim. Instances are at hand in two volumes: "The Wicked John Goode" (Doran, $1.00), by Horace W. Scandlin, and "The White Queen of Okoyong" (Doran, $1.00), by W. P. Livingstone. The first is the autobiography of a reformed criminal, whose life-story is exploited for the benefit of the "new penology" and the New York Bowery Mission. The Reverend Superintendent of the latter institution adds an epilogue to the pages of his convert, in which he himself is incontinently lauded. Against these rare cases of genuine moral reformation one cannot help balancing the crowds of unsuspecting immigrants whom these institutions subsidize in order to exhibit them as converts from error to truth. The second volume, a children's life of Miss Mary Slessor, a Scotch Free Church missionary in West Africa, is more wholesome in its tendency and edifying in what it relates. It affords at once a striking instance of the devotion which marks the lives of many sincere Protestants, and of the fatal defects of the system which enlists such devotion in the cause of a mutilated Christianity. The heroine is permitted by her widowed mother to devote herself to the African missions on the express condition that her salary shall go to support those whom she is leaving behind. Evidently Protestants have more than one reason for contributing generously to their foreign missions.

"The Education of the South African Native," (Longmans, $2.00), by Charles T. Loram, is a thorough and sane study of the unsolved race problem as it is presented in the Union of South Africa. In all essentials the problem is the same as that which confronts us in America, and Dr. Loram's conclusions are equally applicable here. In the early chapters he sums up the general issues, including a history of governmental and missionary enterprises, the methods employed, the results accomplished. He stresses the evil effects of racial contact and after an elucidating exposition of the grave dangers and the inadequate solutions, he concludes that the reply to the question, "Can we afford to educate the negro?" would seem to be, "Can we afford not to educate him." Of the three proposed answers to the difficulty, repression, equality or segregation, he rejects the first two for reasons apparent, and offers the third in a mitigated form, based upon a systematic study of race psychology, and a course of studies suitable to native capacity, with the ultimate end in view of gradually handing over the task of educating the negro to the more competent members of their own race. The book is filled with enlightening statistics and data gathered by long and diligent research, which cannot but prove suggestive and helpful to educators in this field.

Mr. Ellis Barker has translated and abbreviated Herr S. Grumbach's "Germany's Annexationist Aims" (Dutton), published in Switzerland in German, a full collection of opinions of men in every political party and social position in Germany. It conclusively shows that at least up to the end of 1916, every school of thought in Germany, except a fraction of the Social Democrats, was fully bent on "improving Germany's geographical position" at the expense of all her neighbors, the justifying motive being invariably "political necessity."

Teaching the Mass with Lantern-Slides

DO our Catholic people really appreciate the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass? In an article appealing for a new method of teaching catechism an experienced priest said some years ago: "No one appreciates what he does not understand." It follows that the better we understand the sublime beauty of the Holy Sacrifice the sooner we shall learn to love it. Loving the Mass, we cannot fail to become true and stanch Catholics, such as the Church needs in our day.

I have frequently observed our congregations assisting at Mass. Many seem to be there through a sense of obligation only. They come just to avoid mortal sin. Because they have little intelligence of what is going on at the altar for their souls' good, devotion is cold. What would not a camera or a moving-picture machine reveal! Here and there in the church are able-bodied men, and a few women too, in irreverent, half-kneeling, half-sitting postures, their faces blank, many of them surprised when there is a change from standing to kneeling and vacantly following what those in front of them are doing. Yet when it is remembered that the Mass is the very heart-throb of our Catholic life, what a pity it is that so many of our Catholic people are without an intelligent grasp of the Holy Sacrifices's significance! How then can we make the Mass better understood? Why, by using modern educational methods and teaching through the eye. Today visual instruction, used judiciously, has proved of high pedagogical value.

The Mass and the Little Ones

LET us first speak of the children, for what applies to them applies to the "grown-ups" also. The children (God bless them!) have eyes as well as ears. They first want to see a thing, and then hear all about it. With them it is continually "Let's see it!" "Why is that?" and "What's that for?" Why not put a little more of the "see" element in our teaching, and especially in teaching the Mass? The practice of showing the vestments to the children and of explaining the Mass, while another priest stands at the altar, is certainly admirable. If any adults happen to be present, they become like children again, they grow so interested. "That's great, Father," you will hear them say; "I never knew that before." It is certainly a pity that they did not, and of course it may be their own fault and not ours. But that method of explaining the Mass cannot always be conveniently adopted, as it requires a special knack to do it well, and it ought to be done well, or not at all. Besides it is important that the Sisters should have a means suitable for the classroom or auditorium.

The Convenient Stereopticon

MODERN invention has come to the rescue by offering us little up-to-date stereopticon lanterns. They are compact, light, portable and handy. The price is reasonable, even cheap, considering how useful they are. Moreover the element of danger is entirely eliminated, for they are perfectly safe, having in them special high-power nitrogen Mazda globes instead of the troublesome and perilous arc of former days. Their manipulation too is very simple for the cord need only be attached to an incandescent-lamp socket. As the lantern requires no attention while the slides are being shown, it is just the thing for the classroom.

Artistic Slides Necessary

THE slides used should, of course, be worthy of such a sacred and inspiring subject as the Mass is. If popular lecturers of the day, by throwing beautiful pictures on the screen, can attract and entertain large audiences, why should we not be able to hold the attention of both young and old when we explain by means of artistic lantern-slides the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass? Therefore the pictures should be, as far as possible, correct in detail and fine examples of skilful photography and attractive coloring.

The slides are made from numerous photographs taken of a careful priest from the time he goes to the altar till Mass is over. Every important rubric and liturgical action of the celebrant is faithfully represented. If these accurate pictures are accompanied by a clear explanation of the meaning and significance of each part of the Holy Sacrifice, and every action of the priest, as they are depicted on the screen, both the children and their elders will easily learn how to value the Holy Sacrifice properly and how to assist at it with becoming reverence and devotion.

A Thoroughly Practical Method

"THE quickest way to the mind of the child is through the eye." That is perfectly true. Why not then make the application first of all in our teaching of the Mass? These beautifully colored lantern-slides on the Mass will act like magnets; they will arrest and hold attention. Each action of the priest at the altar, once seen by the children, the questions "What's that?" and "Why is that?" will come spontaneously; then it will be a pleasure for the pastor and the teacher to do the rest. The instruction can be more easily and thoroughly given because of the interest awakened through the appeal to the eye by means of the artistic lantern-slides.

That this result can be successfully attained is vouched for by the present writer who has prepared a set of attractive lantern-slides explaining the Mass and Benediction. He knows by experience what a world of profit children and their elders too have drawn from seeing the pictures. The slides enable priests, Sisters and teachers to give those committed to their charge a thorough and easily grasped instruction on the ceremonies and liturgy of the Holy Sacrifice, and that is knowledge which every Catholic should, of course, possess.

GEORGE A. KEITH, S.J.

SOCIOLOGY

"Efficiency, the Uplift, and Jane Addams"

A BOSTONIAN whose chief defect is, very probably, that he takes the Transcript seriously, lately announced that he was "sick and tired of hearing about efficiency, the uplift, and Jane Addams." He was in constant apprehension, he said, that someone, possibly a new-fangled municipal commission, might be empowered to try out one or all of them upon him: and he had no desire to meet Jane Addams, or to be uplifted, or to be made, in any manner, efficient. Boy and man, he had lived in Boston for many years; all he asked in life's twilight, was to be let alone, and allowed to work out his civic salvation as prescribed by and provided for, in the several Constitutions of the United States and of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. Nevertheless, he felt harried. Whenever he saw anything resembling a banner with that triple device upon its folds, he crossed his fingers and fell to saying the Lord's Prayer backward. He took it to be the outward sign of a reformer, lurking in the offing, or at least, bringing up in the middle distance; and he hated reformers with all the holy hatred bestowed by Cotton Mather upon witches. They were strabismic persons, he thought, always going about poking their fingers into other people's eyes, seeking to locate a mote. But they knew nothing of beams. They were not dealers in lumber. They were reformers.

"Efficiency" in New York

I CONFESS to much sympathy with the hunted man from Boston. A similar chord has throbbed in my own heart. In her centuries of existence, this New York of ours has waged victorious battle against Indians, bears, Swedes, the Dutch, English, and psalm-singing Yankees from Wethersfield, Connecticut, but last November she scored her greatest triumph, in the complete rout of sundry reformers who have infested her wards these many weary months. In no American city has that species of Kultur which we dub "efficiency," a most excellent name for so ill a thing, been given a freer and fuller chance to work for the general "uplift." In no American city has "efficiency" registered a failure, more complete, palpable, and confessed. System, system, and yet more system, was adopted as a civic shibboleth until it seemed that the prime purpose of every city department was not so much to do the work entrusted by the city, as to babble about plans of doing it in a different way. While the police, to instance one department, took lessons in psychopathy and politeness, in the applied science of wire-tapping, and the fine art of pricing eggs at the corner grocery, the burglar insurance rates were advanced, and the city saw with shame, that although the police might easily be detailed to pry into the affairs of reputable citizens, against whom no crime was or could be charged, the murder of a child was met by them, first with indifference, and then with foul and dastardly words designed to cast shame on the white soul of an innocent little girl. In company with Mr. Homer Folks, now with the Red Cross in France, and of that eminent and high-minded uplifter, Mr. William J. Doherty, now relegated to private life, Mr. John A. Kingsbury, sometime Commissioner of Charities, could hold up sanctified hands of horror at the criminal negligence of our good Sisters and Brothers, at the very time that the Grand Jury was hearing how in a city institution a crowd of boys had murdered the engineer, by beating him about the head with shovels. Crowds of "experts" many of whom owed that dubious title to themselves alone, flocked rejoicingly to New York. For the crumbs were many, the pickings rich; and in Rule 12 of the Municipal Civil Service Commission was a clause which quite properly exempted very eminent persons from too searching an examination, and, indeed, could be easily construed to exempt from all examinations whatsoever.

Advertising the Violet

IN order to avoid the bushel, under which "efficiency, uplift and Jane Addams" regimes are doomed to quick decay, the aid of the shrinking and publicity-hating Commissioner of Accounts was secured. In his report for 1916, that gentleman relates how he told off an examiner in his office, to act as press-agent for the new administration, although it was well known, said the Evening Post, that in modesty, the late Mr. Mitchel made Wordsworth's violet scarcely distinguishable from a ten-acre lot, golden with flaunting Kansas sunflowers. Nevertheless, the scruples of this gentleman seem to have yielded to proper treatment; in fact, they gave way so completely that "special feature stories were prepared for the magazine sections of the Sunday newspapers" with admirable regularity. At the time the commissioner signed his report, he could boast, as one who had served his city well, that "under the foregoing plan, to date, 2,500 columns of daily and Sunday news stories" had been printed, "including 243 Sunday special stories, which have been given 29 full-page and 32 half-page spreads." This is a fairly complete breakdown of modesty, but it does not tell half the tale of the "publicity" given the late Mr. Mitchel through pamphlets, addresses, and bogus "town meetings," long before any thought of the campaign which ended in the rout of the "uplifters" had so much as occurred to the majority of New Yorkers.

The eminent "uplifters," one and all, connected with the late Mr. Mitchel's inglorious reign, were given full sway. They had the complete support of the local authorities, which, for most purposes is quite sufficient to secure a clear field, and in crises, there seemed to be no great difficulty in enlisting the favor of Albany. If they failed in practically everything they undertook, the result cannot be attributed to any lack of resources, financial or political. The simple fact is that their theories, submitted to the test, broke down.

Two Million Dollars for Tribute

BUT if the general conduct of public affairs in New York for the last four years, has closely resembled an uninterrupted riot of efficiency, the uplift and Jane Addamsism, no words have as yet been invented to describe fitly the campaign engineered by the "experts" in behalf of the late Mr. Mitchel. The basic principle of this orgy of political debauchery seems to have been that every man has his price. According to the District Attorney, several clergymen were induced to preach "election sermons," for so small a sum as $150.00, with $93.00 for clerk hire and stamps. The head of a quasi-ethical culture cult, who although lately divorced by his wife, still poses as an apostle of the higher life, is reported by the District Attorney to have received something less than $10,000. It is only just to record that this gentleman, by his own account, did not profit through the transaction by one penny. Most of the newspapers dipped unclean hands into the limitless stream of gold, and published fulsome panegyrics of all candidates who could pay the price; and with one exception, every New York newspaper burned incense in the august presence of the late Mr. Mitchel. The printers likewise rejoiced, for the whole city was disfigured with huge posters, depicting the late Mr. Mitchel in the military garb he so much loved, defending at peril of his young life, the city of New York against the ferocious onslaughts of the Tammany tiger. So vast and complicated were the expenditures, that even with the assistance of a corps of expert accountants, the District Attorney has not been able to discover all the sources and the precise distribution of the "slush fund." The contributors to that fund are drawn from the directorates of many large "interests," ranging from the Standard Oil Company of New York and the New York Central, to corporations with headquarters in New Jersey, and a manufacturing concern in Dayton, Ohio. Together these gentlemen raised about $2,000,000, incomparably the largest political fund ever used, even in an American national campaign. Following all this efficiency, the late Mr. Mitchel received about 150,000 votes, and with them, the most complete repudiation in the political history of the city. Finally, the Governor will probably order an investigation of the "slush fund," and the legislature is now considering the passage of a Corrupt Practices act. This is the crowning tribute to "efficiency" in New York.

Insult, Patronage and Corruption

THE truth is that "efficiency, the uplift, and Jane Addams" is as stupid as the devil himself. This is not a mild bit of profanity, allowed, except on Lenten ferials, even to the clergy, but what I take to be a simple fact. The devil might just as well give up, since he is never going to conquer Almighty God, and "efficiency" is quite as stupid, when it thinks, as it generally does, to win the generality of men by insulting, patronizing or corrupting them. The worst way to begin the conversion of any one worth converting, is to tell him, that, being altogether a very tremendous personage, you intend with much condescension to lift him out of the mud. If he does not hit you in the eye, he ought to; but at any rate, your words are not likely to make him a willing listener. While the late Mr. Mitchel was devoting much of his valuable time in publicly conceding the barest escape from the Alien and Sedition laws to certain horny-handed sons of toil, whose offspring never said a word about their patriotism, but demonstrated it by going to France, these same horny hands were raised to hide a yawn. When he proclaimed himself the one dyke, holding in check the vast flood of Germans, gangsters and gunmen, which theatened to inundate New York, it was only human nature that many should have resolved to put a hole in the dyke on November 6, just to see what would happen. All wisdom did not begin and end with the late Mr. Mitchel, but it was characteristic of a campaign conducted by "experts" to claim for him a sapiency equal to that of the genius who first taught Ivory Soap how to float. Nor did those good ladies who, from their Socony-fed limousines addressed the denizens of the hinterland south of Fourteenth Street, surpass the regular "experts" in their knowledge of the genus homo. How should you like to be called a dear, good person, and be bidden come right up to the nice, kind lady, to be instructed how to vote? I shall allow you one answer. Only one is needed, and if you live in New York, you probably made it on November 6.

Muppim, Huppim and Ard

AN English clergyman once complained that while his Sunday-school children knew all about Muppim and Huppim and Ard, they knew very little about the things that really count in the spiritual life. Efficiency, the uplift, and Jane Addams, are the Muppim and Huppim and Ard of the social service that seems in the ascendency in many localities today. In New York, it is to be hoped, that variety is now past history. There was once an artist who tried to paint the soul of Switzerland on the slender sticks of my lady's fan: his self-imposed task was light in comparison with that of the social science which bids the worker put the soul of a man on a bristol card. Forget that man is something more than a social unit, forget for one moment that he has an immortal soul, capable of high spiritual achievement as well as of an amazing amount of deviltry, if you give him a fair chance, and you are by so much unfit to suppress the evil and develop the good that is in him. As for the late Mr. Mitchel, "De mortuis," and so on. I greatly fear that Sir Philip Sidney, or Solomon, or George Washington himself would have fared no better, had they been handicapped by the almost unanimous backing of the New York press, together with the "earnest support" of efficiency, the uplift, Jane Addams, and Muppim and Huppim and Ard.

NOTE AND COMMENT

An Ideal Catholic Family

A TRUE Catholic home was that from which the young priest went forth who recently celebrated his first Solemn Mass at St. Teresa's Church, Stanley, N. Y., the Rev. W. D. Muckle. According to the account of the ceremony in the Rochester Democrat and Chronicle, he was assisted by his three brothers, the Rev. John E. Muckle, Ph.B., principal of St. Francis de Sales High School, Geneva; the Rev. Charles E. Muckle, S.T.B., superintendent of the Rochester Catholic High School, and the Rev. Joseph T. Muckle, C.S.B., M.A., professor of classics in the University of Toronto, Canada. Still a fourth brother is at present preparing for the priesthood at St. Michael's College, Toronto, and a fifth brother is a successful business man. Of his three sisters, one is dedicated to God by the religious vows. Let us hope that the happy parents who were privileged to witness this celebration will likewise behold their younger son, as the fifth priest in their family, lifting up in his consecrated hands the Sacred Body and Blood of Christ.

Knights of Columbus Work in France

THE Knights of Columbus war work, as the Columbiad informs us, is now successfully under way in France. The eight chaplains who first set sail were unable to render the spiritual ministration they had gone to bring to our soldiers because permission had not been secured for them at the time to work among the army units. This obstacle has been cleared away, and the priests are all engaged at their posts of duty.

> This chaplain force will be greatly augmented and it is expected that at least 200 Knights of Columbus chaplains will be sent to France in the near future. This will all take money, of course, but who dares to stop and think of expense in these days of stress, when the real spirit of sacrifice is abroad in the land, and every man is endeavoring to do his share for the welfare of humanity?

Priests and secretaries are needed and buildings must be erected. All Catholics should interest themselves in this important work. It is a consolation to know that their money can be given to their country in this most helpful, patriotic and religious way.

Our Soldiers Safer Than Our Babies

THE statement of G. E. Earnshaw that our soldiers in the field of battle are safer than our infants in the nurseries at home is startling but true. It is claimed that one out of every seven babies born dies before it is one year old. The yearly loss of the British expeditionary forces, owing to deaths in action and deaths from wounds, has been little more than two per cent. These statistics are confirmed by the figures of a London insurance company, which shows that out of 2,000,000 British soldiers insured the yearly deaths were thirty per 1,000. From this number ten per 1,000 must be deducted as the average normal mortality of men of the same age. Hence the conclusion of the writer:

> Out of 2,500,000 babies born every year in the United States more than 350,000 die before they are a year old. Of the same number of soldiers only 50,000 will die in a year as a result of their exposure to the risks of war. Terrible as is the toll of life exacted by war the losses suffered by our infant population, through improper foods and clothing, the ignorance of mid-wives, and—alas!—of mothers also, is yet more terrible. To our shame be it said that our soldiers on the field of battle are safer than our infants in their cradles.

Infant-welfare experts estimate that at least fifty per cent of these deaths are preventable. Adverse economic circumstances are often largely accountable for these conditions. There are sections of the country where infant mortality has been reduced to less than half the general average. Catholic parents should be carefully warned of this fact, and Catholic pastors also may be of great service in helping by their advice to preserve the lives of our little ones.

A Pioneer Catholic Educator

"THE glory of having discovered America," writes Marc F. Vallette in the American Catholic Quarterly Review, "of having established the first colonies, the first missions, the first colleges and seats of learning, and the first charitable institutions in North America, as well as in Central and South America, belongs entirely to Catholic effort." It is, however, particularly with the work of the early Spanish friars that the author is concerned. Many of these were men of eminent learning and some of noble lineage or even of royal blood. Among the latter was Peter of Ghent, a kinsman of Emperor Charles V. He deserves special mention among the earliest pioneers of American education as the founder of the Gran Escuela or "High School" of San Francisco, in Mexico.

> In this school were assembled some 1,000 children who received a religious and secular education. Later on he added Latin and vocal and instrumental music. Not satisfied with this, he founded a school of fine arts and of trades. The work performed by the pupils was utilized in decorating the churches; it consisted of pictures, wood-carvings, embroidery and occasionally of feather-work, for which the Indians were noted, and of many other objects used in Divine worship. Then, too, the work of the pupils was useful even in the building of churches, chapels and schools, for the trade school turned out painters, wood-carvers, stonecutters, plumbers, carpenters, tailors, shoemakers and other tradesmen. The good Brother looked after every one and directed everything. The work of this man was really wonderful when we consider time, place and resources. In addition to the school he founded and supported for many years a hospital for the sick natives. In a word, we may say he built a fine church, a hospital and an institution which served as an elementary school, or high school, a school for religious instruction, an academy of fine arts and a trade school.

Similar work was being accomplished by many of his brother friars upon American soil a century before Harvard College was opened in 1638. Too little is known and said of these facts. Can we blame non-Catholics for ignoring our rightful claims for precedence in almost everything American, if American Catholics themselves are often so little acquainted with their own glorious past?

Protestant Student Conference

THE International Student Volunteer movement, established in the interest of the Protestant foreign missions, recently held its conference at East Northfield, Mass. The purpose was thus announced:

> To bring together a limited but selected company of students, professors, student association secretaries and leaders of the missionary forces of North America; to consider together the altered world situation which now confronts the Christian Church; to face the responsibilities which these conditions have thrust upon the Christian forces in colleges and universities; to accept with humility and determination the obligations which rest upon the colleges and universities of North America for extending the kingdom of Christ among all nations and to pray unitedly for guidance and for strength equal to the task.

It was to the famous "Haystack Prayer Meeting" of five young Williams College students that the Protestant American foreign missions owed their birth in the summer of 1806. Through the direct influence of a student brotherhood the Protestant American Mission Board was organized in 1810, and two years later five men sailed for the East. With no misgivings therefore do we look forward to the glorious results that can be achieved by our own Catholic students' mission crusade, now begun in our Catholic academies, colleges and universities.

A Link with the "Apologia"

IT is a contribution to literary history, small perhaps, but interesting, to learn from the recently published letters of Newman, that Edward Lowth Badeley to whom "Verses on Various Occasions" is dedicated, must be counted among the prime reasons why the "Apologia" was written. Badeley was educated at Brasenose College, Oxford, where he took his degree in 1823. Called to the bar in 1841, his work was almost exclusively confined to ecclesiastical cases, and in 1852, not long after the famous Gorham case, in which he took part as one of counsel to the Bishop of Exeter, he became a Catholic. A friend of old Oxford days, it was to him, as to "a man about my own age, who lives out of the world of theological controversy, and whose intellectual habits especially qualify him for taking a clear and impartial view of the force of words," that Newman turned after reading Kingsley's astounding "apology." Badeley was a man of unusual force of character, and at that time had been living for ten years almost the life of a recluse, "devoting himself solely to the solution of the various legal difficulties attending the administration of Roman Catholic trusts and charities." Badeley, of course, could see nothing like an adequate apology for the insulting remarks which Kingsley had published in Macmillan's. "If he had ruled Kingsley's amende satisfactory," comment the Oratorian editors of the new collection of Newman's letters, "the 'Apologia' in all probability would never have been written."

Philippine Progress

THE Philippine Islands are making the progress usual under so-called Liberal governments. On the first and second days of the sessions of the Assembly last year, two very significant bills were introduced. The first provided for the taxation of all churches, the money accruing therefrom being destined to help sustain the public schools; the second bill declares that hereafter civil marriage shall be the only legal and valid marriage in the Islands. Shortly after the introduction of these measures the Senate judiciary committee returned to the Upper House a report on the proposed amendments to the divorce bill with a recommendation that it be approved. The amendments consist of ten additional causes for divorce. Last year well-founded information had it that the Governor General refused his signature to a divorce bill because it was not "broad" enough to suit his taste. The new provisions leave little to be desired by a taste ever so depraved. A further sign of progress is had in the enactment proposed by Representative Morales of Ilocos Sur, who, apparently alarmed at the diminishing birth-rate, offers a bounty for children, providing amongst other things that the fourth child shall be given a college education gratis. Bachelors of forty years and over are to be taxed; so too are spinsters over thirty-five years of age, and married couples who are childless after eight years of married life are to pay an annual fine. Altogether the blessings of modern civilization are descending thick and fast on the Philippines.

Death of Bishop Foley of Detroit

THE death of Bishop John S. Foley of Detroit, took place January 4. He had reached the advanced age of eighty-four years and was Bishop of Detroit for twenty-nine years. For more than a quarter of a century he had been a prominent figure in the Catholic world until the physical strain made the appointment of a coadjutor bishop necessary, the Rt. Rev. Edward D. Kelly being raised to this responsible position as Auxiliary Bishop of Detroit. Bishop Foley was born in Baltimore, Md., on November 5, 1833, made his ecclesiastical studies at St. Mary's Seminary in that city and subsequently at Rome, where he was the first American student at Apollinaris. He was ordained priest December 20, 1856, by Cardinal Patrizi. His brother, Bishop Thomas Foley, was administrator of Chicago from 1870 to 1879. He himself was named the fourth Bishop of Detroit, and was consecrated November 4, 1888, by Archbishop Gibbons of Baltimore. In 1907, on the occasion of the golden jubilee of his priesthood, the clergy and laity of the city presented him with St. Francis Home for Orphan Boys, built at a cost of $250,000. The Catholic population of the Detroit diocese grew under his administration to 386,000 souls, ministered to by 311 priests. Besides a seminary for Polish students there are six colleges and academies for boys and five academies for girls. The pupils in the parish schools number 42,839.

The War.—Neither on the western front nor along the Italian lines has the week been marked by any action of more than local importance. There were raids by the Canadian troops on the German trenches north of Lens and intermittent patrol engagements with the enemy near Méricourt, southeast of Lens. On the left bank of the Meuse, on the Verdun front, there was a steady artillery duel.

On the Italian front the severest fighting took place in the north, in the region of Monte Asolene, where the Italians endeavored to straighten out their lines north of Osteria il Lepre to the head of the Cesilla Valley. On the lower Piave a series of attacks and counter-attacks took place for the possession of the Capo Sile bridgehead, with the advantage finally resting with the Italian troops. According to Berlin, the fighting nowhere yielded the enemy any substantial gain.

The British admiralty has announced that the Turkish cruiser, Midullu, formerly the German cruiser Breslau, was sunk, and that the Sultan Yawuz Selim, formerly the German cruiser Goeben, was put out of action in an encounter with British ships by being driven into mine fields on Sunday, January 20, at the entrance of the Dardanelles. The English losses were the monitor Raglan and a small monitor, the M-28. Other items of interest are the resignation of the Austrian cabinet, the abrupt withdrawal of Carson from the British cabinet, and the controversy between President Wilson and the United States Senate over a new War Cabinet.

On January 16, owing to the coal famine, an order was issued, with the approval of the President, by the Fuel Administrator Dr. H. A. Garfield, directing practically all industries, with the exception of those engaged in supplying materials under contract to the Government, in the production of food-stuffs and munitions, to suspend for the period of five days beginning Friday morning, January 18, and to remain closed on the Mondays of each week from January 28 to March 25 inclusive. The order, admittedly the most drastic economic measure adopted by any of the nations in the war, and adopted against general protest, provides substantially as follows:

The Garfield Fuel Order

Until further official order, persons selling fuel shall give preference to orders for necessary requirements, of railroads; of domestic consumers, hospitals, charitable institutions and cantonments; of public utilities, telephones and telegraph plants; of ships and vessels for bunker purposes; of the United States for strictly governmental purposes; of municipal, county or State Governments for necessary public uses; of manufacturers of perishable food or of food for necessary immediate consumption. On Januuary 18, 19, 20, 21 and 22, 1918, no fuel shall be delivered to any person, firm, association, or corporation, until requirements in the foregoing list shall have been fulfilled. On the dates mentioned and also on each and every Monday, beginning January 21, 1918, and continuing to March 25, 1918, inclusive, no manufacturing plant shall burn fuel or use power derived from fuel for any purposes except—(1) Such plants as from their nature must be operated seven days continuously to avoid serious injury to machinery; (2) Manufactories of perishable foods; (3) Manufactories of foods not perishable and not in immediate demand which may burn fuel to such extent as is authorized by the Fuel Administrator (or his representatives) of the State in which the plant is located, upon application by the United States Food Administrator; (4) Printers or publishers of daily papers may burn fuel as usual excepting on every Monday from January 21 to March 25, 1918, inclusive, on which days they may burn fuel to such an extent as is necessary to issue such editions of papers as are customarily issued on important national legal holidays: where such papers do not issue any edition on a holiday, they are permitted to issue one edition on said Mondays: (5) Printing establishments may burn fuel on January 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, to such extent as is necessary to issue current magazines and other publications periodically issued.

On each Monday, beginning January 21, 1918, up to March 25, 1918, no fuel shall be burned (except to prevent injury to property) for the purpose of supplying heat for: (1) Any business or professional offices, except offices used by the United States, State, county or municipal governments, transportation companies, public utility companies, banks or trust companies, physicians or dentists; (2) Wholesale or retail stores, except under certain conditions, those where medical and drug supplies and food are sold; (3) Theaters and places of amusement, and places where liquor is sold. On the above-mentioned Mondays, no fuel-power shall be allowed for the movement of surface, subway, etc., transportion, in excess of the amount used the Sunday previous thereto. These orders are effective in all the territory of the United States, east of the Mississippi, including Louisiana and Minnesota.

The order is not popular. The New York World calls it "the greatest disaster that has befallen the United States in the war. Unless it is revoked it means the loss of hundreds of millions of dollars in wages and in products, and a demoralization in industry that can be nothing short of calamitous." To the New York Sun, it is "the fruit of the inane, criminal starvation of the railroads by the Government for a generation" but "it is to be greeted without protest" for a "surgeon is more welcome than an undertaker." The Tribune accuses the Fuel Administrator of having lost his head. The Herald qualifies the act as a "blow between the eyes of business." The St. Louis Globe-Democrat and the Providence Journal recognize in the act a confession and an evidence of incompetency. The Wheeling Register declares that "it is justified by the prevailing conditions." It will bring the country to a realization of the fact, "that we are in this war to win, and that upon the people as well as upon the soldiers rest the nation's chances of victory." The Charleston News and Courier writes, "It is an exhibition of Federal power such as this country has never witnessed until now." The Portland (Me.) Press thinks that it will be regarded in the East as "an acknowledgment of the temporary collapse of the Administration at Washington," an admitted failure to cope with the situation. The Albany Knickerbocker Press thinks that it will give Germany renewed hope and "much comfort." The New Orleans Times-Picayune believes that it will cause far greater alarm than the conditions warrant.

In a message to the Russian people and an appeal to the inhabitants of the Central Powers, published on January 15, the British Labor Party announced that the British people accepted the Russian principle of self-determination of peoples, and no annexations or indemnities for the British Empire, especially in the Middle East, Africa and India. At the same time the British Laborites adjured the peoples of the Central Empires "to declare themselves or make their Governments speak for them in answer to Russia and ourselves." The document declared that dynastic interests, or class interests or desire to dominate other classes or nationalities "must no more be suffered to prevent self-determination in Central Europe, and thereby imperil it in Europe as a whole, than the interests of British imperialism or British capitalism must be suffered to do elsewhere."

British Laborites Accept Bolshevik Terms

The message put the blame of the rupture of the Brest-Litvosk negotiations on the fact that the Germans refused to recognize the principle of self-determination of peoples and of no annexations. "In thus acting," it said, "the Central Powers are acting clearly in the interest of a militaristic State." In applying the Russian principle to their own case, the members of the Labor party profess themselves conscious of the problem involved, but declare that they will not shrink from it. In the message the following significant passage occurs:

> We wish to remind the Russian people that Great Britain, taught by the loss of the American colonies in the eighteenth century, was the first modern State to grant complete self-determination to any group of its inhabitants, for example, the Dominions of Canada, Australia, South Africa, and New Zealand. We accept the principle also for India and other dependencies of the British Empire, though we believe that the record of the British Government here gives little occasion for reproach.

The moderation and the principles of broad and liberal policy of the document have been well received.

An official statement from Berlin, via London, issued on January 17, containing the reply of the Central Powers to the Russian proposals made at Brest-Litovsk, declares that the Russian proposals with regard to the territory occupied by the Central Powers diverge to such a degree from the views held by the latter that in their present form they are unacceptable, and that while the war lasts, Germany and Austria find it impossible to withdraw their troops. With regard to the question of national "self-determination," the document of the Central Powers, says:

Germany Rejects the Russian Terms

> The assertion that the right of self-determination is an attribute of nations and not of parts of nations, is not our conception of the right of self-determination. Parts of nations can justly conclude independence and separation. It is by no means assumed, however, that limits of occupation are to be taken as the standard for fixing the boundaries of such portions.
> Courland, Lithuania, and Poland also constitute national units from a historical point of view. Germany and Austria-Hungary have no intention of incorporating territories now occupied by them into their respective countries. They do not intend to compel the territories in dispute to accept this or that form of state, but they reserve for themselves and for the peoples of occupied territories a free hand for the conclusion of treaties of every kind. As to the declarations in this respect they pass over the fundamental differences which the constituted delegations are repeatedly pointing out. . . . The Russian proposal is not sufficiently clear in detail and necessitates further explanation. However, it is admitted without further argument that with the progressive approach of a general peace chosen representatives of the people of the country will cooperate to an ever-increasing extent in administrative tasks. The allied (Teutonic) delegations are prepared to agree in principle that the peoples' vote on broad lines be sanctioned on the basis of citizenship. The setting up of a referendum appears to be impracticable. In the opinion of the allied delegations it would suffice if a vote on a wide basis were taken from an elected and supplemented representative body.
> It may also be pointed out that the setting up of States within the former Russian Imperial Empire recognized by the Government of the People's Commissaries, such, for instance, as the Ukraine and Finland, was brought about, not in the way of a referendum but by resolutions by a National Assembly elected on a wide basis.

The document states that the Governments of Austria-Hungary and Germany make these proposals in all sincerity, but adds that they represent the extreme limits within which they still hope to come to an understanding.

France.—Sensational disclosures continue to be made in the case of Caillaux. The State Department at Washington has published intercepted messages sent by former Ambassador Count von Bernstorff to Berlin, which show that the former Premier of France was in communication with German agents in Argentina, and that he was recommended for courteous treatment and consideration in the event of the ship on which he sailed from Argentina being captured by a German submarine, that he welcomed indirect courtesies from Bernstorff, and that he was under suspicion by the French Government. Incidentally the despatches throw light on the devious ways of modern diplomacy. Concomitantly with the publication of the Washington disclosures the Giornale d'Italia made known the contents of documents found in a safe-deposit box in Florence which had been rented to Caillaux. According to this journal, among other papers there was found a sketch in Caillaux's handwriting of the political program he proposed to carry out, should he again be called to the Premiership. President Poincaré, and all recent political leaders, including M. Briand, were to be arrested. General Sarrail, well known for his active participation in the spy system which was used to discredit the Catholics at the time of the Dreyfus scandal, was to be made commander-in-chief of the French army. The Chamber was to give Caillaux absolute power with which he was to force the dissolution of the Senate and the Chamber and bring about a popular referendum on a peace treaty. Finally a new régime was to be inaugurated in France, limiting the powers of the Senate and the Chamber, but preserving the republican form of government.

The former Premier was arrested on January 14 and was taken to the Santé prison, where he is now in custody. In the same prison are Bolo Pasha and others who were connected with the Almereyda and the Bonnet Rouge affairs and are charged with trafficking or communicating with the enemy. The charges against Caillaux formulated by General Dubail, the Military Governor of Paris, are that he has been guilty of an attempt against the security of the State by connecting himself with intrigues of a nature to compromise the alliance of France with a foreign Power; of trafficking with the enemy; and of carrying on "defeatist" propaganda.

The arrest of Caillaux has caused a great sensation in Paris, and it is expected that the trial will precipitate a political struggle of the greatest importance. The Chamber supported the action of the Government when M. Clemenceau was charged by Socialist deputies with having arrested Caillaux illegally. The vote sustaining the Government stood 274 to 210. The former Premier's friends are making efforts to have him tried by the High Court instead of the military tribunal.

Among the Catholics of France there is universal jubilation over the taking of Jerusalem. Speaking in the Cathedral of Notre Dame at Paris before a huge throng gathered to render thanks to God for the deliverance of the Holy City, Cardinal Amette voiced the sentiments of all Christians when he said:

French Catholics and Jerusalem

> After seven centuries is realized that which Saint Louis and the Crusaders failed to achieve. The Cross is once again triumphant in the place where it was raised for the redemption of the world. Christian Powers again take possession of the inalienable domain acquired for them by the Blood of Jesus Christ, and whilst ready to respect the consciences of those who are strangers to their Faith, they are determined never to allow themselves to be deprived of it again. France is there by the side of England, her great ally, and of Italy, her sister; she has her place, one which she could not renounce without abdicating her age-long right and her noblest traditions.

The future of Palestine is attracting much attention, and it is noticeable that those who are pleading for religious toleration are Catholics. Not only has the Archbishop of Paris declared that the consciences of those not of the Faith should be respected, but Mgr. Baudrillart, the distinguished rector of the Institut Catholique, has stated the same principle in still more precise terms. Prefacing his solution of the situation by the remark that the final settlement must rest with the Governments, he said:

> I may say in general that all Catholics have the same thought and desire: from the religious point of view, they make no demand whatever that those who do not share the Faith should be debarred from the practice of their own religious beliefs. With regard to the Jews we are the first to recognize that they have the right to have their liberty of conscience fully respected. We are not unmindful that the very grandeur of Jerusalem came originally from them, and that they have not failed to proclaim in the face of paganism their belief in the one God.

Mgr. Baudrillart went on to show that the political domination of the Holy City by the Jews rested merely on hypothetical grounds, which would not be changed no matter how numerous the influx of Hebrews; they could hope at most to share the rights enjoyed by others. For the Mussulman Arabs he claimed the same toleration. Whatever might be the final settlement, he declared that the Christians, whose armies had entered Jerusalem, should retain possession of it. France, he hoped, would continue the protectorate to which the Syrians and Maronites were accustomed, and which had hitherto been exercised in virtue of a special grant of the Holy See and traditional privileges.

Ireland.—During the course of a speech delivered recently in Galway, Mr. de Valera spoke at length on the plans of Sinn Fein. According to the Weekly Freeman he

Sinn Fein's Ambition

> Dealt with the government of Ireland by England, the sacrifices which were necessary to win reforms, the statements of English Ministers in regard to the position of small nationalities, a speech delivered by Mr. Redmond in 1902 in connection with the coronation of King Edward; the progress of the Sinn Fein movement, and the question of the representation of Ireland at the peace conference.

The temper of the speech and the party can be estimated by these excerpts:

> After speaking of the fact that, as Chancellor Plunkett had stated, the Union was a nullity and did not deserve any obedience from Irishmen, and that there had been no Constitution in the country since England robbed Ireland of her own Constitution, this man (Mr. Redmond) stated:
> "Never for one single hour since the Union has Ireland been a constitutionally governed country. Never for one hour has the Sovereign of England been the Constitutional Sovereign of Ireland. Ireland, in effect, has, since 1800, been governed as a Crown Colony with certain empty forms and pretenses of constitutionalism. Never for one single hour has the English Government of Ireland obtained the assent or approval or confidence of the people of Ireland. Never for one single hour have the elected representatives of the majority of the Irish people had the control of even a potent voice in the government of their country. Never for one hour has the English Government of Ireland rested upon anything but naked force and unabashed corruption. Never for one hour has the British Constitution been in force in this country, whose own Constitution was destroyed. In 100 years 87 Coercion acts have been passed in spite of the protests of the Irish members; there have been martial law, the suspension of the Habeas Corpus, the suspension of trial by jury, and suppression of free trade. No single reform, large or small, has ever been obtained by purely constitutional methods."

Those words were spoken by the leader of what was called the Constitutional party in Ireland—by Mr. John Redmond—in 1902, when Mr. Redmond had an inkling of what Sinn Fein meant, because the occasion on which that speech was delivered was the crowning of King Edward VII. The loyal Imperialist party thought it well at that time, instead of going over to London to participate in the rejoicing that accompanied the crowning of King Edward, to stay in the City Hall of Dublin to show the world that King Edward was not a constitutional monarch in Ireland, and to make it clear to the world that Ireland did not regard English laws and English institutions as deserving of the obedience of Irishmen.

That was Sinn Fein in 1902. That was before the Irish party lost their backbone and before they got corrupted by the English atmosphere. When you read these things you find it very difficult to believe that men who were capable of thinking as those men thought fourteen or fifteen years ago could be in earnest or serious when they attack our policy today. That is why I, for one, find it so hard to believe that it is not merely party interests that are making them abuse us today.

De Valera then urged his listeners to make it clear to the world that their ambition is that of the race in the past, the ambition of being an independent sovereign nation, a nation among nations. Ireland's most urgent task, he declared, is to convince the world that the whole country is as Roscommon, Longford, Kilkenny and Clare. In this way entrance to the peace conference will be gained. Great progress in this direction has already been made, so much indeed that when England speaks of the freedom of small nations, she is met with the question: "What about Ireland?" In the end De Valera urged the people to put the freedom of the country above themselves, and he petitioned them to sweep Parliament clear of the Nationalists, at the first opportunity.

Little is known in Ireland about the progress of the Convention. The Irish Weekly Independent for December 29 prints the following statement from Sir Horace Plunkett:

There have been no unnecessary delays in the Convention; any delay that has been caused is to be explained by one consideration only, and that is that every member of the Convention is determined to do his utmost to arrive at a settlement which will come in under the definition of a substantial agreement. Everybody knows that the Irish question was never a single political problem, and that all political problems are far more complicated and difficult at this stage in the world's history than he (Sir Horace) supposed they had ever been before.

We are making progress. We have agreed on many things. There are some things on which we have not agreed. I cannot tell you yet that we will be able to present a unanimous end of our deliberations. We shall leave the Irish question better than we found it, because we shall have agreed on many reports. I can tell you that those who have to complete the task which we may have left unfinished will find that they have a much simpler work to do than we had.

Perhaps I might mention one detail. Part of our work, and our most troublesome work, is trying to untangle the problem of the completion of land purchase . . . but the work that has been done by the sub-committee of the Convention upon that problem is very likely to produce a solution that the country will approve. The report of the sub-committee has still got to be debated in full session, but the many experts on the subject I have consulted are quite as pleased as I am at the results so far attained. I will ask you to have patience with the Convention, and not to believe everything you hear about it. It is perfectly true we have been often on the rocks, and probably shall be on the rocks again, but there are always tugs lying by ready to pull us off. We will get off somehow, and I myself am very hopeful of the ultimate result.

Though this looks hopeful some American papers recently declared that so far the Convention has been a failure.

The Pope's Christmas Allocution

Rome.—The discourse of the Holy Father in answer to the Christmas greeting addressed to him in the name of the Sacred College of Cardinals by its Dean, Cardinal Vannutelli, is characterized by intense sadness. Referring to the failure of his peace proposals, the Pope declared that he had merely gathered together the principal points of agreement which had been given official publication by the various nations and proposing them to the heads of the belligerents, he had but one motive in so doing, namely, to facilitate the consummation which is the object of every heart's desire. The refusal of the nations to listen to him, and the suspicions and calumny to which he had been subjected made him realize that he had been set for a sign which should be contradicted, but in spite of all this he expressed the hope that the seed sown, like that in the Gospel, was only passing through the process of disintegration, and would yet bear fruit.

There is an eloquent passage in the address in which he proclaims his determination to carry on the pacific mission of Jesus Christ, and declares that no obstacle and no danger, so far as he can see, will be able to make him fail in his duty, as the representative of the Prince of Peace. With his eyes wide open to the full extent of the tragedy, the paroxism of mutual destruction, and the impending suicide of Europe, the Holy Father views the situation with the vision of faith, and invites the nations to turn from the official impiety and the atheism, masquerading under the guise of civilization, to which must ultimately be traced the responsibility for the war.

"Art as a Religion"

JAMES J. WALSH, M. D., PH.D.

NOT long since I quoted the distinguished president of the most numerously attended university in this country to the effect that a great many professors take advantage of whatever prestige their positions afford them to carry on proselytism of various kinds both within the student body and before the general public. The worst offenders in this regard have probably been the assistant professors and the lecturers. It takes a young man calmly to tell the world that it never knew anything before his time and knows very little today, but that there is a chance to learn something by availing itself of the opportunity of drinking in knowledge at its fountainhead by listening to the lessons he has to teach. These remarks are made apropos of a lecture given by an associate professor of the simple, and usually quite inoffensive, subject of English.

It is often assumed that the sole danger of a secular university is to be found in the departments of philosophy and science. It is rarely suspected that even the chair of English language and literature can be turned into a pulpit from which thoughts on everything, from morality to mysticism and from sin to Satan, can be preached. In fact, it matters little what subject a man may teach. He can avail himself of any topic as a medium for the propaganda of heterodox views.

It was at the second most numerously attended university of this country and on the occasion of a popular lecture that the assistant professor of English proceeded to discuss "Art as a Religion." He began by suggesting that "The four chief offsprings [I do not like the word, it is his] of the spirit of man are philosophy, science, religion, art." He went on to say, with an assurance that is disturbing even though many may to a considerable extent agree with him, that: "It is beyond contention that the constitution of society today is most woefully unsatisfactory. Our cities are jungles. . . . Animals in the jungle may kill each other for food; but they do not kill each other to provide their females with sealskin coats and ropes of pearls or themselves with whiskey and tobacco." He then proposed to review "the activities of the spirit of man in the hope that however small may be the results we can achieve, we will do something to clarify the issues for friendliness sake and for decency sake on earth and for God's sake at large." There are many people just now, from Mr. Wells up and down, who are inclined to think that God has been neglecting His work in the universe and that they could set Him right. Most of them, curiously enough, seem to be of the class which has only recently discovered that there is a God.

In the article under stricture the four achievements of the spirit of man, philosophy, science, religon, art, are then called up in order, to see whether any of them can be helpful. "Philosophy is taken first because it has least to offer, of ready serviceableness in every-day affairs. Philosophy is the product of the garden and the closet rather than the street. It requires leisure and indulgence in order to arrive at its best results." Poor philosophy then is thrust aside as unserviceable and her younger sister science is summoned to see whether she has anything more hopeful to offer.

It will surely be disturbing to those who have been very proud of our recent progress in science and thankful for the help it has given us "in the struggle with our natural enemies particularly our ancient and relentless foes, space and time," to read of the place of science in life.

> Science, according to the lecturer, is a prostitute in the street [I fear that I do not like the figure very well, for while a man may call a spade a spade he need not call it a blank shovel], ready to serve at the bidding of any brute who wants its services. All that science has done remedially or constructively in the world does not equal a tenth of its power for mischief. It has promoted comfort, but not security. At the present moment science is mainly figuring as the mailed glove on the fist of brute force in the world.

The assistant professor in English insists that "Science before all the other activities of our so-called civilization will need to be brought to account and subjected to a control that so far it has never been subjected to." It is refreshing to have authority vindicated and to have thus pointed out the necessity for the control of men and their discoveries. Such wisdom generally comes from other sources.

Then comes the turn of religion. The professor confesses that "Whether there is anything to be hoped for from religion depends on what we mean by religion. Religion is rapidly becoming in the world today a state of abstraction like metaphysics. It has nothing to do with the practice of life." Life has become the mere exemplification of the struggle for existence and the devil takes the hindmost.

> Religion is in a painful state of straddle. It stands neither for God nor Caesar but compromises on both. It is in that dichotomy, in that condition of moral paralysis that the ineffectiveness of modern religion lies. Between the rival claims of God and mammon our clerics come to grief rather dolefully.

Religion, he holds, as now understood by a great many people, and especially the intelligent rich, is something that is useful mainly in making people satisfied with their lots, no matter how hard those lots may be. "Civilization was once defined to me by a young millionaire, a generous and well-disposed young man, as the 'game of keeping the under dog from knowing he is the under dog.'" Just why the word civilization should be in the galley with religion is not so clear.

What is surprising, of course, is that such a parody or caricature should be taken to signify religion. Here is a teacher talking seriously about religion and yet without an understanding of his subject. Doubtless a smattering of some evangelical sectarianism was given him when he was young, perhaps he has read a religious book or two since then, and now considers himself qualified to speak authoritatively. It would be safe to wager that this young man, for he is mentally young and has all the refreshing audacity of youth no matter how old he may be in years, has never read a Catholic book. I know, of course, that Catholic books are dangerous to read. The professor of history at Luther's own university of Halle-Wittenberg read a single Catholic book and became a convert to Catholicism. I refer to Professor von Ruville, who had written several books on older German history and modern English history, and yet confessed that he had never read a Catholic book. He thought that he perfectly understood the Catholic position. He had learned about it from those outside of the Church; why, then, should he read Catholic books? Yet it would have been well for this young man to have read some Catholic literature before summing up modern religion and calmly rejecting it as deficient. However, the rejection was cleverly done. His talk bristles with smart expressions. There is an aphoristic summarizing of modern tendencies that would be particularly attractive for young minds. What they want above all is formulas that represent short cuts to conclusions which make them feel that they are thinking. Thinking is rare enough in the modern time. We read too much to give time to thought. Yet people like to imagine they are thinking, for to such aphoristic expressions are particularly welcome, and they would find the associate professor's summary conclusions very attractive.

Having summed up philosophy, science, and religion, and shown that they are of no service, "art remains." Herein, the professor believes, lies our only hope.

> Men decide and act by the art that is in them. . . . Here is no preaching Jesus and practising Mrs. Grundy. Art speaks with a full voice. She does not look askance and purse her lips like a village gossip and speak slander amiably; though sometimes—as in Wilde, Whistler, Beardsley—she may speak the truth with too sharp a flavor of malevolence.

Art is then the hope of the world, though the worthy lecturer confessed that it speaks not by the book, but by the response of the sympathetic and nervous system. Art is paramount and art for art's sake must not be gainsaid. Truth is not indecent. The all-sufficient law for the government and judgment of art is that, if it be intrinsically honest and truthful, it cannot be immoral. The great apostles of art for this teacher of literature are of course the literary men rather than the painters. He has named them: Tolstoy, Shaw, Ibsen, Moore, Wilde. Unfortunately some of the works of these literary artists have been "arbitrarily seized and suppressed in the blessed and holy name of public decency as understood by our censors and our purity leagues." "Their labors have been ruthlessly seized by the minions and myrmidons of perfunctory morality, its property rights trampled and invaded on, the fruit of its honesty and possibly of years of toil confiscated."

So this young man tells the world how it shall be saved through art. No wonder that the word sophimore, which originally meant a contentious young student intent on arguing, the old sophister of the Greeks, gradually came to be changed to the spelling sophomore which now brings it closely in touch, etymologically, with the Greek sophos and moros, meaning "wise-foolish." Someone defined a "highbrow" as "a person who has more education than he has intelligence for." Such is the affliction of many of our young people today. But it is surprising that a great university should permit propaganda work of this kind to be carried on under the aegis of its name and its prestige. The university in question has established a series of popular lectures which are supposed to enable the public to understand the latest opinions regarding progress in the various branches of the university life. This species of sophomoric exhibition is little calculated to do any good to anyone, least of all to the university. Unfortunately young folks are attracted by such sensational expressions of opinion and are tempted to think that there must be some reason for them, and above all that they indicate progress. In reality they represent nothing more than the old-fashioned protests against conservatism and the well-known attempt to substitute sentimentality for religion.

Conscription in Ireland

WILLIAM J. M. A. MALONEY, M.D.

THE propaganda methods of those whom fate has made physically or mentally kin to Viscount Northcliffe no more astonish us. But a few weeks ago even non-Northcliffe newspapers in England began to fill with Irish news, so uniform in nature, and so unanimous in purpose, as to raise the fear that Bolo had escaped from France. This Boloism may have been wholly unrelated to the official announcement in November that the Government had just allotted £200,000 ($1,000,000) for war purposes to Sir Edward Carson.

The anti-Irish propaganda was directed toward the alienation of the world's sympathy from Ireland. Day after day, Ireland was pictured as a prosperous land, teeming with food, full of fine fighting material, and callous to the world's sufferings. No action was suggested to commandeer the fabled stores of food but a campaign for conscription in Ireland was begun, and carried on with increasing intensity until now it is fast reaching its climax.

As the demand for fighting men on the western front not merely remains insatiable but becomes ever more urgent in spite of the utmost military thrift, the newspaper campaign for conscription in Ireland bears the aspect of being a constructive military measure to promote that success in the war which we so much desire. And among the uniformed and uninformed war-weary people in England, as ignorant of history as they are of Sanskrit, there is the consciousness of unity with Ireland which is expressed in the designation of "The United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland," a consciousness from which springs as natural a resentment against the unconscripted Irish, as a smarting curtailed dog may reasonably feel against its more or less fortunate uncurtailed fellow.

The Redmondites, and those who dread the danger which will attend the enforcement of the draft in Ireland, plead that Ireland has already contributed nearly 200,000 men to the Allied cause; that over 600,000 men of Irish blood are in the Allied forces; and that Ireland needs her men to supply England with food. But this plea is not debatable, for even Canada supplied proportionately nearly the same quota as Ireland but nevertheless adopted conscription and the selective draft in Ireland would exempt the farmers needed to ensure the food supply of England.

The Sinn Fein or Republican party through their leader, Mr. de Valera, declared recently at Mohill, that the Irish are as ready now as they have always been to aid the oppressed in every land, and that if this is to be a war truly for the liberation of small nationalities, let England but give an earnest of her sincerity of purpose by granting freedom to Ireland, and another half-million Irishmen will go to fight in Flanders. An analogous statement was made on behalf of the Boers—the majority of whom are also seeking to regain their freedom now, through their spokesman, Mr. Hertzog. The conquered white nationalities of the British Empire, the Irish, the Boers, and the French, are more acutely interested in resisting their own suppression within that Empire than in surrendering what is still left to them of nationality, for the sake of conserving and aggrandizing that Empire. Yet recent dispatches from Ireland state that thousands of young Irishmen have asked for passports to enable them to join the American army.

Every Irish Republican is, ipso facto, a conscientious objector to imperial conscription, whether enacted by the British Parliament in London, or by the mandate of a British appointed body in Dublin. Lord Wimborne, the Viceroy of Ireland, complains that all are conscientious objectors in Ireland. Lord Derby laments the military cost of handling the 3,000 conscientious objectors in England. There are, at least, 250,000 enrolled Republicans in Ireland. To manage them, the British army of occupation in Ireland would need to be increased; that increased army would be a further drain on the Allies' scant supplies, and its activities would mar the moral righteousness of the Allied cause. Conscription in Ireland would, therefore, hinder the war.

But apart from the effect upon the war, conscription in Ireland is advocated by the English Imperialists who reason somewhat as follows: "The British Empire is at war. Ireland is part of that Empire and shares its privileges and glories. There is conscription in Britain, Jamaica, New Zealand, and Canada. Ireland also must share the responsibilities of the Empire. Ireland must be conscripted." To these Imperialists, who have abolished the power of parliament in England and themselves wield the executive power, conscription is a measure to consolidate the Empire, to extend the principle of unity of sacrifice within the Empire, on behalf of the Empire, to the recalcitrantly separatist colony of Ireland.

According to Irish Republicans, England is the Empire for she, alone, exerts imperial authority; she, alone, controls imperial affairs; she, alone, has the power of peace and war; and the Empire is exploited almost solely for the good of the English ruling class. Ireland neither enjoys nor desires imperial privileges: and Ireland's share of imperial glory is the wooden cross on the battlefields of the Empire. England's wars are not Ireland's wars. England, by her execution of the Dublin rebels, showed that Ireland held within the British Empire the position of a land whose people were more alien and more subject, and therefore, more liable to repressive measures, than the Boers in the De Wet rebellion of 1914. Ireland wants to sever all connection with this Empire, ruled by the old and the fat and the selfish: so the Republicans have united to establish a new order in which youth will sacrifice itself only for the common good, that national right may triumph over alien might, and that in unity of suffering the people of Ireland may strive to elevate the spirit of the nation till it becomes once again an inspiration to the world. Thus the Republicans reason.

The Imperialists incited the British army to mutiny at the Curragh in 1914; fomented the Carson rebellion, which was one of the Kaiser's incentives to this war; and imperiled the success of the war that they had thus helped to provoke, by diverting from France that army which now occupies Ireland, together with machine-guns, armored cars, and artillery, all to keep Ireland articulated to England.

It is perhaps an accident that Lord Lansdowne's peace proposals and the proposal to conscript the Irish synchronized so closely with the announcement that the Irish Convention had reached an agreement which was about to be made public. Lord Lansdowne, who is also Baron of Kerry and a great landowner in Ireland, was instrumental in defeating the scheme that Lloyd George devised, a scheme by which certain counties in Ulster were partitioned from the rest of Ireland where a form of Home Rule was to be enforced, a scheme the Redmondites accepted shortly after the Dublin rising. Rather than countenance any measure of Home Rule for Ireland, Lord Lansdowne, who had earlier been undismayed, if not encouraged by the Carson rebellion, resigned from the Cabinet. By his action then he withdrew his services from the British Government in the extremity of its struggle against Germany. He became the leader of "The Lose-the-War Imperialists," the group of English Imperialists who, with the Carsonites, would risk the loss of the war against Germany rather than see England's hold upon Ireland relax. His recent peace gesture indicated that in the interests of the British Empire he and his followers deemed it desirable that the war should now end. The grant of some form of self-government to Ireland was confessed by Mr. Lloyd George, when the Irish Convention was proposed, to be a matter of expediency, a war measure. The end of the war would, of course, remove the need for this particular war measure. Any Irish executive that might result from the labors of the Irish Convention would in a conscripted Ireland hold power solely by grace of the British army of occupation, an impossible condition for national government. So if the war may not now end there is still the hope of conscription in Ireland to defeat automatically any form of government in Ireland upon which the Convention has decided.

The result of this agitation to introduce conscription into Ireland will therefore afford an index to the war aims at present dominant in England, an index which will be almost as illuminating with regard to the future as the secret treaties published by the Bolsheviki were to the past. The treatment of Ireland now will serve as a barometer to the state of democracy in England, from which may be forecast the English spirit which will prevail at the Peace Conference, where democracy is to be made safe for the world, as well as the spirit in which the British Empire is henceforth to be organized. For no matter what concessions distance and expediency have commanded hitherto, even the most independent and remote colony must ultimately become as Ireland or as the United States. The fate of Ireland today will be the fate of the other colonies tomorrow.

Practical Applications of Socialism

EBER COLE BYAM

DURING the past several years a number of sinister events have thrust upon the world's attention a multitude of startling examples of the practical application of Socialism. Perhaps nine men out of ten are more or less tinctured with that philosophy, many of them without realizing it, and some of whom would hotly resent the implication. Others there are who are knowingly attracted by the specious arguments and more moderate theories about economic readjustment. The rank and file, however, are frankly hostile to any authority, and find their real expression in the violence advocated by the I. W. W.

To attempt any hard-and-fast classification of Socialists is futile, for it is safe to say that there are as many separate schools of Socialism as there are individuals professing it, each disciple leaning more or less toward extreme radicalism or moderation, according to his or her degree of education and mental balance or lack of it. There are some rich Socialists, it is true, but this is a fact that proves nothing beyond the previous statement. As a rule the Socialist ceases to be such as soon as he has acquired a piece of property. All of which is a symptom worthy of note by those whose aforementioned balance may have been inclining them in the direction of radicalism.

Principal among the factors that lead people of seeming intelligence into Socialism is an impulsive sympathy which seeks to discover some single cause, element, or class, upon which to fasten the responsibility for the world's misfortunes. They see the poor in seeming misery, and the rich in seeming content, a contrast they would abolish by exterminating the rich. The armchair or soap-box Socialist can paint harrowing pictures of living conditions among the laboring poor, and the melancholy fact is that they are too often true. The fatal error, however, is that which ascribes these conditions to causes which are but infinitesimally and remotely responsible. These alleged causes are wealth and the possessors of wealth. This is not a modern theory by any means. Thousands of years before there were any corporations or millionaires there were attacks upon wealth. Those who have increased their possessions by industry and thrift have ever aroused the resentment and envy of their less-intelligent neighbors.

For several years we have seen in Mexico the practical application of Socialism. Of course the Mexican Socialist does not call himself a Socialist, not he; he calls himself a "Liberal," a bit of political camouflage that earned the material assistance of the great and powerful United States Government. They even have a Mexican equivalent of the I. W. W. known as the "Obrero Mundial." For three-quarters of a century the revolutionary activity in Mexico has been recognized as Socialistic, so that it is safe to refer to it as a practical demonstration of the effects of Socialism. During the thirty-year rule of Porfirio Diaz the Socialists were compelled to seek refuge in the United States and Mexico became prosperous. With the rise of Madero they returned to find their extreme expression in Carranza and his bandits. Before the days of Diaz the only corporate body possessing wealth was the Church, and so the cry has ever been against that institution. With the coming of the modern business corporations under Diaz attention eventually was attracted to them and they came in for their share of attack. The revolutionists of a hundred years ago began by confiscating the money, goods and other property of the wealthy, and then exiling them. Many of them were murdered in cold blood. Today we find a repetition of those events. The murder of the individual was an effective way of preventing him from reaccumulating wealth. With the Church it was found necessary to pass laws to that end. These laws were not altogether successful in their aim and so now the effort is being made to murder even the Church.

If Socialism were true to its profession of faith, it might be tolerated in spite of the self-evident destructiveness of its theories. It cries out against war, yet wages the most vicious of all wars, destroying the accumulated labors of generations, and respects neither age, sex, nor condition; the outraging of women being one of its commonest activities. Naturally enough, the more educated leaders profess to repudiate these acts, but they do not hesitate to avail themselves of the criminals' services to gain their ends and they conveniently fail to punish the culprits. They talk loudly about liberty and cry out against oppression, yet when in power they laugh liberty to scorn and out-tyrannize the worst tyrants in history. Socialism thus showed its true self in Mexico and now is showing itself in Russia. How many more such terrible examples must be furnished before the civilized nations of the earth awake to their danger and rise up to strike it down? The Socialist pretends to cry down nationalism and babbles about internationalism; yet in practice he becomes not merely provincial, but extremely parochial. In this we see a hint of the real underlying cause and inspiration of the philosophy; and when its communistic aims are considered, as well as its murderous activities, it becomes plain that Socialism is in reality nothing more nor less than a recrudescence of the primitive tribal instinct in man, seeking expression in dynamite instead of in the use of a club.

The primitive tribes view all strangers with dislike and distrust; Socialism drove the foreigners from Mexico and the same has been done in some parts of Russia. The tribesman resents authority and discipline; so does Socialism. The tribe is communistic; so is Socialism. The tribesman cherishes the liberty to murder and outrage; so does the Socialist. Undoubtedly Socialists will resent such a comparison and many would offer more or less blatant explanations of their theories, but the practical facts are such as have been demonstrated in Mexico and in Russia.

Fortunately for Americans, these practical experiments in Socialism have been made in other lands, but the same elements of destruction exist in the United States and have not been idle. This has been demonstrated in numerous instances during the last few months when a state of war has permitted drastic protective measures to be taken. The war, however, is not going to last forever, and when it is over the Socialistic element is quite likely to attempt to establish the same chaos now existing in Mexico and in Russia.

In examining Socialism the American must not give ear to the college professor with his theories expressed in confusing rhetoric, but rather must he view Socialism in its practical workings. There he will find that the supposed leaders, or intellectuals, are but chips in the bloodthirsty gutter of radicalism. The average sociologist is a near-Socialist and takes it for granted that crime and criminals are due to environment. The Socialist echoes this assumption and joins the sociologist in charging environment to the rich. In the practical application of this assumption the Socialist kills the rich man and sets free the criminals confined in the jails and penitentiaries. This was done in both Mexico and Russia.

In Mexico the proletariat swarmed from its hovels and overran the homes of the well-to-do, only to destroy, and then return to its hovels. Many of the leaders saw in the homes of the wealthy so many sources of plunder. None sought to improve living conditions through a reasonable compensation for honest toil. What they sought was to avoid toil altogether, at the expense of others. In thus offering itself as a concrete example of the practical application of Socialism Mexico has intensified its miseries many-fold and has destroyed the only elements able or willing to lead its people into better ways of living.

To those who have never lived among a primitive people it is difficult, if not impossible, to recognize those characteristics which are peculiar to them. Those, however, who are at all familiar with the mode of life of the American or Mexican Indian cannot help but recognize in his mode of life the goal toward which Socialism inevitably tends. Even the Indians have had their I. W. W. counterparts in the Apaches, those vagabond savage outlaws who procured their women, their food and their horses by stealing them from their more industrious neighbors. To one who has lived among a primitive people the city slum appears but the logical consequence of permitting the tribesman to live there. If he lives with his family in a single room in a city slum, the chances are a thousand to one that, if left to his own resources in the country, he would be content to live in a one-room hut and would confine his labors to the procuring of barely sufficient food to last over to the next harvest. Such an individual cares little for the comforts of civilization, but, true to tribal instincts, he resents their possession by others; and, when roused by unscrupulous politicians, seeks, not division, but destruction. He does not desire a greater remuneration for his labor so much as an opportunity to avoid labor altogether. Whatever else Socialists may allege, this is the real fundamental impulse which inspires their following, a fact which has been demonstrated both in Mexico and in Russia.

One does not have to go to an Indian reservation, or to Mexico, to find the primitive tribesman. He is in our midst, and, although his skin is white, and he wears neither feathers nor war paint, yet he is as eager as any dark-skinned brother to pillage and destroy.

Our Friend the Utilitarian

DANIEL A. LORD, S. J.

NOT for the world would I suggest that modern philosophy might plagiarize. Less still would I hint that it had taken to its heart a principle which Jesuits have grown weary repudiating. But sometimes it looks suspiciously as if the dear old despised principle that the end justifies the means had got a new dress and a new name and become utilitarianism. When the old-line moralists raise a voice of protest against birth-control, its defenders do not proclaim that birth-control is a moral action; but with frenzied accents and a tremolo stop, they point to the mothers whose lives it will save, to the over-population it will prevent, to the increase of quality in the race as against mere quantity. And you get the same answer when you question the morality of euthanasia and divorce and half the modern evils; it's useful, and therefore moral.

Normally we talk as if the willing surrender of one's chastity is a distinct moral wrong; yet when Monna Vanna goes to the general of the besieging army to deliver up, if need be, her chastity to save her people, one would think from the pitying sobs and the patter of approval that she was a Christian martyr walking into the jaws of a lion. The end she had in view was the saving of her people; so it really did not make much difference about the means she employed to attain her end. And Monna Vanna is only an example in heroic size of the thousand heroines and heroes who do wrong that right may come of it. From this to utilitarianism is not even a short step, for, says the utilitarian, any action is moral which is useful for the happiness of the individual or the race.

Of course, he continues, there is a difference between actions morally good and actions morally bad. Anyone whose brain has not been permeated with the fog of moral skepticism or addled by the heat of passions long indulged can see that. But the only difference between them is their ultimate effect on the temporal happiness of the individual or the race. If he stresses the effect of happiness on the individual, he calls himself a hedonist. If the happiness he has in mind is the greatest temporal happiness of the greatest number, he calls himself a social utilitarian.

Hedonism, as you can readily imagine, is a delightful moral system for any pagan age. Epicurus was the first to form it into a clear philosophical system, and every young blade in Athens or Rome who sought to dignify his passion for wine and pretty slaves with the name of philosophy called himself an Epicurean. But today, Hedonism is chiefly a working hypothesis; and one does not brag too loudly if he works by it. But social utilitarianism, with its large-minded affectation of sympathy for the majority, is distinctly in favor. Your social utilitarian points to the factories whose smoke is the ubiquitous symbol of a nation's prosperity, to the universities and art museums and dramatic renascences which stand for a nation's culture, to the polling-booths and the free hospitals and the labor pensions and public playgrounds which mark the century's social development. Any act, he contests, which promotes these things, resulting thus in the greatest good for the greatest number, is morally good. Any action which impedes this good of society is morally bad.

It is not surprising that in this day of King Motor one should forget the use of harness and hitch the cart in front of the horse. And this is precisely what the utilitarian does. An act, says the utilitarian, is good because it is useful. The whole difficulty with that sentence is that the clauses have been inverted. It should read: An act is useful because it is good. There is a vast difference between saying: "I like this machine because it can make sixty miles an hour," and "This machine can make sixty miles an hour because I like it."

Now I quite willingly concede that every good action is ultimately—and I stress the adverb—bound to serve the interests both of the individual and the community. But there are certain good actions, like dying for the truth or sacrificing a nation in the interests of justice, which certainly bring little temporal happiness compared to the temporal ruin they involve. They would seem to be good in spite of their inutility to the individual. And so when I say that good actions are always ultimately useful, I have my eyes fixed not merely on the utility in this life, but the higher utility of an immortal soul in another life. Still, even in this case an act must be good before it can be ultimately useful.

Once more, we must resort to a comparison. A vacuum-cleaner, if one may trust the hyperbolic pages of the advertising section, is eminently useful; but before it can be useful, it has to be a good vacuum-cleaner, or, to be specific, the one mentioned in the particular advertisement you happen to be reading. No one nowadays, at least in theory, questions the utility of dentists; but long before a dentist is trusted to preside at the obsequies of a pet nerve, men make very sure that he is a good dentist, technically skilful and acquainted with the science of his profession. In very much the same way the utility of an action will depend on its inherent goodness. Just as a naval expert by examining a turbine can tell what benefit it will bring our navy, so a moralist by examining the nature of an act can tell its bearing on human happiness. But the reason which makes a turbine a good turbine and an act a moral act must be sought elsewhere than in their utility.

In justice to Epicurus, it must be admitted that he never intended his followers to burn incense and nerves and manhood to Bacchus and Aphrodite, or to top off philosophical debates with philandering debauches. Yet if the followers of his rule of morality did in fact make their names synonymous with glutton and libertine, the fault was largely his own. For to say that the morality of an act depends on its effect on personal happiness is to leave room for as many interpretations of morality as there are interpretations of the term "happiness." And history is witness to the innumerable meanings that have tucked themselves into those three short syllables.

Happiness for a scientist and for an American Indian, happiness for a nun and for a dweller in hotels and cabarets, happiness for a bibliophile and for a baseball fan have scarcely a common denominator. If all forms of personal happiness are in themselves morally right, then Raffles and that long line of gentlemen pirates ancient and modern whose supreme thrill lay in a bit of artistic buccaneering were moral men. And what of the duellist who, like D'Artagnan, loved the flash of rapiers better than the flash of diamonds? Were the duels he fought with an enthusiastic zest moral actions? If not, then who is to determine what constitutes man's true happiness and what is but its shadow? And how is he to know just wherein lies the difference?

The fact is that men have clearly distinguished between morality and mere utility. Socrates once said that a courtesan contributed perhaps more than anyone to the happiness of the world. Yet he never intimated that such happiness was moral. The wealthy tenement-owner who distils his wealth from the blood of the poor is serving the purposes of his own personal gratification. Dare he flatter himself in the depths of his heart that he is a moral man? And what of those actions which, like the self-sacrifice of Sidney Carton, led inevitably to his death? Judged by the Epicurean standard, they are essentially immoral acts, for they result in the destruction of all possibility of further temporal happiness.

The social ultitarian has little better success when he tries to determine just what is useful and what conducive to the greatest happiness of the greatest number. For nations have differed as widely as have individuals on the meaning of that exasperating little word "happiness," and they have frequently enough felt that their highest utility lay in actions which they never dared to dignify as morally good.

Many a Roman statesman was convinced that the bloody gladiatorial fights, by keeping alive the martial spirit and instilling a contempt for death, served the best interests of the State. This by no means proves that they were equally convinced that the butchering of men was an essentially moral act. Our Pilgrim Fathers thought that the wholesale extermination of the Indians would be highly useful and conducive to the peace and happiness of the struggling towns. Possibly it was, though one would hesitate to pronounce the murder of Indian tribes, through the deliberate introduction of smallpox, a morally good action. The economists of Elizabeth's day felt that the introduction of the slave trade was a good thing for the mother country and the colonists, just as in former days Greek economists built up their systems on the foundation of a universal slavery. I doubt very much if either of them debated the morality of carrying off a free people into servile captivity. Utility and morality in this as in a thousand other cases, as for example in every war of conquest, were never for a moment confounded.

In fact, statesmen, with eyes open to the immorality of their conduct, have plunged into courses of action which they felt to be for the utility and happiness of their fellow-citizens. By a diplomatic lie or a bit of trickery a statesman averts a war. He is convinced that he is serving the best temporal interests of his fellow-men though he may be sure that the lie is wrong. And the statesman who, for the sake of right and justice, like the statesmen of heroic Belgium, chooses the destruction of his people rather than a stain on their honor proves that mere utility and temporal happiness are by no means the ultimate tests of what is good and honorable. The nation which goes down to ruin fighting for justice has in annihilation found something far higher than mere temporal prosperity.

Happiness and utility are such flexible, shifting terms that they are altogether unsafe guides for determining a morality which is independent of all changing conditions. Murder is not good today and wrong tomorrow, even though a man sees that his best interests lie in the slaying of a foe. An action is not morally good unless the happiness which it produces and the utility it conserves be in themselves morally good. And for this we need a standard as unchangeable as the nature of right and wrong.

The Winter Theatrical Season

JOHN B. KENNEDY

"FROST" is a word of grim significance in theatrical argot. It implies that the public shoulder has turned coldly on the performance of ambitious talent or untalented ambition, that the smooth-faced gentlemen in the box-office are wearing mufflers and overshoes; but, being a seasonable phenomenon, there is little reason in wailing to the heavens because a taxed and tortured public has refused to form queues outside, say, eighty per cent of the metropolitan theaters. The lights of Broadway have been dimmed not through fear of air raids, for Broadway has excitement enough in earth raids, but because the black diamond has of late progressed considerably toward the preciousness of the white diamond. On lightless nights the hordes of theater-bound natives and visitors set out adventurously from inn-land and suburbia, falling in and scrambling out of the caverns and pits with which New York abounds and finding the sport of vehicle-dodging more strenuous than ever under bare stars and a stingy moon. The profane tally-hos of the taxi-terrors combine with the shot epithets of pursued pedestrians to produce flashings and frictions on these Cimmerian evenings; and the messages of the gum-dictators, the tire-dictators, the hose- and shaving-soap-dictators, and all the other autocrats of advertising, are buried in official gloom. It stands, sits, genuflects and otherwise postures to reason that, under these circumstances, an industrious and well-wishing watchman cannot report many bright things of the night.

There is a class in New York and, it is to be presumed, in all the large and flourishing and famishing cities, which is growing larger after each full moon when the psychiatrists neglect to go a-hunting. This class is coming to be called by those who seek to capitalize it, cognoscenti—a word which carries intelligent weight in Italian, but which, hauled bodily into English, and advertising English at that, might be held synonymous with anything from yegg to yahoo. The cognoscenti are having many departures made for them, and these efforts will continue so long as their pockets are tenanted. Intimate revues, smart problem-plays and one-act sensations are manufactured expressly for them. For them exists that delirious importation the ballet Russe —which is really enjoyed by almost as many New Yorkers as truly relish caviar.

Le Théâtre du Vieux Colombier is the most recent bait for the smart fish. Let no unjust inferences be taken. M. Jacques Coppeau, in providing the metropolis with an ascetically esthetic presentation of Molière and other French classicists, thought, no doubt, that events justified the innovation. There is no perfect machinery by which can be ascertained the number of Americans who understand the French language—the celebrated "Questionnaire," so thrillingly French in title, limits its census of linguists to men of draft age. But if there were as many speakers of French in New York as there are reported to be in Paris, it is yet to be proved that Molière and his literary kin have food fitting the American stomach. Of course, the French are vastly libeled by the meretricious meaning attached to all entertainment bearing their imprimatur. A visit to the Grand Guignol in the old days of very red blood and very riotous thunder has left a lasting impression on at least one theatergoer that the French will pay just as much as any other enlightened people to be made thoroughly miserable. Their gayety is certainly not an unqualifiable attribute. Even the naughtiest of their so-called naughty farces is extremely boring when it is not arrantly indecent. Parisian revues differ from American revues merely in the degree of intelligence of their producers, and London revues, which are the worst because they are made cockney parodies of the bad features of the others, differ from the American chiefly in the intelligence of the spectators. But New York will take all the gaudy refuse that Paris and London have to export, and even enemy countries will find their theatrical vices sedulously mimicked by the latest and greatest of their foes. The consolation in the case of an institution like the Théâtre du Vieux Colombier is that almost as few of its native patrons will understand its improprieties as will appreciate its unconventional artistry.

Two well-written English comedies have been revived, "The Gay Lord Quex" and "Lord and Lady Algy." The first is Pinero's excellent pagan exhibition of a roué who discovers that he has a heart. "Lord and Lady Algy," presented by a company of unusual talent, is R. C. Carton's cross-section of the life of a junior peer whose judgment of race-horses and cigarettes is much less reliable than his wife's, and as such disagreements are of vital consequence in the households of Grosvenor Square, Lady Algy leaves her lord, to return after she has witnessed his genuine attempts (while intoxicated) to persuade another man's wife to remain faithful to her marriage contract. Around this trivial theme R. C. Carton erected a structure of crystal dialogue marred by only four "damns" and one stale joke, which, however, he may have originated. The acting is superb and the setting a revelation, even for mechanically astute New York production. Unquestionably it is the most brilliant accomplishment of the American stage this season. Then why cannot a conscientious critic grow enthusiastic over it? Because, like everything else that is brilliant, whether domestic or imported, the profanity above noted is the only evidence the play contains that its actors are located in Christendom.

In "Why Marry?" the trend of native dramatic talent toward the mongrel philosophy best denoted by the term Shavian, is once more apparent. The theme concerns the economic disadvantages attending marriage in a society grown too light-headed and shallow-hearted to retain either the name or the idea of a sacrament. In his resolution of the difficulties confronting his hero and heroine the author employs more common-sense than sanctifying grace; but so unaccustomed are the professional playgoers to such a commodity that they instantly raised their trumpets and sounded to the world that home-grown genius had at last come to dwell with us. Since the gifted dramatist has asked a question in the title of his play perhaps he will not condescend to ignore criticism crystallized to the scope of a question: Why is it that the good points in every play with a purpose are contained in the Catholic catechism? The bad points are merely repetitions of standard dramatic sins.

Three leading American actresses—Misses Ethel Barrymore and Margaret Anglin and Mrs. Fiske have reappeared. Miss Barrymore tries her skill in "The Lady of the Camellias." As the singular quality of the skill and the uninspiring motif of the play are well-known, details are waived. In "Billeted" Miss Anglin presents what one experienced critic, in the absence of his handy book of synonyms, calls an "emotional comedy," germane, no doubt, to emotional tragedy and all other tautologies of starved vocabularies. The argument concerns an English woman whose husband, an officer in the British expeditionary forces, returns to his home, where a senior officer is billeted. What there is of plot ("emotional comedy" cannot stand much plot) rests upon the element of surprise. The acting is of a quality that should not be wasted on such stuff.

Mrs. Fiske's offering, "Madame Sand" is a dramatized biography—how the new terms multiply with the seasons—of the French novelist, who had her own picturesquely vicious ideas about many institutions, including the Sixth Commandment and female attire. She also smoked cigars. There is no more serious moral objection to a woman wearing trousers than to a woman not wearing what she should on her shoulders—even the smoking of cigars need not be an occasion of sin, for women of unquestionable virtue are known to smoke pipes, notably the Old Woman of Whitefriars, who swore with accomplishment and begged regardless, while always succoring others more poor than herself. When the trouser-wearing and the cigar-smoking are symptoms of a distorted ethical standard, or of no standard at all, then the woman is branded, no matter how gifted, as a freak —and for freaks there are built places not customarily known as theaters. Mrs. Fiske, to her histrionic credit, makes "Madame Sand" a joker whose sordidly comic jokes are all at her own expense. Through the silly Odyssey of her love affairs, the figure of the novelist emerges unlovable, yet clothed in a heathen nescience, woven by a brain of extraordinary ability which can create a library of romance but not the shadow of a seamstress' scruple. A reasonable epitaph for the bright and brackish "Madame Sand" is a reminder that just at present the thinking public prefers French geography to French pornography.

"The King" is an account of royalty dissipating incognito, providing no lesson excepting one of wonder that the Russian revolution is a precursor instead of an after-runner of similar upheavals in European kingdoms. The dramatic novelty, of which endorsers need always be wary, appears in "Yes or No," a play contrasting types of metropolitan women and pouring out pathos and humor, with dashes of grade-D dialogue, the bacilli of which play havoc with immature minds. "The Land of Joy" is a hilarious Spanish entertainment full of the much requested "ginger" and lavishly misrepresenting a thoroughly respectable people. "The Pipes of Pan" enters, with due emphasis on the part of the press-agent, the "charming" class, although opinions will differ. "Blind Youth" is a blind-alley drama that cannot, by any stretch of imagination, be considered entertainment, detailing, as it does, the putridness of sensual souls. One of its authors is responsible for "Tiger Rose," a somewhat crude but faithfully staged melodrama of a British-Empire outpost. Worthy of note is the fact that the program of this play gives a striking piece of testimony to the part played by the Jesuits in civilizing the northern wilds. Perhaps "The Gipsy Trail" is the one production to which unqualified approval may be given, for it deals with no problems, contains no suggestive situations, tells a straight story of romantic ideals and keeps the story straight.

Naturally, the gay, giddy and "girly" affairs are abundant. They will, it is to be feared, increase and multiply as the war wages. That has been England's experience. Even war-taxation does not impair the demand for this type of art. But we have the comforting reflection that what the war-tax cannot do the District Attorney's praiseworthy, if quite recent, solicitude for theatrical decency, may achieve. Certain posters flaunted from the city walls should provide all the evidence required for prompt suppression of lascivious shows. Solemn and detailed investigations are not without comic-operatic suggestion.

A Lesson from the "Tribune."

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I am sending you herewith a correspondence which explains itself, but which is far from explaining the mystery why we Catholics put up with such unfair treatment, not merely of ourselves, but of our Faith. As you will see, the New York Tribune permits an apologist for that fraud, Spiritism, to fill a column on its editorial page, not merely with a plea for Spiritism, but with insults and false statements about Christianity. When I answer the letter, the courtesy of the correspondence columns of the Tribune is refused me. But it is extended to a press-agent for Christian Science, writing on the same subject! I, of course, do not matter. I am only a professional Catholic author, writing as an individual, and the newspapers know that they can do practically what they like with such eccentric critics; for there is no organized body of Catholic opinion, no press-bureau, no efficient Catholic Truth society, to call them to account. But Christian Science, with a total membership about as large as the Catholic members of a sizable New York parish, supports a highly efficient press-bureau, and there is never a reference to that cult, never the slightest criticism expressed, never the least mistake about it made in the press, that the bureau is not "on the job," and it never fails to be recognized. When are Catholics going to wake up? When will they begin to follow the repeated exhortations of Pope after Pope to be diligent in their use of the power of the press! I tell you, sir, speaking as a professional newspaperman of more than twenty years' experience in metropolitan journalism, that American Catholics are neglecting one of the most promising fields for lay and clerical labors. What is the reason that we do not cultivate this field?

New York. MICHAEL WILLIAMS.

December 29, 1917.

To the Editor of the "Tribune":

Sir: I read the extraordinary communication in your columns today signed "John R. Spears," entitled "Ghost Hunters and Divines" with a sense of wonderment that there are still to be found men of such profound ignorance of facts, and so destitute of any perception of the realities of life, that they will seek publicity for opinions and prejudices that most educated people long ago relegated to the dust-bins of oblivion. Who is Mr. John R. Spears? What are his warrants for throwing insults in the face of Christians?

Let me, if you will, direct a little attention to some of the wild-eyed statements which with an almost incredible effrontery he makes, as if with pontifical, dogmatic authority: "Intelligent people, as a rule, no longer believe the doctrine of the vicarious atonement." They don't? Where does Mr. Spears get the information? What of the eighteen millions of Catholics, to say nothing of other Christian bodies which approximate to orthodoxy, in this country alone, who hold that belief, together with all others which are part of the deposit of Faith? But, does Mr. Spears object, he said "intelligent" people? Well, what about the thousands of eminent scientists, and tens of thousands of highly educated Christian professional men and women, like the head of our Supreme Court, like the head of our Navy Board, like—oh, like thousands more of our leaders? The obvious difference between the intelligence manifested by heaps of such believers in Christianity, and that of such a critic of that Faith which is the soul, the form, the vitality, of modern civilization, as your correspondent, is not in favor of Mr. John R. Spears.

Again: "Is the attitude of the Christian sects in any degree superior?" asks this writer, meaning, is it in any degree superior to the writings of Sir Arthur Conan Doyle on Spiritualism? Well, against the comic astral heaven of Sir Arthur, I, for one, one among some hundreds of millions, prefer St. John, St. Paul, St. Augustine, St. Teresa, St. John of the Cross, Dante, Angela of Foligno, Juliana of Norwich, Thomas à Kempis, and scores more of poets and great writers who have not only written about heaven, but lived the life that takes you there.

"For all Christians say that a life in heaven is to be the reward of faith. Literally they assert that felicity in the future life is to be earned by credulity. Many of them very sincerely say that a lack of credulity is to be punished with eternal torment." What rustic, backwoods nonsense! It sounds like a village atheist who has read Tom Paine, but nothing else. Has Mr. Spears never even so much as heard about Christians who have something to say about works as well as faith?

I challenge him to produce any Christian authority who asserts that felicity in the future life is to be earned by credulity, or who says that a lack of credulity is to be punished with eternal torment. I pretend to no theological omniscience, nor even to anything but a slight acquaintance with the subject, which I would not debate with Mr. Spears, in any case, but the point is, that, as a Christian, I know mighty well that no Christian authority could possibly put forth such drivel. But Mr. John R. Spears does put it forth. It is up to him to make good. He has no shadow of right to circulate such fantastic fabrications; because, alas, and this is the sad part of such exhibitions of ignorance, or of malice, in this day of hasty reading, and hastier thinking, even such absurd opinions as those voiced by Mr. Spears are absorbed by the truly credulous—by weak and bewildered souls who seek so piteously for light and leading and who are so suggestible, so easily captivated by wild and whirling ideas when uttered with the vigor and earnestness which Mr. John R. Spears commands.

But his own letter proves that it is not in malice that he writes; only in ignorance. He, like millions of others, devoid of faith, is also unaware of the vast amount of testimony which higher courts than those of common pleas would admit was valid support of the Faith—the testimony of saints and martyrs and mystics, and of the lives of untold myriads of humble Christians, made brave and sweet and lovely by faith. He, like so many others, is yearning with soul-hunger, and the thirst of the spirit; the hunger and the thirst which the soul of man must ever know; and so he turns even to the hocus-pocus of the medium, which when it isn't hocus-pocus is something even worse, or to the "experiments" of scientific explorers of the Borderland, seeking for something which will satisfy that hunger, the ineluctable, everlasting hunger of the soul after God; and His life more abundant.

But he is seeking in the wrong spirit, when he wantonly attacks Christianity. As for his willingness to give the Spiritualists a fair show, all right; but why deny a fair show to the Christians?

MICHAEL WILLIAMS.

In reply to my letter I received the following from the editor of the Tribune:

The enclosed contribution has been read. Mr. Frank H. Simonds, Associate Editor, directs me to thank you for your courtesy and interest in submitting it, and to express his regret that it cannot be used.

Yours very truly,

THEO. HONOUR.
Editorial Secretary.

I wrote to Mr. Simonds as follows:

January 4, 1918.

MR. FRANK H. SIMONDS.
New York Tribune,
New York.

Dear Sir: The New York Tribune makes unending play of its profession that from "first to last" its policy is "The truth—News, Editorials, Advertisements." May I ask why you omit letters from contributors, or from volunteer correspondents, from those departments of your journal in which truth is permitted to appear? I am forced to ask this question, which decidedly requires an answer, because in the Tribune for December 29, 1917, you published a most extraordinary communication signed "John R. Spears," entitled "Ghost Hunters and Divines," in which insulting references to Christianity, which were flagrantly untruthful, were thrown in the faces of your readers. This writer was permitted to declare that "intelligent people no longer, as a rule" believe in Christian dogmas. He makes the false assertion that Christians say—"assert" is his stronger word—"that felicity in the future life is to be earned by credulity. Many of them very sincerely say that a lack of credulity is to be punished with eternal torments." I wrote to you that day, challenging Mr. Spears to produce any, even the least title of evidence that any Christian authority, any recognized writer, or exponent of Christianity, ever was guilty of such piffle. Whereupon the Tribune returns my letter, after many days' delay, telling me that "The enclosed contribution has been read. Mr. Frank H. Simonds, Associate Editor, directs me to thank you for your courtesy and interest in submitting it, and to express his regret that it cannot be used." But I did not submit it as a contribution. It is very definitely a letter for your correspondence department in reply to one bristling with falsehoods that injuriously affect my Faith, and which I, a professional writer, though not a theologian, cannot let pass without challenging. Why, then, do you discriminate against Christianity? Why do you permit falsehoods to be published in your correspondence columns while loudly professing your policy to keep them out of your other departments? I am not satisfied with this situation. You are most unfair. You have no right to give only one side of a controversy,—because what Mr. Spears writes is flamingly controversial, unless you give an equal amount of space to the other side. This being, however, your attitude, I shall send the letters to AMERICA, the Catholic weekly, requesting its editor to publish them.

Very truly yours,

MICHAEL WILLIAMS.

P. S.—Your action in this matter becomes all the more extraordinary in view of the fact that the Tribune today contains a letter from a publicity agent of the Christian Science cult replying in full, from a Christian Science point of view, to Mr. Spears' letter, while a letter from an orthodox Catholic author is thrown back at him!

The correspondence needs no comment. It is in itself a striking object-lesson of the treatment to which our apathy subjects us.

New York. MICHAEL WILLIAMS.

Catholic Employment Bureaus

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I should like to offer a suggestion on the matter of Catholic employment bureaus which lately have been under discussion in your columns. Why cannot every Catholic pulpit in the country be such a bureau? The priests of the parish could learn who are out of work and announce the fact to the people of the congregation, requesting the latter to keep their eyes and ears open and if they know of anything in this or that person's line, to apprize the parish priest, or assistant, at once. In this way the unemployed could be brought into touch with his or her work. This is a deed of charity, and the pulpit, from which charity is so often preached, is a fit place for its exercise. I have been following this plan and I think it is a good thing, it pleases our hard-working men and women, and is something of an antidote for Socialism.

Catholics and Prohibition

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I have just read Father Blakely's article, "Catholics and Prohibition." The majority of your readers reside in "wet" States and cannot appreciate Father Blakely's forebodings as to the danger of any State in the Union going so far as to forbid the importation of wine for sacramental purposes. The State of Washington has been in the "dry" column for two years. When prohibition was an issue here I was among the "antis" but the experience of two dry years has caused me to veer round, so that today I am a prohibitionist. Your readers are not interested in my personal views on prohibition. They want some information on the practical working out of the dry law in reference to the importation of wine for sacramental purposes. The desired information can be obtained by a perusal of the subjoined facts.

A certain priest ordered wine six months ago. On its way from California, the wine had to pass through Seattle. The police of that city are extremely active in prosecuting bootleggers, and in a recent raid they made on a freight train they seized the wine shipped to Father M. The wine is still in Seattle and meanwhile Father M. borrows from a neighbor.

The dry law in this State permits one to order wine through a drug store that has a license to handle alcoholic liquor. If the drug store in your town has such a license you are fortunate. If not, you must locate one in the next town. The latter was the course I had to pursue. I went to a druggist thirty-five miles from here and ordered my wine, which arrived in due time, at the drug store. There it must remain until the roads are fit for auto traveling, and then I must discover a kind friend who will fetch the wine in his car. There are three railroads leading from the city, where my wine is resting, to this town, yet not one of them will handle the wine as they are forbidden to do so by the dry law. Meanwhile I am compelled to be a borrower.

The last sentence in Father Blakely's article reads: "Safety can be guaranteed only by inserting into the State prohibition laws a clause specifically authorizing the use of wine for sacramental purposes." Such a clause is too vague. It is inserted in our dry law and its value can be estimated according to the foregoing facts. The sentence should read: "Safety can be guaranteed only by inserting into the State prohibition laws a clause specifically authorizing priests to import wine for sacramental purposes, said authorization to be in the form of a permit issued by the authorities of the city where the priest resides." Vague written laws are as worthless in this regard as the vague unwritten understanding deplored by Cardinal Newman.

Rosalia, Wash. JOHN CRONIN.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In regard to the prohibition law of Oklahoma it is sometimes said that there is nothing in the Constitution of the United States to guarantee the rights of Catholics to have and use wine for sacramental purposes. Touching this point, I would like to call attention to the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution, and to ask your readers to consider it in connection with the First Amendment. One need not be a lawyer to understand plain inferences.

By the first article of the Constitutional Amendments, which reads: "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof," religious liberty is a right or, if you will, a privilege of every citizen of the United States. In the Fourteenth Amendment, it is declared that "No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States." If, therefore, the Constitution restrains the Government from "prohibiting the free exercise" of religion, it is, forsooth, because it claims that the unhampered practice of religion is the right and privilege of every citizen of the country.

By what warrant, then, does the State of Oklahoma, "make and enforce" a law which "abridges" the right and privilege of every Catholic to "the free exercise" of his religion by offering the Sacrifice of the Mass? Or are we to infer that the citizens of the United States have no rights, except such as are positively and specifically conferred on them by the United States Constitution?

Certain truths "self-evident" and "certain inalienable rights," to "life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness," including, no doubt, the practice of religion in the idea of happiness, are mentioned in the Declaration of Independence; and though this ancient and venerable document may not confer any rights in a law court, yet it may serve to enlighten the learned judges on the spirit of our laws, and to guide them to an equitable construction of them.

The Mississippi legislature, has, with a haste that does little credit to sober law-makers, ratified the prohibition amendment to the United States Constitution. Fanaticism never stops to reason, and puts no limit to the lengths it will go. The time to defend our rights is not after all means of redress have been taken from us.

As a resident in Kansas and a neighbor of Oklahoma, I and a number of others, are vitally interested in the decision of the court, referred to in your editorial, "A Federal Decision and the Mass," in the issue of January 5, 1918. Could not some of the able lawyers among your subscribers be induced to discuss the judicial decision in regard to the use of wine for Mass in Oklahoma, and to point out to us, who are not versed in the punctilios of the law, whether the inferences I have deduced from the First and Fourteenth Amendments to the Constitution do not commend themselves to legal talent as well as to common-sense, and if not, why not? It is a good thing, in these days, for every citizen to claim the privilege of Missourians, and demand "to be shown."

Arnold Bennett and Dogma

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Chesterton has somewhere said in effect that you might as well ask for a quadruped without legs as religion without dogma. Perhaps if he had had before his eyes Arnold Bennett's most dogmatic denial of dogma, quoted in AMERICA for December 29, he would have added that you might as well ask for a centipede without legs as "a first-class intellectual apparatus" without a whole substructure of dogma.

That dogma can be denied only on the assumption of dogma is well illustrated in Arnold Bennett's paragraph itself. Indeed in the very sentence in which he writes "It is absolutely impossible for a young man with a first-class intellectual apparatus to accept any form of dogma," he lays down a positive, general, absolute teaching, backed by whatever authority his name carries, that the acceptance of dogma is today intellectual heresy; without even smiling at the Gargantuan grotesqueness of the proceeding, he solemnly pronounces the great dogma that dogma in any form is impossible! This ecumenical definition of truth would indeed be a paradox were it not that the contradiction it contains is not merely apparent. It is real.

But this is not all, Arnold Bennett's next sentence is, if anything, still more dogmatic than the previous one. Not satisfied with dogmatizing regarding the modern man's mind, he goes further in his creed and invades the very "private thoughts" of intellectual equals; for he proceeds to announce the following: "It is impossible in one's private thoughts to think of the accepter of dogma as one's intellectual equal." Around the very mind itself, around "one's private thoughts" does Arnold Bennett draw the awful circle of solemn church; and on the head of him who differs from him he hurls the anathema of excommunication from the sphere of intellectual equality. This is indeed extravagant arrogance.

If Mr. Chesterton's "championship of Christian dogma" sticks in Arnold Bennett's throat, it is not because his intellectual gullet cannot swallow dogma; it is because his fauces are already choked full of other dogmas, dogmas incompatible with those that are Christian.

"Vagabonding Down the Andes"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Some time before Christmas, while visiting a priest who is a very dear personal friend, I asked him if he would kindly look out for a book that would be suitable as a Christmas present for one of my non-Catholic friends. It was understood that the book should be of a non-religious character, lest my friend might think I was trying to ram my convictions down his throat. The priest, after browsing an afternoon in a store in San Francisco, reported that he had seen a book, entitled "Vagabonding Down the Andes," by Harry A. Frank, that the book sold for four dollars, and that he understood that former books by the same author had reached several editions.

I concluded that the book was just what I wanted and had it delivered at my home. Looking it over in a casual manner, I was surprised at some of the sentiments I ran across, and I laid it down with the conviction that the editor of the Menace could not turn out a more anti-Catholic volume. For instance, the author tells of a school he visited, the teacher being a very young man who came from a college in the Middle Western States, which was, or is, not noted for its scholarship. This Jesuitical teacher had the pupils read for the visitor, and the reading was perfect, the effect was spoiled only when he, the visitor, discovered that most of the pupils held their books upside down.

Harry A. Frank attended a meeting of 100 people who were all as white as he, and they were addressed by a speaker who spoke of legal revolution, but at a certain part of the address, his voice was drowned by the ringing of a church-bell across the street. It was the voice of ignorance, fanaticism and superstition trying, as it always tried in the past, to stifle the voice of progress and enlightenment. Morality amongst the women of South America, according to Harry A. Frank, is very low. Yet the women of the streets go to Mass every morning, and think there is nothing inconsistent in doing so. He adds, almost immediately, that mothers go with their daughters to the confessional to protect them, and their virtue, from the priest who sits there.

I have quoted the above from memory. I hope AMERICA will put Catholics on their guard against buying this infamous book. The book looks attractive, has the picture of a church in miniature on the outer cover, on which is stated that "It is a significant study of half a continent. It is also a sort of Arabian Nights book of fascinating adventure, color and incident."

Of course, I returned the book and had it exchanged; but a night or two later, in my own city of Oakland, while in Smith Brothers' book store—Smith is a good Catholic—the salesman wrapped up this same book with another for a young woman, who, while she paid her bill, explained that she was getting the book for a young man, and wanted to be assured that it was good reading. Of course, the salesman assured her that it was, and away she took the poison, and became an agent for the propagation of the lying statements of a vicious mind.

Why Soldiers Are Popular

SOMEWHERE in France is a young soldier who, if you called him a hero, would propably relapse in "Americanese," and advise you to "can that movie stuff." He is only one of a million others who, a few months ago, kissed the "folks" good-by, and with these same folks deeper in his heart than ever, marched off to do his part in making the world safe for democracy. He never knew that he could give up so much for the sake of an ideal. But he came of a hardy, God-fearing fighting race, that had ever had a helping hand for the weak, and a mailed fist for the oppressor. In the moment that his country called, the old blood stirred. He was no weakling. With a smile on his lips that belied the thousand memories tugging at his heart to keep him home, off he went to the camp. He did not love war. He hated it. But with all his honest young soul, he hated with a deeper, fiercer hatred, the bloody cruelty that, without remorse, sank little children beneath the merciless waves of the icy Atlantic, and filled martyred Belgium with the sobs of mistreated women.

He has no idea that he is a hero, and according to narrow canons, perhaps he is not; but with a courage that is nearly sublime, he daily faces death for you and me. It may be that some vision of the glory which the Prince of Peace unfolds for all who unselfishly lay down their lives for their country, shines in his eyes, through the trench mists of stricken, immortal France. Whatever his trials, they are for himself alone; his letters to the "folks back home," are like those of a boy on a camping-trip. "It's winter over here," one of them wrote some weeks ago, "which means first, rain, and then a whole lot of rain, and then some more rain. Jimmy and I are the original web-foot boys, and don't mind it." That is all he has to say of life in the trenches. "The 'eats' over here are fine," he continues. "Most of my last leave I used up showing a little lunch-counter man what an American appetite can do when it gets started. When I quit, he was ready to lay off, and call it a day. So was I." There are probably few "leaves" for him now, and the fatigued restauranteur comes back only as a memory to amuse the "folks at home." "And I went to Mass and Holy Communion in a church they say is eight-hundred years old. Well, it looks the part, all right. Back home, they would have sent it to the dry-cleaner long ago. But it was very beautiful inside, and, say, it was fine to see the Padre again, and get a chance to clean up."

The boy who from the seat of war, can write a letter like that, may not be a hero, but he is so near to one that we take off our hats to salute him. "Say, 'Cap,'" sang out a sailor to his officer, as both were struggling in the water, after the Jacob Jones disaster, "Say, 'Cap', where do we go from here?" An American, it has been said, when hit hardest, simply laughs. He may collapse a moment later, but he prefers to stand up to danger with a smile. That is the spirit which, with God's blessing, is going to win this war, and make it possible again for women and children to laugh, even in Belgium.

A School for Women Voters

"WOMAN made her primal mistake," said the Lady, with the air of one who had been there to see, "when she learned to cook." With these thrilling words was New York's suffrage school inaugurated. "When man found out that woman was willing to cook for him," continued the eye-witness, "her economic slavery began. Woman has ever been a luxury for man." And she rambled on, in complete forgetfulness of Xantippe, Mrs. Wesley, and a host of other helpmeets, as luxurious all, as the shirt of Nessus. "Nor is housework economically valuable. The twenty-five dollar a week stenographer who marries, and does her own housework at the rate of five dollars a week, has sunk just so far in the economic scale."

If this be true, so much the worse for the "economic scale." But it is palpably false. An economic scale is not something you pick out on the piano, or isolate in a test-tube. Without definite reference to men and women, their needs and possibilities, it is as unintelligible as a smile, lacking a Cheshire cat for a subject in quo, or volume without matter, space without extent, music without sound, star-fire without a star. You cannot eat it, it will not buy shoes for Jimmy, or kiss away little Cissy's tears, or pay the rent. It does not make a home, it is not something to die for, it cannot set a leg, or take away the grief of a wound. It is an abstraction, a mere word, like Falstaff's honor, unless studied in connection with the human factors upon which it is founded, with which, in turn, it must deal.

A force of economic value is not to be measured by immediate financial returns. Were that the standard, the noble science of economics could not countenance the erection of a school or the endowment of a college. Instead of keeping boys and girls at their books for barren years, in the possible hope of a return twenty-five years hence, we should put them at once to petty but immediately profitable tasks. But the truest science recognizes that they contribute most to the general economic welfare, who do their part in shaping, by present devotion to duty, a sturdy, industrious generation, dealing honestly with all men, and humbly with God. The part in this work of a twenty-five dollar a week stenographer. may be great; but, as a rule, it is not comparable with the opportunities afforded the girl who gladly gives up this stipend, and takes in its place, love and labor for those she loves. As an economic force, a young wife singing her baby to sleep, or cooking her husband's breakfast at daybreak, or making all bright and comfortable against his return at night, is not so imposing as a steel-mill in full blast. But it is very easily possible that as an economic force, she is worth infinitely more. Conceivably, the world can wobble through its orbit without steel-mills; no one has yet been able to show clearly that the world or steel-mills either can get along at all without mothers. Love always could sweeten a dinner of herbs, and, although a mystery of mystery to many voluble economists, virtue, happiness and genuine "efficiency" are not incompatible with poverty or even destitution.

Economically, the world would have been lamentably poorer had a certain Kentucky damosel of the last century preferred the twenty-five dollar a week "economic independence" of her log-cabin and hominy-pot to the promptings of her heart, which bade her follow Thomas Lincoln and unadorned poverty into the wilderness. Men, and even women with a vote, who strive to reconstruct the economic world with God left out and man's worth rated solely by the size of his cash-register, will end in fashioning a world fit only for Mad Tom, Shylock and Caliban. It is fairly safe to trust God with the world that He has made. He will rule it with wisdom, and in the end, perfect the purpose which He set Himself when He called man from the slime of the earth. Only a fool will advise a cobbler how to make shoes, but many who are called wise, profess to know far more about the heart of man and the order of the universe than the Almighty, at whose behest these things came into being.

Modern Necromancy

AMONG the evidences of moral decadence in our day is the startling development of the practice of necromancy. It has grown into a cult which has taken disquieting possession of many minds and reduces to commonplace occurrences the black magic of the past. It is the outgrowth of paganism in every period of history, and may be found, like all forms of devil-worship, among nations that are most deeply sunk in heathenism. Its recurrence, therefore, in our day is an alarming sign of the degeneracy of a great portion of our civilization.

Unfortunately necromancy is not confined to that fungus growth of society, the idle rich, but finds acceptance among all classes. Clairvoyants and mediums represent as definite a profession as actors and vaudeville "artists." Séances and spiritism are regarded without fear or abhorrence. Conversation with the spirits of the departed, though in reality with the powers of darkness themselves in most cases where fraud plays no part, is deemed a mere development of modern science, which is absurdly thought to have passed beyond the bounds of the sensible and to have discovered, of its own marvelous power, new realms hitherto closed to the pryings of human curiosity. Novels, which are said to be dictated by spirit visitors from another world using the living writer as a mere amanuensis for their worthless effusions, immediately receive a vogue and popularity clearly indicative of the sickly state of modern society.

A new impetus has been given to this pernicious intermeddling with the unseen world of evil spirits by the publication of the notorious work of an English scientist whose morbid mind fancied itself in communication with his dead son who had perished in the war. Even non-Catholic writers, as the Ave Maria notes, have come to realize the alarming danger of this pagan practice into which Saul fell when he departed from the ways of God, and which in our day so often leads to insanity as well as to utter moral depravity. Dr. Crozier, according to the summary given by Father Hudson, describes it as "Akin to those dark and sinister agencies which flourished when the Roman Empire was tottering, and which Christianity sought to put down." Professor H. E. Armstrong speaks of it as "A movement every aspect of which is pernicious—pernicious alike to the prime movers and to the public; one which at all costs, in support of sanity of human outlook, we should seek to stamp out with every weapon at our command."

The fact that neither the Church of England nor educated opinion should have had the courage to take exception to this movement, so greatly intensified by the patronage of Sir Oliver Lodge, is regarded by Professor Armstrong as proof conclusive that "We are living in a period of intellectual decadence." The Catholic Church did not hesitate to condemn at once, clearly and uncompromisingly, this pernicious modern error. It is a fitting punishment of the intellectual pride of our rationalistic age that it should have been permitted to fall open-eyed into an evil so degrading and demoralizing: "Because thou sayest: I am rich and made wealthy, and have need of nothing: and knowest not, that thou art wretched, and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked."

Mortifications for Others

"I DON'T like mortifications that mortify others," Monsignor de Mazenod, the founder of the Oblates of Mary Immaculate, once remarked, as he bade a highly "detached" young priest visit his family before setting out for the Alaskan missions. The saintly prelate's observation is as full of sound sense as of true piety. A hunger for holiness that makes a person give others pain needlessly, or a spirit of "detachment" that renders its possessor selfish and unfeeling is not Catholic piety at all, but a Jansenistic, Puritanical imitation of it. True Catholic piety is winning and attractive and has all the qualities that St. Paul in First Corinthians, Chapter 13, assigns to charity. Moreover in his letter to the Romans he offers valuable counsel to those who out of narrow zeal for the letter of the law become stones of stumbling to their weaker brethren: "For if, because of thy meat, thy brother be grieved, thou walkest not now according to charity. Destroy not him with thy meat, for whom Christ died."

Mortifications which mortify another more than they spiritually profit those who practise them are signs of selfish pietism rather than of generous piety, and have repeatedly given point to the jibes of cynics and scoffers. Wives who carry their practices of piety to such an excess that the domestic harmonies are thereby impaired can profitably remember that those mortifications are best which annoy other reasonable people the least. Husbands who by the exercise of perfect detachment have learned to rise superior to the cares and anxieties that try their spouses could well keep in mind how irritating to busy housewives that kind of mortification is. Indeed it may safely be asserted that every form of self-denial or mortification which is harder on others than on those who practise it is of no ascetical value.

Modern War's Ruthlessness

OVER the caption, "Now for an idea which will make war impossible!" one of our weekly magazines published some time ago a cartoon depicting Uncle Sam, with his fist clenched and a determined look on his face, taking an inventory of the instruments of destruction employed in modern warfare. The turreted battleship, the submarine, the mine, the machine-gun, the airship, the telegraph and the telephone, he finds, are the "American inventions which make modern war possible," but he nowhere sees any sign of a device that will render war impossible. That of course was to be expected, for as long as fallen man lives in this fallen world, there will be wars and rumors of wars. But is there no way of keeping the wars of the future from being waged as long, as ruthlessly and as expensively as is our present war? Almost every paper, magazine or war-book published describes modern battles in language that a dozen years ago would have been regarded as wild and improbable fiction, but those who have actually taken part in important attacks on the Allied front consider that these descriptions give but a faint and inadequate idea of what a battle now means to the soldiers engaged. No one perhaps has made its horrors more vivid than has John Masefield in his book on the disastrous Gallipoli campaign, in which he wrote passages like the following:

> Let him [the reader] think that he has not slept for more than a few minutes together for eleven days and nights, and that in all his waking hours he has been fighting for his life, often hand to hand in the dark with a fierce enemy, and that after each fight he has had to dig himself a hole in the ground, often with his hands, and then walk three or four roadless miles to bring up heavy boxes under fire. Let him think, too, that in all those eleven days he has never for an instant been out of the thunder of cannon, that waking or sleeping their devastating crash has been blasting the air across within a mile or two, and this from an artillery so terrible that each discharge beats as it were a wedge of shock between the skull-bone and the brain. Let him think, too, that never for an instant, in all that time, has he been free or even partly free from the peril of death in its most sudden and savage forms, and that hourly in all that time he has seen his friends blown to pieces at his side, or dismembered or drowned, or driven mad, or stabbed, or sniped by some unseen stalker, or bombed in the dark sap with a handful of dynamite in a beef-tin, till their blood is caked upon his clothes and thick upon his face, and that he knows as he stares at the hill, that in a few moments, more of that dwindling band already too few, God knows how many too few, for the task to be done, will be gone the same way, and that he himself may reckon that he has done with life, tasted and spoken and loved his last, and that in a few minutes more may be blasted dead, or lying bleeding in the scrub, with perhaps his face gone and a leg and an arm broken, unable to move but still alive, unable to drive away the flies or screen the ever-dropping rain, in a place where none will find him or be able to help him, a place where he will die and rot and shrivel, till nothing is left of him but a few rags and a few remnants and a little identification-disc flapping on his bones in the wind.

Though America's inventive genius has helped to make the battles of today the concentration of horrors above described, the cartoonist depicts America looking in vain for some means of making the repetition of such a scene impossible. But perhaps if he had found room in his drawing for the Tables of the Law and for the Cross of Christ he would have suggested to the thoughtful a way of lessening the ruthlessness of future wars. For if most of the world's rulers, generals, diplomats and legislators could once be brought to a practical conviction that the Ten Commandments are as binding on them as on the people they govern, lead, "protect" and make laws for, it would be safe to predict that a war like the present one could never happen again. If States and Governments moreover, in their dealings and relations with one another will in future be guided more by the principles of Christian ethics and less by pagan and Machiavellian rules of "diplomacy" and statecraft, such a merciless and world-embracing conflict as is now going on will be an impossibility.

Masonry in Mexico

THE trenchant editor of the American Freemason is writing with unscented carmine ink once again. The "church papers" are the victims of his Jove-like wrath, and, verily, the inoffensive reviews have come out of the ordeal, resembling victims of German measles in war time. It happened this way: One Brother Seamon, P. G. M., wrote an article on Masonry in Mexico and, like all faithful members of the craft, told of the trials and glory of the lodges in the Republic beyond the Rio Grande. For the most part, the trials consist in diminished members of English-speaking brethren, while the glory lies in the fact that Masonry is guarding "the true light" in the distraught country. That is practically the sum and substance of the article. True, Brother Seamon does say that some of the lodges, apparently both English and Mexican, have been very naughty indeed. "The charter was withdrawn from the lodge at Juarez, because of 'irregular and un-Masonic conduct;'" as for Mexican lodges, they have been guilty of "erratic actions," but then such lodges are not recognized by American Masonry, nor can the fraternity be held responsible for them. Thus Brother Seamon says his word, then carmine ink begins to flow. Brother Morcombe writes: Behold, how the craft doth struggle for its very life in Mexico, and yet church papers accuse it of foul deeds and what-not. Miserable sheets, they are ignorant, or else of deliberate intent they hide or distort the truth, relying "upon the ignorance and prejudice of readers to carry over a whole series of lies." This is so novel that were not Papists both ignorant and prejudiced, they would be amazed. As it is, they can but gaze upon it with stony eyes and in the half-glimmer of stunted intelligence wonder what it means. And Brother Morcombe will pity them, perhaps to the extent of a manly tear. But after all, as a rule, church papers followed the lead of Masonic papers in condemning Mexican Masonry, indeed, the latter reviews excelled the former in heat of indignation and vehemence of phrase. Last year, Mr. Eber Cole Byam, a Mason of long residence in Mexico, declared in the Builder, a Masonic magazine, that "Latin-American Masonry is atheistic, revolutionary and contentious, and in Mexico it has become anarchistic and murderous." What benighted editor of a church paper could say that? Not one of the tribe could command such vigorous language, even with the aid of a "Standard," a "Roget," Billy Sunday, and a prohibition journal. Then, too, the Masonic Tidings, quoted by the Indiana Catholic and Record for November 30, 1917, paid tribute to the craft in a way that made many a "mousey" editor of a church paper exclaim: "Lord, how those Masons can hammer, give us of their power, we beseech Thee; but do not permit us to forget the use of the trowel too often, for much patching will have to be done, when we become cool again. Amen." Here are the quoted words of the Masonic Tidings:

We have the authority of the Masonic Standard of New York City that recently, in this country, Right Worshipful Egon Edward Schoenwald of Mexico City made the statement that nearly all men of prominence and influence in the Republic of Mexico were members of the Masonic fraternity; that Scottish Rite Masonry was the strongest power recognized in that country. Moreover, he makes the remarkable statement that nearly every governor in Mexico is a thirty-second degree Mason; that General Bernard Reyes and Felix Diaz were thirty-second degree Masons; that Madero, who was President of Mexico, was a thirty-second degree Mason, and that at the time he captured Diaz and Reyes [rebels against the then Government] he ordered them shot; that they were finally saved from the death penalty and ordered to be imprisoned for life, because, as states Brother Schoenwald, they were Masons.

He further stated that Huerta, who also was a thirty-second degree Mason, when he captured Madero, ordered him shot, and for this act was expelled from the institution of Freemasonry.

We have no doubt that these statements made by Brother Schoenwald are true and historically correct; made with the best intentions solely to convey the idea that these distinguished citizens and Masons represent the most patriotic sentiment of their country; that if Mexico was to be saved and freed from barbaric rule, these were the class of men to bring about a better condition of affairs.

We, however, are not so much interested in these dignitaries, nor are we particularly interested in the recital of these horrible deeds, for murder has grown to be a pastime with the people of Mexico. What most interests us is that a particular class of men, so influential and powerful in Mexico, acknowledged Masons, should be archconspirators and perpetrators in sanctioning and committing the crime of murder (Italics inserted).

Let us then emphasize the fact that Latin Masonry, in many respects has little in common with Masonry as practised in the United States; that Freemasons and Freemasonry in this country, never will, never has [sic], countenanced the hideous atrocities and crimes committed as set forth in the Schoenwald statement. As a fraternity we object to being judged by such standard.

This takes two leaves from every church paper in the United States, for, as far as we know, none of the latter accused the Mexican craft of substituting murder for croquet and ping-pong. True, the Right Worshipful Egon Edward Schoenwald may be a Jesuit in disguise, but José Castellot is not: he is Past Sovereign Grand Commander of the Scottish Rite Masons of Mexico, and he wrote with his own cute, disingenuous, un-Jesuitical hand that Mexican Masonry plunged deep into the Madero rebellion after having tried to persuade Diaz "to prepare the presidential succession . . . a task which might have been accomplished without serious consequences under his skilful guidance, coupled with the ungrudging support always given him by our people" [the Masons]. (Italics inserted.)

It is but fair to say that many Masonic papers in the United States, the American Freemason sometimes included, "repudiated the Mexican groups, calling themselves Masons." (American Freemasonry.) But then when Mgr. Kelley, of Chicago, once made this same statement, the New Age for August, 1915, official organ of the Supreme Council 33° A. and A. Scottish Rite of Freemasonry S. J., U. S. A., spoke this way, through the lips of the aforesaid redoubtable José, who preens himself on his extensive knowledge of Latin Masonry, especially the Mexican variety:

It is not true that Masons do not recognize Latin Masonry; precisely the contrary is the case. The international Conference of the Supreme Councils of the Scottish Rite which took place in Washington in October, 1912, is clear and irrefutable proof of the fraternity which exists between Latin Masonry and the Masonry of Europe and America. Nearly all of the Supreme Councils of Latin Masonry were represented there, and the American Masons during the Conference and before it, at the ceremonies which were celebrated in Boston, showed their feelings of hospitality in so delightful a manner that the memory of those Conferences will remain in the hearts of those who participated in them with constant pleasure and gratitude.

And once upon a time, unless coy memory fails us, Brother Morcombe wrote in a similar vein. However, he is herewith forgiven, for in the foreword to Brother Seamon's article, he says: "There is no doubt that some men, perhaps some bodies, claiming to be Masonic, and including natives and foreigners, have been unwise in speech and action." In very truth they have been brutal, and the result is tragic beyond expression. As a consequence, church papers have failed to do justice to their deeds: but Masonic reviews, edited by men around whose heads are halos of true light, have risen to the occasion, and made these facts clear beyond peradventure of doubt: Mexican Masonry is anarchistic and murderous: church papers failed to grasp the full horror of conditions; it was left to Masonic reviews to expose villainy too foul for detailed narration.

Literature

A LITERARY MENTOR AND HIS PUPIL

ONE of the most lovable and helpful men of letters of the last fifty years, though full worthy of a devoted Boswell, is yet without one, in effect, at least, if not in anticipation: Father Matthew Russell, S.J., whose helpful love illuminates the brilliant chapters in a score of distinguished biographies and books of reminiscence, is himself left without the honor of a distinct and adequate biography. Some little sketches, full of grateful recognition of his helpfulness, appeared shortly after his death; but the snows have covered the beautifully tinted leaves of autumn, and time has bestowed these fugitive papers silently away among the crannies of reference libraries. Yet, lacking his own Boswell, Father Russell has not been overlooked—How could he be?—by the faithful biographers of other men and women whom he assisted to summits of fame. A list of these names would almost be a catalogue of the best Catholic writers of the last half-century. Not from Ireland alone do they answer the roll-call; but from England as well, and from Australia and Canada and the United States. Two of many yet living, Katherine Tynan and William Butler Yeats, artists of exceedingly able craftsmanship, were literary novices under him. And now comes, in Father Heuser's book about Canon Sheehan, a splendid revelation of Father Russell's heart and mind in service to one who rose high in the apostolate of the pen. Speaking figuratively—mathematical figuring, not rhetorical—it is safe from exaggeration to say that one-third of the personal inspiration in the life of the great Irish novelist is a transcript of Father Russell's sympathetic assistance; more than that, the record of the latter coincides at every point with the aspirations and achievements of the scribe of Doneraile.

In witness to this large assertion, one which can be advanced for Father Russell in the lives of many other writers, there are abundant loci citandi in this recent biography of the Canon. In the files of the Irish Monthly too, that unique magazine which was never a burial-ground but a verdant fields of spring for young writers, how many pages were open to the pen of "P. A. S." while Patrick A. Sheehan was passing through his noviceship in letters. And how intimately the correspondence between editor and pupil displays the reliance of the young writer upon his generous and judicious Mentor. One sentence from the biography gives a comprehensive statement of their relations: "Before looking for a publisher (for his first book) Father Sheehan deemed it advisable to submit his manuscript to the judgment of Matthew Russell, S.J., who had hitherto encouraged his literary efforts, not only by publishing verses and short stories from his pen, but by putting him in communication with other literary people." Besides this happy function of introducing Canon Sheehan to academicians in letters, one of the graceful services that Father Russell constantly performed for other writers as well, he undertook to play the part of a "clipping bureau," and to send the growing novelist the welcome notices from the press. "I tear out the enclosed from the last American Catholic Quarterly. The advertisement in the Westminster Gazette of Monday gives a good phrase from the Spectator and another from Punch. In Dublin I saw Stephen Gwynn's new book, 'Today and Tomorrow in Ireland;' two of the essays are reviews of 'Luke Delmege' and 'My New Curate,' one of them reprinted from the Edinburgh Review where I saw it at Lord Gormanston's." Such was the happy burden of many letters; his courtesies which were also charity implied the patient labor of transcribing passages of the criticisms when the press clipping could not be made. "The Times calls it ['Glenanaar'], 'a vigorous and skilful piece of work'—that you have hit on 'a fine subject for romance,' and that you 'know well the humor, the faults and the pathos' of certain phases of nationalism."

Let it not be imagined, however, that mere effusiveness of admiration flowed from the Mentor's pen. Father Russell was not blind to certain blemishes in the art of Canon Sheehan, nor was he deaf to many hostile criticisms which were made by good men and true among their countrymen. But, a De Sales in recognizing the efficacy of honey rather than vinegar in such cases, the genial editor knew how to adminster doses of admonition and even reprehension. There were little lapses in artistic structure to be noted. Observe the naïve hesitation in this passage about "Glenanaar"; call it tact, helpful and constructive; it is also one of the little flowers of Gaelic culture.

> I wonder what rank "Glenanaar" will take in the hierarchy of your books. There are certainly very noble things in it, and it is completely different from all your other books. When it comes out in book form, I will probably see the symmetry of your plan better than I do now. The construction is certainly complicated, reminiscence alternating with contemporary history. . . . The Messenger has misgivings about your arrangements of the parts of your story—going back so minutely into the past after you had begun by presenting your hero in the present. Probably the story could not have been told otherwise.

Moreover on the point about the Canon's representation of Irish types, a wide circle of censure rippled along the shores of criticism; little pebbles of protest disturbing the full waters of praise from other quarters. And, to pause for a moment, upon this point of the critics, it seems strange indeed at this later day, and with Father Heuser's splendid book in hand, to hear a continuance of the echo of censure; that Sheehan does not give a "right concept" of the Irish character; and that he had "this or that" motive in his caustic satire upon some phases of Irish life. Motives in writing, he had certainly; but our present-day critics should learn what these were from the biography which is now within reaching distance. And what folly to expect that a single writer should give a perfect and thorough "concept" of Irish national life, the most complex, and yet seen in another light, the most simple institution in modern history. Who can place the finger upon the pulse of that national life? Renan and Matthew Arnold failed in their attempt; Mr. Hilaire Belloc and Mr. G. K. Chesterton have only partially touched it. If the national life, and the men and women who have their being in it were stagnant with irreligion, or stolid with the world's stoicism, the analyst's task would be easy indeed; but a nation which is as young and vigorous today, as when Brian fell at Clontarf, and when Sarsfield walked out of the trenches at Limerick, a nation which during these past 300 years, tried by wars and persecution and famine, has lived under the motto, "'Tis morn on the hills of Inisfail"—how shall such a nation give to its novelist only a Mongolian type of external and internal plainness to contemplate and represent?

Father Russell, like many other Irishmen among both clergy and laity, did not relish all of the pictures of Irish life given by the novelist; he even felt that at times the ethical impression was harmful or calculated to be such. But there were great ethical impressions to be obtained in the larger view of the Canon's novels. Realizing that, Father Russell was instant with such lines as these: "'Luke Delmege' is getting the better of its enemies. . . . Write whatever you feel inclined to, and don't mind anybody. . . . Follow your own inspirations bravely to the end and make this perhaps the most beautiful of all your books." And admonition can be given under the kindly veil of innuendo, as in this letter: "Dr. MacCarthy (son of the poet Denis Florence) thinks you run down our poor people too much. Scott idealized his countrymen and raised the appreciation of Scotland abroad. My friend whom I like so much—Mrs. Francis Blundell—vexes me in some of her Irish sketches with the tone she adopts towards her humbler characters." How masterly the manner of the admonition! What heart within the art! Note it well; and deem not the insistence upon this point to be sophomoric or whimsical. Though Father Russell did not relish certain phases of the Canon's characterizations, yet he in a broader view saw the intent and effect of the great novelist's productions, and he aspired to make them truer and more effective. And as proof of his disapproval of some of the work, here is a quotation sent under date of February 7, 1910, by Father Russell to the present writer who had taken occasion to praise one of Canon Sheehan's poems, "Senten the Culdee," and had then passed on to a laudation of "The Blindness of Dr. Gray": "I object to the idea that Canon Sheehan gives of our Irish people. It is not like our people at all as far as I know them. He pleases the English critics too much. The Westminster Gazette says very truly, 'Canon Sheehan does not like the Irish character.'"

The writer then ventured to send Father Russell a refutation of the latter's contention and to tell him how true and strong Canon Sheehan's American readers seemed to find his characterizations. Just because that letter had praise of Canon Sheehan's work and mission Father Russell forwarded it to Doneraile, and Canon Sheehan wrote by the very next mail, under date of March 3, 1910: "I had already seen some kind expressions from your pen through Father Russell; and for these and the good words of your letter, accept my grateful recognition."

This helpfulness and tact and Gaelic culture which Father Russell displayed towards his protégé at Doneraile kept faithful and true to the end. A beautiful passage in one of the Canon's letters, of September, 1910, reads like a "general confession" to one whom he seemed to consider his pastor in the literary world. "Dear Father Russell," he wrote: "As we say down south: 'You have always the pleasant word!' . . . You say: How many minds have I influenced already! I hope for good, because as the night draws on we are thrown ever more inward and inward in self-examination; and I can only say that my intentions were always upright and sincere, in trying to lift the minds of men to higher levels of thought, through the medium of literature. How far I have succeeded cannot yet be known."

THE PENITENT

O! Mary lead me back again to thee;
Too long my soul has wandered from the light;
Upon my desert heart the chilly night
Has fallen,—and I know not where to flee.
'Tis late the hour; mine eyes no longer see;
My cries are sob-stilled and no refuge bright
Has stopt my slowing steps; no chimes invite Save those that fall from tow'rs of memory.

Ah! Mother, give me back the ashen years
That wove the fabric of a ghastly dream;
Revive the withered hopes my spring had known,
And let me now refresh them with my tears,
That love's warmth may my barrenness redeem,
And autumn's harvest for the past atone.

REVIEWS

The Cambridge History of American Literature. Edited by WILLIAM PETERFIELD TRENT, M.A., LL.D., Professor of English in Columbia University; JOHN ERSKINE, Ph.D., Professor of English in Columbia University; STUART P. SHERMAN, Ph.D., Professor of English in the University of Illinois; CARL VAN DOREN, Head Master of the Brearley School. In Three Volumes. Colonial and Revolutionary Literature. Early National Literature. Part I. New York, G. P. Putnam's Sons, $3.50.

Now more than at any other time, it is the duty of every American to become acquainted with the history of his country, of its literature and its national life. To all lovers of American letters, therefore, the present volume will be most welcome. It is planned on a large and generous scale. If the succeeding volumes equal it in size and scholarship, we shall have at last something like an adequate exposition of the literary tendencies at work in the country from early colonial times down to the beginning of the twentieth century. The names of the editors are a sufficient warrant for accuracy, and comprehensive grasp of the subject.

An admirable bibliography of 200 closely packed pages gives evidence of the wide reading and searching erudition which have gone into the making of the volume. From the opening chapter on "Travelers and Explorers," by George Parker Winship, down to the closing chapter, on Emerson, by Paul Elmer More, each subject is treated by one especially fitted for the task. "Colonial Newspapers and Magazines," by Elizabeth Christine Cook, makes a particularly interesting study. What a stride from the staid and leisurely New England Courant, published by James Franklin, Benjamin Franklin's elder brother, to the monster and aggressive sheets of our day! "American Political Writing," a department where some of the best work by Americans has been done, falls to William MacDonald, of Brown University. The writing of our early American statesmen is generally of a high order and the reason is not far to seek, for they grasped a few fundamental principles thoroughly and believed in them with all their soul. Therefore when they came to give expression to them, it was from a full and burning heart that they spoke. They were eloquent because they had supreme faith in what they said. Major George Haven Putnam sketches the work of Washington Irving, Carl Van Doren writes of the development of the novel and does full justice to Cooper, and to the too much neglected Simms and Melville. Bryant, the only great poet of this period, is sympathetically studied by William Ellery Leonard, while the aberrations of New England Transcendentalism are outlined by Harold Clark Goddard. But the great Catholic writer Orestes A. Brownson, one of the greatest minds, according to Lord Brougham, which America has produced, does not get the place nor the space which his talents deserve.

One of the main characteristics of the volume is that, while its writers have endeavored to enumerate as far as possible the authors, who have distinguished themselves in any field of work, they have, besides this, attempted to give a connected view of the main movements and currents in American literature and to bring out that which is distinctive and characteristically American in our writers. This first volume will whet the appetite of the public for a second and equally substantial course.

The Life and Letters of Sister St. Francis Xavier (Irma Le Fer de la Motte) of the Sisters of Providence of Saint Mary-of-the-Woods, Indiana. By one of Her Sisters, MME. CLÉMENTINE DE LA CORBINIÈRE. Translated from the French by the Sisters of Providence. Revised and Enlarged Edition. St. Louis: B. Herder Book Co. $2.25.

This biography was first published in France in 1879 and appeared in English in 1882. As the latter version has long been out of print, the Sisters of Providence have done well to issue a revised edition of the life and letters of one of Indiana's pioneer Catholic educators, now that that State has recently celebrated the centennial of its entrance into the Union. Irma Le Fer de la Motte, like so many of those who laid the Church's foundations in this country, was French, being born in Brittany in 1816. Taking the veil at Ruille in 1840, about a year later she left France for America and in January, 1842, reached Indiana and St. Mary-of-the-Woods, where she was joyfully welcomed by Mother Theodore Guérin, the foundress of that renowned convent-school, who seems to have always thought a great deal of Sister Xavier. Though the Sisters had been in their new home more than a year, conditions were still very primitive and the intrepid religious had many a privation and hardship to endure. But postulants joined them at once, and their school grew steadily, for Indiana Protestants soon realized that the education these accomplished French ladies could give girls was not to be missed, even if it came from dangerous Popish sources. Sister Xavier in her letters home tells her relatives many entertaining anecdotes about the ignorant bigotry of the early Hoosiers, but the devoted Sisters nevertheless won their way and made St. Mary-of-the-Woods a powerful center of Catholic influence and conversions were numerous. In 1848 the subject of this biography was made mistress of novices, but a few years later her health, which was always very delicate, failed completely and she passed to her reward early in 1856.

The Church and the Hour. By VIDA D. SCUDDER, A.M. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co. $1.00.

The multitude of conflicting opinions connoted by the word Socialism would make it difficult enough to appraise the worth of a book in which this term might be used as one of constant value without being anywhere defined. If anything could aggravate this difficulty, it would surely be a proposal to reconcile this undefined Socialism with an even less defined Christianity. This, however, is the impossible task upon which a member of the faculty of Wellesley College in the present collection of essays throws away an excellent style, a creditable amount of earnest thought and a wealth of sincere conviction. Where the author who, in her sub-title, styles herself "a Socialist Churchwoman," pleads for Socialism, she enumerates certain recognized needs which are no more than practical demands of sound social reform, and then proceeds to relate them to some genuinely Socialistic principles which are anything but sound, and from which the natural derivation of the said demands is by no means obvious. But the muddle becomes simply hopeless when the oft-recurring question, why the Church does not embrace these principles, meets with tentative solutions in which "the Church" is understood in at least three different senses: the Catholic Church before the Reformation, the post-Reformation Anglican Establishment, and an imaginary collection of all the extant Christian societies, successively doing duty for one idea, and replacing one another as readily as if they were both synonymous in concert and identical in fact. Were Socrates to reappear in some modern centers of learning, with his pitiless insistence on exact definition as the basis of all practical philosophy, he would probably meet with even shorter shrift than he obtained in ancient Athens. And yet another Socrates is much needed in "the Athens of America" and elsewhere.

The Climax of Civilization. $1.25; Socialism. $1.50; Feminism. $2.50. By CORREA MOYLAN WALSH. New York: Sturgis & Walton Co. The Three Volumes, $4.50.

The name of the writer at first sight leaves the impression of a feminine authorship. The style and cast of thought, however, are those of a man who uses no circumlocutions in conveying his views of the "weaker vessel." His theory in brief is that civilization progresses in cycles. The civilization of every State or group of States, he holds, forms a cycle, rising during an ascending period, like the lowest point in the circumference of a moving wheel. There is next a stationary epoch, when the top of the wheel has been reached, and it is here that we find ourselves at present. Thence the cycle passes into its decline, which is now apparently beginning, and ends in a lethargic condition when the bottom of the wheel has been reached. From the latter state a given civilization may possibly rise again for a new cycle, or may continue in an indefinitely prolonged stage of decrepitude. Yet some general progress has nevertheless been made in so far as the wheel itself has advanced, by one rotation, on its onward way.

It is a very elaborate theory, false in its beginning by representing man as evolving from the ape. The earliest savagery represents the state of degradation to which groups of men or entire nations sank. This decline from civilization into barbarism has constantly repeated itself, and new developments of civilization from such debased conditions have as constantly been taking place and are taking place today. This is the pith of truth contained in his thesis, which might be stated very simply and briefly.

In the author's view the decline of civilization is invariably accompanied, or brought about by three social conditions, which may be described as Socialism, feminism and religion. Thus in the declining cycle of Roman civilization,

> The Christians added one more vice, the most dangerous of all; for they raised weakness to a cult. . . . Naturally, with this failing, with its treatment of all men and women as brothers and sisters, and its consequent confusion of the sexes, its want of patriotism, and also, springing from its disregard of the morrow on earth, its advocacy of celibacy, Christianity could do nothing to stem the decay.

The writer's insight into the most important factor of civilization may be gaged by these lines. While he has gathered together a mass of information, and often defends correct principles in his attack upon Socialism and the vices of feminism, he is utterly unreliable. In his eyes men and women are merely more highly developed brutes and there are no religious standards, since religion and "priestcraft" are the basest and most debasing superstitions. The author's historical allusions to Christianity and his interpretation of quotations from Christian literature show a complete lack of understanding. His morality consists in the highly developed pagan prudence of the ape-man and ape-woman.

The Externals of the Catholic Church, By Rev. John F. Sullivan. New York: P. J. Kenedy & Sons. $1.50.

Every one who has also read Father Scott's book, "God and Myself" cannot fail to remark how that book is remarkably complimented by this complete and faithful compendium of all the concrete facts of Catholic life. To the Catholic who has mastered the doctrines of Christ or the non-Catholic who would know how those doctrines work out in practice and devotion, this book will be found of great value. The author's aim has been to give what even faithful Catholics are too often lacking in, accurate knowledge of the government, liturgy, festivals, sacramentals and devotions of the Church. Besides, there are chapters on the religious state, church music, fasting, the Missal, Breviary and Ritual, marriage laws, canonization and many other subjects, all treated with a historical and descriptive method that is interesting as well as enlightening. It is remarkable how much information the author has managed to compress into the limits of 385 pages. Father Sullivan, who is a priest of the Providence diocese, makes his readers realize a long-felt need and has filled it exceedingly well. Catholics will be made better lovers of their Church by this book, and non-Catholics will doubtless find a powerful magnet in this fascinating pageant of the Church's every-day life. J. W. P.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

Many of those who read in last week's America Mr. Shane Leslie's trenchant paper, entitled "The Drive on the Pope" are no doubt eager to see "No Small Stir," the brilliant vindication of the Holy Father's attitude toward all the belligerents which "Diplomaticus," a member of the Anglican Church, has written and which Mr. Leslie quoted. With the kind permission of the Society of Sts. Peter and Paul, London, "No Small Stir" is reprinted in the current Catholic Mind. "Isn't it shocking that the Pope is so pro-German?" is the wail that "Diplomaticus" often heard in England. On investigation he found that the charges made against the Holy Father could be summarized thus:

> (1) The Pope had no right to remain neutral in the present conflict. (2) Even if we pardon his neutrality, we have still to complain that it was a neutrality unfavorable to the Allies and favorable to the Central Powers. In particular the Vatican has shut its eyes to the wrong done to Belgium and (3) has plotted against Italy. (4) The Vatican is intriguing to restore the Holy Roman Empire. (5) The ideals of the Vatican are essentially in harmony with the theories of Prussia, and essentially in discord with the policy and maxims of the Entente.

The author then takes them up one by one and conclusively demonstrates from the words and deeds of his Holiness that all the foregoing charges are quite baseless. The other article in this number of the Catholic Mind is Cardinal Gasparri's refutation of the London Morning Post's calumnies regarding the Pope's alleged responsibility for Italy's recent military disasters. Loyal Catholics should see that this issue of the little fortnightly is read where the information it gives is most needed.

Maurice Barrès' inspiring address, "The Undying Spirit of France" (Yale University Press, $0.80), delivered before the British Academy, has been translated into English by Margaret W. B. Corwin. The foreword by Theodore Stanton does not praise too highly the gifted Frenchman's concise, vivid and altogether pleasing style. Finding a striking similarity between the courage and self-sacrifice displayed by the 1914-16 French youth and the millions of intrepid soldiers, who, from the time of Clovis, through the Crusades and the European wars fought for the glorification of their beloved France, M. Barrès affirms that "They [Frenchmen] die for France, as far as the purposes of France may be identified with the purposes of God and, indeed, with those of humanity." A more intense love of country than that evinced in the several "last messages" set down is scarcely to be desired.——"The German Terror in France" (Hodder & Stoughton), by Arnold J. Toynbee, is a slightly detailed record of the destruction and outrage that came with the wave of German invasion, as it broke upon and swept across France, till stopped at the Marne. The book is a direct continuation of the author's "German Terror in Belgium," published some months ago. It is not at all pleasant reading, being an unvarnished record of gruesome and revolting deeds. The facts are gathered from the records of officially appointed commissions, etc. The author generally refrains from comments.

"Three Centuries of American Poetry and Prose" (Scott, Foresman, Chicago, $1.75), which Alphonso Gerald Newcomer, Alice E. Andrews, and Howard Judson Hall have selected and edited, is a substantial book of 876 pages, containing adequate examples of American authors' work from the days of Captain John Smith to those of Emily Dickinson. Teachers of English who found the present editors' "Twelve Centuries of English Poetry and Prose" so useful a book will no doubt be glad to know that its companion volume is now ready. Nearly a hundred authors are represented by well-chosen passages from their writings, footnotes are provided and a paragraph of biographical data precedes each writer's contribution to the volume. Schools with small libraries will find that books of this character help to solve pressing problems.

From an unpublished manuscript in its possession, Northwestern University, with the aid of Dr. Schuller, has published the "Moseteno Vocabularies and Treatise," of Benigno Bibolotti, a Franciscan missionary among the Indian tribes of Bolivia. (Northwestern University: Evanston and Chicago). Of Bibolotti, little seems to be known. From his own statement he was still in charge of a Moseteno mission at the end of May, 1868. He was one of those splendid Franciscan missionaries whose services to religion and civilization cannot be too highly praised. It is to the credit of Northwestern University and to the scholars who have introduced his work to the public that they fully recognize the heroism and zeal of Bibolotti and his brethren, while they pay a deserved tribute to their ethnological and linguistic studies. After an introduction by Dr. Schuller, in which, among other subjects, he discusses the Moseteno Indians and previous writing on Moseteno, and then adds Moseteno vocabularies, Bibolotti's work, which may be called a Moseteno-Spanish lexicon is given. To this are appended a few short specimens of the missionary's sermons in Moseteno. Even those uninitiated in the intricacies of Bolivian dialects will appreciate what Bibolotti and his learned editors have done for the cause of comparative philology and ethnology.

Bertha Condé, the author of "The Human Elements in the Making of a Christian" (Scribner, $1.00), is a Y. W. C. A. worker, who writes thoughtfully of her experiences. Daily prayer, study of Christ and devotion to others would seem to have given her a sense of spiritual values, and she stresses the necessity of many Catholic practices, without apparently realizing that they are alien to her religion. Her analysis of non-Catholic religious experience is keen and accurate. In meeting intellectual difficulties and the widespread Protestant sense of unreality in religious matters she is helpless. Her superstitious fear of dogma and her amateurish interpretation of Scripture show her need of the infallible Church founded by the Christ she loves——"Spirit Power" (Dutton $0.60), by May Thirza Churchill, is an admirable little book in many respects. If the author, however, would only study the writings of St. John of the Cross and St. Teresa on prayer, she would find her idea of it not quite the discovery she thinks it to be. She would learn besides to guard against confounding prayer with auto-suggestion, a mistake she clearly makes in the last chapter. Incidentally she might even realize that though she is on the right road and traveling in the right direction she is still far from home.

Mrs. Rheta Dorr, a New York newspaper woman, who is committed to Socialism, feminism and the "uplift" passed three months last summer in Russia, and the account of her experiences, written originally for the Evening Mail, she has now brought together in a book called "Inside the Russian Revolution" (Macmillan, $1.50). There are interesting descriptions of street-fighting in Petrograd, which the author witnessed, of the effect on the army of the abolition of the death-penalty and of Kerensky's fatal order excusing soldiers from saluting their officers, and her account of the women's "Battalion of Death," whose camp she visited, is given with suspicious enthusiasm. Mrs. Dorr says that they "lost foolish mock-modesty when in camp," and she seems to exaggerate those 250 women's military value. What the author saw in Russia should have corrected a number of her "advanced" ideas.

"The Door" (Mary's Meadow, Ludlow, Shropshire, 1/6), the title of the pretty little book on the religious state which Mrs. Armel O'Connor published some years ago, has lately been reprinted. The life of high spiritual usefulness lead by the enclosed nun is well explained.——"Sister Rose and the Mass of Reparation" (Herder, $0.20), by Mother Mary of the Cross, is a booklet of sixty-six pages, setting forth the devotion of reparation to the Blessed Sacrament as well as "the heavenly intercession of that humble and saintly woman, Sister Rose, who, under God, was the originator of this new devotion." The origin of the Confraternity of the Holy Mass of Reparation, its practice, its aim, its spiritual advantages and conditions of membership are treated in the appendix.——A third revised edition of "The Little Office of the Blessed Virgin Mary and the Office of the Dead" (Herder, $0.60), has recently appeared. The Offices in Latin and English are arranged according to the Reformed Roman Breviary.

Carroll Aikin's "Poems" (Sherman, French, $0.75) are characterized by an admirable spirit of faith and a keen enjoyment of outdoor life. "Credo," the opening poem of the little volume well expresses the tenets of the poet's belief, and his love-songs are artistic in their restraint. The following sonnet is called "In the Orchard":

I see God in my orchard every hour,
And in the downward pulses of the sun
I feel His heart beat, and I feel the power
Of pregnancy in every passing shower;
And still I find His infinite spirit spun
In bud and blossom, and His bidding done
By amber bees, and many a pollened flower,
With mating song and silent orison.

And when night hovers over field and grove
With shadowy plumage, and all creatures sleep,
Still on the lake the guardian waters keep
A lamping vigil with His stars above,
And in the vast, unventured hills I see
The awful measure of His mastery.

As is generally true of devotional verse, Anna B. Bensel's "A Voice from Silence" (Sherman, French, $1.00), is richer in piety than in poetry. Being completely deaf and almost blind, the author has found comfort in putting her thoughts into meter and rhyme. "When the Roses Died" and "Counting Off the Daisy" are perhaps the best poems in the volume.——Mr. John Peale Bishop's "Green Fruit" (Sherman, French, $0.80), a sardonic critic might say, contains a number of pieces that well deserve that name. "Claudius" and "Morning," for example, certainly do not express the beautiful. Better far is the sonnet beginning "Sleep brought me vision of my lady dead," and the author's marked fondness for free verse is justified best by these lines called "In the Beginning":

I had dreamed that Love would come under broad pennons of gold,
With rumbling of ponderous drums and conches braying,
Straying of crimson,
Bickering of banners blown to vermilion and gold,
With brown-burnt faces under barbaric turbans,
And a tumult of hoofs upon stony pavements.

And Love has come . . .
But quietly as a girl who walks
With bare feet over the warm grass
In a night of moths and roses.

Enlisting the Colleges for War

BY invitation of the Federal Board for Vocational Education, the representatives of nearly 100 American colleges and technical schools met at Washington on January 11. Although calling forth a bare announcement in the press, it may yet be found that at this important conference a new page was written in the history of American education. For all its undoubted worth, the education of half a century ago was marked, it has been observed, by a certain aloofness, charming, but academic and somewhat self-conscious, marking it off too severely from the actualities of life. The movement of more recent years toward the socialization of the schools, inspired, it is true, by a philosophy burdened with all the defects of its good qualities, has brought life and education into closer harmony, thereby conferring a mutual benefit. If half the plans proposed at the Washington conference survive the strangling influence of the red tape which even now is slowly unwinding from the bolts, a further step toward a more accurate and useful coordination will be the happy result.

What the Conference Proposed

ON December 24, 1917, the colleges were invited to meet at the capital. The general topic of the proposed conference was the possibility of so organizing the schools as to afford the Government a maximum of assistance, with a minimum of "disorganization of the college work proper." It should here be remarked that nothing is farther from the intention of the Government, than to discourage the college of the old-fashioned "classical type." In the years of reconstruction following the war, not less but more deeply, will its humanizing influences be needed. This vital point was clearly recognized by the conference, but, as will be seen, the classical colleges, too, are prepared to take their share in war work. Many, in fact, have already distinguished themselves in the fields open to them. For it need hardly be remarked, in a day which witnessed the rout of President emeritus Eliot by the late Father Timothy Brosnahan, S.J., that the pabulum of the "classical college" is not restricted to Latin and Greek. Of this truth, the laboratories of such representative institutions as Holy Cross and Boston College in the East, St. Louis University in the Middle West, and Santa Clara on the coast, are ample witness.

Making due acknowledgment of the services already afforded, the Board in its praise, certainly did not go beyond the bounds marked off by the merits of the case. The colleges and universities had been liberal in offering the Government the fullest use of all their resources. Whenever possible, they had urged the enlistment of students with such effect, in some cases, that the attendance in September, 1917, instead of the customary augmentation, showed losses ranging to forty per cent. For many of the smaller institutions, the corresponding falling off in fees, created a financial problem of grave import, a problem from which not even the wealthier institutions were wholly free. Nevertheless, the Board felt that the patriotism of the colleges was the guarantee of their readiness for further sacrifice in the common interest.

Occupational Training

AMONG the various schedules prepared by the Board and submitted for discussion, the papers indorsed "War Training Memo. No. 7" and "Mem. Prosser. No. 88" are the most important. The first-named document sets forth the desire of the War Department to provide for the training, in about fifty occupations, of conscripted men in the second and succeeding drafts, "before they are called to the cantonments." The army needs electricians, wiremen, cable splicers, electrical machine repairmen, telephone repairmen, machinists of all kinds, automobile drivers and repairmen, telegraphers and radio-operators, chemists, civil and mechanical engineers, metal workers, printers and wood workers. In the opinion of the Board, some of this training must be given at the camps, but the greater part will be more effectively and economically imparted in technical schools and colleges, and in industrial establishments cooperating with them. The schools, as the Board points out, have an equipment whose value is in excess of $100,000,000, and facilities which no camp could possibly duplicate. By mutual concession, the Board suggested, camp and school could be so coordinated, that while place could be found for the special technical courses asked by the War Department, "too serious a disruption of the normal activities" of the school would be avoided. Some disruption, of course, is inevitable, particularly in the classical colleges. War is not an optional course of lectures on the literary fluff and floss of the renaissance, but something that puts the burden, in reality the privilege, of serving the country, upon all alike.

A Suggested Program

THE second paper noted above, then relates that the experience of the last nine months has shown the need of "some definite, comprehensive program . . . immediately to secure the proper training of more than 200,000 conscripted men for more than fifty different mechanical, technical and engineering occupations required by the seven different branches of the army service." The Board therefore undertook the preparation of a program, which has been submitted to the Secretary of War. The Board suggests the creation of a division of the United States Army to be known as the "Educational Board or Division." It will be made up of representatives from the signal corps, the quartermaster's corps, the aviation division, the engineering corps, the ordnance division, the heavy artillery, and officers to represent the needs and demands of the line. The powers and duties of this Board will include not only the training and proper distribution of mechanics and technicians, but of special groups, such as translators, map-makers, and trainers of carrier-pigeons, commonly classified as neither mechanical nor technical. Finally, it is proposed that the Board be equipped with all necessary funds and authority to act immediately. Not without a touch of sarcasm does the memorandum remark, that "this authority should be as great as that given to any Board or official for the discharge of a vital task, such as the purchase of munitions or the care of wounded men."

> An adequate allotment of moneys for the expenses of the enterprise should be made at the time the Board or division is created. It should be expended under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of War may determine. The task is a tremendous one, and the initial appropriation should be not less than $10,000,000, with which to meet the administrative expenses of the Board or division, including the customary salaries, office expenses and necessary traveling expenses, and the cost of training itself.

Since the men assigned for this special training are enlisted men, "the principle of pay and subsistence for conscripted men in training, wherever they may be detailed, must be accepted." Otherwise, states the Board, the work of the proposed division will be useless. Similarly

> The principle of pay for instruction given by the schools and colleges to conscripted men should be accepted. This charge is a legitimate one, because if the training is not done in this way, it will either not be done at all, or, if done by the army, will cost far more. For the army to provide equipment now owned by the schools and colleges would require the expenditure of $100,000,000.

Further suggestions are detailed under sixteen heads. The courses of study are to be arranged by the Federal Board for Vocational Education in cooperation with the army branches concerned, and are to be approved by the army Board or division before being put into execution. When necessary, evening classes are to be established, and in all cases the training must conform to accepted standards. Faculty members, if conscripted, will be detailed as instructors for such periods as may be required.

The Attitude of Our Colleges

APART from the difficulty of securing the approval of Congress, every college administrator will recognize that to coordinate the new plan with the normal functioning of his school, will not be an easy task. Nevertheless, the difficulty should not be exaggerated, for our "classical" colleges are in many ways admirably fitted to give the training asked by the Government. An "old line college" of so wisely conservative a type as St. Louis University, has done war-work of high quality in its laboratories, and by establishing a school for telegraphy and radiography. A sincere and persistent effort will possibly disclose ways and means of cooperating with the Government, which are now unsuspected. Colleges and individuals are much alike in rarely knowing what they can do until they try. Mars and Apollo may well dwell in harmony under an academic roof. Often have our colleges reconciled interests that seemed far more antagonistic.

The Federal Board admits that it has stepped beyond strictly legal bounds in calling the conference, and there are those who regard with a jealous eye all possible encroachments by the Federal Government upon education. As matters have thus far developed, no "encroachment" is discernible; the only fear is, that little will be left of the proposal after a Congressional committee has debated it. But whatever the outcome, gratitude to the great country under which they have flourished, as well as the claims of religion, urges the Catholic colleges withhold nothing which may aid the Government in the prosecution of the great task which now confronts it.

SOCIOLOGY

The Answer That Satisfies

"IF there's a God, this thing must stop soon," said our host.

"That doesn't exactly follow," said the convert. "If the war does stop soon you might still ask, where God was when the war began."

"But God or no God, it's gone too far," insisted the other. I squirmed. Not so the convert. He knew "ex-Catholics," such as was our host.

"Why, in that event did it begin at all? There's a reason even for cereals, and there must be at least one for this war."

"There's no reason. If there's a God—"

"Sh," warned the convert. "Listen and I'll tell you the reason for the war. It's you: you're the reason. At least, you are one reason."

God's Reminder.

"THE point is this," he went on; "'If there's a God,' He knows the difference between good men and bad men, between right and wrong. You've often heard it said by the advertiser that the world is growing better; also by ecclesiastics who are laughed at, that the world is at present very wicked. Now the fact is, Dives is getting richer and worldly wiser and more efficient, but that hasn't made him any better. Rather worse. You remember what Kipling made Dives say to Satan: 'Behold, all the earth is laid in the peace that I have made; and behold, I wait on thee to trouble it.' Well, Satan has troubled it, and God's Providence has permitted it. It's the old story of God or mammon: and if there is a God, He has a right, and, if I may say it, a duty to remind His children when they forget Him and worship mammon. If the war is not in some way God's scourge, a correction directed by a greater intelligence than our own, then there's very little reason for all this suffering and destruction. The whipping does no good. Now I can see how you—"

"See! Yes, you people full of religion can see; but I—well, I'm not so sure."

"Yes, as I said," proceeded the convert, "you are partly the reason for the war. You know children aren't whipped unless they are bad; and it's not just right to be saying, 'If there's a God,' and 'God or no God.'"

The Harrowing.

"WELL, that's one way of looking at it," admitted our host, smiling timidly.

"That's the only way," said the convert, getting more persistent. "What most of us need is to get over to France and feel death near. I dare say if you've ever felt death around you, it made you want to do something to be better?"

"For the time, yes."

"That's the spiritual side, you see. Men aren't mere machines; and 'if there's a God,' He's not a mere machine either. Death brings us closer to the spiritual side of things. So do suffering and disaster and war. That's how God makes His children remember Him and their immortal souls, when all else fails."

"What good when they're dead?" the other laughed.

"No: when they're dying and seeing others die. Also, when they are living. Nations are dying now, and you can observe the effect on nations. This is no speculation, no theory; it's history, fact. It's always been that way."

"Well?"

"Man has sinned, and God has seen it. That's a reason. It's easy to say, 'If there's a God,' but not so easy to explain these riddles of life if you doubt the existence of God, your immortal soul, and the next life. God has made man a little less than the Angels. If in war, man suffers with Christ, his is the Kingdom of Heaven; if God is left out, well, there's nothing left for the sufferer. There is no reason why all this should be, or any other sorrow in social or individual life, unless, perhaps, that he may open his eyes and see a reason. When a man throws out God, he's bidden a long farewell to all his greatness. There are no more angels than whom he is a little less, save perhaps the angels of darkness."

A sharp silence fell, and presently our host invited us to inspect his new library.

The Meaning of Pain.

"IF there's a God in the heavens." How easily the phrase rolls from the weary warriors of this world, stirred from their lazy luxuries to face the wages of sin! Gold is tried in the fire, and many men are showing their worth in the present crisis. They have tasted sparingly of sweet adversity, and many cannot understand. "If there's a God, this thing must stop." And if it doesn't? Then the riddle is worse than ever. God is not in His heaven; pain, suffering, war have no meaning, life has no reason. All is an unanswerable riddle, a mistake; and the poor struggling sufferers fight on, not only blind and bewildered, but dragging out an existence of unreasonable suffering, of useless hopes.

"Foolish and slow of heart to believe," are we, even when the truth is so near. Without God, this suffering-laden life is the sorriest kind of a joke. With God the sorriest sort of joke is the man who doubts His Divine Providence. You cannot have a God without infinite knowledge, infinite power, infinite love. Otherwise you have not an infinite being. Your idea of God is not filled up. God, who knows all our wants, who has power to give us any and all things, loves us with an everlasting love; and, as God must do, will give what is best for us, according to His wisdom and love. That God exists explains all things. We know that He must do all things wisely, though His thoughts be unfathomed by us.

THE LESSONS OF GOD.

BUT for the heart that has suffered, and has seen suffering, there is more than the mere perception of this truth. It knows that love was the only motive for all the things that were suffered on Calvary. It knows that love has blessed the homes of sorrow and pain, that love has fashioned this world, tear-stained by the sin of a wayward child; it knows that it is meet to suffer these things, and so to enter into glory. Gold is tried in the fire, and saints are made in suffering, where the spirit of Christ is. But where the spirit of Christ is not, there comes the fire not to try, to perfect, but to punish, and by chastizing to turn the thoughts of thoughtless men back to God. That fire is raging now. God is merciful but He is also just. For were there no justice, mercy could not be.

In justice, I return to my quondam ex-Catholic friend. He was a reason for the war, for he was part of that great system that is denying God and God's Providence. The forgetful children must be made to understand, and to welcome each rebuff. They cannot put the lights out of heaven, as Heaven is ever proving to them. My friend is not of that great system now. I had a letter from him recently. His son has gone to France. "Pray for him. God watches over him to take or to leave. . . . I saw our friend, yesterday. God bless him. . . . I often think of that night when he spoke to us of the lessons of God." Such was the trend.

PAUL SWAINE.

NOTE AND COMMENT

The Red Cross Drive

THE Red Cross Christmas drive for an additional ten-million membership has been a "tremendous" success. According to the latest reports available, it has resulted in the addition of fully 16,000,000 new names to the roll of the association. Adding these to the previous membership of 6,000,000 we find that the total present enrolment of the American Red Cross is at the least 22,000,000, or more than one-fifth of the entire population of the United States. "This is a magnificent fact," says Henry P. Davison, Chairman of the War Council of the American Red Cross, "an expression not alone of the patriotism but of the fine sympathy and idealism of the whole American people."

The Chaplains Bill Before Congress

ATTENTION is again called to the need of securing the appointment of an adequate number of chaplains, on the numerical basis of one to every 1,200 men. "This," says the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, "would make a permanently satisfactory arrangement, allowing for the reduction of the army to a peace footing after the war and also for the appointment of chaplains to units not now organized as regiments." The bill, to this effect, introduced into Congress at the previous session, is now before the present Congress. Every citizen interested in the moral and spiritual welfare of our boys at the front is asked to write a personal letter to his Congressman, urging him to vote "yes" on the bill. It is particularly important that religious organizations and societies of every kind throughout the land should interest themselves in the matter.

Camp Memories of Christmas

MEMORIES of the Christmas festivities still linger on in the minds of the soldiers who attended the celebrations held in the various camp buildings erected by the Knights of Columbus. "Uncle Sam's fighting men are deeply appreciative of all that has been done for them, and it would seem that the Christmas observances in all the camps pulled the heart-strings of the men as nothing else could have done." Thus at Jefferson Barracks, Mo., where 18,000 recruits were quartered, many thousands of the men, owing to the "big recruiting rush," received no other Christmas presents than those bestowed through the energy of the Catholic Women's League of St. Louis. The packages of cigarettes, fruits and candies were real treasure-trove for the soldier boys. Although the Christmas treat was given by the Catholic women of St. Louis, the gifts were freely distributed among all. "Recruits in khaki and civilian applicants of every creed, Indians, negroes, and white boys, all lined up in single column around the Christmas tree, near the stage at the front of the building, with their hats in their hands." At Camp Kearney, Mme. Schumann-Heink sang at the Christmas Mass and accompanied by her two sons, one of them in the uniform of the United States Navy, received Holy Communion with the hundreds of soldiers who approached the Sacred Table.

The New York Apostolate

APPENDED to the twenty-first annual report of the New York Apostolate is a brief summary of the work accomplished by these zealous missionaries since the establishment of their Apostolate. During that period no fewer than 756 missions were given by them to Catholics and 243 to non-Catholics. We are further informed that 198 of the missions to non-Catholics and 73 of those to Catholics were gratis. There were 768,779 confessions heard and 12,075 were instructed for the Sacraments. The number of converts made by the missionaries was 4,602. During the past year there were seventy-seven missions given and 160 converts made. Of the missions forty-six were for adults and thirty-one for children. The need of frequent missions for the spiritual renewal of parishes is everywhere deeply felt. They are the most effective means for bringing back lukewarm Catholics to the practice of their holy religion and mightily assist in confirming the more fervent people in their lives of virtue and devotion. They offer the opportunity of bringing again to the notice of all the great fundamental truths and principles of our Faith in a psychological sequence and with a concentration of purpose that can be obtained at no other time. Hence the great importance placed by the Holy See upon these missions and the effort of Protestants to copy them in their revivals. The success of the New York Apostolate and the demand for missions everywhere throughout the country are therefore most favorable signs of Catholic alertness and activity.

Bisbee Deportations and the Verdict

THE report of the President's mediation commission on the forcible deportation of over 1,000 workers from Bisbee, Ariz., in connection with the copper strike, is quoted with great satisfaction in the January number of the Carpenter. Particular emphasis is laid upon the severe condemnation of "those citizens of Bisbee and the officials of the two mining companies who were the instigators of the outrage." Here are the facts in their entirety as recorded by the commission:

> Early on the morning of July 12 the sheriff and a large armed force, presumably to act as deputies under the sheriff's authority, comprising about 2,000 men, rounded up 1,186 men in the Warren district, put them aboard a train and carried them to Columbus, N. M. The authorities at Columbus refused to permit those in charge of the deportation to leave the men there, and the train carried them back to the desert town of Hermanas, N. M., a nearby station. The deportees were wholly without adequate supply of food and water and shelter for two days. At Hermanas the deported men were abandoned by the guards who had brought them and they were left to shift for themselves. The situation was brought to the attention of the War Department, and on July 14 the deportees were escorted by troops to Columbus, N. M., where they were maintained by the Government until the middle of September.

The deportation was carried out under the sheriff of Cochise county. It was formally decided upon at a meeting of citizens on the night of July 11, participated in by the managers and other officials of the Copper Queen Consolidated Mining Company (Phelps-Dodge Corporation, Copper Queen Division) and the Calumet and Arizona Mining Company. Those who planned and directed the deportation purposely abstained from consulting about their plans either with the United States attorney in Arizona or the law officers of the State or country, or their own legal advisers.

In order to carry the plans for the deportation into successful execution, the leaders in the enterprise utilized the local officers of the Bell Telephone Company and exercised, or attempted to exercise, a censorship over parts of interstate connections of both the telephone and telegraph lines in order to prevent any knowledge of the deportation reaching the outside world.

It is vain to hope for a settlement of economic difficulties by such means, which the commission defines as "wholly illegal and without authority in law, either State or Federal."

Perpetuity of the Church

IN glowing language and with unabated vigor of thought Cardinal Gibbons recently preached upon the perpetuity of the Catholic Church. Describing the world in its mighty throes of battle and unrest he pictured the Church of God as the one vision of peace and stability granted to earth:

> In this general cataclysm how reassuring it is for us to contemplate the Church of God serene amid the disquiet and agitation around her, standing erect and unshaken amid the dissolution of empires and kingdoms. The indestructibility of the Catholic Church is truly marvelous and well calculated to excite the admiration of every dispassionate and reflecting mind when we consider the number and variety and the formidable power of the enemies with whom she had to contend from her very birth to the present time; this fact alone stamps divinity on her brow.

She has seen, as he says, the birth of every government in Europe and the foundation of our own republic is but as yesterday to her. She has seen "monarchies changed into republics and republics consolidated into empires, while her own Divine constitution has remained unaltered." There is no human power or astuteness that could have assured for her this unity, perpetuity and indefectibility. It was possible to the power of God alone. Here is a thought that should challenge the attention of the world today.

War Work of the Central Verein

THERE could be no better and clearer statement of our position as Catholics in any great national crisis than that contained in these words of Mgr. Bonzano, spoken over a year ago at a mass meeting of the Central Verein, and quoted by the president of the society at its last convention:

> When they ask you about your loyalty and patriotism simply answer: "I am a Catholic, and according to my Gospel and my Church I must respect and love my flag and my country." I do not think it is necessary for you to say more. Just say: "We are Catholics." That covers it.

The splendid record of our Catholic colleges and parishes, and the Secretary of War's statement of September 22, estimating the number of Catholic soldiers at that time as "perhaps thirty-five per cent" of the entire enrolment, sufficiently bear out the glorious words of the Papal Delegate. The Central Verein itself is engaged at present, in cooperation with the Catholic War Council, in a great drive that is to enable it to "adopt" a number of military chaplains. The purpose is to provide for the needs of the soldiers under the care of these priests, who can then always apply to the Central Verein for their necessary means and supplies. The smallest gift expected from every member of the society is one dollar. The Central Bureau of the Central Verein has been actively engaged since the beginning of the war in the publication and distribution of literature promoting the welfare of our troops. The latest successful venture is the "Soldiers' and Sailors' Series" under the title "Who Goes There?"

Harry Lauder on the War

A VERY optimistic view of the war is taken by Harry Lauder, whose only son, Captain John Lauder, of the Argyll and Sutherland Highlanders, lost his life in France. Telling in the American Magazine of the struggle through which his own soul has passed, the famous singer says:

> In the days before the war, young Englishmen and Frenchmen were leading gay, careless lives, with hardly a thought for the morrow or for such shadowy things as death or a future life. "Let us live and be merry" was the cry then, but now it is all different. Because when men know that at any moment a shell may explode in their midst and blow them to shreds, or that an order may come during the night for certain regiments to make ready to go over the top at dawn, their thoughts are mostly on their God and on the life to come. And because they are all thinking of the same thing, a spiritual silence seems to come among them. The men go off by themselves and write their wills, to be delivered at home in case they do not come back, and all through the night you see silent, yet calm and peaceful faces in the dugouts, and, somehow, the religious atmosphere makes a definite impression upon you. So much so that one night an officer said to me, very quietly: "When I see the men this way, I sometimes wonder if this war was not brought about by God as the only means of making the world think of Him and His laws more often?"

The same impression is not shared by all witnesses, though Catholic priests in general speak with admiration of the devotion shown by our Catholic soldiers.

A Catholic Civil Service School

A CATHOLIC Civil Service School has for some time past been conducted in New York with the purpose of preparing candidates for the position of attendance officers. Forty permanent appointments are at present offered by the Board of Education in that city. It is an excellent plan therefore that Catholic men and women should be instructed to fit themselves for these important public functions. Additional prestige is given to the school during the present year by connecting it with the Sociological School of Fordham University as an extension course conducted at the Cathedral College Hall. Its purpose is not to offer the completely rounded sociological and social service education of the two years' course of the regular school, preparatory to the reception of the University diploma, but simply to present a series of special instructions and lessons to those who are seeking to qualify themselves for the particular civil service positions in question. Teachers, nurses, social workers, members of the St. Vincent de Paul Society, Big Brothers and Big Sisters, and those in hospital social service or connected with public or private institutions which are established for child welfare are particularly desirable candidates. This is evidently a progressive idea that might well be applied and carried out in our other cities in conformity with existing conditions. The classes are conducted on Monday and Thursday nights during the present year, beginning with January 14, and continuing until the applications are issued.

Chronicle

The War.—After a period of relative quiet on the western front, operations were resumed during the week from Nieuport, where the French now hold the line, to the Swiss frontier. The movements were nowhere of a major character but were everywhere marked by the intensity of the struggle. Northwest of Reims and on the right bank of the Meuse there was an intense incessant artillery duel. Heavy German raids repeatedly took place southeast of St. Quentin and north of Courtecon. The struggle on the Aisne front north of Souain and Avocourt was of a particular violent nature. The Germans claim that in this sector they took a considerable number of prisoners, while Field Marshal Haig reports that a German attack broke down at La Bassée, under the fire of the British batteries, and a French communiqué states that another German attack on the front of Chaume Wood, north of Verdun, was ineffective.

Bulletin, Jan. 22, a.m.-Jan. 29, a. m.

The most important event of the week is the withdrawal of the Austrians in the mountains of Italy, where they fell back on the west of the upper Piave from their strong positions on Monte Tomba to Monte Spinoncia.

As a result of the revelations concerning the manner in which military and economic preparations have been conducted by the President and the Administration, the Senate Committee on Military Affairs has prepared a bill whose main purposes are as follows: A War Cabinet is to be created, composed of three citizens of distinguished ability, to be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, through which War Cabinet the President may exercise such of the powers conferred upon him by the Constitution as are described in the bill. The War Cabinet is to be superior to the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy and all other officers of the Government except the President, its acts being subject to his review. Differences between Cabinet officers and other officials as to the conduct of the war are to be adjusted by the War Cabinet. No head of any executive of the Government is to be a member of this Cabinet. The bill does not provide that the President shall be a member of the new Cabinet or sit with it. The President is left to his own determination in this connection.

The War Cabinet Controversy

Senator Chamberlain of Oregon, who made charges in New York that the Government had broken down in its war preparations, has officially repeated them in the Senate, adding, however, that he referred to the military preparations about which he contended that the President was misinformed. He also declared that he did not intend to attack the Administration, and proclaimed his loyalty to the country. In the array of evidence put before the Senate to prove that the military establishment had fallen down, Senator Chamberlain referred to the disclosures of delay in ordnance and equipment; of illness in the camps due, he alleged, to failure to create an adequate system, and of a failure in general to use the vast machinery of the War Department to put the country on a war footing.

The President, who had formally denied the charges of military inefficiency and had specifically upheld the official conduct of the Secretary of War, Mr. Baker, who has been under investigation by the Senate and is the storm-center of the controversy, does not seem inclined to suffer any curtailment of the rights and duties with which, in his capacity of Commander-in-Chief of the Army, the Constitution invests him. He is set against the War Cabinet bill, as well as the bill for the creation of a Munitions Ministry. As to the latter, in a note addressed to Senator Chamberlain, on January 11, and later made public by Senator Chamberlain, the President frankly expressed his disapproval. Not only, he said, would the results be disappointing and a dislocation of activities ensue, but even to attempt such a thing would greatly "embarrass the processes of coordination and of action" upon which he had spent "a great deal of thought and of pains," and which, he believed, were more and more yielding the results desired. Meanwhile, Mr. E. R. Stettinius of New York has been appointed by Secretary Baker as Surveyor-General for all army purchases.

The Belgian Government's terms of peace so far as they concern Belgium herself were set forth in her reply to the Holy Father's peace note on January 23. The terms are in substance, those outlined in the peace terms proposed by the Pope himself, absolute political, economic and territorial independence. In enclosing his reply, King Albert wrote the following personal letter to his Holiness:

Belgium and the Pope

Holy Father: I have taken note, with lively sympathy and interest, of the message your Holiness was good enough to send to the heads of the belligerent countries on August 1, and have hastened to submit it to my Government, which has studied it with most serious and deferential attention. The result of that study has been recorded in a note which I am happy to communicate to your Holiness. In associating myself with the wishes of the Holy See that a just and durable peace may promptly put an end to the evils from which humanity, and particularly the Belgian people, so sorely tried, are suffering, I beg your Holiness to believe in my filial and respectful attachment.

The reply of the Belgian Government is an official denial of the charge brought against the Pope that he neglected to protest against the wrongs done to Belgium by her invaders. On this point the note says, in speaking of the Holy Father's peace-message of last August:

At the outset of his message the Holy Father took pains to declare he had forced himself to maintain perfect impartiality toward all the belligerents, which renders more significant the judgment of his Holiness when he concluded in favor of the total evacuation of Belgium and the reestablishment of its full independence, and also recognized the right of Belgium for reparation for damages and the cost of the war. Already in his consistorial allocution of January 22, 1915, the Holy Father had proclaimed before the world that he reproved injustice, and he condescended to give the Belgian Government the assurance that in formulating that reprobation it was the invasion of Belgium he had directly in view.

The honest people of all countries will rejoice with the Belgian Government that the injustice of which Belgium was the victim and the necessity for reparation have been proclaimed, and that the highest moral authority of Christendom remains watchful amidst the passion and conflicts of men.

It was because of the gratitude felt on this account, which was augmented by the numerous charitable acts of the Holy Father in favor of so many Belgians, victims of the violence of the enemy, that the Royal Government has examined into the possibility of contributing in the measures depending upon it toward the realization of the double desire which inspires the Pontifical message: to hasten the end of the present war and render a return of similar catastrophes impossible by the adoption of guarantees destined to assure the supremacy of right over force.

"If there is a country," the note says, "that has a right to say it took up arms to defend its existence, it assuredly is Belgium." It then adds its peace terms as far as Belgium is concerned. They are as follows:

The integrity of Belgium, the territory of the mother country and colonies, political, economic, and military independence without condition or restriction, reparation for damage suffered, and the guarantees against a renewal of the aggression of 1914—such remain the indispensable conditions of a just peace so far as concerns Belgium. Any settlement that would not recognize them would shake the very foundations of justice, since it would forevermore be established that in international domains the violation of right creates a claim for its author and may become a source of profit.

With regard to the peace terms mentioned by the Central Empire in their reply to the Holy Father, the document states:

Since the Royal Government a year ago formulated its conditions, it permits itself to recall that the Reichstag voted resolutions called peace resolutions. The Chancellors and Ministers of Foreign Affairs have followed each other in the German Empire, and more recently in the Central Empires, and have published notes replying to the message of his Holiness, but never a word has been pronounced and never a line written clearly recognizing the indisputable rights of Belgium, that his Holiness has not ceased to recognize and proclaim.

The message of King Albert and his Government is a clear statement of their conditions and at the same time a perfect vindication of the policy of the Pope with regard to the unfortunate country.

Count von Hertling, the German Chancellor, outlined Germany's peace terms in his address before the Reichstag Committee on Jan. 24. Commenting on the fourteen points in the program for world-peace set forth in President Wilson's address to Congress, the Chancellor said that an agreement could be easily obtained on the first four points, i. e., open covenants of peace, freedom of the seas, removal of economic barriers and establishment of equality of trade-conditions and reduction of armaments. Regarding the fifth point mentioned by President Wilson, namely, adjustment of colonial claims based upon the principle that the peoples concerned have equal weight with the interest of the Government, the Chancellor said that some difficulties would be met with. The sixth point, the evacuation of all Russian territory, he stated, concerned Russia and the Central Powers only. With regard to the seventh, the evacuation of Belgium, Germany, according to the Count, never intended to wrest Belgium by force or annex that country. The President's eighth point called for the restoration of all French territory and the righting of the wrong done in taking Alsace-Lorraine. The question of Northern France would be a question for discussion between Germany and France, said the Chancellor; but Alsace-Lorraine would never be given up. He added that readjustment of Italy's frontiers along lines of nationality should be referred to Austria, as well as the Balkan questions, the evacuation of Rumania, Serbia and Montenegro, and access to the sea for Serbia. The President, in his eighth point, demanded the sovereignty of Turkey's portion of the Ottoman Empire, security for other nationalities under Turkish rule and the opening of the Dardanelles to all nations. Germany rejects the open Dardanelles clause as endangering Turkey's existence. In answer to the American demand for an independent Polish State, Von Hertling declared that that question must be settled by Germany and Austria and Hungary. To the fourteenth point in the Presidential address, namely an association of nations for guarantees of political independence and territorial integrity to all, the Chancellor countered by saying "a durable peace first and then discussion of the question of a league of nations." On the question of a general peace Count Czernin is quoted as having said in the Austrian Parliament that he considered President Wilson's peace propositions an approach to the Austro-Hungarian point of view, Austria however would fight to the end in defense of her alliance with Germany.

The Hertling Peace Terms

The Russian delegates to the Brest-Litovsk conference have unanimously decided to reject the final terms offered by the Germans, which are that Russia must give up Courland and all the Baltic provinces, otherwise the Germans will resume military operations and occupy Reval within a week. The question of peace or war rests with the Congress of Soldiers or Workmen's Delegates in Petrograd. Dispatches from Amsterdam on the other hand state that the German Chancellor, Count von Hertling, in addressing the main committee of the Reichstag on January 24, stated that he still held fast to the hope that the Brest-Litovsk negotiations would soon reach a satisfactory conclusion. He also declared that the German Government hoped soon to make an agreement with Ukraine "which would be mutually satisfactory especially from an economic point of view." The peace-strike in Austria, at first reported serious, has apparently been broken. According to the latest despatches the democratic movement in the Empire has received a great impetus which has been further emphasized by the Bohemian demand for self-determination pressed in the Vienna Parliament. On January 25 the New York Evening Post published the first instalment of the full texts of the sensational secret treaties between Russia and the Entente Allies, taken from the files of the Russian Foreign Office and made public by the Bolshevist Government in Petrograd. It is prefaced by Leo Trotzky's statement on secret diplomacy issued at the time of the first revelation of the documents.

Other Items

France.—The law concerning the wards of the French nation is about to be put into execution; that is, the orphans whose father or mother, or the one on whom the children depended for support, has fallen in the course of this war, or has been incapacitated by wounds received, or maladies contracted or aggravated by reason of the war, are soon to be adopted by France with a view to their protection, education and support. From the very beginning the law caused grave apprehension to Catholics. Recent developments have increased rather than relieved their anxiety. According to La Croix, there is grave reason to believe that the guardianship is to be employed as a powerful means of further laicizing the nation and of robbing French children of their faith. More than 1,000,000 children will be affected, and from official statements made up to the present it appears that no assistance is to be given children unless their families agree to their entrance into the école laïque. It is estimated that approximately $40,000 are to be distributed each week at the direction of the members of the Offices Départementaux, of which the lion's share will probably fall to the Oeuvre des Pupilles de la Nation, whose sectarian character is admitted.

The War Orphans

La Croix urges Catholics to do their utmost, towards the end of February, to secure the election of Catholics wherever such places are to be determined by ballot, as members of the Offices Départementaux. If they succeed in doing this, although they will be in the minority and not in sufficient numbers to control the action of the members of the Office Départemental in their locality, which will be presided over by the prefect, usually a man of pronounced irreligious views, they will nevertheless have a considerable influence in preventing an altogether sectarian and anti-religious application of the law.

Ireland.—The country has been much disturbed during the past week. Craig, a partner of Carson in former opposition to a just settlement of the Irish problem, resigned from the office of Lord Treasurer of the Household, stating that it was impossible for him to separate himself from the action Carson had taken. The press has been speculating a great deal on the reason for the latter's withdrawal from the Cabinet. He says himself that he withdrew on account of the Irish question. The London Daily News suggests that Carson is desirous of bringing about harmony. The Irish Times, organ of southern Unionism, welcomes his "return to Irish politics at a most vital moment of his country's needs." Belfast Unionist papers take it for granted that the Ulster leader is getting ready to fight for Ulster's claims. The Manchester Guardian is of opinion that Carson intends to bring about peace in Ireland. Meantime the British Government is growing restive: it feels that a settlement must be reached in order to ensure friendship with the United States and to satisfy the British people who are weary of the struggle. It is suggested that if the Convention fails in its work, the Government will settle the matter in its own way. The London Chronicle refers to certain eventualities following the Convention which might induce Mr. Redmond to regard his retirement as obligatory, a calamity in the opinion of the aforesaid paper. On January 14 this official communication was issued in London:

The Convention

> At today's Irish Convention a letter from the Premier was read, stating that before the Convention arrived at a decision on certain issues under discussion he and his colleagues in the Cabinet would be happy to confer with the leading representatives of different sections of the Convention, should they desire to follow such a course. Thereupon it was decided to adjourn the Convention and certain members were selected to meet the Premier and his colleagues.
> Sir Horace Plunkett, the chairman, was authorized to arrange the conference at the earliest possible date and immediately thereafter to summon the Convention.

Meantime while this was going on in Ireland, America was waiting for the outcome of the resolution that Miss Ranken introduced into our Congress, calling for the recognition of Ireland's rights. So far Congress has been silent, as have been both the President and Congress in regard to this petition presented to them by Mrs. Sheehy Skeffington:

> We, the undersigned, representing a large body of Irish women whose president was condemned to death for her share in a struggle for the freedom of our country, make an appeal to you, and we base our appeal, first, on the generosity of the American administration in all things affecting women's lives and welfare, and secondly, on your recognition, many times extended, of the justice of Ireland's demand for political freedom. For many lamentable generations the women of Ireland have had to bring up their children in a country in a perpetual state of economic and political disarray consequent on its being governed in the interest of another country. Your declaration concerning a war settlement which has called into being and endowed with hope the spirit of democracy in every country, has made us feel that a new era is opening for us. Our appeal now is to remind you of a cause which should not be overlooked when so many European nationalities are to be reconstructed in accordance with your declaration. Our country, having behind it twenty generations of repression, has, we believe, a profound claim upon those who have declared their will to make the world safe for democracy. We appeal to you to recognize the political independence of Ireland in the form of an Irish republic. And encouraged by the knowledge that the States of Wyoming, Colorado, Utah, Idaho, Washington, California, Arizona, Kansas, Nevada, Montana, Oregon and New York have granted full suffrage to their women, we feel that your generous sympathy will be extended to the women of our country in our demand before the world for the recognition of an Irish republic virtually in existence since April, 1916, the only republic which from its inauguration was prepared to give women their full place in the councils of their nation.

The petition was signed by ten prominent Irish women on behalf of the Irishwomen's Council.

Rome.—On December 20 a Republican Deputy, Signor Pirolini, in a speech delivered before the Italian House of Parliament, asserted that Mgr. Pacelli and Mgr. Tedeschini attended a reception given by the former's brother, at which Madame Caillaux was present. He also made accusations against certain priests of the Propaganda, the Jesuits, Colonel Repond, Commander of the Swiss Guards, and others.

Calumnies Repeated

The Osservatore Romano at once published an authoritative denial of the charges. Mgr. Tedeschini, in the columns of the same journal, repudiated the accusations by a personal letter, called attention to the malicious procedure of Signor Pirolini in repeating calumnies already denied and proved groundless, and declared that Signor Pirolini's intention could only be to involve the Vatican in a scandal at any cost. Referring to the accusation against Colonel Repond, he pointed out that it rested on letters supposed to have been written by the Colonel, but in reality forged, proof of the forgery having already been produced and the culprit punished. M. Ernesto Pacelli made a categorical denial of the statement made by Pirolini that Madame Caillaux had attended a reception in his house. He said he never knew or saw either Monsieur Caillaux or Madame Caillaux, and had never had any communication, direct or indirect, with them or any of their entourage. Father Tacchi-Venturi, Secretary of the Society of Jesus, at once wrote a letter to the Giornale d'Italia, proclaiming in unequivocal terms his love of his country, which, he said, was second to none, and challenging Pirolini to adduce proofs in support of his attack on himself and his fellow-Jesuits.

Cardinal Gasparri, Secretary of State, sent the following telegram to Cardinal Amette of Paris:

Neither M. Caillaux nor Madame Caillaux nor Madame Lenouard have ever been received at the Vatican by his Holiness or the Secretariate of State. It is likewise false that the Cardinal Secretary of State or any other prelate connected with his office has ever seen or met outside of the Vatican any of the persons mentioned, and not a single word has passed between them in writing. I deny unreservedly and categorically any information of contrary import and I protest against this campaign of calumny against the Holy See.

The Irish Catholic, in its issue of January 5, justly remarks that the incident calls for no comment. The Italian Premier, Signor Orlando, while addressing the House of Parliament on December 22, took occasion to deplore the attacks made on the clergy and the Catholic party as unjust and offensive to the supreme spiritual power and to the great mass of patriotic Catholics.

Russia.—After violent scenes in the streets of Petrograd the long-delayed meeting of the Constituent Assembly took place in the Tauride Palace on the afternoon of January 18. The Social Revolutionists elected as Chairman, M. Tchernoff, Minister of Agriculture under the Kerensky Government, defeating Maria Spiridonova, the Bolshevist candidate, by a vote of 244 to 151. The Chairman announced that the Assembly would immediately call a conference of the Entente Allies to consider war-aims. The Bolshevist minority urged, however, that the authority of the Workmen's and Soldiers' Government be first discussed, but the motion was defeated. The Bolsheviki then asked for a two-hours' recess to consider further action, but only a half-hour was granted, and at the expiration of that period the Assembly began to discuss peace and land questions. M. Tseretelli, ex-Minister of the Interior, made a bold speech, sharply criticizing the whole Bolshevist policy, declaring that the country is now facing starvation, labor is in a state of collapse, and the peace conferences are fatal to the revolution. After scenes of disorder, during which Tseretelli's life was attempted, the Assembly hastily passed decrees awarding lands to the peasants and proposing to send delegates to all the warring nations. At 2 a. m. the Bolshevist delegates left the Assembly, two hours later sailors and red guards with fixed bayonets ordered the rest of the delegates to disperse, and a notice appeared on the palace door forbidding admittance. Premier Lenine subsequently announced that the Assembly would not be allowed to convene again. His decree of dissolution declares that the Workmen's and Soldiers' Councils are the only organizations able to direct the struggle of the exploited laboring classes for complete political and economic freedom.

Constituent Assembly Dissolved

Are Soldiers Martyrs?

J. HARDING FISHER, S.J.

THE new year finds the people of the United States firmly fixed in their determination not to shrink from the task they have undertaken. Every public manifestation makes it increasingly evident that there is a quiet, unobtrusive realization of the part, the tremendous part, which our nation is to take in making the world free for the enjoyment of the blessings of peace. The acceptance by Congress of the fact that a state of war exists between us and Austria; the reiteration by the President of our Government's unalterable determination to carry on the war to a successful issue, and his crystallization of the sublime purpose which is animating us in its prosecution; the thorough, if somewhat confused, way in which the economic, financial and industrial portions of our population are steadily but effectively adjusting themselves to war conditions, and the reliance expressed in foreign countries on the assistance which America is prepared to give in the struggle for peace—all emphasize the determination of our people to do their duty by the world.

To Catholics in particular the Christmas and New Year's messages addressed to them by their ecclesiastical superiors, and especially the greeting sent by his Holiness to the American people, have brought home with renewed force the need of courage for every sacrifice that patriotism may demand. That courage is most needed, perhaps, by our American mothers.

The thought of danger, as is natural, is not very often with the boy who dons the uniform. The hurry and bustle of camp life or active service leave him little time to think of wounds or death; but it is not so with his mother. All about her are reminders of her son; and as she comes home from bidding him God-speed in his country's service, she thinks of him out on the trackless courses of the sea or somewhere in France. For all her strength, especially in the silent watches of the night, she cannot keep love's visions, with their forebodings of peril, from rising before her mind.

In her moments of deepest desolation, in which there is no admixture of cowardice or regret but only silent generosity, the little mother who sits at home conjures up the worst, and then she turns to religion for consolation. She is certain that if her boy falls he will die a hero; she wonders if the Lord of Hosts will not gather him into His white-robed army of martyrs. If, she argues, like the Christians of old, he scorns earth's joys with its lures and its frowns, and treads the highway of blood and gives his life for his country's cause, what more is needed for a martyr's crown? Some such thought is seldom wholly absent from her prayers; it is constantly cherished in her heart; sometimes it trembles to her lips in the question if death on the battle-field is not a species of martyrdom. Cardinal Mercier was asked this question on his return from Rome in the first half-year of the war, and other ecclesiastics in other parts of the world have had a similar experience. The question is a natural one; it was asked in the days of St. Thomas, it is current today.

No doubt it would be a source of much consolation to our brave American Catholic women who are sending their sons or brothers, their husbands or their betrothed, into the jaws of death, if they could be assured that the soldier's sacrifice of life, in a just cause, at the call of duty, is sufficient to constitute martyrdom with all its effects, remission of sin by the infusion of sanctifying grace, condonation of eternal and temporal punishment, and immediate entrance into beatitude. But a consolation which is built on error is a sorry one at best; real strength and comfort is to be found, not in pleasing delusions, but in truth. And the truth is that the soldiers who go "over the top" in the face of murderous fire, and, while "doing their bit" fall, never to rise, are not martyrs in the strict sense of the term, although they are martyrs to duty, martyrs to their love of humanity, and, perhaps, martyrs of charity.

To be a martyr in the canonical sense of the word, a sense which is accepted today and has prevailed since the fourth century, although before that time considerable latitude was countenanced in the use of the term, one must (1) suffer death or injuries of their nature apt to produce death, (2) in testimony to the Faith, and (3) without resistance. Applying these tests to those killed in the present war, we find that the first condition is assuredly fulfilled, the second is very doubtfully present, and the third is certainly absent.

Death for one's country, of itself, is not sufficient to constitute martyrdom, even though it be joyfully and heroically met in a worthy cause. The Church has not venerated as martyrs those who die in battle, not even the Crusaders. True, the supreme test of friendship is theirs, they deserve a place in the temple of fame, their names should be kept for a perpetual remembrance and inspiration by the nation for which they gave up their dearest possession, the Church calls them heroes and good men; but they are not numbered among the martyrs. The reason is clear: the essential conditions of martyrdom are absent.

One of these conditions is that the sacrifice of the soldier's life should be a public testimony to the Faith. Two elements are involved in such testimony: the attitude of mind of the one who suffers death, and the motive of the one who inflicts it; the former must submit to his corporal suffering in order to be true to the principles of his Faith, and the latter must be actuated by hatred for the Faith.

As for the mental attitude of the soldier who suffers death, it is by no means inconceivable that it should be such as to constitute, so far as he is concerned, a real cause of martyrdom. That such should be the case, nothing more is required than that he should so transfigure and elevate his patriotism with supernatural motives and Divine charity as to bring it into direct relation with God. The sublime motives proposed to American soldiers in the present war are easily susceptible of such a transfiguration, and evidence is not wanting that it has been an actual and not infrequent fact. Nevertheless, this act by which the soldiers supernaturalize their sacrifice lacks the clear stamp of the special publicity required in the supreme witness to the Faith, for, so far as external appearances go, there is nothing to differentiate it from the sacrifice of many others who have no faith. Moreover, hatred of the Faith, as an actuating motive, is certainly absent from most of the battle-fronts. In no case can hatred be attributed on grounds stronger than conjecture.

But even if it were certain that the American soldiers dying on the battle-field were giving public testimony to the Faith, it still remains true that they lack the other condition of martyrdom. A martyr must be passive, he must make no effort to defend himself or to injure his assailant. Such submission is obviously out of the question in battle. So far from being a virtue, it would be a serious dereliction of duty; for the soldier, no less than his Government, must make every effort to reduce the fighting strength of the enemy and conserve the fighting strength of his own army; he is bound to do his utmost to render the foe ineffective; he must neglect no means of defending his own life, even at the cost of taking the foe's. This is his strict duty. If, therefore, he does his duty as a soldier he makes martyrdom impossible.

These are the reasons which led Cardinal Mercier to deny Belgian mothers the consolation of believing their sons martyrs; and yet he did afford them another source of comfort, which is hardly less, when he assured them that he had no doubt that God crowns with eternal salvation the military valor of the soldier who consciously lays down his life in defense of his country's honor, in vindication of violated justice, and in the true Christian spirit. Such an act easily rises to the highest degree of charity, and a single act of perfect charity cancels a whole lifetime of sins.

A writer in the Revue Pratique d'Apologétique is of the same opinion. Speaking of France, he says that it is faith rather than patriotism which has sustained the victims, that their sacrifice and death have been made in the name of Christian principles, in the spirit of reparation, expiation and love of Christ. Grace, he says, is the source of their courage, charity towards God and their neighbor their principal motive, the Divine good bound up with the human good the end they propose to themselves. "For God, the Church and for France," is their glorious motto. Such men are not far from the Kingdom of God; undoubtedly they are offered and assuredly they accept the grace to die in the perfect love of God.

Even though they be in sin, when they receive the order to go forward, they will realize that this means looking death in the face, and will find, especially if they be Catholics, their minds turning to God and their hearts pleading for pardon. All that they need for forgiveness is to elicit an act of sorrow with perfect love for its motive. Who would dare say that God will not give the grace for this to those who are following in His footsteps and generously laying down their lives for their friends? Very few who have any faith at all would refuse to accept such a grace when they stand on the brink of the grave, and see the witchery of trifles fading away and the great light of truth illuminating the stern meaning of life. This is the consolation that mothers should lay to their hearts. After all, what more could a mother wish for her son than that losing his life he should find it; that dying in time he should live in eternity? It is the prayer she whispered over his cradle, it is the epitaph she should inscribe to his memory.

A Benefit from the War

EBER COLE BYAM

WAR, terrible as it is, has its compensations in benefits that otherwise would not have been granted or, if granted, would have been ignored. This was clearly set forth in the remarkable Christmas message of his Grace, the most Reverend George W. Mundelein, Archbishop of Chicago, a message, by the way, that every patriotic American should read with reverence, no matter what his creed.

In addition to those cited by his Grace, there will come some benefits which, if recognized and properly employed, will afford an opportunity to guard against the future for the protection of civilization. One of these benefits is the unmasking of the Socialists and their brethren the I. W. W. or Bolsheviki.

The varying degrees of Socialism reach almost into infinity, from that of the dreaming theorists to the I. W. W. Apaches, but the great majority of Socialists are more or less anxious to see the destruction, by violent revolution, of the existing social order, that upon the ruins there may be erected the cloud castles of their vaporous imaginations.

In times of peace the long-suffering good-nature of the American people compelled a tolerance of the propaganda scattered by the Socialist I. W. W. "red-flaggers," and the more violent their ravings and the more exaggerated their self-evident lies became, the more the indulgent American smiled pityingly. Yet, insane and absurd as these fanatics have been in their mouthings, there have been multitudes eager to believe their absurdities and imitate their insanities. This might very well have brought about violence, and it may do so even yet, had not the United States entered into the world-war. This entrance into the war has compelled a separation of the sheep from the goats, and in this process we find the Socialists, the I. W. W., the Bolsheviki—they are really synonymous,—all actively engaged in aiding the enemies of America and its companions in arms.

The admission of Socialism to the ranks of the political parties of the United States was an act of folly comparable only to that of the farmer who warmed the viper in his bosom only to be stung to death by it. Fortunately for American civilization the war has shown the American people their danger; but, if they would avoid the fate of the farmer, they must crush the head of this Socialist-I. W. W.-Bolshevist snake now granted asylum in their midst.

That Socialists, I. W. W. and Bolsheviki are all of the same breed is being demonstrated with increasing clearness each day. If this could have been demonstrated several years ago, much misery might have been avoided. Russia is today entering into the same chaos that has oppressed suffering Mexico for several years. Indeed, it may be truthfully said that Mexico's history of nearly 100 years has been a continuous performance of Bolshevist anarchy under varying disguises of political camouflage.

The Bolsheviki and the I. W. W. are but twins and fit offspring of their infernal parent, Socialism. Since March of 1913 they have made, under various aliases, a very hell of Mexico, and are now plunging Russia into the same abyss. By its armed forces the United States Government intervened to enthrone the bewhiskered Bolshevist leader in Mexico, and, learning nothing by experience, it committed the insane folly of permitting the return to Russia of all the Russian Bolshevist-I. W. W.-Socialist scum that had sought refuge in American gutters. As a consequence of the first act, we are required to maintain a large army guarding the 1,800 miles of Mexican border, just that many less men to send to France; while, as a consequence of the second act, Germany can transfer 1,000,000 men to the west front and seize the food supplies of Russia.

The Bolsheviki have even had the audacity to send a ship loaded with arms and supplies to their brother I. W. W.'s in the United States, and, while the attempt to start a Bolshevist revolution here was a ridiculous failure, it must not be forgotten that the intent to do so was most infernally real.

Fortunately, the emergency of war has unmasked the Socialist-I. W. W.-Bolshevist combination, yet, in spite of all this, it is announced that these apostles of destruction are to be permitted to enter the country and "preach their doctrine of government without hindrance" (Press dispatches from Washington in morning papers of December 26).

This "doctrine of government" is frankly one demanding the overthrow of our present form of government by violence, and it would repeat in the United States the same chaos and anarchy reigning in Mexico and in Russia.

True, the I. W. W.-Bolsheviki-Socialists have been unmasked, but, unfortunately, too many Americans refuse to recognize the danger and prefer to dismiss it as but the fanatic viciousness of a few of the collarless and unwashed agitators. Collarless and unwashed they certainly are, but few, they as certainly are not, and among them there is found an occasional creature possessing not only education but wealth. Through some mental twist such find an impish delight in urging their many-headed companions to destruction.

Mr. William Bross Lloyd, announced as "one of the owners of the Chicago Tribune," published a letter in the Chicago Examiner on Christmas Day which is good evidence in support of the statements made in this article. Mr. Lloyd says, in part: "I want the people to join the Socialist party." That statement identifies Mr. Lloyd for what he is and the Socialist party for what it is. As to his attitude he says: "I'm a revolutionist. The only reason I'm against this war is that the United States aren't fighting the people I want to fight." In this he agrees with the Bolsheviki. Concerning his purpose Mr. Lloyd says: "I'm a revolutionist and I want to overturn and destroy the present capitalist system. . . ."

"Overturn and destroy" are his words, and thousands of the liquor-scented, unwashed radicals echo his cry and look forward to the day when they will be privileged to outrage and rob and ruin, even as in Mexico and Russia they have outraged and robbed and ruined. In these unhappy countries no woman's honor is safe, no man's life secure, while property is but something to be stolen or destroyed. That is the state of affairs Mr. Lloyd would establish in the United States. Mr. Lloyd and his unkempt following are in deadly earnest and it behooves thinking people to awaken to the impending danger.

One of the possible benefits accompanying this war is the elimination of Socialism. Let us hope that this benefit may be realized and that in its realization all the rest of the political Apaches may be cast into the limbo where they belong.

Autocracy is fighting democracy, Socialism is fighting civilization. Autocracy would make it impossible to enjoy civilization, but Socialism would destroy civilization altogether. Both are intolerable tyrannies inimical to the welfare of the human race.

A Cure for Caprice

DANIEL A. LORD, S.J.

ROUGHLY considered, there are two general classes of moralists: the moralists who invent theories, and the moralists who live them. The second follow the first as inevitably as a tail follows a comet or a small boy a circus parade. There precisely is the danger of all moral theorizing. If every man were a hermit, living ten miles from his nearest neighbor and absolutely barred from communication with anything more human than a woodchuck, he might sit quietly, in the midst of the forest, spinning moral theories from dewy dawn to dusky eventide.

But moralists love solitude as much as they hate print. As soon as a moralist has gathered a dainty little handful of fantastic moral principles, he rushes furiously into a university or a publisher's office, blows a bugle, clangs a gong, and assembles the populace; whereupon, some pliant idiot takes the new teachings hot from the master's lips and plunges outdoors to try them on the neighbors. Why have the neighbors never thought of organizing a Home Guard?

Geographers may not mention the fact, but among the most important products of our country and among our staple importations are lawless heroes and wayward heroines. They ramp through our current novels and over our subsidized stage "living their own lives." (We can be grateful, by the way, that they're not living ours.) Through the medium of special newspaper writers with alliterative names they tell the credulous public that their particular murder or adultery or robbery was the expression of their eager, panting souls. They did no wrong; how could they, when they were following their esthetic conscience? What we call crime, they call necessary self-expression. Men, stand to the life-buoy!

Irritating and ridiculous as these criminals in evening clothes may be, they are after all only the camp followers of a very definite school of morality. They all stand valiantly for the principle that whatever the individual decrees to do is right; evil is whatever the individual conscience feels itself unable to perform. Morality for them is so much a matter of private interpretation that any crime from manslaughter to the wholesale production of literature reeking of vice is justified by the smug criminals and hysterical feminists who hold office in the "Eager Society of Sob Sisters." We must not be too hard on them for carrying to its ridiculous conclusion the theory of subjective morality.

Since the days of Kant, its ablest exponent, the subjective school of morality has flourished mightily. Kant held that a morally good action is one which my reason decrees and which I feel could be made the universal rule of action for all men. Shall I die for my country? asks the soldier as his officer calls for volunteers in an enterprise that means certain destruction. Yes, he answers; because my reason bids me die for my land, and because the best rule for all men under these circumstances would be to die thus for their land.

Shall I leave my husband? asks the modern heroine, in and out of the covers of our best-sellers, when her butterfly affection has flitted to the handsome coast guard. Yes, she cries, placing her hand where her heart, if she had one, would be located; because my reason bids me leave where love no longer dwells, and I should wish all women to do as I do under the same circumstances. An ethical society of self-respecting Eskimo squaws would sniff at such morality, while a professor without a sense of humor would begin to explain the distinction between reason and caprice. But why should the moralist who accepts as his moral standard the individual conscience condemn her? Each one in his theory is moral dictator for himself, not only judging what is right and wrong but actually making it so. As dictators are notoriously irresponsible, we need not be surprised at the sickening procession of men and women in fiction and real life for whom the whim of the minute has become the law of life. Nor need we flatter ourselves that the end is yet.

Why will people persist in talking as if our reason were really the only unreasonable thing in the world? Unlike the German philosopher in the famous yarn, we do not pull down the blinds and fling all our natural histories in the fire when we want to know what a camel may be like. We trot out to the zoo and look a camel straight in the eye. If we don't, ten to one our camel will be a hippogrif or a dodo. In the same identical way the reason does not go into a darkroom to spin unreal theories out of nebulous data. It is not reason but nonsense unless it bases its operations on the facts of life.

So once more our moralistic friends are looking through the large end of the opera glasses. An action like murder or kidnaping, is not wrong because my reason forbids it; my reason, if it makes any pretense of being reasonable, forbids it because it is wrong. My reason, as soon as it knows anything about the nature of arsenic, mildly suggests the inadvisability of consuming it with my meals. Arsenic, however, is not slightly deleterious because my reason forbids it; my reason forbids it because, as a substitute for demi-tasse, arsenic is not conducive to long life or proper digestion. Some kind grammarian ought to write a guide to the uses of "because."

Take a swift glance at any of the thousand actions which from the dawn of history, man's reason has classified as good or bad. In every case you will find that there is something in the very act itself which forces man's reason to approve or disapprove it. Every reasonable man recognizes the moral goodness of patriotism because through it our national life, so necessary to true peace and temporal prosperity, alone can be conserved. In a parallel way men recognize the evil of treason because like the ambushed assassin it aims with cowardly malice at the peace and happiness not of a single individual but of a whole people. There is something inherent in every good action which forces the human reason to approve it; and something in every evil action which forces the reason to condemn it. And that something we claim is its conformity or lack of conformity to man's rational nature taken in all its aspects.

Perhaps this may look a bit vague and cryptic; if so, blame a new combination of words; the fact itself is familiar to every moral man and woman. You, kindly reader in your armchair, act upon it a thousand times a day. Suppose, for example, that an honorable man feels within himself the sudden wild impulse to grip the throat of the scoundrel who ruined him in business; instantly his better nature (See, how we seem to slip into the phrase?) rises in protest, and he casts the impulse aside as unworthy of him. Why? Because he sees clearly that murder reduced man to the level of a beast of prey, making him worthy fellow of the wolf and the panther; murder is against his whole rational nature. Why does a pure woman shrink so swiftly from the slightest stain upon her honor? Because she realizes that her woman's nature has entitled her to a niche just below the angels, and every impulse that tends to cloud her stainlessness causes her to be less the being whose purity makes men honorable, and more the mere animal whose passion makes men beasts. Eating and drinking in themselves are actions which we share in common with the brute, though absolutely necessary for life. But we are instantly aware that when a man eats, as the Romans did, for the sheer joy of eating, or when a man allows a craving for drink to ruin his poetic genius, he works against his human nature and commits a morally wrong act.

For all their arguments to the contrary, the Hedonist and the Social Utilitarian could not stay moral men for a single day unless they were constantly recurring to their human natures as the moral metric stick by which to measure their conduct. An action, say they, is morally good which promotes happiness. Yes, but surely all happiness is not moral. We have only to glance at the dens of our cities to realize that fact. Only that happiness is moral which conforms to man's rational nature, which raises it up and ennobles it. The libertine and the drunkard have no right to call their bestial pleasures man's true happiness, because they drag man's intellect and will through the gutters and make their victims false to the duties which constitute man's highest dignity.

In this day of men whose favorite study is their image in a glass and of women whose horizon is bounded by the hem of their skirts one must keep dinning with monotonous repetition on that tiny additional phrase, "taken in all its aspects." Is it not maddening to hear our cant writers harping on "self realization," as if men and women were isolated beings with the breeze and the sea-foam for their parents and the upper regions of the air for their habitat? There is no genuine self realization which does not take into consideration human nature in all its aspects, and very importantly in its essential relations to others.

We are bound, whether we like it or not, with woven steel to our parents, to our children, to civil society, to God. The mother who, in her enthusiastic hunt after culture, has to inquire her baby's name each time she goes to see it, may be wise as Aspasia; in one very important relation she is not a moral woman. A lie may here and now be to the eminent advantage of a lawyer; yet because of his essential duties as a member of the State, he may not perform an act that weakens the mutual trust and confidence without which society would be worse than a confederacy of picaroons. And while other moral systems, which regard man's epitaph as the end of all, may see no good in a man who contributes nothing to society's temporal prosperity, we find place in our moral world for the martyr, the missionary, the Poor Clare, and the man who lives to see noble hopes and dreams crushed into pitiful fragments.

It is the proud boast of Catholic philosophy that, here as elsewhere, she is the valiant champion of human nature. She stands for all that is best and noblest in man's nature; she points out a moral guide that cannot but lead him aright. The man and woman who keep their grip fixed on their human nature will not find themselves twisted from their path by every whim that blows hot with the breath of passion. Our moral standard is the sure cure for caprice.

Who's Who in Quebec

J. C. WALSH

WHEN the officers of the French regiments in Canada went home to France after the cession of 1763, as most of them did, the population left behind consisted of some 60,000 souls. A good many of the seigneurs remained, and a delightful section of the native literature is that in which the life of the countryside under the old manorial conditions is described. But the bulk of the population were the tenant farmers, the roturiers. I once asked a brilliant writer, with a talent worthy of Paris, if he were related to a judge of his name. "There is no seigneur about me," he answered. "I am a roturier." It was just about that time the lawyers at the bar had agreed to Votre Seigneurie as a free translation for "Your Lordship," by which title a Canadian judge is invoked in England. The device was accepted, but one venerable magistrate was prompted to comment that, "Of our seigneuries there seems to remain only the banalités," that being the name given to one of the feudal privileges from which the old seigneur derived his profit.

Considering that this seigniorial system lasted in full vigor until the middle of the last century, and that it is still a matter of prime importance when buying land to make sure that the seigniorial dues have been commuted and paid, it is not difficult for anyone with a sense of values in sociology to realize that here is a community which has habits, manners, outlook and a history of its own, and that standards which can be freely and accurately applied elsewhere do not necessarily apply here at all. Where you can follow a family from the early part of the seventeenth century, from its little farm on the St. Lawrence or the Richelieu, back, back, back from the river front as the generations multiplied, then into the towns and at last into the cities, where you can trace words they brought with them from Normandy or from Anjou, where you can listen to the songs they brought with them three hundred years ago and which you hear nowhere else on this continent, you find yourself in presence of a soul which is entitled to respect, and which will not make itself over to the pattern you in your wisdom prescribe, even if you issue your commands roughly.

The type of Quebec farm, everywhere, until a few years ago and in many sections yet, was the " full " farm, laid out and worked to give a complete existence to the family just as if the rest of the world did not exist. There were fields for bread, and fields for meat; there was the carefully tended wood-lot; the women wove the cloth from the wool of their own sheep and from the cloth they made the clothes. Economically, that was the solid foundation of life. Socially, there was a system deeply rooted in religion and kindliness. The parish church was the center of all communal activities. A society whose growth has been as that of the Scriptural mustard-tree is not to be refashioned as a tailor makes over an old coat. Unfortunately that is an idea many well-meaning people, and many others, never can get into their heads.

One could deduce, if he did not know, the professional element in such a community. The priest, the doctor, the notary; at a long distance from the beginnings of development, the lawyer. Indeed the lawyer came with the town, and he got his training, like the others of the élite, mainly in the classical colleges which rose upon the devotion of Religious Orders. Not until the third quarter of the nineteenth century, but since then with a vigor that has brought remarkable results, were the people able to engage seriously in commerce, industry, finance and the professions related to natural science. Political leaders they had always had, men of power and of achievement. And there was always a high order of journalism, even if it was compassed about by much not so high.

This old Quebec, which is keenly alive and sensitively responsive from brain-center to farthest extremity, finds its political expression today mainly through the voices of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Sir Lomer Gouin and M. Henri Bourassa. Laurier is the leader of almost the whole of the Province's delegation in the Canadian Parliament; Gouin is the leader of an almost equally solid delegation in the legislature of the Province; and Bourassa as popular tribune and serious journalist wields an enormous influence in the formation of public opinion.

Laurier, of course, long ago attained to a high place in international statesmanship. It would not be appropriate to seek now to limit his standing to the rank of a Quebec politician. But what is true is that for the forty years he has been in public life his own people have idolized him and have stuck to him. He has never spent a great deal of time in laboring to secure a continuance of his people's favor, and they have never required him to put on the candidate's white robe and come and beg their good-will. A strong case might even be made out for the theory that the more distinction he won away from home the more his own were proud of him and content to support him. The same thing would happen tomorrow if a turn of events should cause Quebec to be forgotten and therefore to lose the self-consciousness which the none too polite attentions of others force upon her now.

Sir Lomer Gouin, on the other hand, has fought all his fights at home, and, as the Serbs and the Bulgarians say, there is no blow so cruel as that a brother strikes. Nevertheless, in the close in-fighting of now nearly a score of years, Gouin has been consistently successful, and that of itself would argue the possession of high qualities. He is endowed, in fact, with those attributes one associates with the idea of a great judge. His mind is clear as a straight road ahead, and his thought never gets lost in wayside thickets. He is a scholar, a student, a speaker whose every sentence registers a decision. He is not without warmth of imagination, but when he gives it play it is upon a concrete program, of which he transmits rather the details than the inspiration. He is endowed with that high order of prudence, or perhaps he has cultivated it, which enables a man to keep his judgment and his will traveling comfortably together in double harness. He prefers a result achieved to a project conceived, and yet he has part of the devotion of a disciple back of his determination to complete the program outlined decades ago by his predecessor and relative, Mercier. Not a seeker of quarrels, he has repeatedly carried himself with high political courage. Never a captious critic of what public men do or say in the English Provinces, he is firm in the assertion of the rights of his own Province when attacked, and he knows so well what those rights are that I can remember no occasion on which his defense was unsuccessful. No doubt he has his limitations, but if he has they are not of the sort which count in a crisis like the present, if crisis there be, when the adequate safeguard of his people's interest is the task that confronts him.

M. Bourassa, the third of the group, differs from the other two mainly in that he has deliberately put away what most public men ardently covet. He prefers the free advocacy of opinion without the hampering obligations of public office. He labors incessantly, passionately, to form the mind of his people, content that others should have what satisfaction legitimately attaches to the exercise of power associated with the translation of the popular will into legislative or executive action. Not that he shirks the awkward or the vital issues. On the contrary, he is a popular tribune in the sense that Wendell Phillips was a popular tribune, or John Bright, or Mazzini. Few men anywhere have such moving power over an audience. His labors of preparation are Gladstonian in volume and thoroughness. He has a courage and an aggressiveness that are a legacy from Papineau his great ancestor. Moreover, he writes as well as he talks, and in the one medium or in the other he can inflame or he can restrain with equal success. If he is sometimes violent, he can be contrite, and if by violence he makes enemies there is a consistency of purpose running through his career of intense and unceasing activity which has won for him the respect that is the tribute exacted from his fellows by a man of character. He fights, as Browning says, "breast forward." And, without office, he wields a power with which men in office have to reckon.

With three such men in her service, Quebec can hope to withstand what shocks the near future may have in store for her. Indeed, there are not many little peoples, if one looks the world over, who are anything like so well provided with leadership. And as all they want is to live their lives in their own way, to continue the civilization patiently builded by so many God-fearing law-abiding generations on the only soil they knew, the prospect is not nearly so bad as many excitable and doubtless well-meaning people would have us think.

The Troubles of an Anglican Bishopric

A. Hilliard Atteridge

THE last Catholic Bishop of Hereford, Thomas Reynolds, died a prisoner for the Faith, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. He was the last of a line of prelates extending back to the days of the Mercian kingdom in the seventh century. One of the Norman Bishops, Losinga, the friend of St. Wulstan, laid the foundation stone of its cathedral, whose great central tower was erected in the days immediately before the Reformation. It has been in Protestant hands for more than three centuries. It has been disfigured by the wretched restoration work of ignorant eighteenth-century architects. The shrine of St. Ethelbert has been swept away, and the Lady Chapel, as usual in the old English cathedrals, turned into a place for the erection of monuments to men of local fame. And the Anglican clergymen who have usurped the see of Losinga, of St. Thomas of Hereford and of the confessor, Reynolds, have in later years numbered in their line of succession bishops who have held and preached doctrines that are not merely un-Catholic but can only be described as un-Christian.

In the days of the Tractarian movement, when the Church of England was staggering under the shock of Newman's conversion and the abandonment of Anglicanism by a host of its most brilliant supporters, there was a new crisis provoked by Lord John Russell's appointment of Dr. Hampden to the see of Hereford. Hampden in his Bampton lectures, and in a pamphlet written in defense of them, had questioned the full revelation of the Scriptures and taught doctrine that was near akin to Unitarianism. Half the Bishops of the day addressed a protest to the Prime Minister; Manning, then Archdeacon of Chichester, was the chief speaker at a great indignation meeting of the clergy in London; but the protest had no effect, Hampden entered into possession of his see, a few Anglicans took the logical course of leaving a Church that had ceased to defend the elementary doctrines of Christianity, but most of them made up their minds to bear with this "new trial" of the introduction of a semi-Unitarian prelate into the episcopal bench.

Dr. Percival, who has been Bishop of Hereford since 1895, resigned his see this summer on account of age and ill health. His peculiar views had always been another "trial" to the advanced Anglicans who flatter themselves that they represent the Catholic Church of old England. Percival, a Liberal in politics and theology, held the old Protestant views that the High Churchmen repudiate, and he frankly protested against their theories. In an ordination sermon in Hereford Cathedral at the Christmas of 1908, he told the candidates for orders that the "Kingdom of Christ had no sacerdotal system," and went on to say:

> This absence of any sacerdotal order from the Christian Church, rightly understood, is deserving of all the more careful attention because of the tendency of a section in our Church of England to drift back towards the erroneous and misleading Roman doctrine of a sacrificing priesthood.

The High Church party deplored Dr. Percival's views, but consoled themselves with the hope that sooner or later he would be succeeded by a more "Catholic" prelate. They have been most bitterly disappointed. Mr. Lloyd George has promoted to the see of Hereford Dr. Hensley Henson, Dean of Durham, and the promotion is a curious index of the condition of the Church of England.

Dr. Henson is an Oxford man, in his fifty-fifth year. He is described as "a Broad Churchman of independent views to which he is not afraid to give the frankest expression." So one of his admirers writes about him. His clerical career began in the London district. In 1900 he was given a canonry at Westminster Abbey and the rectorship of the parish church of St. Margaret's attached to the Abbey. Here it was that in his sermon on the Christmas morning of 1911 he told his fashionable congregation that the story of the Nativity in St. Luke was probably nothing more than a beautiful poetical legend. There were of course some protests in the Anglican press, but Dr. Henson accentuated his strange attitude in the following Lent by inviting an Oxford Professor who had written a book on "Christianity Without Miracles" to deliver a course of lectures at St. Margaret's, Westminster, on the same theme—the miracles eliminated being amongst others the Virgin Birth of Christ and the Resurrection, as usually understood by Christians.

Instead of incurring any official censure Dr. Henson received promotion. In the same year (1912) Mr. Asquith, then Prime Minister, appointed him Dean of Durham, where there is a minor university for the training of candidates for the Anglican ministry. While Dean of Durham Dr. Henson has more than once addressed Nonconformist bodies, on two of these occasions in defiance of protests from bishops who are now to be his colleagues on the episcopal bench. He has taken a frequent part in newspaper controversies. He opposes disestablishment, and holds that the "National Church" should have room for men of a great variety of opinions. He has written that of course a clergyman must accept the Apostles' Creed, but he adds that there must be a wide freedom as to the interpretation of it. Judging from his Westminster sermon he himself interprets it in a sense that is neither Catholic nor Christian.

Already there are protests against his appointment to the see of Hereford. A meeting of clergymen at Oxford has called upon the Dean and Chapter to refuse to accept him as their bishop. It is quite certain that they will obey the law and make the best they can of the new appointment. The protests will be as futile as those that were made against Dr. Henson's predecessor, Bishop Hampden, in 1848. It is unhappily true that numbers of both clergy and laity in the Church of England no longer have any real belief in the Divinity of Christ. Dr. Henson represents a large party. His promotion is a new illustration of the "comprehensiveness" of the Church of England. Even the episcopal bench itself represents every variety of belief. Probably some few Anglicans may be forced by this new manifestation of the nature of the Church of England to realize that such a Babel cannot be the Church of Christ which guided by the Holy Spirit is to teach God's truth to the end of time. Others will go on lamenting the "trials" of the Church, and protesting that her real mind is "Catholic," despite the imposition of an unorthodox prelate on what the Church Times describes as "the unfortunate see of Hereford."

COMMUNICATIONS

Letters, as a rule, should not exceed six hundred words.

Clerical and Lay Activity

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Letters on the question of the cooperation of the Catholic clergy or lack of it, in movements to suppress "white slavery," interest me principally for the light they throw on our attitude toward public movements, which immediately or remotely concern faith and morals. The normal and proper conservatism of our holy mother, the Church, places her children at a sore disadvantage in our nation, where events no longer march but roll on the rubber-tired wheels of material progress with breathless and unseemly rapidity. Fifty years ago the population of New York State was ten parts urban to ninety parts rural. Today the proportions are completely reversed, being ninety parts urban to ten parts rural. The new, or rather the added moral and economic problems presented by this fundamental and sudden change in human habits is simply staggering.

Now what I gather from the letters before-mentioned is that some writers maintain that the clergy should take more active part in public matters affecting morals. Others rather inaptly, it seems to me, fling back the taunt of disloyalty to the Church. The work of Catholic benevolent institutions in this country in the face of difficulties is marvelous. The work, such as it is, of the clergy is to the glory of God and the credit of the clergy. But how about the laity? There's the rub. The laity should, and undoubtedly could, do more. But the laity does not do what it could do. Why? Because the clergy or officers of the Church militant do not utilize to best advantage the ready services of the soldier laity. The clergy is concerned with purely parochial matters, too much to the exclusion of everything else. There should be in every parish, worthy of the name, boards of laymen concerned with the following matters:

(1) Parochial and diocesan finances as they affect the civic community; for example, the financing of far-reaching benevolent movements like the Knights of Columbus' fund for the soldiers, the promotion of a healthy organization for boys after the pattern of the Boy Scouts, or collecting campaigns for eleemosynary institutions.

(2) The vigorous combating of anti-Catholic associations, when they venture to take sides in politics for the avowed purpose of injuring the Church.

(3) The establishment of more St. Vincent de Paul Conferences and their reasonable cooperation with civic, organized non-Catholic or non-sectarian charities. In most cities the Jewish charities have a standing order with the main organized charity associations to turn over to them all Jewish destitutes. There is no such thing in most Catholic dioceses. Here and there an enterprising clergyman will act on his own account for his own parish. Many Catholic clergymen refuse to listen to any but direct appeals, and all cooperation with any society not frankly Catholic. I will venture to say that only good could come of it, if in every non-sectarian charity organization there was a recognized representative of the Bishop, preferably a member of the society of St. Vincent de Paul.

(4) Constant watchfulness to check, as far as possible, the spreading of pornographic literature, pictures and entertainments. The enforcement of decency in pleasure resorts and the general enforcement of the law in regard to public morals.

A diocesan group of aggressive and influential laymen could do vastly more practical good in having certain temptations done away with than a year of Sunday sermons. It would make an interesting point of dispute whether he is the more practical Christian, who stands in the pulpit and warns the susceptible in his congregation to look the other way on passing a flagrantly indecent poster, or he who goes down and persuades the chief of police to have it removed. Now I maintain that it is the place of the priest to seek out, each in his own parish, members who will act on such boards and encourage them in their efforts. The recent article of Father Garesché in AMERICA, begging Catholics to take more interest in the proper conduct of public schools, is a matter in point. What is everyone's business is no one's. If the Bishops asked every priest to appoint in his parish one man to do this in cooperation with the rest how much might be done? As the article stands, Tom, Dick and Harry reads and then runs to the next article, sighing: "What can I do alone?"

The average parish priest, although there are brilliant exceptions, considers that his duties begin and end with the Sacraments, the collections and the school. The wealth of possibilities in parochial organization is left entirely to the voluntary and ofttimes indifferently accepted efforts of laymen. The success or failure of the parish as a civic institution depends too much on the initiative of the parish priest.

There should be a high and generally accepted standard of what constitutes a well-organized parish over and above the number of communicants, and the size of the Sunday collection and the school, and, it might be added, the outward splendor of the church edifice.

These suggestions call for very little more work from the already overburdened parish priest, but offer means of utilizing a great quantity of parochial ability and good-will that lie fallow solely for want of planting the seed. The greater utilization of sodalities, where these exist, and the founding of them where they do not, offer the most obvious field for cultivation. These things can always be done without "band-wagon" or "Billy Sunday" methods. Furthermore, I submit that to hold that we may not cooperate with non-Catholic citizens toward the common good in matters of morals for fear of scandal is rank bigotry and not holiness.

Some Irish Old and New

To the Editor of AMERICA:

As a reader of your valuable weekly, though not an old Holy Cross College boy of '61, may I be permitted to say a wor on the subject of "Some Irish Old and New," which is at present eliciting some friendly criticism in your pages. Mr. Philip J. Libby has my sincere sympathy in having to listen to those "vulgar slurs" and ignorant sneers hurled at him by the "ould country Irish," as "country born," "second crop" and "Yankee born."

But if this Mr. Libby listened at a little closer range he would hear from another camp more insidious epithets hurled into other ears such as "greenhorns," "salt-water boys" and "micks." Both attacks are to be deplored and are due to ignorance; but which is the more to be condemned? I think that the sons of the "old stock" are more insulting to the offspring of this old stock when they designate them as salt-water boys, micks, and the like. It is unworthy of the best traditions of our race and betrays a narrow-mindedness unworthy of dear old "Banba of the Streams." But we must always consider the sources of such gross insults, and I believe the Irish-American who criticizes the "old country borns" is himself unworthy of the traditions of Irish ideals. Probably he is the son of some "get-rich-quick," whose parents were never anything in Ireland, and now that they have made a little money in this country, wish to be known as the Shoneens who hate Ireland as much as the genuine Celt "loves" England.

The St. Vincent de Paul Society

To the Editor of AMERICA:

An ever-timely topic for discussion is the work of the St. Vincent de Paul Society. The value of this labor of love cannot be estimated in dollars and cents nor properly appreciated by a study of statistics; nevertheless every effort should be made to increase the efficiency of the society. We may moralize as much as we please on the good that is done but wherever there is room for improvement in method or in practice no means which has justified its value by actual experiment should be ignored. Criticize as you may organized charity, these organizations have spent thousands of dollars in perfecting methods of relief and investigation. Their main defect from a Vincentian standpoint is that they are "heartless." Why not adopt what is good in them and send some purifying Vincentian blood through the system to spiritualize, and if necessary, humanize it? We should not be either afraid or ashamed to learn "from the enemy."

In the discussion of the society there has been stated but little that has a constructive character. We would welcome a statement of the ways and means of perfecting our social-service work by anyone experienced in this field, and many Conferences would adopt such of the suggestions as would increase the efficiency of their available resources. This, however, depends upon the director of the individual Conference. Here, as in all other matters of a diocesan character, we are handicapped by parochialism. The spiritual director's vision may be horizoned by the parish limits, while the methods of the Conference including suggestions for improvements may be confined to the same territorial restrictions; others, however, are of a more progressive character to whom suggestions are not intrusive.

The Bishop of Ukraine

To the Editor of AMERICA:

AMERICA, in its issue of December 29, referred to the consecration of Mgr. Theodoroff by the Most Rev. Metropolitan of the Uniates, Count Andrew Szeptycky. As a personal friend of the Rt. Rev. Leonidas Theodoroff, or in Russian, Fiodoroff, I am able to give to the readers of AMERICA a few details concerning the new Bishop of Ukraine. The Bishop is a convert from the Russian schism. He joined the Catholic Church in 1906, when Archbishop Szeptycky, after long negotiations between the Apostolic See and the Russian Government, went to Russia in order to investigate the validity of the ordinations of the schismatic sect of the Staroviercy, or Old Faith, which is the least opposed to the Catholic Church. Many converts from this sect have joined the Catholic Church, thanks to the grace of God and the endeavors of Archbishop Szeptycky and the late Bishop Ortynski. Archbishop Szeptycky traveled throughout Russia and brought back into the Church a very great number of persons belonging to the highest Russian aristocracy.

Among the converts in Petrograd was the sister of the former Russian War Minister, Sazonoff, who is a near relative of Bishop Fiodoroff. Miss Sazonoff built, at her own expense on St. Basil's Island, in Petrograd, a Catholic church for the Slavonian rite, of which the Rev. Alexander Ivanovitch Dayjbner was appointed pastor. In 1913 this zealous priest was arrested and exiled by the Russian Government, but he has returned to his flock.

Bishop Fiodoroff was born in 1880 and was twenty-six years old when Archbishop Szeptycki met him. As the young man was himself a member of an old aristocratic family, he was interested in the new conversions and soon fell under the influence of Archbishop Szeptycky. Fiodoroff joined the Church in 1906. He finished his theological studies in 1909, in Rome, in the Gregorian and there we became friends. Having been ordained, he entered, in 1910, the old Greek Order of the Studites, which was founded in the fifth century in Constantinople. This Order resembles the Trappists in the severity of its observance.

At present Bishop Fiodoroff is thirty-eight years old and is a man of great talents and holiness of life. He possesses profound historical knowledge, and notwithstanding his comparative youth, a wide experience. In his external appearance he is a striking contrast to the Bishop who ordained him. Archbishop Szeptycky is a giant, over seven feet tall; the new bishop of Ukraine resembles a young Sicilian altar boy, with delicate figure, dark hair and angel-like features.

We should like to ask the prayers of the readers of AMERICA for the new Bishop and his work, as there are well-founded hopes now that Ukraine is independent, of bringing back to the unity, of the Catholic Church some 30,000,000 of these Ukrainians who are now living in schism.

Cardinal Newman's Correspondence

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Having gone over carefully and interestedly the two volumes with the title, "The Letters and Correspondence of John Henry Newman," edited by Cardinal Newman's sister, after his decease, and at his expressed wish, I have been surprised not to find in all the long correspondence presented, a single letter from any one of three prominent Tractarians, who left an indelible impress on the Oxford Movement, namely, Ward, Faber and Hope Scott. Of the three, Ward took a foremost part.

Surely, with the divergence of views held by Newman and Ward, as to the presentation of principles enunciated in the "Tracts," many letters must have passed between them. Those differences in treating of the subjects are set forth in Wilfrid Ward's life of Cardinal Newman. The first mention of Ward, Faber and Hope Scott occurs in the correspondence of 1838-1839. Can any light be thrown on the non-appearance of letters written before that date to these gentleman? Is it possible that no such letters were written or preserved?

Caring for the Child

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The article on Sociology, entitled "Caring for the Child," published in the issue for October 13, 1917, has suggested the enclosed draft on New York for $25.00. Please transmit it to the persons in charge of the institution which cares for "the babies that no one wants."

Stand By the President

AMERICANS, as a people, know very little about war. In the sense that war never loomed large in their thoughts as a means to national honor and prosperity, they have not been rated a war-like people. These ends they have preferred to attain by pacific means. Thus a generation has come to maturity, to whom war has seemed something exotic, to be looked for in other countries, but foreign to the busy, peaceful United States. Hence it is not altogether strange that there are some in our midst, not many, but too many, who appear to believe that a declaration of war is equivalent to a successful conclusion of the war; or that certain voluble and picturesque Americans, not hitherto rated with Washington or Lee as statesmen and military geniuses, profess to see the ship of State heading directly for the rocks, under the unskilful pilotage of President Wilson.

Much of this criticism would be amusing, were it not for the fact that some citizens take it seriously. It might be alleged with partial truth, that the country has prepared for war with a slowness which is causing some uneasiness among the Allies, but to say that we are on the rocks, or even in the neighborhood of rocks, is to go beyond the facts. War is not so calm an occupation as knitting, and is acknowledged to be more perilous than sheep-herding; it has, moreover, asked much from thousands of American fathers and mothers, and before the blessed dawn of peace may call upon every American to pay for the privileges of freedom in the coin of sacrifice. These are things which only now we are beginning to realize. The realization inclines us to be captious, perhaps unfair, and, as was to be expected, the War Department has borne the brunt of the attack. That Department, as the Secretary freely confesses, has made its mistakes; but such accusations as that through stupid neglect, our soldiers in the cantonments are dying "like East Side babies in summer," is both unjust to the Department and thoughtlessly cruel to the families of the enlisted men. The fact is that the death-rate from September, 1917, to January 1, 1918, was somewhat lower than that of civilians of the same age. Nor has the Secretary's contention that "no army of a similar size has ever been raised, trained and equipped so quickly," been successfully controverted. No one will contend, least of all the Secretary, that, in any department, the army has reached its highest point of development; nevertheless, what has already been done is a fair guarantee for the future.

Finally, there seems little reason to believe that the President is seeking to make himself a dictator. It is, of course, possible to conceive a worse creation than a dictator; a bungling board, for instance, composed of "pork-barrel politicians," in charge of a war for the preservation of democracy. But as conditions now are and are likely to remain, boards and dictators are equally remote. No one acquainted with the tremendous powers vested, directly and by implication, in the President by the Constitution, will be tempted to say that Mr. Wilson has in any way trespassed upon functions beyond the scope of his high office. That is an accusation to be urged only by prejudice or ignorance. In a republic such as ours, there is always place for criticism, incisive criticism, destructive criticism in certain crises, and criticism of every kind, except dishonest, malevolent criticism. It is only reasonable to assume that Congress and the courts may be relied on to preserve unimpaired the system of checks and balances, characteristic of the American form of government, leaving to the citizen the duty and privilege of omitting nothing which may strengthen the hands of our civil superiors. Criticism is useful, but obedience comes first, and the first and plain duty of every American citizen is to stand by the President.

Catholic Mothers and the Vote

NOW that the women have the vote, New York expects every woman to do her duty, and use with discernment the privilege which has been conferred upon her. In the metropolis, she will not lack teachers, for many have undertaken the task, if task it be, of enlightening her intellect on affairs of public moment, and of awakening her will to cast her vote in such wise, that the civic millenium may be looked for within a reasonable time after the next election. Democrats and Socialists, Laborites and Republicans, political parties of varied names and purposes, and even church societies, have established schools or bureaus for the express purpose of teaching the new voters how to exercise the franchise for the greatest common weal. In avowed design, at least, all these movements are praiseworthy. In practice, however, much of the energy which they are generating may be lost. For if the common tradition of mankind is not to be overturned, the women will, in the end, make up their minds for themselves, with little reference to outside influences, and either not vote at all, or vote as "they feel like."

It is probably true that very many Catholic women, perhaps the majority, look upon the vote with indifference, if not with a certain unfounded dislike. This is a condition which should not be allowed to continue, for never was it more important that the franchise be used, and used properly. In these days, when the wildest theories, resting upon principles destructive of good order in the community, may be given practical expression through ill-considered social legislation, to vote is rather a duty than a privilege. Nothing can ever take the place, in Catholic hearts, of the "old-fashioned mother" whose first duty and highest happiness was to care for those of her household. Under changed circumstances, however, it may became the duty of the "old-fashioned mother," who is really not "old-fashioned," but the perennial product of Catholic principles, to use her influence for the protection of the community, as well as for the good of her own home.

An Irresistible Appeal

THOUGH AMERICA, as is well known, has always sternly refused to open its editorial columns to appeals for the needy, the time seems to have at last come for making an exception to this iron rule. For even editors have hearts, and, when a strikingly worthy charity is brought to their attention, the most hardened and cynical of their tribe, sometimes rise above themselves and plead so eloquently for the cause that the relief-fund soon runs up to the millions. That being so, the moving nature of the following appeal, our readers will no doubt agree, leaves the editor quite unable to avoid publishing it:

Friends:

Please take enclosed tickets, and more if you can, . . . to help feed the dogs and cats sent to the Animal Refuge, 810 Ensor Street. Only tickets bought from us do we get a percentage on. The cost of food, even for animals, has increased greatly, and the ones at the Refuge who [sic] are there until good homes are found, must be fed. This year we are doing even more charity work by having to accept pets sent us by people who can no longer feed them. Think how the separation of poor people from their pets is alleviated by sending them to the Refuge, where they will be cared for, instead of having to have them condemned to death. Remember what dogs are doing for us at the "Front"—doing scout work and relief work such as even man cannot do. Europe has honored these dogs with medals of recognition for bravery. Do we not owe the homeless ones in our own city food and shelter? They all have the capacity for faithfulness, bravery and patience, even if they have not been called out to serve the colors. Help us as you always do, and accept our grateful appreciation.

MRS. BOLLING BARTON,
President pro tem.

It is hard to see how any heart but one of adamant can resist this appeal. Though the papers are filled with urgent pleas to help starving Italy, famishing Armenia and war-worn Poland; though hungry England is clamoring for 75,000,000 bushels of American wheat; though there are numberless poor in our own cities and towns who are actually without the necessaries of life; nevertheless, the far more pressing needs of the cats and dogs who [sic] have found a home in Mrs. Bolling Barton's Animal Refuge should open wide both our purses and our hearts. True, milk is so high that Mrs. Murphy's youngest child will hardly survive the winter, yet think what a comfort it will be to Miss Perkins who has been tearfully separated from her darling Pussy, to know that owing to your timely contribution the little quadruped orphan will still enjoy its accustomed morning cream at the Animal Refuge on Ensor Street. And though everybody knows that because coal cannot be had, the entire Rospillosi family is down with pneumonia, two of them so ill that they will probably die, think how much your generous contribution to Mrs. Barton's fund will do to keep cozy and warm that high-bred Pekinese whom the childless Mrs. Uplift has sorrowfully sent to the Animal Refuge. Finally, because there are some men heartless enough to hold that institutions like that at 810 Ensor Street, Baltimore, should be investigated by our food and fuel administrators, and obstinate enough to maintain that the funds already collected by the President of the Animal Refuge, its six vice-presidents and its large board of managers, could best be used to buy a quantity of chloroform for the promotion of euthanasia among the furry inmates of the Refuge, remember that these unfeeling persons' very attitude of mind makes it all the more incumbent on our readers to see that the unappreciated American relatives of those noble dogs at the front who [sic] have been decorated for courage and efficiency should receive some substantial marks of recognition, at least for their admirable "capacity for faithfulness, bravery and courage."

Catholic Unity League

THE recent Luther celebrations have revealed to us the woful misconception regarding all things Catholic which still exists in the Protestant mind, and everywhere indeed outside the Catholic Church. It was hardly possible to open even a secular magazine, treating of this subject, without seeing at first glance false, if not positively ridiculous, statements concerning Catholic doctrine and Catholic practices. There is, doubtless, in our day a better understanding between Protestants and Catholics than existed at the time when Newman wrote his "Present Position of Catholics in England." But the false views regarding the Church which are still current everywhere prevent many from seeing the truth and joyfully embracing it. A mist is hanging before their eyes, hiding from their sight the beauty of the one true Spouse of Christ. For many, to know her would be to contribute to the utmost of their power toward giving this knowledge to the world. It is the great return they can make to Almighty God for the unspeakable grace of the true light of faith bounteously bestowed upon them.

One of the means by which the Catholic laity can assist in spreading the Kingdom of God is by the promotion of lecture courses to non-Catholics. Such a course is at present announced to be given under the auspices of the Knights of Columbus from February 10 to 24 at the Paulist Church in New York. It is the fourth annual event of this kind conducted by the Paulist Fathers, and we are told that previous courses have brought scores of converts into the Church. Doubtless the present series of doctrinal lectures will be no less rich with the blessings of God to many a non-Catholic.

But while this work is excellent, its promoters know that their individual powers are of necessity very limited. Their voice cannot reach beyond the walls of the church. Yet vast multitudes without are no less in need of Catholic instruction. Hence the reason why the indefatigable Father Conway, C.S.P., founded the Catholic Unity League (415 W. 59th St., N. Y.). Its purpose is to interest the Catholic laity in this same work of extending the Kingdom of God upon earth. Catholic men and women are invited to enlist in the association as active members or contributing members, as associate members or life members that they may thus give of their energy, or at least of their means to this noblest of all causes, the conversion of souls to Christ. The aims of the proposed enrolment of thousands of Catholic men and women in this work of the lay apostolate are thus briefly summarized by the League: "To explain Catholic truth and to answer kindly and intelligently the difficulties of earnest-minded inquirers; to further lecture courses to non-Catholics and to provide funds for their support; to distribute Catholic books and pamphlets gratis to all seekers after truth."

This is a splendid program which should meet with an enthusiastic response from the Catholic laity. The time is ripe for such instruction. Countless thousands are in search of the truth and it is our duty to point it out to them. The grace of God and their own good will, together with our earnest prayers, will accomplish the rest.

"The Religion of Sanity"

SPEAKING of an article entitled "The Religion of Sanity" which appears in its current issue, the Century declares that this "absorbing interpretation of the practical side of American religion should win considerable attention." To atheists, free-thinkers, and rationalists it will no doubt commend itself, but to those whose vision is not hopelessly narrow and who have retained a vestige of faith it will seem to be only another illogical generalization spun by a Socialist out of his own heart. The study, however, has an interest for those Catholics who are bent on sending their sons to non-Catholic universities.

The writer sets forth what he believes he has found to be the religion of a Middle Western university, and doubtless his facts are correct. His conclusion, as applied to the American people, is a gross calumny, but it portrays fairly well the radical views on religion which obtain in many secular educational circles. His description of the American religion obtaining in one such circle is very frank.

This new religion of America is a thing indigenous to American soil, evolved by the people in harmony with their lives and ambitions; it has a supreme contempt for the philosophical abstractions underlying good and evil; it is a creed irreconcilable with the ideals of Christ, whom it looks on as the "apotheosis of effeminacy," "the most picturesque of failures." It is indeed called Christianity but only out of compliment to tradition, and if it uses certain Christian formulas, like "The wages of sin is death," it does so only in a new sense, namely, that sin is weakness resulting in disintegration of character; it puts cigarette-smoking on practically the same plane as promiscuous immorality, and dissuades from impurity, not because it is inherently wrong, but solely on the score that it is unmanly and acts as an obstacle to success.

Catholics who will not take the word of their ecclesiastical superiors as to the danger to faith in secular institutions of learning would do well to devote "considerable attention" to this cold, unimpassioned study of the religion taught and practised in one such institution. The description has the ring of sincerity; and although its author is a sorry philosopher and quite innocent of any knowledge of the real nature of Christianity and the ruthlessly practical side of Catholicism, he is nevertheless a keen observer of facts. He paints the Middle Western university as he saw it. Being a Socialist he will not be suspected of over-pious susceptibilities. The religion he describes is to him immensely satisfying; if he speaks of it and its adherents, the students, he does so only to praise.

Too many Catholics have come out of such universities in the same condition as his friends, aggressively Modernistic, with a crusader's passion for sweeping the musty cobwebs out of the world, taking nothing on faith, emancipated from ancient creeds, splendid pagans. Had they gone to Catholic colleges, they would have seen through the shallow superficiality of such a parody on religion, and would have aligned themselves with the vast army of profound thinkers who have tested Christianity and not found it wanting. Instead, they became intoxicated with a little learning and much sophistry, and gave up their dearest possession. Catholic parents have rued their folly in exposing immature minds to such dangers. Others who are thinking of imitating the scandalous conduct of such parents should ponder the article in the Century, in the light of their strict responsibility for the eternal salvation of their children.

"The Craft of Dying"

SINCE this devastating world-war began, a change has been noted in the average man's attitude toward death. Formerly he was loth to think of death at all, and as for speaking of it even to those seriously ill,—that was decidedly bad form. But the present conflict has made the thought of death familiar. Nearly every family in warring Europe has no doubt been bereaved of relatives, wayside crosses bearing inscriptions which commend the departed to the prayers of passersby have grown common even in Protestant England, and the importance of learning how to die well, since die we must, has been seriously brought home to many who have hitherto avoided such thoughts altogether. Very seasonable, therefore, is Longmans' recent publication of the quaint and pious fifteenth-century treatise on "The Craft of Dying," which Richard Rolle probably translated from its Latin original and which was a veritable vade-mecum of pre-Reformation Catholics.

So great is the Church's concern that those who are seriously ill should be prepared betimes for death that in the Middle Ages she charged "straitly every bodily leech that he give no sick man no bodily medicine unto the time that he hath warned and induced him to seek his spiritual leech." The author of "The Craft of Dying" wishes his readers to be familiar with every aid for making a good end, so he gives divers godly counsels regarding the temptations that beset the dying, suggests what questions should be put to them, tells what dispositions they should be in, and what "obsecrations" they ought to use. Those who assist at death-beds are advised, for instance, to > Present to the sick the image of the crucifix; the which should evermore be about sick men, or else the image of Our Lady, or of some other saint the which he loved or worshiped in his heal. Also let there be holy water about the sick; and spring [sprinkle] often times upon him, and the others that be about him, that fiends may be voided from him.

The high importance of the sick man's heart being "meeked to the knowledge of the defaults" which he has committed to the end that he may "duly repent them" is also emphasized. But there is nothing more beautiful in the little book than the "obsecrations" that the seriously ill are exhorted to make to "the right glorious Virgin Mary, which is the very mean [mediator] of all sinners," and who is the "most remedious speed and help of all sinful men to God." Those who assist the dying are bidden say to Our Lady for instance:

> Ever clean and blessed Maiden Mary, singular help and succor in every anguish and necessity, help us sweetly and show to our brother, thy servant, thy glorious visage now in his last end. And void all his enimies from him, through the virtue of thy dear beloved Son, our Lord Jesu Christ, and of the holy Cross; and deliver him from all manner disease of body and soul, that he may thank and worship God withouten end. Amen.
> O glorious Queen of Heaven, mother of mercy, and refuge of all sinful men; reconcile me to thy sweet Son, my Lord Jesu, and pray for me, sinful wretch, to His great mercy, that for love of thee, sweet Lady, He will forgive me my sins.
> O right entire and eternal Blessed Lady, glorious maid, aideress and helper of all anguish and necessity, succor us sweetly now; and show to thy servant here, N., our brother, thy gracious visage in this last necessity. Withdraw and put from him all his enimies, by the virtue of thy right dear Son, Our Lord Jesu Christ, and by His holy Cross and Passion; and deliver him from all anguish of body and soul, to the end that to God our Lord he yield praising without end.

Thus did the Catholics of medieval times learn the "craft for to die for the health of man's soul," and out of a desire to make "a clean end" they had recourse, as do their children in the Faith today, to Blessed Mary, the Refuge of Sinners.

Literature

THE GENIUS OF COOPER

AMONG noteworthy contributions to the story of American letters I have enjoyed most, William Crary Brownell's essay on Cooper. And particularly, because in writing it Mr. Brownell definitely restored to his properly high niche in our literary hall of fame one of the world's greatest romancers; it is not too much to say that he rehabilitated Cooper.

The treatment accorded by American critics to one whom Mr. Brownell ranks "with all but the greatest" of our literary possessions, signalizes the perils that exist for the Catholic student in drifting with prevailing currents in literary criticism. Among the few possessions of inestimable value to such a student is his detachment; and he most of all, should be chary of accepting the mere judgment of the day as it may run. Where in the critic perception is lacking, it would obviously be too much to expect appreciation. And the treatment of Cooper at the hands of imperfectly equipped censors suggests that the walls of every study and every classroom should bear this admonition: Criticize, if you like, freely; but always remember you are, first of all, criticizing yourself.

The readers of AMERICA have particular, even painful, reason to know that most men are content to let others do their thinking for them. This always limits the number of thinkers to be reckoned with; and of these but a few are trustworthy. For it is not enough to think independently. As Mr. Brownell himself has somewhere expressed it: "To produce vital and useful criticism it is necessary to think, think, think, and then, when tired of thinking, to think more."

However, he has not been content to rest a defense of Cooper on the quite ample grounds of his own judgment. From the resources of an erudition, embarrassing in its amplitude, to ordinary critics, he summons, for example, two of the greatest names in all fiction to bear witness to our novelist's rank in the very important field of the portrayal of character: "I have to own," said Thackeray, "that I think the heroes of another writer, viz, Leatherstocking, Uncas, Hardheart, Tom Coffin, are quite the equal of Scott's men; perhaps Leatherstocking is better than any one of 'Scott's lot.' La Longue Carabine is one of the great prize-men of fiction. He ranks with your Uncle Toby, Sir Roger de Coverley, Falstaff—heroic figures all—and the artist has deserved well of his country who devised them."

"I doubt," said Balzac, "whether the works of Walter Scott present us with such a splendid creation as this hero of the forest and the plains." And Balzac's biographer, M. André Breton, adds: "I fear that the usurers of Balzac, his lawyers, bankers and notaries, owe too much to the sojourn his imagination had made in the cabin of Leatherstocking or the wigwam of Chingachgook, and that there are in the 'Comédie Humaine' too many Mohicans in spencers or Hurons in frock coats." "Sainte-Beuve praises without reserve," continues Mr. Brownell, "that creative power of Cooper which gave birth to such original characters, a power similar to that of Rabelais when he created 'Panurge,' of Le Sage when he conceived 'Gil Blas' and Richardson 'Clarissa.'"

Yet it is precisely Cooper's "Mohicans," from whom, it would seem, even Balzac could derive inspiration, who have been called on to withstand the chief American attacks on his portrayal of character. And like most of our hardy aborigines, his Indians have stood the critical onslaught well. They were not only the first genuine Indians to make an appearance in literature but they have never successfully been discredited either as types or characters. The ridicule heaped on them is to be accounted for in great part by the fact that the "noble white man" wanted their lands. And to hang a dog, with popular approbation, English practice requires that you first give him a bad name. The viewpoint of the hardy frontiersmen, colored by outbreaks of savage resentment on the part of Indians that objected to being pillaged, gradually became the public viewpoint of them and this in turn furnished to our easy-chair literary critics their impressions of the red man. The Indian himself too long scorned the press-agent.

But Catholic students, least of all, have need to rely on popular tradition for their judgment of the American Indian. Their own missionaries are the highest possible authorities on the subject. And these have recorded in their life-blood the savagery and degradation of the Indian and his marvelous response to the elevating influences of Christianity. Not until the story of men like the Onondaga, Garagontié; of Tegakwitha, Lily of the Mohawks; of the Hurons of Lorette and of the Iroquois of Caughnawaga, can be blotted from our missionary records will Uncas or Chingachgook stand in need of defenders.

The women of Cooper, as well as his Indians, have been ridiculed. Fun has been poked at him because he termed them "females" and this, curiously, by men familiar with the changing fortunes of words. That which is now almost strictly a designation of one sex, stood in his day for "woman" and legitimately, for a young woman. The "finishing school" of Cooper's day was a "female academy." One might as well object to the "wig of Lovelace and the hoop of Clarissa." And in stories of romance and adventure, men naturally play the dominant part. Such stories, too, are usually set in times of great public stress, and in these circumstances—if latterly we except the suffragette—women do not "act up" as they do in novels of manners. But anyone that imagines Katherine Plowden or Cora Munro could not "act up" on necessary occasion, could hardly set up for a discriminating critic.

The picture Cooper painted in "The Leatherstocking Tales" has long since vanished from our American life, but it will always survive in his pages as an unequaled contribution to our literary possessions. When he turned to the sea for a story, his success was likewise extraordinary. How he surpassed Scott in this particular is marked in comparing "The Pilot" with "The Pirate." Indeed, it was because he was dissatisfied with Scott's sea story that he wrote "The Pilot" and the first five chapters of the American novel will stand with those of any story of the sea ever written. Consider the orderly unfolding of the plot, and its unflagging succession of incidents, with each springing naturally from its predecessor, and all reflecting that continued interest which we term suspense. Perhaps the supreme test of a story is that it will hold the reader to a finish. This "The Pilot" does.

Doubtless the greatest obstacle to Cooper's present-day popularity is his prolixity. Mr. Brownell points out that Cooper belongs to youth but an American boy of my acquaintance now refuses to read any book that does not begin with, "Help! Help!" I fear there are many such young Americans and Cooper does not begin in this way. Novelists in his day rode in stage coaches, not motor-cars. Undoubtedly in the art of condensation, our fiction has improved. But in Scott's and Cooper's day they obviously lacked editors to cut down speeches such as survive now only in the Congressional Record. The American boy must do this editorial work for himself. In Scott and Cooper it is well worth doing.

And if I can have anything of value to urge here beyond recommending the student to read Mr. Brownell on Cooper, it is to plead that our teachers encourage their boys to read Cooper himself. Teach them how to skip and cut through overlong narration or dialogue, but urge them to stick to the story; it is in this they will find their reward. "The Leatherstocking Tales," for the most part, "The Spy" and "The Pilot" will hold any boy that can be held by romantic adventure.

By the happiest possible chance, Cooper was born in New Jersey and not in New England. This has meant much for American literature. He was, too, an Episcopalian, and a century ago that meant definitely more than it means now. His views of life are so sound as to be in our day refreshing. Indeed, to appreciate what we have lost out of our American life in a brief century one has need only to read Cooper: The high regard for the sanctity of the marriage tie—it is gone; the settled appeal to those verities common even to a divided Christian faith—wholly gone; the chivalry toward women, that rosy-cheeked if sometimes unruly foster-child of Christianity, quite gone. Read in Cooper's pages the moving death-scene of a Christian gentleman such as Colonel Howard—what novelist could truthfully write a like scene as typical of today? Mortally wounded among his "rebel" American kinsmen, Colonel Howard, Tory, dying at sea, begs of his distressed relatives that he may at least be buried in consecrated ground. Who, as this page is printed, among the great-grandchildren of men such as Colonel Howard, could explain, if questioned, what the words "consecrated ground" means? To have restored to us one of our few great literary possessions, is a genuinely patriotic thing and this Mr. Brownell has definitively done.

Giordano Bruno. His Life, Thought and Martyrdom. By WILLIAM BOULTING. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co. $3.75.

Mr. W. Boulting represents a type of the "modern" mind which is about as uninteresting as it was common in the days before the war. He is obsessed with modernity. His sole criterion for the truth of Giordano Bruno's ideas is that they were so very modern that many of them can be paralleled by similar notions to be found in the writings of Bergson, Bradley and others who, like Bruno, have, in their attempt to live by philosophy, been equally hampered by an over-powerful imagination. In other words he is a Modernist whose endeavor in this work appears to be to show that Modernism is not so modern after all; which is pretty much just what Pope Pius X meant when he defined it as "omnium hæreseon comlectum." But, Mr. Boulting displays his great lack of depth most manifestly in that he evidently fails to realize that had Luther, Calvin, Bruno, Spinosa, Kant, Fichte, Schilling, Hegel, etc., not been quite so modern the world would have been much wiser and would have been spared this modern war; for in one way or another they all "perceived" (sic) as he says in praise of Bruno "that moral practice is not under unalterable laws: it is relative," and with this they laid the foundations for that philosophy of frightfulness which holds treaties to be mere "scraps of paper" and which, if it could, would substitute might or "the will to power" for God's laws of right.

Another typical point in the work under review is the author's attitude towards the Church. His information about this nineteen-hundred-year-old institution is on an even lower level than is his knowledge of what may happen to lie on the other side of the moon; for, with very few points excepted, it is nothing but gross misinformation about a subject on which he could easily have informed himself had he wanted to. Yet this has not prevented his writing about the Church as though he knew it better than all the Apostles, Fathers, Popes and theologians in the past, or than all of the 300,000,000 Catholics alive and thinking in the world at present. As with those of his type the word "authority" seems to have taken very uncomfortable lodgment in his mind. Yet for all that his "thin habits and poor likelihoods of modern seeming do prefer against" it, the fact is that in all that they hold to be of faith Catholics believe not on the authority of the Church, as he would have it, but on the authority of God. The Church is merely the Divinely established and infallible guardian of that inestimable treasure of revealed doctrines which God Himself in His infinite goodness has imparted to man. Again, vagarious thinkers like Bruno turn out to be heretics more by reason of what they obstinately deny than of what they assert. And after all, what is the use of maintaining that four times five are twenty if you refuse to admit that two times two make four, or what earthly good could ever come of Bruno's enlarging chimerically upon the Copernican theory if it meant that he began by denying the personality of God and the Divinity of Christ? But then Mr. Boulting holds truth to be relative and will allow nothing so absolute as all this to loom up on his own mental horizon. The necessary consequence of this, however, is, that in adjudicating between Bruno and the Church he is almost as modern as Pontius Pilate. For Pilate believed truth to be relative; and he no less than our author yielded to "modern" opinion. While holding judgment, moreover, he also refused to weigh the other side of the case. But Pilate did not attempt to exonerate Barabbas and at the end, in a spirit of true religious indifference, he politely washed his hands; whereas Mr. Boulting has placed himself in the category of those of whom Carlyle wrote: "Their tolerance is but doubt and indifference," yet "touch," says he, "the thing they do believe and value, their own self-conceit: they are rattlesnakes then."

Selections from the Correspondence of the First Lord Acton. Edited with an Introduction by JOHN NEVILLE FIGGIS, Litt.D., and REGINALD VERE LAURENCE, M.A. Vol. I, Correspondence with Cardinal Newman, Lady Blennerhassett, W. E. Gladstone and Others. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. $5.00.

Lord Acton stated in a letter to the editor of the London Times dated November 21, 1874, that communion with the Catholic Church was "dearer to him than life"; a friend of his writing to the London Tablet shortly after his death in 1902 declared that he had it from Lord Acton's own lips that he had never doubted any of the Church's dogmas; Cardinal Newman writing to a critic of Lord Acton, under the date of April 13, 1875, said: "I do not think you should say what you say about Lord Acton. He has ever been a religious, well-conducted, conscientious Catholic from a boy"; and Acton himself, replying to a request from Cardinal Manning that he state whether he adhered to the doctrines defined in the Vatican Council, gave an answer, which if rather vague, was accepted as a satisfactory statement of his orthodoxy by the Archbishop of Westminster.

It seems necessary to reproduce these testimonies, in order to contradict the following assertion made by the non-Catholic editors of the present volume: "He [Acton] had no more faith in the infallibility of Councils than in that of Popes." In view of the above testimonies, this assertion falls to the ground, since the infallibility of the decrees of Ecumenical Councils and the infallibility of the Popes are both articles of the Faith. Of many of the letters, however, contained in the volume, all Catholics will say, what Newman said of the letters to the Times that they heartily wish they had never been written. For undoubtedly they cast a good deal of doubt on the Cardinal's declaration that Lord Acton was always a well-conducted Catholic. No well-conducted Catholic would have taken the part Acton took in the political intrigue to defeat the definition of Papal infallibility, nor written the rabid diatribes against the Papacy in which Acton indulged.

At the time of the Vatican Council there was little to distinguish his attitude from that of Doellinger and Dupanloup, although he inclined rather to the views of the former than those of the latter. As Doellinger strove to enlist the service of the secular power of Germany and Dupanloup that of France, so Acton did his best to persuade Gladstone to throw the weight of the British Government's disapproval against the definition. Happily, however, he imitated not the former, but the latter, after the decrees were published, although, unfortunately, he did not make the same whole-hearted, generous and unequivocal submission as Dupanloup. In fact he expressed his opinion that excommunication was inevitable. Apparently it was only the tolerance of Cardinal Manning, based on a better knowledge of the man than that of many Catholics at the time, which saved him from being cut off from the Church. Acton's after-life proved the wisdom of the Cardinal, for in spite of the fact that he idolized his former teacher, Dr. Doellinger, and had taken from him his liberal trend of thought, as the years went on, he declared that he found it more difficult to understand the Professor's state of mind.

Great Wives and Mothers. By HUGH FRANCIS BLUNT. New York: The Devin-Adair Company. $2.00.

"Clean literature and clean womanhood are the keystones of civilization. This aphoristically defines the ideals of the Devin-Adair imprint." Such is the general program marked out for themselves by the publishers of this volume, and it needs but little acquaintance with the immoral trend of modern literature to appreciate the courage which it implies and the encouragement it deserves. Devin-Adair says in effect to the unprincipled author who would make money by trailing woman's honor in the dust that he need not bring his manuscript to them, and to the book-lover is given a promise that there shall be nothing in their publications to soil the imagination or degrade the heart.

The present volume is well characterized by its title. It sets forth the heights of heroism in the ordinary Christian life to which women have attained in the course of the centuries. One after another the great wives and mothers pass over the pages, a noble procession that thrills the reader and makes him proud of his Catholic ancestry. From land to land, from age to age, they have handed down the torch of faith and piety, and the sweet odor of their holy lives purifies the atmosphere of any home which is privileged to make their acquaintance. The book is intended principally by its author to lighten the labors of priests who are directing sodalities, but it has a place in every Catholic family. Convent-schools also would be wise to place it on their shelves. It will be an inspiration to their pupils and a stimulus to make their lives sublime. The author is doubtless well known to the readers of Catholic periodicals, as he has for many years been a contributor to their columns. The sketches of Margaret Roper, Elizabeth Seton and Pauline Craven are perhaps the best; but there are others, such as those of the wife of O'Connell and of Lady Georgina Fullerton, which are of almost equal interest. The style is simple, careful and entertaining. The book deserves a warm welcome.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

Among the recently published booklets that the Catholic soldier-boy will doubtless be glad to get is a neat, khaki-covered Douay Version of the New Testament, "Army and Navy Edition" (Paulist Press, $0.60). Another little book that will increase our fighting men's spirit of sacrifice is "The Mass and the Christian Life" (Paulist Press, $0.30), which has been adapted from the French of Mgr. De Gibergues. A book which will help to perfect the soldier's knowledge of his profession is a "Small Arms Instructors' Manual" (Dutton, $0.60), by Reginald Sayre, Stowe Phelps and Gerard Herrick. Its authors have aimed at outlining an intensive course of instruction which will prove efficient in the present crisis when the best work has to be accomplished in the briefest time. "The U. S. Army Manual of Small Arms Firing" has supplied the framework for the booklet, and in addition many suggestions have been added from modern works. As for the parents and relatives of the lads who have gone to the training camps, "Draftee No. 357" describes in eight excellent letters written to the "Dear Folks at Home" just what it means to be "In the National Army Hopper." (Lippincott, $0.25.) He supplies in a chatty way interesting information about the new soldier's daily routine, meals, drill, organization, amusements, etc. "The Itinerary of a Soldier" (Service Pub. Co., Woonsocket, R. I., $0.65 and $0.75) is a wall-tablet, 14x18 inches in size, handsomely printed in red, black and gold containing well-chosen prayers and blessings from Holy Writ and from the Church's liturgy, and bearing the imprimatur of the Bishop of Providence. The tablet is meant for the home, the church or the club that has sent soldiers to the front, and is designed as "an adequate memorial that obtains for recogniton," "the complement of the service flag," "an opportune appeal to allay human misgivings," and "the supreme source of heroism and fortitude."

The January Month is a particularly readable number. In "Peace at Home" Father Keating pleads for justice to the laboring poor. He shows that "the world is full of abuses against personality because God's interests in the human beings He has made are ignored and flouted" by the new paganism. "The immediate result of the elimination of the Creator is the degradation of the creature." John Ayscough begins a series of entertaining autobiographical papers called "Pages from the Past"; Father Martindale continues his study of "St. John of the Cross"; Father Thurston examines the vagaries of "The New Thought Entourage" and Hugh Anthony Allen writes a discerning appreciation of Thomas Augustine Daly's non-dialect poetry. Theodore Maynard contributes a poem on "Laughter," and Judith Carrington one on "Joy" which runs thus:

To find a friend in ev'ry sort of place,
This were a grace;
To know thy kinship with the wildling things,
'Tis to gain wings;
And if the echo of the surges roll
Within thy soul,
The color of the mountains light thine eyes
And make thee wise,
The lightning and the tempest sing to thee
In harmony,
And all things, from the daisy to the star,
Be not afar
But close, attunéd to thy beating breast,
Then thou art blest.
Such are the doors Joy can unlock for thee—
But only they who worship find the key.

A brief treatise displaying thorough acquaintance with three such subjects as religion, education and American citizenship, would be a rare production by the very terms of the contract; yet coming from the hand of a reputed educator, the attempt might at least exhibit an impartial recognition of the principal facts involved. Unfortunately, however, the reader who expects anything of the kind from Professor Peabody, of Harvard, in his recent volume "The Religious Education of an American Citizen" (Macmillan, $1.25), will meet with unqualified disappointment. To insist that "personal experience of God" must precede all authoritative information about its object, is to define religion in terms of a logical impossibility; but even this is more pardonable than the substitution of fiction for fact. The author's facility in this latter art is fairly illustrated by his insistence upon a "democratic religion"—whatever that may be—for "the many millions" who are genuine Americans, as contrasted with that "aristocracy in religion" which, he concedes, "may be attractive to the few who have become, through travel or training, practically Europeanized in taste." And yet a few trips to points very near at hand would have served to inform the Professor that Harvard is not America in microcosm.

The earnest patriot who wishes to make a practical use of the war-cry, "We eat what we can and can what we can't" will find aid and comfort in Ola Powell's "Successful Canning and Preserving" (Lippincott, $2.00). It is a practical handbook for schools and the home, compiled, with the aid of the U. S. Department of Agriculture, in the interest of the movement for the conservation of foodstuffs and a more varied, and economical diet. The scientific principles and practical details are clearly stated and a wealth of illustration added. A study of the manual will convince even the most sceptic of the convenience of preserving, and thus wisely utilizing the yield from the greatly increased acreage of fruits and vegetables that present economic conditions have brought about.—— H. E. Licks's "Recreations in Mathematics" (D. Van Nostrand Co., New York, $1.25) is a neat little volume replete with interest not only for those who have studied mathematics and science but also for those who would care to know something about the history of the several scientific branches. It contains a number of rather ingenious problems, some, indeed, old, but others not to be found in the ordinary text-book. It brings out one point not often insisted on, namely, that the so-called general processes in mathematics, in algebra, for instance, sometimes lead to absurd conclusions. From this follows the necessity of reasoning with regard to every step and not merely following blindly the rules that are laid down.

Here are two admirable poems from "Gardens Overseas and Other Poems" (Lane, $1.25), Mr. Thomas Walsh's latest volume. The first is a sonnet entitled "Sursum" and is "after the Spanish of Guillermo Valencia of Colombia," while the second poem, "Mother Most Powerful," is "after Giovanni Dominici, 1356-1420":

A pallid taper its long prayer recites:
Before the altar where the censers spread
Their lifting clouds, and bells toll out their dread,
In grief's delirious sanctuary rites.
There—like the poor Assisian—invites
A cloistered form the peace All-Hallowed;
Against the dismal portals of the dead,
Resting his weary brows for heavenly flights.
Grant me the honey-taste of the Divine;
Grant me the ancient parchments' ruddy sign
Of holy psalmody to read and prize!
For I would mount the heights immortal crowned,
Where the dark night is 'mid the glories drowned,
And gaze on God, into His azure eyes!

That thou so often held Him in thine arms,
So often pressed His infant lips to thine,
And in thy bosom warded off the harms
That came with flesh e'en to the Child Divine;
That thou couldst clothe Him—feel Him cheek to cheek
In dreams and waking—at thine ear hast known
His first lisped, "Mother," watched His soft hands seek Thine aid—with glances cast on Thee alone;—
That Thou couldst know such countless ecstasies
Of love through that sweet hidden time of yore.
And yet Thy heart held strong through all of these—
Shows Thou wert mortal,—Mother,—yea, and more!

EDUCATION

The Success of Success

"MY son," quoth a modern Solomon, "the will to win may be foolishness; ever to triumph a stumbling block. To excel is the prayer of the prudent, to succeed the birthright of the wise. The wise man always succeedeth albeit at times he winneth not; to win may work riches of a day, to succeed is the guerdon of ages."

The average classroom, whether of the grades, the high school or the college, embraces two kinds of workers, those who seek to win and those who wish to succeed. The young disciple may not at once grasp this distinction; to many there is no success that is not thoroughly triumphant. Not to be an out-and-out victor is flat failure. The untrained mind sees not that five talents as well as one may be misused, while two talents developed and not "hid in a napkin" will win the "well done" that spells success for the good and faithful servant. The greatest of orators was not victorious in his first appearance before the people but this, his maiden speech, was probably his greatest success, for it meant for him lifelong impetus to develop his better self. Not always those who win the contest, gain the greater profit therefrom. This may in some way account for the fact that, not infrequently, school prodigies and medal-winners are later buried in obscurity "to dumb forgetfulness a prey," while useful mediocrity comes to the forefront and succeeds. We can all succeed though "only one receiveth the prize."

Children and Grownups

ALL of us should be candid enough to admit that we wish to succeed. Nor are children of a different clay. The ancient Stoic pretended to be indifferent to the outcome of his every work, but deep down in his cold-storaged heart, there was ever whispered a prayer that his very rejection of any courted success might be brought to a happy issue, for him at least. Today, unfortunately, success is become a god among us; his altar never lacks adorers; it is the only cult universally practised. But success is a blessing, one of God's choicest gifts, easy, it is true, of abuse, but none the less a gift and a blessing. As such it should be employed in every walk of life but in education it is invaluable. As a motive of action, "Nothing succeeds like success," may shock the moralist, and far be it from us to make success an end in itself and final. But in the hard struggle to attain and retain knowledge it is our best stepping-stone to higher things.

The Philosophers' Stone

THE making of success successful would seem the philosophers' stone. It will transmute humble efforts into golden excellence. Success pays with interest. Confidence in our ability to succeed in a given task is our best preparation for success. What is so encouraging as the realization that in these or similar circumstances I have succeeded before and hence that my chances of success now are equally strong? After the first success, solving puzzles in newspapers has a peculiar fascination for the younger members of the household; with what zest are even harder problems tackled. Add together all the effects of coaxing and scolding and moralizing, and it will be found that putting success within the grasp of the pupil brings a far greater efficiency. It is imperative that our charges be made to succeed as soon as possible. This may sound a bit platitudinous, but like so many obvious maxims, it is more easily preached than practised. How then can we put success within easy reach of our classes?

A Fighting Chance

TO make success successful, there must always be a fighting chance for the pupil. This implies in the teacher a full realization of the abilities and inabilities of the pupils, with the logical keeping within bounds of their capabilities. No rational creature, young or old, willingly wastes energy on the impossible or the improbable. The grades will never be successful if high-school tasks are assigned, nor can we expect the high school to succeed in college work. Moreover, if a class feel that unusual difficulties are to be presented in a test, they will in most cases cease all preparation, and trust to chance. If the majority have failed in an examination, it would be well to review the questions set by the teacher before a wholesale condemnation of the inaccurate answers of the pupils. Hence the first sign-post on the road to success is: Keep within bounds!

At times there is needed judicious assistance in achieving a happy issue; but it must be given sparingly and be well directed. The shy and diffident, so afraid of attempt and so breathless in experiment, have as a rule, latent capabilities that require a little spur to be set in action. Then, magnifying a difficulty, but at the same time showing the possibility of its solution, makes the contest more enticing; and when success does come the elation is all the greater for there is developed a wholesome confidence in self's power to surmount obstacles.

Praise Ye!

FIRST, last, and always, must we be appreciative. If something worth while is accomplished, it should receive its full quota of praise. Away then with any misguided zeal to oust all conceit at even the slightest provocation, away with that too great fear that the successful may become too satisfied with self. It is not those who are really qualified that are most vain; in matters intellectual as well as moral it is only the exaggerated opinion of self's sufficiency that is harmful. True worth deserves praise. The greatest of teachers was not loath to give the merited "well done!" What a dismal world this would be, if all panegyrics and eulogies were tabooed! The favorite Scriptural text of the teacher should be that word so frequently found in the songs of one after God's own Heart: Laudate! If we want success to come from our efforts as instructors we must cultivate a keen appreciation of work well done. A word of commendation for examples solved quickly and correctly, a favorable comment on the excellence and neatness of an essay, will not only beget in the one praised greater rapidity and accuracy in mathematical tasks, more splendid makeup and style in language lessons, but the rest of the class will be encouraged by a realization that the reward of merit is not absolutely limited to the life to come. To children, this seems a long way off, and is a bit indefinite; they want a part of the hundredfold here. Let them have it.

SOCIOLOGY

Socialist Equality

EQUALITY is the ultimate aim of Socialism. Liberty and fraternity are only the presumed characteristics of that future state in which all distinction of classes shall cease to be. The nature of this equality is variously described by Socialist authorities, who notoriously disagree upon every practical application of their theories. The wisest among them refrain from prophecy and merely state that aside from the common ownership of productive property, the nature of the Socialist commonwealth will depend entirely upon the will and vote of the triumphant Socialist faction. The latter in turn, will be guided by expediency in the choice of their measures. Whatever they determine must be regarded as law and justice.

Equality, we are told, does not mean a division and redivision of property among the masses, although a distribution of the land was one of the first proposals made by the victorious Bolsheviki. "The end which true Socialism sets before us is the realization of absolute equality of condition," wrote Bax and

Morris in "The Manifesto of the Socialist League." (p. 10.) The immediate end, however, is now commonly described as equality of opportunity, to be assured under a system in which all the large industries and means of transportation are to be owned, not by individuals, nor by the State, but by the people. "The alpha and omega of Socialism," says Spargo, "is equalization of opportunity." ("Socialism and Motherhood," p. 39.)

Historical Examples

THE beheading of the nobility was the first step toward equalization taken by the French revolutionists. The confiscation of property toward the enrichment of their leaders was the immediate measure of the Mexican Socialists. The leveling of rank in State and army, the seizure of banks and the immediate or gradual expropriation of the wealthy classes was the practical plan of the Bolshevik organizations. In every historic instance the confiscation of the property of the Church, of her schools and charitable institutions was considered essential. Where Socialism is not triumphant it seeks to obtain this purpose, as far as possible, by urging the taxation of all property devoted to religious purposes. Aside from the animosity toward revealed religion, characterizing the Socialist movement everywhere, without excepting a single nation or period of time, the Church has always been hated and opposed by Socialists as the support of authority and consequently of social inequality. Her very hierarchy, as instituted by Christ, is based upon the idea of authority and obedience.

Attempts at Equalization

ABSOLUTE equality is clearly unattainable. It is absurd to hold that under any proposed economic system natural equalities will practically disappear. The more reasonable Socialist writers themselves freely admit this. Hence the importance given to the idea of "equality of opportunity," which Spargo calls the essence of Socialism. Thus it is proposed that every child receive at the very least a primary education in the same Socialist schools. Those who would show marked ability might then be advanced to higher studies. The result would be an élite of education, who by natural abilities and training would rise far above their fellows with the inevitable result of drawing upon themselves that same envy and hatred which is ever at the heart of Socialist movements. There are doubtless many idealists who honestly, though mistakenly, embrace Socialism in protest against the real abuses of wealth and power. They fail as yet to see that these call for a Christian restoration of human brotherhood by the enforcement of just laws, based upon the demands of nature and the Gospel, and not for a false and unnatural Socialist equalization.

The old question, moreover, of the distribution of the agreeable and disagreeable tasks reasserts itself. It is naïvely explained that under Socialism almost every kind of unpleasant work will be performed by machinery, owing to the impetus that will be given to invention in the new era. More practical minds realize that this problem must be fairly met. Some urge that each man should be employed in turn at occupations that are agreeable and disagreeable, at those esteemed more dignified and those that are now deemed less honorable. Factory manager and charwoman might thus change places in turn, since all able-bodied persons of both sexes are to be employed in the service of the commonwealth. Though proposed by leading authorities such solutions are childish and would end in a reign of total inefficiency.

Another solution proposed is to bestow the greatest remuneration upon the humblest and most disagreeable occupations, so that men and women would seek out the latter by preference; or else to shorten the hours of labor according to the unpleasantness of the task that is to be performed. Many finally hold that so high a state of altruism will be reached that men will vie with one another in desiring the lowliest, most trying, and hardest occupations. This is particularly likely in a materialistic commonwealth such as the Socialist State would be.

Efficiency

ONE fact is certain that men are urged to efficiency by the economic remuneration offered them. The higher their hope is raised, or the greater their fear of losing their advantage, the more productive and efficient will they become. The Catholic economic system, which proposes the elimination of the abuses of modern capitalism and of all unfair profit or unjust competition, can alone attain to the highest efficiency and is economically the only perfect system. Socialism, on the other hand, is as far removed as the most tyrannical capitalism from securing the utmost productivity of labor and the most equitable distribution of rewards. Both would fly in the face of nature and substitute their own artificial laws, which mean wastage in the one instance and inefficiency in the other, and injustice in both cases.

Socialist Wage System

TO bring about a condition of equality it was first suggested to pay the laborer, not according to hours of his labor nor according to the quantity and quality of his work, but merely according to his needs. This principle was even incorporated into the Gotha program. "From each one according to his capacity, to each one according to his needs," was accepted as the ideal aim of Socialism in "The Manifesto of the Socialist League" (p. 10). Even an opportunist Socialist, such as Hillquit, sees in this concept the ultimate ideal, which may yet come to be accepted as the working basis of the Socialist State. The absurdity of this rule becomes evident from the fact that the greatest spendthrift will likewise in all probability be the worst idler and most inefficient laborer, yet the highest remuneration would be given to him because he will always be most in need.

Pearson's solution which would make the reward depend on the quantity and quality of the labor contributed to the common stock, is doubtless more just, but the demand for equality is too strong to be withstood. Thus even Spargo proposes an approximate equality of wages. The Socialist ideal would without any doubt leave the smallest margin between the remuneration received by the most highly efficient specialist and the man or woman engaged in the most unskilled forms of labor. But again it is apparent that a mere nominal difference in remuneration will not stimulate men to attain to the highest productivity or efficiency. Should the required incentives be given they could only lead to new inequalities and to the ancient discontent. Dissatisfaction owing to insufficient wages and other causes would be more acute under the Socialist régime where all freedom of expression would be taken away, since the press would be in the hands of the ruling politicians, as likewise every department that might offer the facility for public remonstrance. Even churches could not be built except at politicians' pleasure, since the work could not be undertaken unless the material were furnished and the laborers detailed by them for this purpose.

Changing Human Nature

IT is true that wages or accumulated savings could not be invested so as to produce profit, interest or rent, since the object of Socialism is the abolition of these sources of income. Higher wages could be spent merely in personal luxury and the satisfaction of personal inclinations. Though the present system might for a time be permitted to linger on, it is incompatible with the idea of Socialism. Hence another source of incentive and enterprise would be sealed. We know that Socialists have one answer to all such objections. Human nature, they tell us, will be completely changed under Socialism, so that we cannot at all argue from present experiences. This is nothing but a confession of the absurdity of their position. Human nature and the fact of original sin and of its consequences have not undergone the slightest changes in the course of history. Men have practised justice and charity in so far as they have been truly religious and for no other reason. Such is the general rule and the universal experience of mankind.

Leveling Downward

SOCIALISM, as we made plain in the preceding article on "The Promise of Socialism." (Jan. 12), would of necessity mean longer hours and smaller rewards. The worker is promised that each one can then possess the luxury of his own automobile and the enjoyments for which he now perhaps envies the rich. In fact, however, if there were to be a Socialist equalization, it would be downward and not upward, so that society would not reach the economic position of the wealthy of today but would be leveled to the condition of the impoverished few. The average income of all is not raised so excessively as may be imagined by the exceptional fortunes of the few very wealthy members of society. When their money has been absorbed the average income will of necessity sink still lower, since the waste of the present system will be as nothing compared with the lack of incentive and the slackness and inefficiency that would follow under Socialism. So far from receiving the full price of his product the workingman would receive less than today. As for the loot and booty of Socialist revolutions, it has never yet enriched the people.

Socialist and Christian Methods

THE Catholic system on the other hand proposes a true equality based upon nature and the Word of God. In each man it beholds an image of the Divinity. By just laws it would strive to bring about the widest possible participation on the part of all in the private ownership of productive property and render impossible the acquisition of any undue portion of the nation's wealth by a few greedy capitalists. The Church was able to accomplish this in the days of the gilds. By wise regulations it could again be accomplished in our day without the injustice of Socialism and the misery and certain failure that would be consequent upon it. So talent and energy would not fall short of their full reward while the welfare of the masses would be equally secured. To drive out nature with a pitchfork is the Socialist method; wisely to cooperate with her in conformity with the Divine will of nature's God is the Catholic solution. The world has its choice between the two. It is the difference between a false and a true equality.

NOTE AND COMMENT

A Worthy Mission Contribution

THE largest contribution ever offered by a single diocese in the cause of the missions is announced in the annual report of the New York archdiocese, giving the sum of the offerings made by it during the past year to the Catholic foreign missions and to the Society for the Propagation of the Faith. A few modest words of introduction precede the tabulated accounts that close with the announcement of the gross receipts totaling $239,734.15, or nearly a quarter of a million. Special thanks are given by the director, Mgr. John J. Dunn, and his assistant, the Rev. Joseph F. Boehles, to his Eminence, John Cardinal Farley, "The Cardinal of the Missions," for his generous helpfulness in bringing about these splendid results, "an evidence of a living Catholic faith, which has always distinguished the people of this truly Catholic diocese." The figures are more eloquent than words, and it is to be hoped that they will serve as a stimulus to the Catholics of the entire nation. If each diocese will contribute in proportion to this noble cause, the United States will soon be able to accomplish wonders for the extension of the Gospel in the foreign mission fields.

The Catholic Khaki Testament

THE Chaplains' Aid Association has published a special Army and Navy edition of the New Testament which is the smallest Douay version ever printed in America. An edition of 10,000 copies has already been issued and distributed among the soldiers. To continue this work a New Testament Fund has been established, for which contributions are earnestly solicited. When the project was first proposed the increased cost of labor, paper and binding made it appear an impossible task, since the entire contents of the volume had to be set up in type, proofread and electrotyped before the book could be printed.

> The Protestant bodies, better prepared in the way of pocket editions and with plates, were working day and night running New Testaments off the press that the Protestant enlisted men might have each a copy; the Hebrews were likewise printing and distributing their Scriptures. Should the Catholic Church, the custodian of the Word of God, alone be unable to provide her children with the Testament of Christ's love? The thought was unthinkable. Heroically the Chaplains' Aid set itself to the task. "What must be done can be done," and the event has justified the motto.

So the Chaplains' Aid Bulletin describes the beginning of this important work. But the task of financing the free distribution of copies for all our Catholic soldiers and sailors is no slight problem. The suggestion has consequently been made that the pastors supply the men of their respective parishes with free autograph copies "as a constant memorial to the soldier and sailor of him who is his father in God." A special parish fund might readily be created for the purpose of providing the men with a New Testament and likewise with an Army and Navy Prayer Book, if this has not yet found its way into their pocket equipment. The Catholics of the country should adopt as their slogan: A Catholic Testament for every Catholic soldier and sailor.

An Insurance for Every Fighter

"THE most just and humane provision ever made by any nation for its soldiers and sailors," is the description of the Government-insurance plan given by Secretary McAdoo. The United States Treasury Department has left no means untried to induce every fighter at the front to avail himself of this opportunity. The success of these efforts may be judged by the fact that the insurance has already passed the third billion mark in the total of policies written. Particular attention is called to this important matter at the present moment since the automatic insurance provided by the law ceases after February 12, 1918. Soldiers and sailors must therefore avail themselves of the opportunity before that date for the sake of their families and dependents and their own peace of mind. The insurance can rise as high as $10,000 and is payable to wife, husband, child, grandchild, parent, brother or sister. The law also provides for the reeducation and rehabilitation of the totally disabled and allows monthly compensation to those disabled.

The Little Foxes That Spoil the Vines

EVERY war orator, says the editor of the Epworth Herald, has his own favorite slogan. Ships will win the war; coal will win the war; aeroplanes will win the war; food will win the war; dollars will win the war. Rarely are we told that men will win the war. What is the psychology of this fact?

The orator takes it for granted that the country will give up its men; he is not so sure that it will give up its sugar or its leisure or its electric lights. As human nature runs, big sacrifices are easier than small ones. Tommy in the trenches performs miracles of endurance, and then makes bitter complaint if he misses a mouthful of strawberry jam. He was not altogether a heretic who prayed: "Lord, save me from my little faults, and I will take care of the great ones myself." Watch out for the small disobediences, the insignificant weaknesses, the trifling flaws in your daily living. The call to splendid sacrifice will not find you cold, but how about the call to self-denials which nobody will notice? How about the humdrum faithfulness which stirs nobody's blood?

Our greatest opportunities, as he rightly says, are the unnoticed ones. Our subtlest temptations are those that seem insignificant. The little foxes spoil the vines. Unfaithfulness in small things leads to failure in great things.

It is worthy of note that Belgium made no formal declarations of war. Her ruthless invasion by Germany rendered such a measure superfluous. The total population of the Entente Allies, including their colonies, is 1,300,000,000, and that of the Teutonic Allies, likewise including their colonies, is 160,000,000. The former occupy an area of 40,000,000 square miles and the latter of 2 200,000. Printing in black the portions of the map of the world that are now implicated in the war, we find that only a few narrow strips are left, here and there, indicating the territory which still remains neutral ground. The snow-fields of Greenland represent the only considerable tract of land in the Northern Hemisphere that is not embroiled by this gigantic conflict.

Paganizing the Philippines

AN appalling spirit of religious indifference is settling upon the Philippines. The rising generation is growing up without religion and without God. "We have in and around Vigan," writes a missionary priest to us, "some fifteen Catechism centers, but you will hardly see at our instructions a single little boy or girl who has reached the third or fourth grade in the public schools." Yet these children are all "Catholics," for Protestantism, we are told, "Can sink no roots in Vigan." Of the high school pupils apparently only a handful show any disinterested zeal for their Faith. Going to a town of about 6.000 inhabitants, on the occasion of a special feast, the missionary found seventeen persons at the first Mass and some 200 at the second and Solemn Mass. Another straw to show the direction in which the wind is now blowing was the statement made to the missionary by a former Catechism teacher, who had joined the National Guard, that his captain had given instruction that the Jones Law forbade the teaching of Catechism. The officer is an ex general of the Philippine revolution. To increase the confusion there are the itinerant preachers making a pure mockery of religion: "Some of these are mere boys of seventeen or twenty years, absolutely ignorant of everything, I may say, except of a few texts from the Bible which they have learned from an American minister. They go forth into the highways and byways preaching, and not infrequently their doctrine is a hodge-podge of heresies." The same may be said of the girl preachers or deaconesses. Is it to such uses that the Protestant mission money is put in the Philippines? The writer continues:

> Yesterday I went during morning recess to two different schools and urged all the little fellows, some 200, to be present in the afternoon. Some thirty came, and of them only about half a dozen knew the "Our Father" and the "Hail Mary." Can you picture what the Philippines will be in a few years, when we now behold the present generation growing up, absolutely, I may say, without an idea of God? To this may be added what appears to be a growing contempt or perhaps animosity toward the priesthood. The action of some political leaders may help to foster this. The Protestant propaganda, especially in attacking the priests and striving to undermine their authority, and the indirect influence of the schools, all tend to intensify this spirit.

Even in the Philippine Senate a systematic political attack has been made upon the clergy and upon religious schools, and an insidious attempt is even now under way to supplant the highly efficient weather bureau conducted by the famous Father Algue, S.J. and worse still a bill has been introduced into the Philippine Congress calling for the taxation of churches, the money obtained thereby to be applied to the support of the public schools. Unless mighty efforts are now made to save the country it will fast decline into a godless and atheistic land.

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

WHOLE No. 460

Chronicle

The War.—On the western front the week was marked by comparative quiet. Several raids, however, were made on the German trenches at Nieuport, and around Monchy-le-Preux in the Arras sector there was a series of intense artillery duels. In the Caurières Wood and in the Woevre a few local engagements developed into fighting of the severest character but resulted only in small gains to either side. It was officially announced by the United States War Department that some of the troops of General Pershing have taken over a sector formerly occupied by the French somewhere in Lorraine. Our army abroad is thus definitely stated to be in action on the firing line.

Bulletin, Jan. 29, p.m.-Feb. 4, a.m.

The event of the week is the change which took place on the Italian front. Abandoning their purely defensive tactics, the Italian troops attacked in force the enemy's position on the heights east of the Asiago Plateau, broke through at several points, captured in their first dash more than 1,500 prisoners and drove back by heavy artillery fire the reinforcements which the Austro-Germans were hurrying down the Nos and Campo Mulo valleys. The German report states that the Italian forces which attacked the positions in the Col del Rosso region, and between the Frenzella Valley and the Brenta were thrown back by the Austrians, though it admits the loss of some positions on Monte di Valbella. On the days following their first attack the Italians succeeded in consolidating the positions they had won. According to the Rome bulletin, they improved their lines west of the Frenzella Valley and advanced a little northeast of Col del Rosso. The gains thus made were substantial. To the prisoners already mentioned they added another thousand; they also captured a few heavy guns and large supplies of military stores. The Berlin report claims that the Austrians made several hundred prisoners.

For four and one-half hours the Secretary of War, Newton D. Baker, spoke before the Military Affairs Committee in justification of the work hitherto accomplished by the War Department, which he held had not been matched in the raising of any other army in history. He sympathized, he said, with the "tremendous impatience of the American people to do great things greatly," the War Department had realized this impatience and had formed a gigantic war policy when the United States entered the conflict. Taking up one by one the various difficulties which had aroused hostile criticism, he answered each in turn. The first point was the alleged hospital neglect. He found the number of complaints relatively few and stated that in every instance they had been referred to the Inspector General of the army in order that instant corrective steps might be taken, or punishment inflicted where guilt had been incurred. In explaining the problems relative to the supply of ordnance he said that there had been great differences of opinion in selecting the rifles and there had necessarily been further delay in carrying out the minute specifications for the manufacture of the remodeled Enfield type. Hence it was some time before the troops could be fully armed. All this had been foreseen. In regard to the artillery, there were two theories, one favored by the English and the other by the French, and the choice could not be made blindly. The ablest men therefore were sent to France to confer upon the relative value of the various weapons. "But in the meantime we allowed no hindrance to be proposed in attempting to speed up the production of our practical types of weapons." Admitting the initial shortage in clothing, he said that the country could have waited until all preparations had been made, but he thought that the unwisdom of this would be obvious:

Secretary Baker's Defense

> It is true that we have sacrificed something to get our men into the camps. Not all of them had rifles at first and not all of them had uniforms. If we had waited until the last button had been sewed on the last coat I'd have felt a crushing load of responsibility for not having had men in the field when the day came that they were wanted at the battle front.

He absolutely denied the statement that shoddy had been used in the manufacture of the uniforms. A small proportion is to be found in the overcoats and blankets only, where it tends rather to improve than impair the usefulness of the goods. Similar explanations were given in regard to the erection of camps and a description was offered of the manifold activities of our forces in France. The most important item of information contained in the speech was that the War Department expects to have 500,000 men in France early in 1918, and that 1,500,000 men will be transported to France during the course of this year, if facilities can be procured for them. The outlook for ships he considered to be "not unpromising."

Revolt of Labor

A strike of considerable magnitude, attended by some disturbances and rioting in various sections, has spread through many of the German centers of industry. At Essen, Lübeck, Dresden and Berlin the strike continued after work had been resumed in many of the other cities. No accurate figure of the number of strikers at any given time can be gathered from the reports. Earlier estimates spoke of 1,000,000 men, a later account dwindled down to 180,000. Neither the Socialists, as a party, nor any of the trade unions were willing to be sponsor for the strike. The Catholic trade unions and other most important non-Socialist unions are said to have opposed the movement. A "Council of Five Hundred" was appointed by the strikers to watch over their interests, but was dissolved by the military authorities. Many individual Socialists were conspicuous in the agitation, and the Socialist Deputy, Dittman, was placed under arrest and later charged with treason. Martial law was declared in seven of the Berlin factories and the workers ordered to return under threat of court martial. Various dispatches speak of arrests of strike leaders.

The Secret Treaties

On November 23 of last year the publication of the secret documents in the Petrograd archives was begun by the Bolsheviki. Later the complete text was translated into English and was published with exclusive rights in the New York Evening Post. The date of the first document precedes by a fortnight the entrance of Italy into the war. In return for her participation that country was promised the district of Trentino, the entire Southern Tyrol to the River Brenner, the city and suburbs of Trieste, Goritza, and Gradisca, all of Istria to the Quarnero, many islands specifically named, the province of Dalmatia with its limits defined, all the islands to the north and west of the Dalmatian shores, the Bay of Vallon and other territory, besides an equal share in the basin of the Mediterranean Sea, after the division of Turkey. Article XV, which concerns the Holy See, is thus worded:

> France, England, and Russia obligate themselves to support Italy in her desire for non-admittance of the Holy See to any kind of diplomatic steps for the purpose of the conclusion of peace or the regulation of questions arising from the present war.

The second document contains the report of General Polivanoff. It describes the Rumanian policy in entering the war as an act of greed and implies equal double-dealing on the part of Russia. "The collapse of Rumania's plans as a Great Power is not particularly opposed to Russia's interests." In the documents that follow an offer of South Albania and later of territory in Asia Minor is made to Greece; Russia, France and Great Britain agree "with regard to future distribution of their zones of influence and territorial acquisition in Asiatic Turkey"; and the right of determining the western boundary of Germany is conceded to Great Britain and France in return for a free hand given to Russia to limit the eastern boundaries of Germany and Austria. "The question of forcing Germany out of Chinese markets is of great importance," the Russian Foreign Minister significantly writes to his Ambassador in Paris. Other documents define in detail the "demands and guarantees of territorial character" to be made by France, and enter into the question of Constantinople and the Straits. Finally we find that Russia herself plainly mistrusts the Allies and believes that she has sufficient evidence pointing to a betrayal on their part. This is founded upon "extensive conferences" held by "certain financiers of both the enemy lands" in Switzerland. Rumors of a basis of agreement are reported by the Russian Chargé d'Affaires at Berne, according to which the Central Powers are to be compensated at the expense of Russia. "For England," the latter writes, "the splitting up of Russia into several small States seems acceptable, all the more so because in the event of Russia being weakened England would secure a free hand in Asia." After the Russian revolution a "painful impression" was created on the Russians by the English, French and Italian Ambassadors who at once called upon the Provisional Government to urge the rehabilitation of the army. "I ask you," Tereschenko writes to the Russian Ambassador at Washington, "to communicate to Lansing in strict confidence, how highly the Provisional Government appreciates the abstentation of the American Ambassador from participating in the aforementioned step." The remaining documents reflect the confusion then reigning in the country.

France.—Though Catholics have poured out their blood in heroic endeavor to save France, the wretched Government has left nothing undone to ruin the Church.

The Government and the Church

In the last number of the Irish Ecclesiastical Record Dr. James MacCaffrey of Maynooth speaks of this persecution as follows:

> In spite of pressure from without and treachery from within the Government of France can still find time to carry on the war against the Church. The Ministry of War has issued another order for the observance of "religious neutrality" and the suppression of the "active clerical propaganda" at the Front, while the Chamber of Deputies and the Senate passed with acclamation a new law designed to secure that even the older clerical reservists will be put into the fighting line. To understand this recent development it is necessary to bear in mind that until the law of 1899 the clergy were exempt from military service; by the law of 1899 they were to be called upon merely to look after the wounded, etc.; while by the laws of 1905 and 1914 they were placed on exactly the same footing as other conscripts. Hence, in the present campaign, the conscript priests belonging to the classes 1899-1905 were not legally bound to take their place in the fighting line as active combatants. But partly in order to discredit the services of the priests, over 2,000 of whom have already died for France, partly, also, to make sure that, as far as possible, the clergy would be wiped out as well as the seminarists, it was proposed by one M. Sixte-Quenin that the priests called up, even those liable between the years 1899 and 1905, should be treated as the other soldiers. The proposal was backed by the usual wild harangue against the privileges of the clergy and of the Church, and was passed by sweeping majorities in the Chamber and the Senate.

In making provision for the Orphelins de la Guerre, the children whose parents have been killed or incapacitated by the war, the Government refused to give any guarantee that these helpless ones should be reared in the Catholic Faith. The State is to be their guardian, but as the State is "neutral," they, too, must be reared as "neutrals." On the central council, which controls the whole scheme, the universities, the city and departmental Councils, the lay social organizations, etc., are to be represented, but the Church is denied representation; and, furthermore, as if to ensure that religious neutrality would be observed. the work is placed under the jurisdiction of the Ministry of Education and the local Prefects, both notoriously hostile to religion. All amendments framed to secure that at least the children of parents who had taken care to have them baptized should be reared as Catholics were rejected, so that, as M. Piou points out, the orphan without parents would be almost forced into unbelief. "The war," he said, "has made him an orphan; the State makes him a free-thinker. (For him) neither family nor religion; that is the price the children are to pay for the heroism of their fathers."

On the other hand, M. Lazare Weiller, a free-thinker, makes the Journal des Débats the medium for a plea for the re-establishment of diplomatic relations between France and the Vatican, claiming that such an agreement is absolutely necessary.

In reality the problem is political, and nothing but political. It results from the real conditions of our foreign relations, from the rights and duties assigned to us in the world, from our secular traditions, and from our future destinies. It is thus it has been understood by many Republicans, and even by some of the most distinguished members of the Socialist party. It should not be forgotten that in the first article penned by M. Albert Thomas in the Information, after that eminent Socialist resigned power, he expressed astonishment that the French Government had not replied to the Peace Note of Benedict XV. . . . I may add that, though I am not a Freemason, I have received, without surprise, the adhesion of many eminent French Freemasons to the idea of re-establishing diplomatic relations with the Holy See. And now comes the deliverance of Jerusalem by the Entente Allies' troops. That gives renewed actuality to the problem of our protectorate over the Christians in the East, and of our traditions in Syria. No one denies the difficulties, nor can dream of solving them without the action of the Holy See. Nor can anyone think that in such a matter we could abandon to any one, even were he a friend, the defense of our rights.

The writer even expresses the hope that since M. Clemenceau is possessed of practically dictatorial powers, he will at once ask the present Chamber to effect the resumption of the desired relations.

Mexico.—In a recent issue of the American Freemason there is an article by W. M. Seamon, which contains these passages of interest to all who have the welfare of unhappy Mexico at heart:

Carranza and Mexico City

In Mexico City there is now a complete paralysis of business. In addition, and because of neglected sanitary conditions, there is much disease, typhus fever and pneumonia being especially prevalent. Business men are, in consequence, very despondent, and anxious to get away. For seven years the resources of the country have been wasted. Public improvements have been destroyed, and repairs have not been kept up. Now the evil harvest of all the neglect and destruction must be reaped. This will be the worst year that Mexico has had of all the bad years just passed, and I can only hope that there will be no others still worse in the future.

The strongest government in the country, that of Carranza, is impotent, disorganized and inefficient. Many believe that if Carranza can secure a loan of $200,000,000 in the United States he will be able to hold things down. There are others who hold that the lack of money keeps Mexico comparatively quiet; that such a large amount of money in the treasury would at once bring about a new revolution to get possession of it.

The New York Sun goes even further. On January 29 it printed the first part of the report of a "trained observer," who had been sent into Mexico with "instructions to be impartial and unbiased" and to depict the situation as it is. The country is in a state of chaos and is starving and bleeding to death. Carranza, who has failed miserably, left Mexico City Christmas Day for Queretaro, and it is freely predicted that he will not return. Despite the fact that taxes have increased tenfold, the treasury is empty, nobody is receiving pay for services rendered and brigandage obtains throughout the country:

Down through the rank and file of the army looting prevails, but when too excessively carried on it provokes the complaints of the citizens and hurts the First Chief's popularity, at the same time stirring the victims to retaliation, with the result that the country is full of brigandage, under revolutionary chieftains owing no allegiance to Carranza, under avowed bandit leaders, and under Carranza's own officers, who are often the most rapacious of all. . . . . .

Mexico City is full of starving Indians, insufficiently clad and with no shelter to betake themselves to at night to escape the icy winds that sweep down from the encircling snow-clad mountains. When the sun goes down they huddle together for mutual warmth on recessed doorsteps, passing the bitter night in a physical state that must somewhat approach that of the hibernating bear, for in the morning they crawl into the sunny spaces and slowly thaw into life again, when they get up and resume their pathetic quest for food. They mutely appeal with outstretched hand and wistful, doglike eyes to the passerby, and there are legions of them. . . . . At every station through which the trains pass you see them mute and sad-eyed through all the country between Mexico City and Monterey and Queretaro, San Luis Potosi, Saltillo. They are gaunt and almost naked. These are the great producing class, and unless they are fed and fed soon they will perish. . . . .

The food supply is appallingly scant. In warehouses in Mexico City there is perhaps a three months' supply of flour for that portion of the population, some twenty per cent, using write bread, but for the rest of the people accustomed to subsist on corn, beans, etc., there is an absolute dearth at the present moment. To such an extent have the city's cats been sacrificed for food that the common mouser is eagerly purchased by merchants and warehouse men for five pesos, while a half-grown kitten sells for three pesos. Sugar retails for thirty-five cents a pound and flour for thirty cents.

Regardless of the shortage of food and the millions of starving Indians they are still permitting the shipment of foodstuffs from Vera Cruz. The Ward liner Esperanza last week loaded two carloads of garbanzos (Mexico peas) for Havana.

Mexico City wears an awful aspect, the awfulness accentuated by the contrasts between the dark, filthy patios in which the starving peons huddle and the palaces builded by the Cientificos of the Diaz regime, where the Carranzista generals now hold obscene orgy. Carranza himself has chosen the magnificent house at 95 Pateo de la Reforma as his private residence. Each general has his own picked troops to guard his residence and a military band to entertain him. Night life in Mexico is not, however, the gay life led in other Latin-American capitals. It's too cold, for one thing, and robbery is too rampant. . . . . One popular and easy form of robbery is to hire an automobile to be driven to an address in some lonely neighborhood, sandbag the driver and take whatever he has on his person. This simple procedure is also worked the other way round, the driver taking his fare to an auspicious place and sandbagging him. . . . .

The writer then pays his respects to the I. W. W. on which he puts the blame for Mexico's sad plight, adding that "it was through this organization that the men chosen in the last elections climbed to power." In future issues of AMERICA more will be said on this subject.

Russia.—The forcibly dissolved Constituent Assembly has been succeeded by the Congress of the Councils of Soldiers' and Workmen's Deputies of All Russia which assembled in the Tauride Palace, Petrograd, on January 24, and was attended by 625 workmen and soldiers. The chairman asked the Congress to decide at once whether the Russian Government was to be one of all classes or a dictatorship by the proletariat. After settling that, the Congress could discuss the question of war or peace. The chairman requested the Congress to ratify the decree of the Council of Soldiers' and Workmen's Delegates giving the proletariat all power and to approve the acts of the Government Commissaries.

The All-Russia Congress

The Congress has refused to negotiate with the Ukrainian Roda, and states that nothing remains but a relentless struggle until the bourgeois control of the Ukraine is brought to an end. Foreign Minister Trotzky announced on January 27 that the Bolsheviki had completely broken with the Rumanians also. A dispatch read:

(1) All diplomatic relations with Rumania are broken off. The Rumanian Legation and all agents of the Rumanian Government are to be sent abroad by the shortest route. (2) The Rumanian gold fund deposited in Moscow is declared inaccessible to the Rumanian oligarchy. The Soviet Government assumes responsibility for this fund and undertakes to hand it over to the Rumanian people. (3) The former commander of the Rumanian front, General Stcherbatcheff, who has revolted against the people, is declared an enemy of the people and an outlaw.

On January 31 an official statement announced that the new Workmen's and Peasants' Red Army will serve to support the coming social revolution in Europe, and a decree establishing an "All-Russian Collegium" for organizing the army in question was published and 20,000,000 rubles were devoted to the purpose. The All-Russia Congress has adopted a constitution for a "Russian Socialistic Soviet Republic" to consist of a voluntary union of the nations of Russia of which the highest authority shall be the All-Russian Workmen's and Soldiers' Congress which will meet not less often than every three months, the power in the interims resting with the Executive Committee. The government of the federation which will consist of a council of national commissioners, may be elected or deposed either by the Congress or the Committee. Local affairs are to be in the hands of local soviets, but the higher soviets will have power to control the lower.

The Bolsheviki have taken a hand in the affairs of Finland. The Red Guard, assisted by the Finnish Socialists, were reported, on January 31, to be in control of Helsingfors, but the Government troops succeeded in blocking any further movements of troops from Russia. When the Finnish Minister at Petrograd protested against Russia's interference, he was told by the Workmen's and Soldiers' Delegates that "Russia's Government, true to its principles, is in duty bound to support the proletariat in Finland in its battle against the Finnish bourgeoisie." Russian warships commanded the Finnish capital where murder, plunder and general anarchy were common, while Government troops control the northern part of the country, but the Red Guard and their adherents dominate the south. On February 3 the situation in Helsingfors was reported to be growing worse.

Revolution in Finland

Ensign Krylenko, the Bolshevist Commander-in-Chief, in a speech delivered at a meeting of soldiers, stated that in his opinion the recent murder, in their sick beds, of two members of Kerensky's Cabinet, is "a blot on the revolution." He considered the present movement in Russia "more dangerous to the propertied classes than any other revolution." The Allies, he continued, are willing to pay the Bolsheviki to go on with the revolution. "But we shall not be cannon-fodder so that the allied Imperialists may celebrate a victory. We are against the whole world and we shall fight for the revolution and for the revolution alone."

Krylenko's Utterances

The Chief-of-Staff on the Russian front has sent to Ensign Krylenko a gloomy picture of the army's condition. The maintenance of discipline is reported to be impossible, many forts at the front are entirely open; in some places there are only 240 infantrymen to a mile, fortified places have been destroyed and economic problems are pressing. Food is so scarce in Russia that a great famine is said to be impending, and epidemics due to malnutrition are spreading.

The "Bone-Dry Law" and the Mass

PAUL L. BLAKELY, S.J.

WHEN Mrs. Bill Sykes comes trembling into the Domestic Relations Court you feel that the only forces capable of dealing with the case are the late Mrs. Carrie Nation, William J. Bryan, and whoever it was that founded the Manicheans. For Mrs. Bill displays a black eye, not the work of nature, and accustomed to the slings of outrageous fortune, is intimidated, poor creature, even by the Hooverized splendor of so kindly a tribunal as the Domestic Relations. She admits everything. Little Bill is not at school. Rosie, supposed to be working in a box-factory, is beginning to "run around" in a way that portends disaster. The younger children lack proper food and clothing. She loves them, but they, too, are getting beyond her control. She can't be at home very much, because she scrubs floors in a down-town office-building. She is not sure she is a proper guardian. It is hopeless to appeal to Bill, Senior. He has been tried by the fires of probation, and was consumed utterly at the first application of the purifying flame. Wouldn't it be better to find a home for at least the younger children? And Mrs. Bill goes back in tears to a home in which the music of noisy children has been stilled.

You know the story. Bill, Senior, is a longshoreman, with good wages when he works. The tenses of that last sentence had better be changed to the preterite. Bill's quondam avocation required limbs fairly steady, and an intellect also fairly steady, if not necessarily Aristotelian. But Bill is steady only in his support of the liquor trade, and the unclean things that too often go with it. The low saloon gets most of his money, and as a gracious return, deprives him of his job and his morals, sets the feet of his growing children on the easy path to perdition, disperses his family, breaks his wife's heart, and possibly some of her features, and in the end, generously provides him with a grave in Potter's field or the plot adjoining a penitentiary. It does you credit that you leave the Domestic Relations Court with a fixed bias in favor of a law, providing boiling in oil as the minimum penalty for all liquor dealers. For you know that Bill, transposed to many keys, exists in all grades of society. When jolly good fellows get together, whether in the Ritz-Carlton or Tom and Jerry's down near the docks, some one must drink bitter tears. Because the cannikins clink, the police must herd the weary wanderers of the streets into the Night Court, and anxious Commissioners of Charities must plan to stretch depleted appropriations into new channels for the care of dependent children and hospital cases. You have seen all this before, and you know that the bitterest indictment of the evils that follow, with easy disgrace, man's fondness for alcoholic liquors, falls so short of the reality, that it sounds like a panegyric of St. Agnes. In the anger of the moment, you swear a mighty oath that you will use your undoubted influence to secure some copper-riveted "bone-dry law" from the next legislature.

If you live in Oklahoma, you were one of thousands who did that precise thing. Now, having got your law, if you are a Catholic, you are witnessing the phantasmagoria, said to parade before the ultra-bibulous on the morning after. But out of the welter emerges one clear idea, and it is this: The Oklahoma legislation, and all legislation modeled upon it, will, if enforced, put an end to the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass.

And it is the Mass that matters, now as never before. Now more than ever do we, mourners in a stricken world, need that daily immolation of Jesus Christ, the daily breaking of the Bread of Life, those pierced Hands pleading pardon for your sins and mine, and the great cry that gives hope to hearts that sin and hearts that mourn, "Father, forgive them." But if we are to safeguard the Holy Sacrifice, it is imperative that the proper guarantee be inserted in the local or State law. If this guarantee is not clearly, specifically secured, we shall be confronted with the expensive and racking necessity of carrying an appeal through a series of courts, perhaps to meet failure in the end. Our attention must center upon local legislation, for the prohibition "agitation" is, properly speaking, a matter to be decided by the several States, not by the Federal Government, and the probable results of any appeal to the courts are clearly foreshadowed in several recent Federal decisions. Within the last year, certain questions affecting the right of the State to restrict or abolish the liquor traffic have come before the Supreme Court of the United States, and in all instances, the right of the State has been affirmed. Early in 1917, the Webb-Kenyon law, attacked on the ground that it gave the State an unconstitutional power over interstate commerce, was sustained, and the effect of this decision is to prevent the importation of liquor into any State, except in conformity with the laws of the said State. No doubt in this, as in all other contingencies, the "rule of reason" is applicable, but as it affects the liquor traffic, that rule is narrow. Thus on December 10, 1917, in Clark Distillery Co. vs. Western Ry. of Maryland, the constitutionality of this law was again affirmed. "Its purpose," said the Court, "was to prevent the immunity-character of interstate commerce from being used to permit the receipt of liquor through such commerce, in States, contrary to their laws, and thus in effect, afford a means by subterfuge and indirection to set such laws at naught." The bearing of this decision is plain. When a State enacts legislation forbidding the manufacture, sale, importation, or retention of alcoholic liquors, the Supreme Court of the United States will uphold that legislation. Will an exception be made in favor of a particular religious body, believing wine essential to a religious rite? It is surely the summation of imprudence to look for such an exception.

Probably the Clark case was one of "the numerous decisions upholding prohibition legislation" (U. S. Supreme Court, in Crane vs. State of Idaho) which Judge Clark had in mind when on December 24, 1917, he ruled that, according to the Oklahoma statute, wine might not be brought into the State "even for sacramental purposes." (AMERICA, Vol. XVIII, p. 323). It will be remembered that when this law was proposed, and finally passed by the legislature, assurances were given that in no case would it be used against the Mass. But it has been used against the Mass, and there can be no doubt whatever that, sooner or later, every similar "bone-dry law" will be invoked to make the celebration of the Holy Sacrifice, difficult, or altogether impossible. The situation in Oklahoma is thus detailed in a personal letter to me from the Reverend Urban de Hasque, D.D., Chancellor of the Diocese.

I am absolutely convinced of the correctness of your statements [AMERICA, Vol. XVIII, p. 303, p. 323] on the difficulty of upholding any claim to the possession, importation and use of wine for sacramental purposes, under Federal or State Constitutions, and through judicial authority, when the prohibition law, like the "bone-dry law" of Oklahoma, does not make specific exception of wine for sacramental purposes. I listened most attentively to all the arguments advanced in the case which I inaugurated in the District Court, to protect in the name of "religious liberty," the right to secure and retain wine for the Holy Sacrifice. I have been forced to the conclusion that so long as Congress or the State enacts no law directly antagonizing the Faith, or thwarting the practice of religion, no constitution has been violated. The judge who rendered the decision and the eminent counsel who defended the Santa Fe Railroad, were not, as has been insinuated by those who hold an exaggerated and unenlightened belief in "religious liberty guaranteed by the Constitution," actuated by any prejudice against the Catholic Church. Furthermore, the attorneys who appeared in my behalf were not incapable or inexperienced lawyers, but learned and erudite members of the Oklahoma Bar, and exemplary Catholics.

An appeal has been taken from the decision of the District Court, to the Supreme Court of Oklahoma, and on January 15, announcement was made that the cause of Urban de Hasque vs. A. T. and S. F. Railway Co. had "been advanced and set for hearing before the Supreme Court at the April term thereof."

Your advice to secure the insertion into State prohibition measures, "before their approval by the respective legislatures, of a clause which specifically authorizes the use of wine for sacramental purposes," is excellent. But when such a clause is refused insertion by the prohibition leaders who fathered the law, and an amendment to the same effect is voted down by the legislature, as was the case in Oklahoma, the only possible recourse is to the courts.

I took that recourse. The result is that the court has decided that a strict prohibition law, inhibiting the possession and use of all wines, no matter for what purpose, is declared, in this first decision, constitutional. It is now left for the Supreme Court of Oklahoma to rule whether or not the police power of a State is so absolute, as not to be restricted by the fundamental principle of liberty in religious belief and practice, and whether or not a citizen who worships God according to the dictates of his conscience and the belief and practice of the Church, shall be forced to become a criminal in the eyes of the law, as long as he remains steadfast in his belief and practice.

Whatever succeeding judicial rulings may establish, the following paragraph is recommended to the consideration of all Americans, and especially to the prayerful meditations of a certain body of Catholics who, it would seem, scruple to place no impediment in the way of the Holy Sacrifice, provided that with the impediment, a "bone-dry law" is secured:

Meanwhile the priests of the diocese of Oklahoma are violating the law of the State by the mere fact that they have wine for sacramental purposes in their possession. Daily do we see our limited supply grow less, and we have hardly any means of replenishing it. We can now only pray, and work for the enactment of an amendment, but the legislature will not convene until January, 1919.

While writing these lines, I received a letter from the head of the department of philosophy in a prominent Catholic university. I quote the concluding paragraph:

Father A. has been commissioned chaplain, and is now in camp. Shortly after joining his regiment, he wrote that he had not been able to offer the Holy Sacrifice. Why? He had brought no wine with him, and the camp is in a "bone-dry" State! Whether he has since been able to disregard this fanatical regulation, by importing altar wine, I cannot say. But I know Father A., and I know that no prohibition law will long stand between him and the Holy Sacrifice. Still the difficulties in his way are very great.

Does this mean that our Catholic soldiers are to be deprived of Mass and Holy Communion in any camp located in a "bone-dry" State? If it does, the outrage should be referred at once to the Secretary of War. Certainly, the Secretary can not change the State law. Possibly, however, he can change the location of the camp.

It is all very well to weep over Mrs. Bill Sykes' black eye, and Rosie wandering into devious paths. But if the Mass goes, their kind will be multiplied a thousandfold. It is the Mass that matters, and the Sacraments. Compared with their power to uplift and ennoble the individual and to leaven the social body, a thousand volumes of sumptuary laws are as nothing.

Several correspondents have hinted and suggested appeals to the Fourteenth Amendment. What that famous Amendment may or may not admit, is beyond the power of man to conceive. But it is an ill policy to lock the door after the Ford has been abstracted. Furthermore, as I hope to show in a succeeding paper, that Amendment has already been invoked against another "bone-dry law." The result was as might have been expected. On December 10, 1917, the Supreme Court of the United States ruled that there was no conflict between the Idaho "bone-dry law" and the Fourteenth Amendment.

A Place of Peace

MICHAEL WILLIAMS

"THE details all satisfactorily arranged, I left New York on an early morning train, and reached the Benedictine priory in less than an hour and a half, the last ten miles from the station being done by motor. It was possible for me to remain, on this occasion, for the week end only; moreover, the newness of it all, at least to me; the profound character of the impressions received, and a lack of more than a superficial knowledge of this newest of religious works in our country will explain, I trust, the somewhat fragmentary, and really inadequate account of my visit which I am now sending to you. But later on, I shall write again. For I shall go there for a longer stay; I hope I shall often go; for I have tasted a draught of that which all our souls are thirsting after; I have tasted peace; I have gone apart from the world for a brief, too brief, interlude, and found an oasis, where by the wells of living water, and under the palms of silence and solitude, I have refreshed myself, and strengthened myself, for the next stage of my journey in life.

Well! I am afraid all this sounds rather fantastic; and it is not fantasy but a very muscular reality; so let me drop my metaphors, and tell you what has happened. As you know, for the subject has often been discussed by us, for years I have been one of many men living a busy life who felt the need for what I may term, I hope, without irreverence, a spiritual vacation now and then. By this, however, I do not mean a dropping of religious duties, an escape from religious interests. On the contrary, I mean a nearer approach to religious reality, a more intimate and concentrated study of religion, only, done in a way, and in a place, that would rest and refresh the spirit, console and soothe the soul. Ever since I entered the Catholic Church, I have made it a yearly custom to make a retreat with the Jesuit Fathers, and under their direction strengthen myself with the "Exercises of St. Ignatius," as they are so skilfully adapted to the limited time and the rather limited spiritual vigor of laymen. For we laymen do lack religious energy, religious zeal, even more than time. Ah, if we did not, the Church would count for more than she does today in our country. The lay-retreat movement increases year by year, and we must each and every one of us strive to spread it ever wider and wider, and ever deeper, among our men and women, yes, and among our children, too. But, there are many mansions in our Father's blessed house, the Church, and many forms of service, and multiform types of character. Therefore, there can be no end, practically, to the legitimate ways in which Mother Church may teach and guide her children, and, as I have said above, there has been a wide-spread longing among Catholics in the United States for what has now been given them, namely, a Benedictine foundation, devoted primarily to the exemplification of the liturgical worship of the Church, and the development of its artistic beauty, and to its spirit of peace: a place, too, above all, where laymen may go into retreat without the necessity of following formal exercises; a place of spiritual balm, and restful, though guided, meditation. A sort of spiritual sanitorium, you might say; for priests, too, as well as laymen; a place of healing, of withdrawal from the rush and bruising conflict of the world.

Such is the Benedictine priory, which for some years past, now, has been so beneficially doing its serene and consoling mission. I should need to write a whole book to describe its beauty and its peace. Situated near New York, yet withdrawn from all suggestions of the city, in the midst of many acres of woodland and lake and hilly grounds, slowly but surely its picturesque buildings are arising around the first small settlement. Great architects are aiding to create its form; celebrated artists are gladly cooperating in the decoration of its inspiring church, in which—oh, the joy of it all!—I have heard what my soul has been longing for all these years: the true music of Mother Church, the plain chant. There the High Mass and the Divine Office are sung daily, and it was wonderful to be one of the group of laymen present, among whom there were several businessmen, a doctor or two, a lawyer, and numbers of priests, a very influential journalist—a non-Catholic by the way, one who used to be a convinced enemy of the Faith—all of whom were absorbing the powerful and elevating influences which radiate from the Church in her beauty, even as they come from the Church in her other aspects. But the chief thing here is summed up in the great word of this ancient Order: Pax. It is a place of peace; not a quiescent and passive rejection of life, but a powerful though placid mastering of its problems; in the spirit of true peace, that peace which our Blessed Lord brought to us all."

"So, let me tell you how—" But, no, I cannot keep up the little subterfuge; it makes me too envious of the writer who by and by, and very soon, I trust, will in all reality write like this, or, at any rate, on this subject; for, alas, as yet the Benedictine priory thus described exists only as a project. Let me add at once, however, that the project is well under way. More than $10,000 have already been subscribed by interested American Catholics to the fund which Dom Leonard Sargent, O.S.B., an American Benedictine monk, trained at Downside Abbey, in England, is now collecting. Sites for the foundation have been examined, and other active forms of promotion are going forward. Himself a convert from the Protestant Episcopal Church, Dom Sargent has made it the work of his life to bring about in his native land a foundation of the Benedictine Order which shall not in any way conflict with the excellent work of the several Benedictine communities already existing here, which direct their energies to that which, after all, especially today, is more practically necessary, that is, the active apostolate. But Dom Leonard well knows that the country requires the influence and the powerful assistance of the contemplative life. So, blessed by the sanction of Pope Benedict, and the hearty cooperation of his English superiors, he is now actively at work. In a letter to me, he says:

> In your article I shall be grateful if you can make it clear why we are at the work now. After the war there will be much to do in spiritual contributions to the readjustment of life, and a Benedictine house can surely do its part in this. Cardinal Gasquet said once that when the struggle had brought peace many would be turning to the spiritual and away from the merely material values of life. And we have had for fourteen centuries an offering of Pax to the world-weary people of all times.

In order to secure wide-spread cooperation in the work, an "Association of the Clients of St. Benedict" was formed by Dom Leonard Sargent (Newman School, Hackensack, N. J.) on the feast of the Nativity of the Blessed Virgin Mary, September 8, 1914, and placed under the patronage of Our Lady and St. Benedict. The Association's objects are: (1) To ensure the united prayers and the good works of those interested in the establishment in America of a Benedictine house, a subject-priory of Downside Abbey (England), until conditions shall warrant its separate existence; (2) to foster in the members of the Association a knowledge of Benedictine history and traditions, and an esteem for the liturgical worship of the Church. The requirements for membership are: (1) A memento at Mass, or any daily prayer, for the purposes of the Association; (2) the medal of St. Benedict to be worn; (3) the payment, upon admission only, of a membership fee of one dollar.

It is hoped that the clients may also be able to render some voluntary assistance to the proposed foundation. A Mass is offered each month, and a memento made daily on behalf of the Association and its members. When the Community is formally established, the Association will be erected into a proper Confraternity of St. Benedict.

The Reign of Law

DANIEL A. LORD, S.J.

MAN is at once the master and the anomaly of the world. Beneath him, the Creator has subjected all things, so that either by their very nature they minister to his needs, or he, by the force of his God-given intellect and will, can bend them to his service. On the soft pelt of the man-eating tiger, stretched now before his domestic hearth, his children tumble and play. The wind that can uproot whole forests becomes for him hewer of wood and drawer of water. Fire and flood, the swaying grain, the mettlesome horse, gold and the forces of steam and lightning serve him as no slave ever served a king in Babylon. The order of the universe all verges upward toward man, and on the pinnacle of the universe he stands, the world's greatest anomaly.

For in the midst of unchanging order he alone is free. All else must yield a blind obedience; he can lift his head against the world's Designer and cry a proud defiance. And he who is the appointed master of the world's order is also he who most often sets that very order at naught, putting chaos where without him order reigned. That is the mystery of man's free will.

Yet it is perfectly absurd to talk and act, as many modern philosophers talk and even act, as if, in the midst of this universal order, man, the most perfect of visible beings, were himself without any order whatsover. It is ridiculous to suppose that the intellect, which set a course to the stars and implanted an unchanging law in a scarcely visible seed, left man as the one lawless creature in a law-bound world. God is not a wise director but a fool of fools if He has left man free to scatter his talents, to squander his powers of intellect and will, to ride heedlessly over his fellow-men, spreading along his path ruin of souls and death of bodies. God could not make it right for man, His supremest visible creature, to thwart the order of the world. He has given him an intellect and will, but He could not give him leave to become inferior to the brutes, by the very faculties which raise him above them. For a beast is bestial by force of his nature; a man becomes bestial in spite of his.

On the contrary, our own experience and the history of mankind proves that there is a law implanted in our natures which binds us to a definite course of action and forces us to avoid the contrary course. It is perfectly true that we have also a free will, and consequently the law does not coerce us as it coerces the horse and the ox and the rose and the comet by a blind, physical force which cannot be resisted. It is a law which is in accord with our free wills, which, leaving us physically free to act for or against the law, obliges us to choose with the law and not against it, if we would act in accord with our human nature. There precisely is the anomaly: the law of our nature has been made to depend on our free will. We can live according to the law and thus attain the fulness of our manhood; or we can set the law at defiance and deliberately ruin all that is best within us. This is at once the glory and the peril of our freedom.

Natural law has an unpleasant ring in certain philosophical quarters. Law implies restraint, obligation, both of which words are sadly in disfavor. The revolutions which swept away first much of canon law and then more of civil law have been aiming at natural law as well. But though we can destroy the laws of the land by pitching them, as they are doing in Russia, into a bonfire, the only way we can destroy the natural law is by rooting out the human intellect. The natural law is expressed so clearly and forcefully in every rational being that, even though he may run, he must read. From the dawn of reason we are conscious of its mandates, and we can read in the eyes of others—the frank, pure eyes of the nun not less than the brutal, shifting eyes of the roué—that they too have felt its binding power.

Among the first judgments of which we are conscious is: This action is right; this action is wrong. Blurred and hazy at first, we find such judgments growing clearer and more definite with advancing years, and extending their scope to include a range of actions which hitherto had not touched our lives. Independently of any outside suggestion, frequently in the face of systematic training, men recognize with more or less clarity the difference between actions which are good and those which are bad. We need no instructors to tell us that murder and lying and the fleshly sins are wrong, and all the professors in the college of crime with Bill Sykes for their chancellor could never convince our reason that they are right.

Almost simultaneously with these judgments comes a second group which imperiously and without appeal bids us do the good and avoid the evil. No one rests satisfied with the purely impersonal, objective opinion that striking one's mother is a grave wrong. Immediately he feels within himself a peremptory mandate: You shall not raise your hand against your mother. Who does not recall with shrinking the first time he shut his ears resolutely to some exasperating command and ran heedlessly into a course of action against which every fiber of his better nature was struggling in vain rebellion?

And then came the rush of condemnation which follows on every wrong, the bitter, relentless, accusing judgment: You should not have acted thus! We have all felt in a greater or less degree the remorse that made Macbeth see murdered men where others saw but empty thrones, and caused his wife to wander in her sleep, washing away a stain which water left as fresh as ever.

Here is law expressed more clearly than if it were written like the Roman Law on brazen tablets or like the law of the Hebrews on tables of stone. We have only to glance at the literature of the nations or to read their written codes of law, to discover that no matter how much men and nations may differ in their culture or in the religion which they follow, in the more general precepts of the natural law there is not only identity of thought but almost identity of expression.

These commands of which we are all conscious are not in any sense mere directions suggesting the most profitable course of action. They are real laws whose binding force we feel even when we struggle hardest against them. A business man finds himself so placed that by a single dishonest act, which no one can possibly discover, he will make a fortune for himself and for those he loves best; whereas honesty will in this case mean inevitable ruin. Still, he has no choice; the law is absolute; though disaster fling him and his family into irretrievable poverty, though he see his family starving before his eyes, he must take the course which his reason knows to be honest. And should he choose the dishonest act, not the clinking of gold across his counters, nor the healthy laughter of his carefully tutored children, nor the adulation of an adoring wife can drown the voice within him which condemns his dishonest course.

Put in one pan of the balance fortune, honor, life itself, and in the other a mandate of the natural law, and the mandate must prevail. For her child the mother sacrifices health, her own pleasures, and the thousand luxuries which a woman's heart craves, because the natural law makes her duty to her child a paramount obligation. A soldier captured in battle receives from the enemy a choice: treason to his country followed by honors and wealth with a grateful foe, or a line of glistening rifles at dawn. He has no choice, if he follow the command of natural law, but the blinding handkerchief, the sharp order, and a grave in quicklime.

All men acknowledge this; our literature teems with the praise of men who, rather than violate the natural law, choose a death with torture. Even the pagan could not but admire the martyr who, when an almost casual gesture, the flinging of a bit of incense into a brazier, would have meant life, chose rather to become a living torch in the gardens of the Cæsar. And we stand in awe over the mangled body of the maiden who, to preserve her chastity, plunged down a cliff to certain death.

Here is a law which no mere man, least of all one's own self, could have implanted in the human soul. By what right can any man oblige me to lay down my life rather than transgress his precept? And it is ridiculous to suppose that such a law is self-imposed, for after all, my first instinct is the instinct of self-preservation, an instinct which the law in a thousand cases obliges me to conquer. What relative proportion is there between a short lie and my life? Yet something within me commands me to die rather than utter that lie. Indeed, the simplest human law is inconceivable unless there were first a law in my nature obliging me to obey rightfully constituted authority?

This is a law which is beyond all possibility of human repeal. Man can tomorrow blot out the laws he made today; but when any written law contradicts the natural law, our whole instinct rises in rebellion, and we refuse to obey. One may ignore it or rebel against it; but one cannot repeal the natural law nor blot it from his heart.

Such a law, so weighty in its commands, so binding that I am obliged to sacrifice in its observance all that I naturally cling to, would be utterly impossible were there not some Being beyond and above me who has a right to force me to obey His will. The same Deity which set the wonderful order in the oak and the swallow and the whirling planet set too an order in my soul. But there is this difference: neither oak nor swallow nor planet can do other than obey, blindly and by a physical coercion, the law of its nature; the Deity has left me free to obey or resist the law as I choose. But whether I obey or resist, one fact I cannot escape: the natural law is for me the imperial voice of God.

"Protect Our Womanhood"

GEORGE D. BULL, S.J.

"PROTECT Our Womanhood" is the slogan a newspaper is using to cry down the over-quick employment of women to replace men. And certainly sound reason seems to support the cause; for broken health, and shortened lives are the results in many cases of trying to make the delicate frame and organism of woman substitute for the hardy muscles of man.

The slogan might justly be given a broader application, the movement it heralds, a wider scope; for if signs can be read aright woman needs protection not from physical ills alone, but from other evils threatening subtly to take from her what she and the world can afford to lose far less than her health, her longevity or even her life itself.

That such evils exist no one, I think, who has watched the gradual popularizing of crude ideals of womanhood, can deny. Day by day certain phenomena have become increasingly common; and though diverse in many ways, they are at one in that implicitly or explicitly, by precept or by concrete example, they preach the advent of the "new woman."

In magazines we stumble upon such phrases as the "proprietary theory of marriage" and marvel perhaps that Christian monogamy, not the Turk's conception is meant: staid writers make such distinctions as "mating and parenthood," or champion "the cause of the unmarried mother"; the novel, the moving-picture, the stage hold up for admiration and imitation heroines in whom feminine gentleness and modesty, virtues too old and worn, have yielded to the supreme virtue of "self-expression."

Now if anyone set himself the task of tracing this ramified and unnatural attention to woman, his experience would, we imagine, have been something like this: He would see in the philosophical journal, the ethical review, or wherever else, a theory advanced or a doctrine propounded as the basic reasons for the new woman's being. In some papers he would come upon the conviction that a change in woman's status is at hand. Mr. Vance Thompson would tell him, for instance: "The light you see along the horizon is the dawning of the woman's age," the "androcentric world is changing for good and all." He would be pained to learn perhaps, from another writer, that "The saintly self-sacrificing woman whom our ancestors praised had her place in a certain organic conception of society, the conception of ordered hierarchies which dominated the Middle Ages"; that she belongs to the same order of ideas as the faithful servant, the loyal subject, the orthodox son of the Church but that "This whole order of ideas has vanished from the civilized world."

In other articles he would find some special phases of the subject isolated and weighed. Now it would be the economic aspect, and the modern woman's humiliating (sic) dependence upon man; now it would be the meaning of the movement for woman, the individual, set out in such phrases as "career impulse," "living her own life," "due self-expression."

Finally in increasing wonderment at the ramifications of the movement, the detail and thoroughness with which successive phases had been touched, our rash investigator would come upon the sexual aspect of feminism and incidentally upon the phase dearest to the heart of writers most revolutionary in character. He would learn that the whole theory of sex has thus far been wrong or at any rate is now outworn. He would be told that "Only a small section of the public genuinely believed that sex relations outside marriage are wicked"; that "There are large sections in which no social penalty is inflicted" for sexual sin; and, that "There is a very rapidly increasing number of women who do not believe the conventional code." He would find frankly written as the problem in this field, "The task of building up an idea of sex that is consistent with the facts and yet leaves a universe in which woman can live comfortably, escaping from her own barren chastity while avoiding man's meaningless license, creating a new appreciation and expression of the most fundamental human instinct."

Other writers tell how the woman movement is to modify the family for "We cannot expect to have higher education and new possibilities of freedom and still retain the special type of monogamy characteristic of an earlier civilization—a civilization which in many respects was brutal in its restraint upon woman." This and much else like it can be read in many a random article. If a reader refrains from further detailed investigation he can glance at titles alone, and find vistas of the movement's real meaning before him in such captions as: "When Mating and Parenthood are Theoretically Distinguished," "Marriage and the Population Question," "Feminism and Sex Ethics," "Feminism and the Family," "Motherhood," "Woman" and others as startling as these, signs that some attempt is being made to educate the public to the new woman, who is the outcome of a movement which has at least two well-defined phases, the economic and the sexual, each capable of subdivision according as the viewpoint is that of the individual woman or that of society as a whole.

Nor is all this agitation merely academic. As has been said, its instruments are also the popular magazine, the novel, the newspaper, the theater. In all these the new woman herself is made to live, and act and pose in every attitude likely to catch the imagination and enlist the emotions in her cause. As a result, many are familiar with her mental attitude, the "keenness of her mind to probe medieval concepts" and its unique way of "doing its own thinking." And it is not the new woman's fault if men do not see and admire her physical dash and prowess as she handles the rifle or rides or marches with manful ease. Mannishly attired she drills and maneuvers and poses in woman's camps or appears in khaki on the street or acts as chauffeur for a group of men, in fact plays as man in a thousand ways, and in all strives to be the embodiment of brilliancy, nerve, dash, freedom both of body and mind, so utterly scornful of the conventional, as to be a striking contrast to the "maternal type" which unfortunately she is intended to supplant. Many and varied are the attitudes and aspects and protests of the new woman, but in all of them is found much cant, "the indisputable justice of her protest against the established status of women." In recent years, play after play, film after film, article after article have been the same in general outline. The theme has been the "triangle," so trite in immoral literature, and woman has always been right, society has always been wrong, even when the former has outraged decency and flown in the face of the law. Indeed, even when at passion's behest she has trampled upon the right and happiness of others she has been the victim, a martyr in the cause of the "higher freedom." "Society" has been the tyrant, blind, unreasoning and archaic. A Hall Caine, a Galsworthy, a Shaw, even a Winston Churchill, have not been too great to lend their power to the campaign. Note, for instance, "The Woman Thou Gavest Me," "The Fugitive," "The Inside of the Cup," where situations are so managed as to translate into the language of burning appeal the cold syllogisms of a Havelock Ellis, a Bertrand Russell or an Ellen Key.

What milady of the finishing school has been receiving from the pages of Russell, Ellis, or Key the shop girl and factory-worker gets through the moving-picture, the novel and the "thoughtful article" in cheap magazines.

From all this then arises the inevitable conclusion, that beneath the vagueness of such terms as "feminism" and the "woman movement" there is a sinister reality which is being introduced into the lives of the people by two main streams, one reflective and analytical, in which the theory is advanced and justified, the other, popular and emotional, which seeps through to a stratum where thought is at a minimum and life is more likely to be dominated by feeling and passion. This conclusion is fully justified by everyday occurrences, by the scant or mannish dress and postures of the new women, by their conversation, by their over-eagerness to adopt occupations and recreations hitherto distinctive of men. In the face of this ubiquitous beating upon traditional ideals, is it not likely that even in conservative women some obstinate doubts will arise which only a new application of the eternal, immutable principles will quiet?

The answer to the question may indicate to the custodians of faith and morals a very broad and deep application for the slogan, "Protect our Womanhood."

The Catholic Church and Freedom

JOHN C. REVILLE, S.J.

IF liberty exists in the world, we owe it to the Catholic Church. From the beginning of her history, the poor, the outcast, and above all the slave, were the object of her solicitude. As far as the religious society of the Faithful is concerned, St. Paul announces the abolition of slavery, for he writes to the Galatians: "There is neither bond or free . . . For you are all one in Christ Jesus." No one before him had dared to write such a charter of freedom. Not content to define the rights of the slave, the Apostle pleads for him in his tenderest words when he begs Philemon to welcome back to his household the ungrateful Onesimus: "Not now as a servant, but instead of a servant, a most dear brother, especially to me; but how much more to thee both in the flesh and in the Lord?" The conduct of St. Paul is the conduct of the Church. If from the spiritual point of view, there is no slavery for him, he recognizes that the civil law acknowledges serfdom, and that the law cannot be violently abrogated or changed. His prudence equals his zeal. So with the Church. While she proclaimed the equality of all men before God, she did not attempt the impossible task of upsetting at one blow the huge fabric of oppression which weighed so heavily on the multitude. She knew that freedom was the work of years. But she was nobly confident that one day the colossal fabric of slavery would fall.

Two things had to be done to free the slave. These had never been fully attempted even by the wisest philosophers and statesmen of antiquity. The slave himself had to be emancipated; his labor had to be ennobled. The first was to be the result of a moral upheaval and victory; the second was to be a political and economic triumph. It took time to accomplish these results. For the foundation on which slavery was built went deep down into the life of the people and rested on an almost unshakable substructure of selfishness and heartless indifference to suffering. It took a longer time to make the labor of the slave free, but before the end of the fifth century his person had been emancipated, or where that result had not been accomplished its speedy realization had been prepared.

Under the beneficent influence of the Church, thanks to the wise and humane legislation of the Popes, and the example of the early saints and martyrs, the slave regained his rights as man. He ceased to be a chattel, a plaything, serving the caprice and the passions of his master. In the religious society which he entered when he became a Christian, he regained the use of the rights and privileges of manhood, which for centuries had been denied him. The Gospel restored them. And thanks to the Gospel and its teachings, this despised creature, fit only, in the eyes of pagans, for the vilest uses, gradually but surely ascended in the social scale and recovered even his civil and political freedom, accordingly as society became more and more imbued with the spirit of Christ. The world seems to have forgotten this inestimable benefit which it owes to the Catholic Church. She wrote the Magna Charta of the slave. She found him prostrate. She stretched out her hand to the thousands groaning in the mines, in the holds of Roman galleys or lash-driven to face the beasts of the Roman amphitheaters. She reminded the serfs that though their masters might bind their bodies in iron gyves, they could not enthrall their souls, and that slaves as well as the proudest Romans were called to the liberty of the children of God.

In the Catholic Church, the barriers everywhere else separating the slave from the freeman were broken down. For the bondsman as for the master, there was but one Faith, one Lord, one Baptism. In the Catacombs, when the martyrs were preparing, by the reception of the bread of the strong and the wine that maketh virgins, for the contest of the arena, the slave knelt at the banquet table of the Lamb by the side of the heirs of the Glabrios and Caecilii, the consuls and senators of old Rome. Time and again, slave and master died together for the Faith. Their mortal remains were buried together in the Catacombs and their brethren honored them both as stalwart soldiers of the Cross.

In the Church, the slave might even be held in higher estimation than the free man, if the former were baptized and the latter a catechumen only. The Church even opened to the former the ranks of her priesthood. As a rule, however, the Church prudently required that the priest or bishop should at least have been emancipated. But a former state of servitude she considered no bar to the highest office within her gift, and in the second and third centuries she was governed by two Popes, Pius and Callistus, who had once been slaves.

Thanks also to the Church, this religious and spiritual emancipation was to be accompanied by the regeneration of the family life of the slave. For the serf of Greece and Rome, those sacred words, family, home, wife, husband, child, were empty sounds. In his case, the law recognized no such thing as the legitimate union of man and wife. It did not assure the permanence of the marriage bond or protect it against outrage. The slave was without family and without kin. The Church taught him that he was not so wretched or so forlorn. She sanctified and protected his affections and his love, taught him that the words father, husband, mother, children, bride, were as holy for him as they were for the sons of consuls. She admitted him to the sacramental contract of matrimony, blessed his nuptials and declared guilty whosoever should attempt to outrage their integrity and sanctity. On the day she did so, the world went forward with a giant's step in the path of true progress and civilization. If she had not felt the strength of God Himself nerving her hand for the task, she would never have dared attempt it.

Passing further, the Church taught Christian masters to treat their slaves not as chattels, but as men. She reminded them that the noblest gift they could confer, the most welcome alms they could bestow on the poor of Christ, was the gift of freedom. A striking instance of liberality thus inspired is the well-known story of St. Melania, who generously freed her 8,000 slaves.

Such were the results of the direct and personal action of the Church. It is doubtful whether in her long history she can point to another victory of similar magnitude and splendor. To have given back to millions the sense of their own dignity as human beings and to have slowly forced the world to recognize them as such was an undertaking which only she could carry through. It was beyond the power of natural forces and agents. God visibly helped her in the gigantic task.

In her religious society the slave had reconquered his place. It was not so easy for the Church to have all his civic rights restored to him. But when after the peace of Constantine she emerged from the Catacombs and had something like official recognition from the State, her influence and example gradually secured for the slave his personal liberty in the eyes of the law. Nothing can be more interesting than to watch, after Constantine's accession to power, the struggle between the spirit of paganism and that of the Church. It is one of the most dramatic spectacles of history. Two forces are in deadly conflict, the spirit of true liberty and that of pagan absolutism still potent enough to win many a heartless victory. Now paganism is triumphant and the cause of the slave seems lost; now Christianity wins the day, and the hopes of the oppressed revive. The victory long hung undecided in the scales, but after the middle of the fourth century the first glimmerings of the coming triumph are faintly discernible. Through the fifth century the light of the full-orbed day of freedom grows more resplendent. In spite of itself, the Roman State had to recognize the influence of Christian principles. These were as the little mass of leaven vivifying the whole body. Even in the political sense there was progress. From the days of Nero and Domitian, in spite of the crimes of pagan rulers, in spite of the horrors of the reign of an Heliogabalus and a Galerius, Roman law had made substantial progress along nobler lines. Unconsciously it was influenced by the presence of millions of Christians in the Empire. After Constantine had taken the Church under his protection, the laws became still more humane, more tolerant; they recognize more definitely the dignity of man and safeguard his rights more jealously. They are approaching nearer and nearer every day to the spirit of the Gospel. The day is not far when at the head of the great book of the Roman Law the Cross will be inscribed to safeguard and ennoble its statutes.

Constantine forbids masters or magistrates to brand slaves on the face where "resides an image of the Divine Beauty." He gives to priests and even to the simple Faithful, by the mere act of "manumission" performed in their presence, the privilege of conferring all rights of citizenship. He decrees the abolition of those gladiatorial contests where so many were butchered to make a Roman holiday. He safeguards the sanctity of the family life of the slave, forbids the separation of parents from children and husband from wife. The slave was thus made to feel that the law realized at last that he had a right to love and to be loved, and that his humble hovel was a sanctuary inviolable to the lust and the cruelty of his master. Constantine also declares guilty of homicide those who so maltreat their slaves as to cause their death. The laws of his successors, Constantius, Valentinian, Gratian, Honorius, Theodosius, those particularly relating to the protection of female slaves, hitherto the most unfortunate because the most helpless, carry on his work, until, under Justinian, the great movement of civil emancipation, more especially of the woman and the girl, reaches its height.

A cursory view even of the history of the early ages of the Catholic Church affords convincing proof that she is not the enemy of liberty. Had she been such, she needed only to keep silent about the oppression and outrages under which thousands groaned. But she championed their cause. She warned their oppressors that slaves were men redeemed by Christ. She herself treated these wretched outcasts as her favored children. By patience, by prayers, by threats, by sacrifice and deeds of heroic courage, she won the sacred battle of freedom. Of the many services she has conferred on humanity, this is one of the noblest. When the slave lifted up to her his shackled hands, God gave her the will and the power to break his chain.

Adopt a School

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In the issue of AMERICA for September 15, 1917, Father John La Farge, S. J., put forward the very practical proposal of adopting a school. He says truly that "a sodality, a Holy Name Society or Council, an academy or high school" could easily take care of a poor school. I feel sure that if American Catholics realized the necessity of Catholic schools and the difficulties against them in the Philippines Father La Farge's proposal would not fall on deaf ears.

In the words of the Director of Education in the Philippines: "The [Philippine Government] law provides that no public money or property shall be applied directly or indirectly for the use, benefit, or support of any system of religion. . . . The Government respects all religions and teaches none." In other words education without God is the law of the land in the Philippines, and 700,000 young Filipinos, nearly all children of Catholic parents, are at present being brought up under this system.

A Catholic priest may build a school in his parish, and if he brings it up to standard, it is "recognized" by the Government, but not financed. And the financial difficulty is acute here. Let the present Bishop of Buffalo explain. When Bishop of Jaro in the Philippines his Lordship wrote (Extension, July, 1913):

> As an outcome of the union between Church and State the people were never habituated to the maintenance of religion, not even so much as to a penny collection. And now that the former régime has passed away, it would be extremely difficult to accustom them to support religion, even if they were able to do so. But the fact is they are most wretchedly poor. . . .

On the other hand, if Catholic schools are not built it means loss of faith to the children. Owing to bad example around them, and other causes, the children, very many of them, will not come to Christian doctrine class on Sundays. The only means of imparting to very many of them any knowledge of God is through the schools. Already the faith of a good percentage of our young Filipinos has been destroyed, and as these lines are being written the Manila press is loudly crying out against the immorality of the State schools.

Another circumstance to be remembered in this connection is that all the missionaries in the Philippines come from Europe. There are not half a dozen American priests in the islands today. And Europe is beggared by this all-destroying war. If ever, then, there was a field of work open for those who wish to adopt a school, that field is the Philippines.

I am not pleading here for my own school alone. Every Catholic school in the Philippines needs help. Protestants in America are lavishly pouring money into the Protestant schools of the Philippines. One Protestant institute has received as much as $40,000 within the last two years. Will not American Catholics help Catholic education in their great colony? Failure of Catholic education here means ruin of all faith. The Filipinos will never be Protestants.

In our parish at Opon we have a Catholic school with an attendance of between three and four hundred children. It is recognized by the Government. Our parish collection for it amounted to sixty-two cents. Who will "adopt" it?

As already stated, I am not pleading here for one school alone. The names of many others will be supplied on request; or, better still, the names will be supplied by the superiors of the missionaries who are working here under the American flag, for the welfare, temporal and eternal, of American subjects.

"Some Irish Old and New"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I trust you will permit a Catholic who is not an Irishman some remarks on the controversy which has been occupying space in AMERICA under the above title. I write as a friend not as an enemy. But even as a friend I have some unpleasant things to say. In the first place many think that the average Irishman has one preeminent weakness of character. He is a truckler of a very vicious species. In poverty he bends his knee to his wealthy neighbor as he used to do to "my Lord" at home. In wealth he turns on his people and pretends to despise them. Worse than that, he sneers at Irish ideals and apes the English in speech, manner, dress and everything else, thereby converting himself into a contemptible hybrid that is despised by everybody, except himself and his silly wife and their climbing offspring. I am not concerned with the explanation of this phenomenon but only with its result, which is a position of inferiority that prompts those in power in this country to treat the ordinary Irishman as an alien. He may be tolerated but not respected. From this defect of character arises dissension, which is shown in jealousy, suspicion, bickering more or less violent, and what not. How few Irishmen, for instance, will help an Irishman to fame and power? They will help a Jew to eminence or an Englishman, especially if he be a convert to the Faith, but not an Irishman. If one of the race happens by sheer talent and industry, or by a mere accident, as is often the case, to climb to power and eminence, his own people are the first to try to pull him down. How can such a race expect to command the power and respect due its better qualities? The majority of our people judge by little things not by big things. Then, too, is it not true that the Irish, as a race, have shown very little constructive ability here in America? Individuals among them have displayed great power in this line, but what has the race done, what is it doing now? Practically nothing. The Irish in America are a disorganized crowd without leaders and without plans, just floaters living from day to day, boasting of what was, rather than of what is and will be. Let me put a question. After the war there will undoubtedly be a rush of young Irish people to America. What Irishman or Irish society has given thought to their care? None. They will be allowed to congregate in our already congested cities, there to live from hand to mouth in poverty and loneliness, until at last temptation comes to lay them low. Then the "mere" Irish will lacerate the poor creatures with their tongues and the "made-over" Irish will exclaim: "Those horrid Irish, don't yer know." There is the trouble. Why don't the Irish learn from their enemies and correct their defects?

New York. L. J.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Though not an Irishman or a Catholic, I have always taken a keen interest in the Irish race and I feel that the Irish in America deserve unstinted praise rather than censure. They have done more for this country than men of any other race, and their best work is just now beginning to be appreciated. They have preserved the family, scorning divorce and other moral filthiness. This has been no easy task, especially of late years, when men and women have been exchanged like cattle in the market. True, the Irish have their defects, so has every race, but time and patience and freedom will smooth out the wrinkles from the national soul. And now that America has gone into the war for democracy, it should not be too much to hope that Ireland will profit by our sacrifice. In the meantime Irishmen should organize here to teach their fellows two things: (1) The glories of Ireland; (2) the great work done in peace and war, by Irishmen for these United States.

The Amadi Mission

To the Editor of AMERICA:

As a constant reader of AMERICA since its inception, as a missionary at Amadi from 1901 till 1911 and as Superior Regular of the Canons Regular of the Order of Prémontré in the Welle Prefecture of the Belgian colony, I beg you to insert the following correction. On reading the review of a book on travels in Africa by Mr. Du Plessis, I was surprised to find the following passage quoted by W. D. in which the author states: "At Amadi the Dominicans have put up a fine edifice in Gothic style, with stained-glass windows and an imposing tower." I beg to state that the author is here in error. The church of Amadi was erected in the year 1904-5 by the Norbertine missionaries. In fact, all the actual buildings were erected from 1901 to 1906, and the Dominicans commenced their missionary labors in the Belgian colony at Amadi, only in 1912.

The Prefecture of the Welle, being more than seven times the size of Belgium, proved to be too extensive for the missionaries at our disposal. When the Dominican Fathers arrived Propaganda divided this Prefecture, giving to them the eastern portion, we on our part ceding the two solidly established mission centers of Amadi and Gombari.

St. Vincent de Paul Society

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The several articles on the Society of St. Vincent de Paul appearing in recent issues of AMERICA, signed by L. E., R. S., and K. B., have been of great interest to me, since work as a Vincentian has been for many years my proud privilege and pleasure. Until I moved to Chicago, two years ago, I was a very active worker in New Orleans, where I was a member of the Conference of St. Rose of Lima, transferring later to Our Lady of the Holy Rosary Conference, when the new parish was created. From my observation of Vincentian work as done in other cities, I think that in New Orleans the work is performed in closer observation of the "Manual" than elsewhere. Here in Chicago, for instance, I find that the work is done very much the same way as it is done in New York, taking of course my conclusions from the several letters to which I referred above. It appears to me from articles read in AMERICA that the real work of the Society is being more and more overlooked, the main effort now being that of mere organized charity and alms-giving. This, to my mind, is a great mistake, for the Society of St. Vincent de Paul is a strictly religious organization. The charity or alms-giving feature was adopted as the best means of reaching the poor in their homes, means by which Vincentians can become more intimately acquainted with those to whom they are giving relief, thus learning the real cause of their destitution, so as to be better able to point out the way to the poor to help themselves. Experience has taught that most of those who ask for relief come to grief because of neglect of religion. The knowledge of this important fact is best acquired by visits to the homes, by becoming personally acquainted with the poor, by visiting them in their misery, by hearing their conversations, by watching their actions.

The New Orleans Conferences find that the best way to do this successfully is to follow the rule laid down in the "Manual." Members are required to visit the poor once a week, giving only such relief as is necessary to carry the latter over their difficulties till the next visit. Members must attend the regular weekly meetings, where they make a full report of their findings, thereby enabling the Conference to become more closely identified with the work of each member and with the conditions of the poor visited by him. This gives all the members present at the meeting the benefit of the different experiences accumulated through numerous visits. With advancement of spiritual work as the objective, the results of this method are most edifying, both to the members of the Society and to those to whom relief is given. Moreover, the zeal of the members is increased, as is shown by the large attendance at the quarterly Communions. During the year 1916, out of a total membership of about 1,000, the average attendance at these Communions was some 420. This, I think, you will agree, is a fine showing. Another evidence of increased zeal was shown in the distribution of relief during the same period. New Orleans, with forty-four Conferences and a membership of about 1,000, collected, during the year, $33,206.35 and distributed $31,258.50;

1,472 families were visited. In Chicago, during that year, where there are eighty-nine Conferences, with a total membership of about 1,400, the receipts for the year were $33,992.75. Of this, $31,295.75 were distributed and 1,984 families were visited. Now, Chicago has a population of 2,500,000 people, while in New Orleans there are only about 340,000 people. This, to my mind, is another example of the superior benefit derived, when the spiritual element is foremost in the work of the St. Vincent de Paul Society.

Evils of Subjectivism

To the Editor of AMERICA:

To a person familiar with systems of German philosophy the policy pursued by the Imperial Government in its conduct of the war does not come in the nature of a surprise. When a man forgets that there is such a thing as an established order founded on the immutable principles of the natural law, and appeals to his own personality as to a last court of decision, then we may expect those dreadful consequences that are the legitimate offspring of the mind, when it paints a picture, not from nature, but from its own wild fancy. When the world must adjust itself to the individual, then there is a serious and dangerous inversion of things. The menacing shadow of utilitarianism looms up and at the next moment we are at the mercy of that relentless demon. If I am at liberty to govern my actions according to the standards of subjectivism, I am not going to be the loser, and nothing will stand in the way of my advance along the lines marked out for me by myself. Autonomism and utilitarianism are the very Lares and Penates of Germany, and under their auspices that misguided Power is conducting her cruel ravages upon humanity. The fear that comes over one who reads the cold-blooded statements of most of the leaders of thought in Germany turns to consternation when we find these very notions, so near home, in the utterances of our submarined eclectics. We are under the spell of a siren if we imagine that wild intellectual theories are born and die in the atmosphere of their conception, for there is in the intellectual world a seepage that makes it practically impossible to restrict these vagaries to those who teach them today and with marvelous versatility reject them tomorrow. A censorship, in time of war, is considered perfectly proper, and our daily papers tell us that an index of prohibited books on military topics has been ordered. Would it be incongruous to hope for the day when our Government will decide to serve upon certain gentlemen of the pen a writ to show cause why they should not be considered undesirable citizens, since they propagate thought destructive of the rights of governments, and subversive of that authority upon which all law is founded? Surely the inalienable right to the preservation of existence is not to be denied to nations, and a just defense is as lawful to them as it is to individuals. It is a hazardous thing to throw a boomerang and then close your eyes. How sad it would be to see our own United States "reasoned" out of existence.

Censorship of Movies

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The discussion of "White Slavery," started by C. Connolly, has done much good Here, there is work for us all today. God knows, the Catholic people should be workers in every social problem that benefits the health and life of the community. We must be agents of good and helpers of men. We have a sacred duty to help the fallen and to prevent the good from evil ways. He does more service to the world, who prevents vice than he who helps to reclaim the wayward. There is one thing we all should do to keep the youths of our cities from careers of crime—demand censorship of picture films. Our cities have many criminal youths, and why? Because dangerous, insidious, immoral pictures are freely permitted to run their course of corrupting the young mind. Some pictures are so openly indecent that they have a debasing effect upon the impressionable minds of both sexes. Will Catholic priests and people stand silent, while their youths are ruined? The grand work of our schools and churches is undone, our preaching fails because the youth are taught crime by evil pictures.

That the evil picture is the cause of moral ruin, that it is a propagator of evil is well known, especially to our courts. From films like "Cleopatra," the youth has every chance to learn cunning, plotting, crime; he sees in it lasciviousness, lewdness, lust—everything debasing. Then we ask where our boys learned all this crime!

Our cities have their boards of health to protect the people against physical diseases. They have their pure-food laws, their safety laws, but laws to protect the purity of our youth are not to be found. The Catholic people must demand a strict censorship, clean films.

A few weeks ago, a public-spirited official of Chicago suppressed a film, for which action he is now sued by Theda Bara. I called on him, a non-Catholic by the way, and he impressed upon me the necessity of clean, wholesome films if we wish to keep our boys clean and wholesome. They have now in Chicago a strict censorship, thanks to the energy of three or four people. As a result, criminal youths are fewer in that city. Why cannot Catholics of other cities stand together and demand strict supervision of every film before it is presented to the public gaze? With censorship, there will be less corruption of youth, less murder, less immorality. To safeguard innocence and public morality the censorship of moving-pictures is absolutely necessary. And there is little use in having our religious schools open by day if the criminal schools of immoral pictures are to be open day and night.

Beating the Air?

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In a recent issue of AMERICA C. P. makes an earnest appeal for a Catholic Y. M. C. A. There has been of late so much shooting in the air on this subject that it seems time to do a little range finding. The disease of which C. P. complains is a widely admitted fact. But is the Y. M. C. A. a specific for this disease? Is it the only cure, or the best cure, or a cure at all? Is it even a practical palliative? For if the evil is serious, is increasing daily, we dare not "be as one beating the air" but must strike at the cause. Does the Y. M. C. A. reach the cause of the evil?

Parish Employment Bureaus

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The suggestion made by T. E. P. about enployment bureaus in AMERICA for January 26 is an excellent one and should prove a real boon not merely to those desiring employment but to employers as well. I should like to add a detail to the plan of having the priests of the parish announce the names of those who are out of work. In the vestibule of almost every Catholic church there is a bulletin board. Why not post the names and addresses of those seeking employment on this board with other notices of parochial interest?

Our Subscribers

AMERICA owes a word of grateful appreciation to the many subscribers who have lately shown especial interest in its welfare. Conscious of the stress occasioned by high prices and other necessary and unnecessary concomitants of war, many of our readers have generously taken upon themselves the task of lengthening the subscription list, with the result that a large number of educated Catholics, hitherto strangers to the paper, are now numbered among its patrons. For this we are thankful, and should our words of gratitude fall short of the measure of our appreciation, our benefactors still have the consolation of knowing that they are missionaries in a good cause, the same cause for which AMERICA itself exists and does battle. A peculiar feature of this problem of circulation is that little or no interest is taken in AMERICA by Catholic schools and graduates thereof. There are exceptions of course; some few schools respond nobly, so too do some graduates of these schools, but in general it remains true that Catholic colleges and those educated therein are indifferent. Thus, for instance, not one-half of one per cent of the alumni of a well-known Catholic college are amongst AMERICA's readers, and there are indications that their names are not found on the subscription list of any Catholic paper. And strange to say, this state of affairs is not peculiar to the colleges of any particular Order or Congregation, unless perhaps it is more noticeable amongst the graduates of some of the Jesuit colleges. What is wrong?

Worse still, many of our high schools subscribe to secular papers for use in classrooms, but no Catholic paper ever finds its way into those sacred precincts. An example in point is a Catholic school which every week takes sixty-five copies of a secular review and not a single copy of a Catholic paper. And the tragedy of it is, that Catholic theologians have been known to discuss whether or not the favored paper falls under the general law of the Index. And is it not peculiar that the reviews which never lose an opportunity to insist on Catholic education are discredited before the eyes of Catholic students in Catholic schools, while papers aggressively hostile to our ideals are used as supplementary text-books and guides for the thought of our youth in those very schools? Something surely is wrong.

But all this which is apart from the thanks we owe our patrons, is not said by way of complaint but only to point a moral, and to awaken the interest of Catholics. Our subscribers have done well by us: they have our thanks. Finally, though they compose a prudent and patient group, it has become necessary to remind them once again that they do an injury to others by tempting them to rifle the mails of greenbacks posted after the manner of ordinary letters. Alas, to our positive knowledge many unfortunate wights have lately "fallen from grace" under the stress of this temptation; a check or a money-order might have left these literary, but practical, thieves untouched by the devil's wand. And may our subscribers not forget the fuel administrator and the railroad director who are no longer fictions but stern realities. Their orders have gone forth stamped with all the dignity and force given to the decrees of an ecumenical council in full session. Their mandates should and must be obeyed, hence printing-schedules have been deranged and the transportation of second-class mail has become uncertain. AMERICA will be late now and then, but the case is not altogether hopeless, for the seven Penitential Psalms and continual fasting prevent impatience and the writing of cross letters which make us old beyond our years.

What Is an American?

"SAXON and Norman and Dane," remarked Tennyson, on an occasion when song had deserted his lips, "are we." Perhaps from these three strains alone is woven the fabric that is called English, but what makes an American? Must his name begin with "Mc" or "von," and end with "ski" or "stein," or roll its length along a line of bewildering liquids, or guttural consonants that betoken ancestries drawn from sunny Italy or dark Lithuanian forests? Must it be Blackburn, or Vernon Lee, or Hastings, or may it be Hascha Bey, Muldowney, or even Sitting Bull?

A traveler from Altruria, endowed with a fair knowledge of geography and ethnology, would read the columns of a typical "City Directory," or scan the roster of any American regiment, with increasing amazement. Columns and rosters alike are more than pentecostal. Parthians and Medes, Elamites and Mesopotamians are there, and in addition, representatives of almost as many nations as stood in bewilderment about the Tower of Babel. It is clear that Europe, Africa and Asia have combined to supply our cities with inhabitants, and our army with soldiers. And all are Americans. No longer must one prove his right to the title, by a family tree rooted in the Puritans, a race most comfortably viewed through the haze and retrospect of several centuries, or to the Cavaliers of that remarkable region, Westmoreland County, Virginia. Today, no one need blush for his Americanism, if his first ancestor in this country, flying from pogroms or famine, sold shoestrings in the market place, or dug honest ditches in lower Manhattan. On the contrary, these facts may easily make him a better American than the present representative of men who laudably ducked scolds in New England or drank the parson under the table in colonial Virginia. For the bitterness of want and persecution enables him to appreciate what liberty is, and what it asks in return.

The rank is but the guinea's stamp. Neither name nor ancestry makes an American, but the spirit that animates the man, stirring a devotion to democratic ideals, made manifest by deeds. With pardonable pride, a colonel in a Middle West regiment announces that there are seventy-five Murphys in his regiment, while a chaplain in the same region bewails his ignorance of the Polish and other Slavic languages. We are more than "Saxon and Norman and Dane." The Christian principle that all men are equal, as children of God and brethren of Jesus Christ, flourishes under our kindly sky, and makes us a united people neither English nor French, nor German nor Irish, but American.

God and Sad Mothers

MANY mothers are sad these days and they are expressing their sorrow in hot burning words that appear to make their letters tremble with emotion. Their sons are at war, exposed to a thousand unprecedented dangers on land and sea, and maternal anxiety overflows the heart in language pathetic and appealing. No doubt this is quite natural, and none save the heartless will rebuke it. But then there are both cause and room for emotions other than sorrow. It is no small blessing to have mothered a hero, and our soldiers are heroes. It is splendid to help rescue nations from tyranny, to die that others may re-enter into their heritage of liberty, living once again their own lives free from the tyrant's yoke. Mothers' souls might well leap with joy over the realization of the fact that their sons are victims on the altar of freedom. And is it nothing that so many warriors have at last found God and "shown us God"? Their sublime heroism has been blessed from on high and in reward for their ready obedience to the voice of authority, God has drawn them closer than ever to Himself, while the world looks on and from the warriors' noble deeds of love and courage learns to glance from earth to Heaven, there to see the face of the Father: a matchless blessing, for in God alone lies hope of better things; through Him alone will come peace to this blood-drenched earth lacerated by the claws of hate which was born of the disappointed greed of a few men who rule the destiny of powerful nations. Surely in this at least is consolation to overtop the sorrow of soldiers' mothers, that their sons are as glad tidings to many who sit in darkness and the shadow of death.

An Archbishop in Quest

A DISTINGUISHED prelate of the Anglican Establishment, the Archbishop of York, is now in the United States. As is fitting, he will be received with the respect due to his worth and dignity, both as a clergyman of unimpeachable character and as an unofficial representative of a great nation whose fortunes are now closely joined with our own. But if the news reports may be credited, surely no prelate ever left a peaceful cathedral close on a stranger mission. The intention of the Archbishop, it is announced, is "to bring into relations even more cordial two countries already closely linked by the common bond of language, customs and religion."

Plainly, exception may be well taken to every link in the chain. Our language is alike to the extent that we follow, with amusing variations, a common orthography. There the similarity ends. As to the resemblance of customs, let the fervent criticisms of Americans sojourning in England, and of Englishmen traveling in America, be a sufficient commentary. But when the puzzled reader is asked to believe that Great Britain and the United States are bound by the tie of a common religion, particularly the religion presumably represented by the Archbishop of York, his simple trust rapidly yields to blank incredulity. Out of a total of more than 100,000,000 Americans, careful search may discover possibly 1,125,000 who agree to pool their differences in the Protestant Episcopal Church, thus becoming, in some sense, the "co-religionists" of the Archbishop of York.

There is much peril, however, in this estimate, and there are other grounds of objection against the alleged communism of religion. To begin with, it is not clear what particular form of orthodoxy or heterodoxy, according to one's point of view, sheltered under the hospitable roof of the Establishment, finds an exponent in the Archbishop himself. Were there question of the Archbishop of New York, or Westminster, or Paris, or Vienna, or Christ Church in New Zealand, doubt would be absurd. One in the Faith delivered to the Saints, these Catholic prelates are one in bearing unwavering witness to its truth. But who shall answer for the Archbishop of York? Does he give his allegiance to that school which has long since done away with the very statement of the inspiration of Holy Scripture? Does he hold an Apostolic Succession, as well as Baptism, to be matters of small moment? Does he scorn as a scholastic quibble the discussion whether, after the words of consecration, uttered by an Anglican clergyman, the "Elements" remain mere bread and wine, or become, in some new sense, a type of Christ's abiding presence, or are in very truth the Body and Blood, Soul and Divinity of Jesus Christ, to be adored even as God Himself is adored in heaven and on earth? Does he impart the kiss of love and unity in the faith to his newly-appointed brother in the See of Hereford, who along with the miracles of the New Testament rejects the Divinity of Jesus Christ?

Where is the bond of a common religion uniting England and the Christian United States, if one may remain an Anglican, with a respected and exalted position in the Establishment, while refusing to confess Jesus Christ before men? If the Archbishop can find that bond, his is a vision not vouchsafed to the common run of men and of Anglican prelates, skilled as many of them are in reconciling irreconcilables.

Elsie von Hindenburg's Poem

THE poetic heart of the daughter of Germany's Field Marshal broke into rugged song quite recently and the effect was startling to those unacquainted with Lutheran thought. At Christmas time or thereabouts the maiden warrior lifted her voice and caroled:

Christ Jesus gave His life for me,
From every debt I am now free;
He has procured His Father's favor,
He has become my gracious Saviour.

He to the bayonet thrust gives vigor,
The joy to aim, to pull the trigger.
My aid is Jesus, that I know—
On to the foe, on to the foe!

As was to be expected in the case of strong-lunged minstrelsy the notes of Prussia's valiant daughter were heard beyond the borders of the Fatherland and forthwith she became the target of a thousand sharp arrows of criticism. But after all why blame her for the sentiments expressed? They are not hers. She is but reproducing the thought of her ghostly father, Luther. Were he alive today the doggerel verse would intoxicate him with such joy that he would make the earth ring with the fateful words:

"Christ Jesus gave His life for me,
From every debt I am now free."

Those two lines contain the pith and kernel of his pestiferous doctrine on "fiducial faith" which takes account of good works only to sneer at them. If a strange uncanny faith which really partakes of the "nature of a strong, artificially stimulated hope" is alone necessary and sufficient for salvation, it is quite clear that Elsie von Hindenburg, the Kaiser and his war lords are "free from every debt"—and the last two, God and men know, are acting true to doctrine. As for the other stanza which bristles with darting bayonets and resounds with exploding pistols, apparently directed by Christ, with whom most people do not associate murder but only sweetness and mercy, they are but a tame and faint echo of Luther's passionate appeals for the slaughter of the unfortunate peasants whom he plunged into war by intemperate words and other actions

No, no. Elsie von Hindenburg is not overmuch to blame; the thoughts are not hers, but only the language and structure of the verse; and for these last no man will forgive her, not even Don Marquis and Free Lance.

Soldiers' Saints

IT was an observant French officer in the present war who came to the conclusion that the Germans fight out of pride, the English through interest, and the French for honor. Had an English or a German soldier made a similar remark, no doubt it would have been phrased differently. It will certainly be interesting to hear what verdict his enemies and his allies pass on the American soldier when he takes part for the first time in an important action. Perhaps the soul of the American soldier, as he goes into battle, will be strengthened both by a consistent blending of the three foregoing motives and by a burning desire to bring to a just and quick end this suicidal war of the nations, so that when peace is finally restored to the world all subject races and peoples may enjoy the right of self-determination so that hereafter no country will be governed against its will by another. Men who go to war for such worthy objects as those, provided they live clean lives, pray like priests, and fight like gentlemen, will surely win from Heaven the blessing of victory. But if it be God's will that they should lay down their young lives in so noble a cause, Paradise will be theirs forever.

Thrice is he armed who has his quarrel just. But of the Catholic soldiers who make up so large a portion of our American forces, it may be said that they are panoplied in armor of proof because they have such a fine array of military saints to imitate as patterns and to invoke as intercessors. The Catholic soldier who is charging the imminent deadly breach can call, for example, on St. Ignatius Loyola, that fiery Spanish captain who defended the Fortress of Pampeluna until he was struck down by a cannon-shot; or St. Sebastian, the valiant Roman officer who sealed with his blood his allegiance to God; or St. Lawrence, who endured intense pain so smilingly; or the Forty Martyrs of Sebaste, who saw in God their heavenly Commander-in-Chief; or the great St. Louis, peerless Crusader and proudest of Christian knights; or his intrepid cousin, St. Ferdinand, so renowned for his devotion to Our Lady, and who wrested many a Spanish city from the Moor; or St. Genevieve, whose prayers saved Paris from Attila; or St. Clare, whose faith in the Holy Eucharist drove the Saracen troops from her convent gate; or she who perhaps stands above all other saints as a soldier's patron, the Blessed Joan of Arc, the Domremy shepherdess whom God called to free her country from the invader and to seat her sovereign firmly on his throne. With such sainted champions as these to inspire and protect the American soldier his praying mother should feel confident that all will be well with her absent son.

Literature

FIGHTING AND BELIEVING FRANCE

THE assertion is often made that though the French Government is hostile to the Church, the people of France, when the test comes, generally act like stanch Catholics. The fact that hundreds of anointed priests have died in the trenches with rifles in their hands and that the million French orphans that the Government is sending to the école laïque are in grave danger of losing their faith would seem to indicate that France's Catholicism is not always of a strikingly aggressive type. On the other hand if the war literature written by French Catholic authors reflects faithfully the spirit of the country, there is little cause for feeling uneasy about the future of France. For that nation's soul seems to have been purified by the call to arms, by the suffering and sorrow the war has brought to the people, and it would appear that the bravest of France's defenders, whether at home or on the battle-line are also the most faithful of the Church's children.

No recent book shows this better than "A Crusader of France" (Dutton, $1.50), the appropriate title given a collection of letters written from the front by Captain Ferdinand Belmont, of the Chasseurs Alpins, who was killed in action, December 28, 1915. In the opinion of that discerning Catholic littérateur, M. Henri Bordeaux, who contributes an admirable preface to the volume, the letters are written in exquisite French, and owing to "their sincerity, their familiar and provincial flavor, their profound intimacy, their religious fervor" they deserve a place beside Mrs. Craven's "Le Récit d'une Soeur" and the correspondence of Maurice and Eugénie de Guérin. They are pervaded moreover by such a noble spirit of courage, patriotism and scorn of death that they express unmistakably a brave French Catholic soldier's mind and heart.

Captain Belmont was studying medicine when the war broke out, but he at once took his post as sub-lieutenant of the reserve. He seems to have been an ideal officer. One of his closest friends, the Abbé Gonnet, now a lieutenant in the French army, writes that he was "kindly in the exercise of his authority but knowing how to be master of them [his men], knowing how to elevate their souls to the height his own had risen." He himself writes:

> To be a good officer, you must possess many and very rare qualities: devotion, determination, courage, intelligence, common-sense, coolness and I know not what besides; as a matter of fact one must have all qualities, be perfect—as in all callings when you would fill them properly. Consequently you must not count on yourself, but on the grace of God. . . . An army officer, a leader of men, must above all have character: his men must feel almost instinctively, that he is some one to be respected; everything which proceeds from him, their leader—orders, acts, gestures, or words, nay even attitude, must bear the mark of moral superiority and elevation of mind. Moreover he must know how to be as kind as possible.

Judging by his intimate letters and from the testimony of those who knew him best, Captain Belmont seems to have attained the high ideal he set for himself as a Catholic soldier. He realized that sacrifice and suffering is the school of character and that the object of our life in this world is not happiness but perfection. He can see the fatherly Providence of God in all that happens to him and to his country; his resignation to the Divine will, even under the heaviest crosses is as beautiful as it is holy, and his sympathy with the men of his command and his admiration for them is another very attractive trait of his character. Like so many brave soldiers who are face to face with the enemy, Captain Belmont speaks of him without that bitterness that often marks the utterances of those who are farthest from the front. He admits that the Germans have taught the French the art of modern warfare but he regards it all as a combat not "of heroes but of decadents" and longs for the knightly warfare of his ancestors when battles were fought man to man with naked weapons.

It was at Holy Mass and in fervent prayer that Captain Belmont found the strength to live every day the life of heroic self-sacrifice he had resolutely set for himself. "What fervor and poetry and value," he writes, "these Masses celebrated no matter where, on temporary altars by soldiers and for soldiers assume." His unwavering trust in God's goodness enabled him to see in the war "the sheet-anchor held out by God to this drifting country, in order to bring it back to Him," and a "redeeming devastation permitted by God in order to efface the stains which soiled the eldest daughter of the Church." It was his strong spirit of faith too that nerved this "Crusader of France" to bear with such fortitude the loss of his two beloved brothers, Jean and Joseph, who were slain in battle. Both were much like Ferdinand, it would seem, for Jean said on bidding his mother what proved to be a last farewell: "To die for a noble cause when one is young is a great blessing," and Joseph who left the seminary to enter the army, wrote to his parents: "To be nearer danger and death is to be nearer God. . . . I am absolutely convinced that death is happiness, suffering a merit, danger and trial a splendid lesson in energy."

Ferdinand himself was not destined to survive his two brothers long. When he heard of Jean's death, which occurred the first month of the war, he wrote his parents a letter which fills two of the finest pages in the book. Then Joseph was killed in action almost a year later, and again Ferdinand tried to comfort the bereaved father and mother. Finally on December 28, 1915, this Crusader of France laid down his life for his country, after being twice mentioned in army orders for his "bravery, activity, coolness and authority," promoted to a captaincy and decorated with the Legion of Honor. Fatally wounded by a shell-splinter at the Hartmannsweilerkopf, he made a Christian soldier's end, for God found him ready.

The story of another French officer's military career which was cut short by a mortal wound received in his first battle is movingly told by his father, Hugues Le Roux, in a recent book called "On the Field of Honor" (Houghton Mifflin, $1.50). Robert was engaged to be married when the call to arms came, and the letters from the front to his intended breathe an admirable spirit of patriotism and devotion. He writes, for instance:

> This morning I was thinking of you, following you in every act. You got up early, went to Mass. I saw all this in the blue sky, for the plain where we are camping overlooks the valley of the Moselle, and the horizon is far, far away. Yes, my little Helen, I shall commend myself to God when I am under the enemy's fire for the first time. I shall think of you then. I don't feel like the somewhat-cowardly person who is converted because "One can never tell what may happen!" No, I have already spoken to you of this. I have faith, and it seems to me that if ever our lives are in the keeping of God, it must be at such times as those I am traversing. I have always prayed in the solemn moments of my life and I shall continue to do so now.

Lieutenant Le Roux's "war lasted," as he expressed it, "just one-half hour and 300 meters." In his very first action, as he went to the assistance of a wounded major, he received a mortal wound which sent him to the hospital. Robert's sorrowing father and biographer who was with his son to the end received the only comfort that endures from the young soldier-priest who prepared the dying Lieutenant for Heaven. "O God, our Father," the priest prayed, "hidden from us beyond this world, this child whom You are taking, spoke Your name reverently, with faith. To shelter his young love, so pure, he longed for Your Kingdom here on earth. He has responded without a murmur to the dictates of Your will. He has never spoken a word of anger against the enemy who shot him down and who rejoiced to see him fall."

The thought of Robert's impending death proved a severe trial to his father's faith, but after praying a long time before the altar, the author won the grace to be fully resigned to the Divine will, and learned not to sorrow like those who are without hope. At his son's obsequies the bereaved father meekly unites his prayers with those of the officiating priest and exclaims: "Peace and Light! This is what we invoke, O Lord, for those who leave us. This is Your promise to us after so much suffering in darkness."

In General De Castelnau, whose distinguished career is sketched in the December Studies, France has a commander more than worthy even of such gallant subordinates as Captain Belmont and Lieutenant Le Roux. This brilliant strategist who saved the day at Nancy and at Verdun has always been "a Catholic in the open," and the fear that the uncompromising profession of his faith might hinder his advancement by an anti-clerical government never made him waver a hair's breadth from the path the Church traces for her loyal children. The inestimable value of his services to his country has forced Castelnau's enemies to respect his Catholicism. He trusts in God, seeks light in prayer and is a frequent communicant. Just before a victorious assault at Verdun he mounted his horse and addressing the troops called out: "We meet again here, or there," and pointed with his sword toward heaven.

Like the father of Captain Belmont General De Castelnau has lost three sons in the present war. The following account of how he behaved when the news came that his youngest boy had fallen, throws a flood of light on the General's character as a soldier and a Christian:

> On August 20, 1914, in the heat of the action, Castelnau is dictating his orders. He is interrupted by the entry of an officer with a report. "General, the Fourth Battalion of Chasseurs has repulsed the enemy after five hours' fighting. Unfortunately the officer who was in command has been killed. His head was shattered by a bursting shell."
> "What was the name of that officer?"
>
> "Sub-Lieutenant Xavier De Castelnau."
> The General bows his head a moment in prayer. Then turning to his secretaries: "Gentlemen, let us continue."

It is from the high examples of faith and courage that shine out from the lives of such gallant soldiers as Captain Belmont, Lieutenant Le Roux and General De Castelnau that the lovers of "gentle France," a land which still seems very dear to God, derive bright hopes that after the war both her government and her people will again be found acting according to the noblest Catholic traditions of the Gallic race.

GOD'S WAY

Dear Lord, You pleading asked a part
Of my already crowded heart:
And when with grudging, and with tears,
And thought of future lonely years,
I gave a part, ah was it fair
To ask for a still larger share?

Ah was it fair to ask a part,
And then with all a lover's art
To steal the whole? Ah was it right
To use such sweet, tremendous might
Against a little, feeble soul,
That feared the race, and feared the goal?

REVIEWS

Le Merveilleux Spirite. Par LUCIEN ROURE. Paris: Gabriel Beauchesne. 3fr.50.

This is one of those substantial and luminous books which it seems the privilege of Frenchmen to write. It lets in a flood of light on a question now engaging thousands of minds, so perversely anxious for the truth that they are abandoning God's revelation, where it can be easily found and seek it outside of those sources which He has ordained should be its natural fountainhead. There is a revival of Spiritism, one of the startling results of the present war. Thousands deprived of their loved ones slain on the battlefield have tried to pierce the veil of impenetrable secrecy which hides the other world, in order to receive some message from their departed. Spirit-rapping, table-turning, and "medianimist" manifestations are again becoming popular. Some pretend to have received through them cheering messages from the other world. As many more, were they to tell the truth, would confess that they have been dismayed and terrified by what they were told. What is to be thought of these from the standpoint of reason and of faith? Such is the question which the Jesuit author of this admirably conceived and finely ordered volume asks. No book could be more timely and necessary.

What is the value, what is the real worth of Spiritism? On what foundations does it stand? What must reasonable and God-fearing men think of its manifestations? A certain class of men, says Father Roure, dissatisfied with the narrow and heart-crushing teachings of rationalism ask themselves whether in Spiritism they may not find the glimmerings at least of a new religion that will satisfy the ineradicable yearnings of their nature. Scientists, the "men of the laboratory and the clinic" on the other hand, want to know whether the recorded facts of Spiritism have been subjected to a methodic examination, and under what scientific precautions Spiritistic phenomena have been tested. Believers and Catholics, alarmed perhaps at some of the marvels of which Spiritism boasts, seek to know how far they can trust them. The book gives the answer. It is a study of what might be termed formal and historic Spiritism, from its origins to our own times, from Mesmer, Allan Kardec and Agénor de Gasparin to Sir William Crookes, Sir Oliver Lodge and Eusapia Palladino. The phenomena of Spiritism are studied from the historical, scientific, psychological and religious point of view. The literature of the subject is familiar to the author, who personally has assisted at Spiritistic séances and consulted several of the best-known Spiritists.

There are chapters as absorbing as sections of a romantic novel on the "Vital Fluid," the "Frauds" and the "Messages" of the craft. In the last chapter Father Roure defines the attitude of the Catholic Church towards this frightful obsession that so often unhinges the reason of its deluded adherents. With regard to the evocation of the spirits of the dead, the summons made to them to appear and tell the secrets of beyond the grave, i. e., Spiritism properly so called, the Church's attitude is one of severest disapproval and formal condemnation. Neither reason nor faith forbid us to believe that, under certain conditions, God sometimes allows the spirits of the dead to communicate with the living. But neither the one nor the other can allow us to summon at our beck and whim, at the command of charlatans and tricksters, or of men and women often in league with the powers of darkness, the souls of those who have passed to another life, especially when they are summoned to answer ridiculous, puerile, blasphemous, or obscene queries. The practice of Spiritism is the undoing of its adherents. It ruins their mental powers, it corrupts their morals, it often drives them to suicide. Life and time are man's great privileges. These he must use and enjoy. The grave and eternity belong to God. He will not tolerate that men gaze irreverently into their secrets.

In condemning Spiritism the Catholic Church nobly safeguards man's dignity and nature. J. C. R.

The Irish Issue in Its American Aspect. A Contribution to the Settlement of Anglo-American Relations During and After the Great War. By SHANE LESLIE. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.25.

The reception given the ten papers in this volume will of course be largely influenced by the political predilections of their readers. In the correspondence columns of AMERICA for December 29, "J. C. W.," it will be remembered, expressed his opinion of one of the book's characteristics, and since almost every question now bearing on Ireland may well be termed "burning," Mr. Leslie's book can hardly be called a fire-extinguisher. In the opening chapter on "America's Family Ghost," there is a good review of Ireland's share in developing this country and in determining our policies, and in "The Centenary of John Mitchel" the author calls attention to the high literary value of that patriot's writings, the following description of the Irish famine's effects being quoted as an example of his power:

> Go where you would, in the heart of the town on in the suburb, on the mountain side, on the level plain, there was the stillness and heavy pall-like feel of the chamber of death. You stood in the presence of a dread, silent, vast dissolution. An unseen ruin was creeping around you. You saw no war of classes, no open janissary war of foreigners, no human agency of destruction. You could weep, but the rising curse died unspoken within your heart like a profanity. Human passion there was none, but inhuman and unearthly quiet. Children met you toiling heavily on stone heaps, but their burning eyes were senseless and their faces cramped and weazoned like old men. Gangs worked, but without a murmur or a whistle or a laugh, ghostly like voiceless shadows to the eye. Even womanhood had ceased to be womanly. The birds of the air caroled no more, and the crow and the raven dropped dead upon the wing.

In other chapters the author pays an affectionate tribute to the memory of his friend, Tom Kettle, gives a good account of St. Enda's school, contrasts Casement's character with Carson's, describes Parnell's career, and in the last two papers in the volume pictures the ebb and flow of the age-old war between the Celt and the Saxon, as it has been fought in the United States. Mr. Leslie's scintillating style makes "The Irish Issue" fascinating reading. W. D.

A Book of Prefaces. By H. L. MENCKEN. $1.50. Interpreters and Interpretations. By CARL VAN VECHTEN. $1.50. New York: Alfred A. Knopf.

The first of these books may be commended without reservations, to Hermione and her little group of serious thinkers, who since the Masses was suppressed by a cruel government, are forced to oscillate between the New Republic and the Outlook, in search of suitable mental pabulum. Mr. Mencken writes as Fothergill Finch talks, although with smaller regard for common-sense, and is plagued with the notion that sewage and slime, moral and physical, are really the most important things in life and literature. This is something of a pity, for the characterization, "brilliant," which some critics have applied to his work, is not wholly undeserved. Yet it is not "brilliant," but merely stupid, to label as "stupid" serious students who turn from Theodore Dreiser, as from a third-rate scribbler with a passion for the unlovely things of life. Nor is everyone in sympathy with the general purposes of the late Anthony Comstock, and of his successor, Mr. John S. Sumner, necessarily a dolt or a rogue.

Mr. Van Vechten remarks that a certain choregraphic exhibition staged some years ago at the Manhattan Opera House reminded at least one spectator of a Spanish omelet. His own book produces a not dissimilar effect. Still, from this rather bizarre volume, the reader may gleam some curious facts. One, for instance, is that in moments of depression, Oscar Hammerstein goes back to his old trade and makes cigars; another, that Mrs. Siddons could reduce a whole roomful of people to tears by repeating in varying tones the single word "hippopotamus"; and the third, that a famous Russian bass once came to New York and announced that he could "spik Inglishh." His complete vocabulary, which he had been assured would be ample in New York, was "I drink, you drink, he drinks, I love you." Later he added "I eat." Musical critics are reviewed by Mr. Van Vechten in a sober spirit of detachment, nearly akin to disdain. In manner, some are "exegetical, eupeptic, adynamic," and these are supplied with matter by "the eleven dull devils of dusty knowledge." Others deal in "soft sobbery," illustrating with irrelevant quotations from Rimbaud, Laforgue, Shelley, William Blake and Verlaine. Their work is applauded with delight by audiences of "silly maiden ladies in the Middle West," and perhaps in Manhattan, too, where dwell and thrive these masters of the throaty sob. Musical criticism, he thinks, has two functions. The first is "to provide a bad livelihood for the critic," and the second is to amuse the public. Mr. Van Vechten writes amusingly on small themes, and so perhaps, fulfils his own concept of the complete duty of the musical critic.

The Old Front Line. $1.00; Gallipoli. $1.35. By JOHN MASEFIELD. New York: The Macmillan Co.

In the opinion of many discerning critics "Gallipoli" stood at the head of last year's war-books. A poet described in prose the Allies' disastrous attempt to take that peninsula from the Turks and produced a work of lasting literary value. Mr. Masefield's latest book on the war, "The Old Front Line," as is not surprising, by no means equals his earlier volume. For the most part it is a description of the Somme battle-line as it appears today, though the volume's pages are also full of striking pictures of what happened when the battle was raging. The author asserts that behind the allied lines was "by far the most terrible concentration of artillery ever known upon a battlefield," and to show the tremendous power of the munitions used, he tells of a mine-hole thirty-five yards deep and more than a hundred wide. Considering the variegated nationality of the British regiments in this war, the author's frequent references to "our race" grow tiresome.

Without question Mr. Masefield has a remarkable gift for describing terrains, battlefields, campaigns, maneuvers, etc., in such a way that they are unmistakably intelligible even to readers who are not soldiers. It may safely be stated that few of those who began "Gallipoli" left the book unfinished, and it may be as confidently asserted that every reader of the volume was given a picture of that disastrous campaign's sanguinary horrors and futile results that he will long remember. The reasons assigned for undertaking the Dardanelles expedition are interesting. They were:

> (1) To break the link by which Turkey keeps her hold as a European Power. (2) To divert a large part of the Turkish army from operations against our Russian allies in the Caucasus and elsewhere. (3) To pass into Russia at a time when her northern ports were closed by ice the rifles and munitions of war of which her armies were in need. (4) To bring out of southern Russia the great stores of wheat lying there awaiting shipment. (5) If possible, to prevent by a successful deed of arms in the Near East, any new alliance against us among the Balkan people.

With the exception, perhaps, of the second of the foregoing objects, the Gallipoli campaign was a complete failure, though the author in summing up its results finds a little comfort in the fact that though the Allies' wounded and missing numbered about 115,000 men and their sick came to some 100,000 more, the Turks' losses were greater. There is many a page in this volume which rulers and statesmen should read thoughtfully whenever they are tempted to plunge their people into war: the description, for example, on page 50 of the attempted landing at "V Beach" when the Turks from a distance of only 200 yards or so, in broad daylight fired no less than 10,000 shots a minute pointblank into thirty boats crammed with men; or if that passage leaves our war-makers unmoved, let them read on page 97 the author's soul-harrowing description of a modern battle, and perhaps they will think again before opening hostilities. Mr. Masefield believes that the reason why the Gallipoli campaign ultimately failed was because the "High Direction" in England did not send fresh men and shells, for a final thrust would have dislodged the Turks. But the war as a whole had to be considered, so the army of occupation sadly obeyed the order to sail away from Gallipoli. Both volumes are well illustrated. W. D.

Mère Marie de Jésus. Foundress of the Little Sisters of the Assumption,, Nursing Sisters of the Poor in Their Own Homes. (Adapted from the French). Preface by His Eminence CARDINAL BOURNE, Archbishop of Westminster. With portraits and other illustrations. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. $1.10.

Thoughtful Catholics who have often marveled at the number and variety of the Religious Congregations that sprang up in France during the last century will find fresh food for their admiration in this biography of Mère Marie de Jésus. Along with Père Etienne Pernet, the Assumptionist Father, she was the foundress of the Little Sisters of the Assumption, religious who devote themselves to helping the sick poor in their own homes, and by supplying prompt relief keep distressed families from breaking up. As the work of these Sisters is in harmony with today's strong movement to preserve the homes of the poor, if it can possibly be done, the volume should be of special interest to social workers.

Marie Antoinette Fage was a child of the poor herself, having been born at Paris of humble parents in 1824. Left an orphan early in life, she found two friends who brought her up and the year 1850 saw her earning her living as a dressmaker. Coming under the influence of the Dominican Sisters she joined a sodality of which the chief work was visiting the sick poor and that perhaps was the beginning of Mlle. Fage's vocation. Subsequently she took charge of an orphan asylum and it was while in that position in 1864 that she met Père Pernet, who had already started three pious women at the work of nursing the poor gratis. Mlle. Fage joined the group, was soon made their director by Père Pernet and the Little Sisters of the Assumption, we may say, were born. After steadfastly overcoming many difficulties and passing unscathed through the siege of Paris in 1870, the new Congregation began to thrive and spread. In 1874 Cardinal Guibert gave the Sisters his official recognition, they adopted a distinctive habit and "the little swallows of the garret," the affectionate name they received, became familiar sights in the streets of Paris as they made their way to the homes of the needy. In 1878 Mère Marie de Jesus with two of her original associates took her final and perpetual vows, and five years later she died, though not before she had the comfort of seeing her Congregation spreading rapidly in France and starting in England. In 1881 Pope Leo XIII issued an Apostolic Brief blessing the work of the Little Sisters and in 1911 Pope Pius X also gave their institute his approval. The Congregation has now spread into Ireland, Belgium, South America and the United States, and with two convents in New York the Little Sisters of the Assumption, through their free ministrations to the sick, and with the help of the confraternities they have established, are doing excellent work for the city's Catholic poor. The British Navy at War. By W. MACNEILE DIXON. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Co.

Britain in Arms. By JULES DESTRÉE. Translated from the French by J. LEWIS MAY. New York: John Lane Co.

Lord Northcliffe's War Book. With Chapters on America at War. New York: George H. Doran Co.

To anyone interested in the present gigantic struggle, in which Americans are now so vitally engaged, all additional information which bears on the war has some new point of value. "The British Navy at War" answers quite emphatically the question, "What is the British navy doing?" The description of what the North Sea blockade really means cannot but win praise for the men who are drenched, "winter and summer, by wet and dreary mists, choked with oil-fuel smoke, slashed with icy spray, freezing and utterly miserable," yet ever faithful to their stern, unremitting duty. An account of all the ocean battles is given in detail, with the tragic death of Admiral Craddock, with whom Mrs. O'Shaughnessy's book on Mexico had made Americans familiar. The landing at Gallipoli is the most thrilling chapter in the volume, and it makes one realize that "though the attempt was, possibly, incredible madness, yet, viewed as an exploit, it was the most amazing feat of arms the world has ever seen."

"Britain in Arms" is a French version of the account of England's position in the war, which the Belgian author presented to Italy when he went there to take part in the movement which led that country to participate in the aims of the Allies. He modestly claims little originality for his book, which, he says, is merely a resumé of facts within the reach of anyone who reads the newspapers.

The scope of "Lord Northcliffe's War Book" is wide enough to embrace the deeds and the needs of the soldiers of all the allied nations. The directness, force, and vivacity of the alert journalist is evidenced in every line. The chief thing that strikes the non-combatant reader of Northcliffe's pages is the amazing ingenuity shown in the improvement and invention of all kinds of machinery and mechanical devices, which the war has developed. No need arises which is not almost immediately supplied, as if by magic, by some ingenious contrivance, which it would have taken years to make perfect in times of peace. The book is not one of those likely to survive the declaration of peace, but it is well worth reading at the present moment.

Platonism. By PAUL ELMER MORE. Princeton, N. J.: Princeton University Press. $1.75.

Mr. More's lectures on "Platonism" will interest the specialist, not the general reader. The latter would find the book too technical; and even the student of the history of philosophy may well be pardoned if he feels irritated from time to time at the author's lack of clearness. What, for instance, was the precise form which, in Mr. More's opinion, Socrates' "intellectual skepticism" assumed? The skepticism of Socrates, we are told, "meant to him an unwearied questioning of the solicitations of both the reason and the senses, and a continuous exercise of the will, being of all states of mind the rarest and the most difficult for a man in this world to maintain. Doubt was thus to Socrates the beginning both of philosophy and of morality." And yet only a page or two before we read: "But if the existence, even the predominance, of the doubting mood in Socrates cannot be overlooked, the quality of this skepticism needs none the less to be sharply distinguished from what commonly passes under the name. The matter stands thus. Absolute suspension of judgment, however a man may profess it in words or strive to attain it in practice, is an impossibility." How shall we reconcile these statements? Was Socrates' skepticism universal or only partial; and if partial, to what extent? Again, what is the exact content of the "spiritual affirmation," which, according to the writer, was the second leading thesis of Socratic philosophy? These are but an illustration of the many questions that at once present themselves to the mind of the patient reader, and to which, it would seem, no definite and clear-cut answer is given in the chapters that follow.

However, there are points on which those who have read and re-read their Plato from cover to cover with a view to discovering his philosophical creed and how far it agrees with or differs from the teachings or the doubts of Socrates, are better qualified to pass judgment. By such students the present volume will doubtless be welcomed; for the author does not hesitate to differ radically from other interpreters of the mind of Plato. Unfortunately, though, Mr. More would have us all return to the philosophy of his idol; "to the truth, still potent and fresh and salutary, which Plato expounded in the troubled and doubting days of Greece—the truth which is in religion but is not bounded by religious dogma, and which needs no confirmation by miracle or inspired tradition." But surely the history of human thought has made it luminously clear that Platonism, even as understood by this ardent admirer, is a system of philosophy that can lead only into blind alleys. The realm of truth is not an unfurrowed, nor an uncharted sea; witness the conquests of the medieval schools. And in the firmament of revealed truth there is many a star to guide mankind in the quest: if the toilers labor in vain they must seek the cause of their failure in their own narrowness of vision. Eyes that are always riveted to the ground can detect only what is of the earth. J. A. C.

Bubbles and Other Poems. By WILLOUGHBY WEAVING. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. $1.50.

Though these poems come from the trenches, the martial note is by no means dominant in them. "Bugle-Call," and "The Passing of the Young Men" deal directly with the war and in memory of "a friend who had fallen for England" there are three good sonnets. "Gloria in Excelsis" and "The Niche" are medieval tales well told in blank verse. In the latter is this charming picture:

> Now on the ninth day when the fearless dawn
> Left night her nurse, and like a wanton child
> Ran rosy-footed down the drifted snow,
> Till earth stirred drowsily from her white bed.

Most of Mr. Weaving's lyrics joyfully sing the praises of spring blossoms, flowing waters, and sweet birds, though there are deeper poems too, like those "To Fame" and "To Ideal Beauty." Such poems as "Eucharist" and "Cloud Days" show that the author is a believer, and in his love-songs there is no wantonness. None of his flights is very lofty but nearly all are well-sustained. These concluding lines of the "The Yellow-Breeched Philosopher" are a fair specimen of Mr. Weaving's manner:

> Little miners they, who delve
> Below the blossom's silken selve
> And something more than gold procure
> As precious as their well is pure,
> A wealth that is not sold or bought
> Nor nurses up no selfish thought,
> And being to them so valueless
> No usage has except to bless.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

December's six best-sellers according to the Bookman were "The Major," Connor; "The Dwelling Place of Light," Churchill; "Extricating Obadiah," Lincoln; "Long Live the King," Rinehart; "Christine," Cholmondeley, and "Missing," Ward. They have all been noticed in AMERICA.——"The Wolf-Cub, a Novel of Spain" (Little, Brown, $1.35), by Patrick and Terence Casey, has for a hero, Jacinto Quesada, a renowned bandolero. The plot of the story turns on his abduction of a beautiful Spanish maiden, but three valiant champions undertake her rescue. The tale is full of action and color.——"Cabin Fever" (Little, Brown, $1.40), the title of a novel by B. M. Bower, is what Westerners call a certain malady of the mind. In the East it would perhaps be termed énnui. How Bud Moore and his wife Masie weathered a violent attack of the disease is the theme of the story, and it will interest those who like to read of adventurous outdoor life in the West.

The February 8 Catholic Mind contains Father Hull's excellent paper on "The Psychology of Medieval Persecutions." He cautions his readers to judge the Middle Ages "in the light of human nature," and well observes:

> Humanity in the past did certain things which fill us with horror. But on the other hand we are doing things now which would have filled humanity in the past with equal horror. If to us medieval intolerance causes creeps down the back, surely the tolerance of modern times, with the indifferentism inseparably bound up with it, would also have caused creeps down the back of the medieval. The notion that the existence of God, the truth of Christianity and the teaching authority of the Church should be a matter of hesitation or doubts, would have made any average medieval turn in his grave. To him these truths were as clear as the sun at noonday; so much so that any man who called them into question must be either hopelessly insane or hopelessly wicked. . . . To the medieval mind the rectitude of faith and religion was if anything even more important than rectitude of morals, just because religion and faith were the foundations on which morality rested. Hence the avowed and aggressive heretic was regarded as no less dangerous to the community in general than the avowed and aggressive libertine. Therefore he must be handled drastically.

The number concludes with a continuation of Father Reville's list of novels for Catholic readers.

As handbooks of information on topics that are now current, "American Government" by Dr. Frank A. Magruder of Princeton, and "Community Civics" by R. O. Hughes, are highly useful. Neither contributes anything particularly new to the discussion of fundamental problems in government, nor indeed, would this be desirable in texts intended for high schools. Mr. Hughes, however, seems to overrate the capacity of the average student, when he suggests "Draw up a constitution for the United States, or for your State, or a charter for your community." It is tasks of this kind that make some aspects of modern education rather ridiculous. The high-school text on civics which is neither too abstruse or too sketchy, has not yet been written. The illustrations in the present volumes have been chosen with discernment, and both are well indexed.——Messrs. Watkins and Williams, instructors in public speaking at Knox College have edited "The Forum of Democracy," a collection of addresses on the war. An ebulition of patriotism, excusable if not laudable, is probably responsible for the inclusion of some rather prosy selections. That the editors do not lack a sense of humor, is a fact evinced by their choice of M. René Viviani to speak on "Our Heritage of Liberty." Judging this gentleman by his acts of record, he has not the slightest concept of what either Americans, or any other civilized peoples, understand by "liberty." The foregoing books are published by Allyn & Bacon.

If every father of his first little daughter should insist upon publishing all the incredibly clever things she says and does from her first to her ninth year the world could not contain the books that would be printed. The father of "Bettina Brown" (Dutton, $0.75), who describes himself as "one of her subjects" relates as modestly perhaps as he can, the prattle of a bright child who is brought up in a household of grown people, and learns of course to talk as they do. Unfortunate Bettina "knows by heart the acts of Tom Sawyer and of Gulliver the traveler—not the Acts of the Apostles," "prays or not as she sees fit," asserts that when Christ "grew up He became a god," believes that "nature will take care of" her, calls her mother "Catherine" and her father "Bobby," and is condescending enough—the little prig!—to brighten the "incomplete" lives of some Sisters whose convent is on Riverside Drive, New York. What a pity flat-raised Bettina did not have a few brothers and sisters, a wiser father and an occasional spanking!——In "The Full Measure of Devotion" (Doubleday, $0.50), a short story which first appeared in McClure's, Miss Dana Catlin tells with skill and feeling how an American father and mother received the news of their only son's death while fighting for France.

With the title "The Pope on Peace and War" (6d) the London Catholic Truth Society has published in a neat pamphlet a calendar of Papal documents, which is a guide to the pronouncements of the Pope on the European war, from September 8, 1914, to August 1, 1917, in the Holy Father's persevering efforts to restore peace to the world begun in the very first days of his Pontificate. Two penny pamphlets are "Saints for Soldiers," by Mrs. Armel O'Connor, and "Carry On," a word to those in active service by a Lieutenant, R.N.V.R. In the department of history are these also for a penny each: "Dont's for Students in Science and History," by G. S. Boulger; "Some Facts About Martin Luther," by A. H. Atteridge; "The Kulturkampf," by Humphrey Johnson; "St. Paul of the Cross," by F. M. Capes; "The Ursulines"; "The Sisters of Charity of St. Vincent de Paul"; "Catholic Orders and Anglican Orders," by Rev. Vincent Hornyold, S.J., and "The Three Mothers," by E. Nesbit. In the field of apologetics the following have been issued at the same price: "Personal Immortality," by the Rev. Dr. R. Downey; "The Resurrection," by Edward J. Sydes, S.J.; "God's Will and Suffering," by Dom Roger Hudleston, O.S.B.; "His Greetings," meditations for Eastertide, by Mother St. Paul, and at 4d "God's Truth," four sermons by the Rev. H. Lucas, S.J.

Those who are interested in learning what the life of "A Russian Schoolboy" (Longmans, $2.25) was like at the beginning of the nineteenth century are given a naive and picturesque account of his own early career by Serge Aksakoff, whom his translator, J. D. Duff, Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, calls a Russian stylist of "inimitable purity and simplicity." When the author was sent to a government boarding-school at the age of nine, both he and his mother felt so much the pain of separation that they both fell ill, consequently little Serge had to be brought home for another year. On his return to school he devoted himself almost exclusively to studying Russian and French, private theatricals and butterfly-collecting. The little joys and pleasures of the simple country life he led at home during vacations are all vividly described, and the volume ends with an excellent account of the author's success as a collector of butterflies.

The December number of Studies will reward its readers well. The editor opens with a paper on "The Pope and Peace," in which he reviews the relations between the Pope and the European Powers, and then shows that now "the two greatest of international forces—the Papacy and Labor—have raised their voices above the roar of battle, and the clash of economic interests in a moving appeal for peace—and for peace on a democratic basis." In "A Preface to Gibbon," Hilaire Belloc again proves how amazingly unhistorical and uncritical that pompous author could be, for he actually took at second hand from the now discredited Mosheim an absurd account of the growth of episcopacy in the Church and makes no mention whatever of the cultus of the Holy Eucharist. Professor Rahilly has an excellent article on "The Significance of Suarez," Charles Baussan gives a satisfying sketch of the character and career of that stanch Catholic strategist, "General De Castelnau." Father O'Neil writes on "The Centenary of Kosciusko," there are several valuable papers on economic, social and educational subjects, and among the poems in the number are these stanzas by H. E. G. Rope, "To an Imperialist":

Oh happy you, who can believe
In our imperial destiny,
Who see the doom of slavery,
Where'er our ships the waters cleave;
Oh happy in your faith; but I
Hear Erin's deep and bitter cry.

You tell of freedom's triumph new (They strive this day in Montreal
For nation, language, faith and all
That men hold dearest) Happy you!
But I hear ringing in the gale
The living wrong of Innisfail.

You tell of foison that shall be
The goods of body, mind and soul
(The myriad fires of Moloch roll
Before his throne of industry);
But I hear, still uncomforted,
The keen of Rachel for her dead.

EDUCATION

The War and the Schools

WHAT is the war doing to the schools of America? How are they affected by the great world conflict?

In the proverbial ten words of a short answer, this can be said: The war is cutting our schools down, and bracing them up. In the branches of higher education, enrolment has been appreciably affected by the war; and in the secondary schools there has come a genuine waking up on the score of lax methods of physical training, character-building, waste of time and supplies; and of course there has been throughout a marked stirring of the patriotic spirit.

Reduced Attendance

AS for the colleges, it was unavoidable that enrolment should be cut into by the war, for immense numbers of young men have been called from them to go into the ranks. This was expected; and yet, as much as it was expected from the beginning, it is only now, after war affairs have run on for a few months, that it is seen what a severe check American higher education has been given. The story is the same whether we look east or west, greatly reduced enrolments, heavy financial problems made the heavier by curtailed income, and much uncertainty concerning the future. A statistician gives us these figures: In something like sixty representative colleges and universities there were last year over 120,000 students; this year there are scarcely 100,000. In the autumn of 1916 31,000 students entered these institutions; in the fall of 1917 only 28,000. This is a heavy decrease; and it makes the problems of our educators very complex and trying, indeed, for expenses, unfortunately, do not decrease at all in proportion to losses. The fuel question alone proves this. Heating plants must be kept going. The shortening of terms, the lengthening of the Christmas holidays and the closing of certain buildings or parts of buildings, are helps; but they do not solve the problem, by any means.

This shortening of terms is being tried both in the higher and the secondary institutions; and in some cities it has even been proposed to close the public schools for a whole month or even longer during the severe cold weather. On the other hand, many communities have given no approval to this idea, thinking it best, on the contrary, to crowd in all the time possible in the winter months, so that the spring and summer labor needs may all the more readily be met later on with an early closing of the schools.

Forgetting the Future

MR. BAKER, the Secretary of War, recently issued a protest against the reduction of school enrolment and deplored the leaving of school by students who had not been drafted. He pointed out especially the great need the Government will have as the war goes on of young men who have taken special courses in science. And in that plea the Secretary voiced the sentiments of scores of our educational leaders. The Massachusetts Commissioner of Education, for instance, in publishing a letter on the subject, said:

> Wherever there is any doubt as to whether the youth should attend school, or go to work, let his future have the benefit of the doubt, and the investment be made for years afterward rather than for the immediate present. From the experience of Europe we should learn that now, more than ever, education in America should not be curtailed, but rather extended and taken the more seriously. To keep the youth in school, and to keep the schools at the highest possible standard of efficiency are the best assurance of this generation to the safety of the democracy of the next.

A second glance at the figures given above will show that not only have the men actually engaged in their college career gone out by the thousands, but also thousands of high-school boys and others preparing for their university work. While this speaks eloquently for the patriotic spirit of our youth, it shows poor foresight. A decrease in freshmen was to be expected; and it was to be expected that our lads of eighteen and nineteen would find it hard to stay at home when their big brothers were going to the war. But the many appeals made by educators through the press, and by pastors from the pulpit, were looked to to check most of that premature adventuring. Yet it was all remarkably ineffective.

Economic Pressure or Patriotism?

BUT, argues someone, perhaps they had to go to work: these are hard times, with living at such a cost; and so on. There are facts, however, which seem to prove that it is not at all an economic crisis that has driven our young men out of school. If it were, it is reasonable to suppose that it would have had the same effect on our young women, especially in view of the lucrative openings found for women just now in various branches of activity. But the same figures which show a drop of eighteen per cent in the enrolment, and of ten per cent in the number of freshmen, at men's colleges or coeducational institutions, show also that the attendance at women's colleges has increased almost twenty-five per cent. If hard times are keeping the boys out of school, the girls' schools should be the first to show the effect; for it is proverbial that, in a choice between the boys and girls of the family, as to who shall go to school and who stay home, or go to work, the boy is favored and kept at school or college, no matter what the sacrifice. In other words, higher education for the boy is, nine cases out of ten, considered a practical necessity; and for the girl a mere accomplishment. The conclusion must be that the falling off in attendance is due to a patriotic impulse.

When it comes to the matter of economic pressure and hard times, it must be said that the schools are the chief sufferers. There is the fuel problem, for instance, already mentioned. That is but one item. All the running expenses of schools and colleges have been increased by leaps and bounds. The wages of janitors and other help have gone up. Supplies, particularly those used in laboratories, cost twice as much as formerly, while even the simple things like paper and pencils are now so costly that, in the public schools in Minneapolis, for instance, a complete new system of distribution has become a necessity. Text-books again show a heavy increase. All this is but added to the initial loss suffered in the falling off of attendance, a loss which, as one authority has figured, has already mounted to the four-million mark.

The Seminaries

THESE figures relate to high schools, State universities, Catholic and non-Catholic universities and colleges, such institutions as Harvard, Princeton, Yale and the general run of educational foundations. But while speaking of them, it will be interesting also to note the effect of the war on the seminaries throughout the country. They have suffered heavily; even more heavily than the lay schools. From twenty to twenty-five per cent decrease in attendance is given as the loss at the scholastic houses located at Brookland, in affiliation with the Catholic University; and the novitiates of the Orders in other parts of the country have fared no better. The Commissariat of the Holy Land, at Brookland, is said to have lost fifty per cent of its regular attendance. The Protestant theological institutions are as badly off. In fact, from forty to fifty per cent is their loss, conservatively figured. The Boston Transcript is authority for the statement that "Instead of the 4,500 young men who usually enter Protestant seminaries each autumn, this (1917) autumn's enrolment will not exceed 2,500, perhaps not equal that in number.'

This is the debit side of the ledger: loss of attendance, cutting of income, greatly increased cost of maintenance. The reckoning of what our schools are gaining by the war, and of how they are meeting its problems, will be treated in another paper.

SOCIOLOGY

The Great Divide

IT is not remarkable that the minds of all good men are in agreement as to the desirability of realizing social justice. Nor is it very remarkable that many good men agree on the efficacy of various proposed remedies, such as a living wage, reasonable hours of employment, healthful environment, for the evident social unrest. The human reason, when confronted by the facts of modern industrialism, will at once accept these remedies as just and necessary. So, too, every good man recognizes the viciousness of commercialism, that disease of capitalism which substitutes "large returns" as the ideal of the use of capital, instead of the welfare and happiness of mankind.

The Evil and the Remedy

THAT economic slavery is evil, and that a living wage, reasonable employment, and decent surroundings are obviously good things, is patent. Herein lies a great danger. The man-in-the-street is too prone to accept a description of conditions and a promise of correction, as an earnest of the ability to effect the desired change. Listen to the comments following a passionate soapbox-denunciation of "malefactors of great wealth," of the increasing cost of living, and of the sufferings of the "teeming millions." "Who is that fellow speaking? He knows what he is talking about. A Socialist? Well what do you think of that." But what about the remedy for the conditions outlined by the Socialist? That is another question. Unfortunately the man-in-the-street argues that if the Socialist knows one-half the truth he must, necessarily, know the other half. If the man-in-the-street would only stop to think, he would see that the reason he was convinced was because the stranger on the soapbox had told him of conditions he already knew about and personally felt.

What about the remedy for the great social injustices? For the Catholic this second half of the truth is all-important. He and the Socialist are at the place where the road divides. But he is not walking along an unmarked path. There is a signpost in front of him. It has two arms, one reads "To Socialism," the other, "To Christian Cooperation." For the sake of argument, let us say that the Church and Socialism have the same economic objective, the material welfare of mankind. Yet we find that the Church condemns Socialism, and that Socialism condemns the Church. For a Catholic there is no other course than to follow the signpost which our great Pontiffs have placed along the economic highway to social justice and peace. The Christian nations of the world are now fast approaching the point where the road divides. Which way will they take? Socialism or Christian cooperation?

How Can the Remedy be Found?

MEN are dependent on one another. Individuals and nations cannot continue to exist without one another's help. How can that help be obtained? Socialism answers let the public own the "means of production," meaning all land and the material used in production. Who will administer this vast property, arrange work and position, fix wage-scales, whether in money or its equivalent, distribute supplies? As every human organization must work through human agents, we would find with us again, our old friends, the politicians, with our lives, our jobs, our property, and our food supply absolutely under their control. A glance at some of the politicians, from the days of Pontius Pilate to those of Carranza, makes one hesitate before he throws into the social "pot" a perfectly good, hard-worked farm, with barns and wagons and farm implements, especially if one has a wife and children who tomorrow will ask for their usual supply of food and clothes. Of course the wife and children need not ask the father for these things, but can go direct to the politicians; the man need not have a regular family at all.

Factors of Production

THERE are three factors of production—labor, land, and capital. The Socialist would entirely eliminate capitalism, but this elimination would be one in name only. For example, food must be supplied to support the workers, during the process of producing a new crop; these supplies must be held over from previous crops; the State would be the absolute capitalist. But the great snare of Socialism is in calling property, whether land or otherwise, the "means of production." Without labor, property would disappear beneath the dust and the moss. Labor, land, and capital are, all three, indispensable to production. Whoever can concentrate and control capital or labor or property, can dominate the whole field of production. Just at present, capital rules supreme; but labor leaders are seeking so to unionize the workers as to control the labor market and thus to bargain with capital on even footing. Labor, without the help of capital and land, would starve to death. The socialized State, by absorbing all capital and land would effectively control labor. Therefore the Socialistic doctrine of public ownership of the "means of production" implies the public ownership of labor.

Christian Cooperation

CHRISTIAN cooperation, on the other hand, teaches that a man's labor, and the fruit of that labor, belong to himself, as do also his land and his money. If a man who has only money wishes to build a house or a factory, he must pay rent, purchase-price, or the equivalent, to another man for the use of the necessary land. Furthermore, he must pay to other men agreed wages for working with the land and material he supplies. There is no reason why a man should not give his labor, money or land; his money for labor or land; or his land for labor or money. There is nothing wrong in working, owning land, and having capital, all at the same time. In fact this last is the normal and safest condition of life.

There is nothing inherently wrong in the possession of millions of dollars. The great danger is in its use. Christian cooperation teaches that all labor, land and capital may be used for individual profit, letting our profit be in proportion to the service rendered and not increased by the other man's necessity. For example, "a fair wage for a fair day's work" is Pope Leo's measure of a workman's service. A workman and his family cannot live through a day, unless he is given a wage large enough to at least meet that day's expenses. Then provision must be made for sickness, the "rainy day," and old age. A "fair wage" includes all these. Christian cooperation teaches that there is an obligation upon us to help one another in our necessity. If one man's land contained the only available supply of coal, surely he could not refuse it to his neighbors; but he should nevertheless be compensated properly for it. Because it has become a public utility is no reason why the State should rush in and confiscate the land. Neither is there any reason why the State should take over ownership where the public use can be satisfied by proper regulation. Public ownership is justified only when the State is unable to secure the cooperation of labor, land and capital by regulation. But it should not be used as a means of avoiding the problems of regulation.

State Regulation and Socialism

THE war has brought about changes among the nations which have been held by some observers to be the adoption of Socialistic doctrines. This view is absolutely incorrect. On the contrary, the changes noted are clearly consistent with Christian cooperation. In the first place, the State can justly requisition the service and property of its citizens for its own preservation. A good example of this is taxation. Secondly, even in times of peace, the State has the duty as well as the right to take over the control of any industry of public utility, which otherwise cannot or will not provide adequate service.

No greater mistake can be made than to attribute the successful concentration of the energies of the various nations at war, to the adoption of Socialistic principles. This confusion and ignorance while pinning unmerited decorations on the Socialists, is preparing the way for an ardent Socialist drive. The nations will soon reach the place where the road divides. The one road ends in slavery and despair, the other in liberty and peace. Socialism or Christian cooperation: which will it be?

NOTE AND COMMENT

The Delayed Paper

THE following explanation offered by an Eastern paper to its readers for the unavoidable delay of its issues will be of equal interest to the readers of AMERICA, since all publications are experiencing the same difficulties:

> It lies not with the publications themselves, for they are mailed at the usual time, nor with the postal authorities, but with the railways, whose transportation facilities have been very largely taken over temporarily to relieve the coal shortage which is still a grave menace to the health and life of multitudes. To meet the imperative need of giving coal the right of way until the fuel famine was relieved, hundreds of passenger and other trains were taken off by the transportation companies, and the mails, all except first-class matter, became congested at the starting-point. Every Eastern publication has suffered from this delay in the same degree. The trouble is not only unfortunate but wholly unprecedented.

The paper concludes by requesting all its readers to "Wait at least a few days before complaining," and expresses the hope that regular deliveries will soon again be made as usual.

"Somewhere the Sun is Shining"

WHILE the mercury in the thermometer had for weeks slightly fluctuated about the zero mark, and pipes were bursting in the rooms and cellars, and coal was a commodity no longer purchasable for either love or money, it was highly comforting to chance upon the following leading editorial in the Southern Cross, whose Christmas issue had just reached us from the Argentine Republic:

> The dog-days have come early this year, and the streets and houses of the city are so many Turkish baths. The suffocating heat reached its culminating point on Wednesday afternoon (December 19). The meteorological signals are pointing to a roasting January and February, abnormal consumption of beer, coup-de-chaleur and other characteristics of a torrid Argentine summer.

The editor philosophically seeks relief from these depressing thoughts by alluding to the deep snow in Flanders and the extreme cold along the upper Piave, and ends with the wise reflection: "There are worse things than heat and cold."

Appeal of Cardinal Gibbons to Catholic Schools

THE following patriotic call to the teachers and pupils of the parochial schools in America, urging them to rally to the support of the American Red Cross, was recently issued by his Eminence, Cardinal Gibbons:

> The President of our beloved country, who is also the President of the Red Cross, has issued a call for all schools of whatever kind to become auxiliaries of the Red Cross, and each pupil in each school a Junior Member of the Red Cross. His desire is not only to add the efforts of all the children to the work of the Red Cross in sustaining the fighting forces of the nation, but to teach by practice to the children those lessons of unselfish love and service which must be part of the education of every child if this republic is to endure as a Christian nation, and remain the haven of freedom. In this time of peril our country needs the services of the children as well as the adults; and in the days to come she will need still more the clear heads, the honest hearts and strong and steady hands of men and women who today are school children. Therefore I ask, and urge, that each of you make full response to the call of our President, and that each school become a Red Cross Auxiliary, thus making every pupil a Junior Member. It is a privilege, no less than a duty, for the children to help bear the burden of the momentous hours of America's trial, and in the days of her gratitude for final victory, to rejoice that they have helped to preserve her as the home of Liberty.

The plan proposed by the manager of the Junior Membership Enrolment, Willoughby G. Walling, is to have every school in the country, parochial, public and private, become a Red Cross Auxiliary, and every pupil in all these schools a Junior Member.

Father Gannon's Death

ACCORDING to a dispatch sent to the United Press and dated Rome, January 30, the Rev. Thomas J. Gannon, the well-known American Jesuit, is dead. He was born in Cambridge, Mass., sixty-four years ago, received his education at Boston College, entered the Society of Jesus in 1872 and, after making at Frederick and Woodstock the Jesuit's usual studies, having taught literature at Holy Cross College and logic and metaphysics at Boston College and Woodstock, he was appointed Rector of Fordham College in 1891, and held that office till 1896, when he became secretary to the Provincial of the Maryland-New York Province, a post he filled till he himself was made Provincial, in 1901. On retiring from that office, in 1906, Father Gannon joined the Mission Band for a year and then became Instructor of Tertians at St. Andrew's Novitiate, Poughkeepsie, N. Y., and there he stayed until his religious brethren chose him as a delegate to the General Congregation, which on February 11, 1915, elected Very Rev. Father Wlodimir Ledochowski, General of the Society. The same Congregation formed the American Provinces into an Assistancy and Father Gannon was elected the American Assistant, being the first to hold that high office. Soon after Italy entered the war Father Ledochowski and his curia went to Zizers, Switzerland, to live, and it was there that Father Gannon died.

A New National Catholic War Council

OFFICIAL announcement is made that complete centralization of all our Catholic war-activities is now an accomplished fact. The result is a new National Catholic War Council, organized by the Archbishops of the United States, after consultation with the Ordinaries of every diocese. The entire authority of the Board of Archbishops is delegated by them to an Administrative Committee, consisting of Bishop Muldoon, as chairman, Bishop Schrembs, Bishop Hayes and Bishop Russell, with Very Rev. John Fenlon, as secretary. Aided by the Ordinaries of the various dioceses this central committee is henceforth to direct and control all Catholic war-activities. Both the Knights of Columbus and the old National War Council have heartily agreed that all funds collected by them be placed under the control and direction of this same committee. The complete organization of the National Catholic War Council embraces furthermore an Executive Committee, consisting of the four Bishops already mentioned and twelve other members, besides a General Committee to be composed of a lay and clerical delegate from each diocese, two representatives from each national Catholic organization, two representatives from the Federation of Catholic Societies, two from the Catholic Press Association, and such individual Catholics as the Committee may deem necessary. The official announcement says:

> The National Catholic War Council, therefore, touches every diocese and every national Catholic agency. The hope is that through the diocesan committees and the national societies every Catholic in the land will be interested and informed. It is the desire of the National Catholic War Council that not only in every diocese, but also in every parish in the country, a Catholic War Council Committee be established. The Committee of Administration endorses and approves most heartily the present drive for funds by the Knights of Columbus, and hopes that those sections in which the drive has not yet taken place will be as generous in responding to the call as have been those parts of the country where the drives have been completed. The Knights of Columbus have worked most assiduously and have most loyally offered their service and all the power of their great organization to the Church.

It is furthermore to be noted that all inquiries concerning chaplains in army or navy and all applications for chaplaincies are in future to be directed to Bishop Hayes. There are at present several vacancies, and if the chaplains' bill is accepted, allowing one chaplain for every twelve hundred soldiers, there will be an immediate demand for over 200 additional chaplains to fill out the Catholic quota. All other inquiries in regard to war activities are to be addressed to Rt. Rev. P. J. Muldoon, Chairman, Rockford, Illinois; or to Very Rev. John Fenlon, Catholic University, Washington, D. C.; or to Rev. John J. Burke, C.S.P., New York, N. Y. The Knights of Columbus, under direction of the Administrative Committee of Bishops, will carry on their work as before. Communications should be sent directly to their office, 734 Woodward Building, Washington, D. C.

A Model Christian Soldier

IN its press bulletin the Central Verein calls attention to the life of General de Sonis, as a source of religious and military inspiration at the present time when the true ideal of a Christian soldier and officer merits our serious consideration. His active life had been spent in strenuous warfare and the loss of a leg at Loigny caused him continual suffering and great difficulties in the performance of his important military duties. His home life is thus described:

> In spite of his continual state of suffering, De Sonis would never relax the old regularity of his life. Rising every morning at five in summer and six in winter, he insisted on dressing himself alone, in spite of the difficulties caused by his mutilation. After his prayers and meditation, he used to go to the parish church of St. Germain, which was close to his house. "His recollection edified everybody," wrote the curé. "The good people who came to the daily Mass declared that the General's presence was a sermon in itself; and that when he went to Communion, though he could no longer kneel, his devout and respectful manner made every one strive to emulate his fervor." After Mass came work. . . . After two o'clock the General remained in his study, writing, studying, and giving lessons to his children. He rejoiced in his near neighborhood to the church, which enabled him to make his daily visit to the Blessed Sacrament. As he had been inscribed among the associates of the Perpetual Adoration, he never failed to present himself on the day fixed, which was Saturday from seven to eight in the morning, and there among the poorest people in the parish he occupied his place as adorer.

The life of General de Sonis was written by Mgr. Baunard, of Paris, and translated by Lady Herbert. A short sketch is to be published in a new pamphlet of the Central Verein's "Soldiers' and Sailors' Series."

An Advertising Campaign

IN describing the Knights of Columbus campaign in Chicago, which added more than half a million to the war fund, the Caravel, the official organ of the Knights of Columbus of Iowa, calls especial attention to the results of the advertising. Since the campaign was conducted in the interest of all the soldiers and all the sailors, an appeal was made to the general public as well as to the Catholics of the city and county. Hence two full-page advertisements were carried in all the morning and afternoon papers.

> Just what the value of these pages were to our campaign in the way of dollars cannot be told, of course. A line may be gotten when it is known that checks as high as $500 were mailed to Treasurer McCormick with the coupon from these ads, while others brought sums as low as twenty-five cents. Thousands of dollars were mailed with these coupons. They attracted much attention, both because of their artistic effect and the appeal of their text. They gave class to the campaign.

It was probably due in no small degree to the placing of these advertisements that the appeal found a sympathetic response in the sanctums of the Chicago press. Strong editorials were printed in nearly every daily urging the public to contribute generously to the fund. Needless to say the Catholic papers did not fail to contribute their full share to the success of the campaign. "In the course of two weeks," adds the Caravel, "the press of Chicago gave to the campaign 120 news items with the words 'Knights of Columbus' or 'All Welcome' in every heading."

Retracts Repetition of Rumor Against the Pope

MR. F. C. WALCOTT, of the United States Food Administration, has written a manly apology for an erroneous statement made by him regarding the Pope, at a food conservation meeting held in New York. It implicated the Holy Father in the Italian disaster and held him responsible in a measure for the disruptive propaganda which preceded the defeat. Mr. Walcott explains that he had thoughtlessly repeated the false rumor without due verification. His letter, which follows, was addressed to Mr. Adrian Iselin, Chairman of the Committee of Catholic Laymen:

DEAR MR. ISELIN: I desire to confirm what I at once wrote to Monsignor Lavelle on the 18th instant, namely, that I much regret a statement I recently made in this city at a conference to consider food conservation. My statement attributed to the Pope a measure of responsibility for the Italian disaster and for the disruptive propaganda which had brought it about.

I repeated thoughtlessly and without previous reflection a rumor I had heard which I had not verified and which I am now convinced and believe was untrue. I have since read the categorical denial of Cardinal Gasparri, the Pope's Minister of Foreign Affairs, and the denial of Cardinal Bourne of London, and I have also read the statement recently made by Signor Orlando, the Prime Minister of Italy, in the Italian Chamber of Deputies, as follows:

"I deplore the accusations of a general character made by the Hon. Signor Pirolini against high ecclesiastical personages—accusations that tend to hurt the supreme spiritual authority—against priests and against the Catholic party.

"Such accusations are unjust and offensive because, as the public are aware, the Italian clergy, both high and low, have given noble and beautiful proofs of Italian sentiments and the great mass of the Catholics have known how to reconcile the dictates of faith with their duties toward their country."

I therefore feel that it is my duty to retract the statement I made in regard to the Pope, which I do without reserve, and I would like to correct the unfortunate and erroneous impression my remarks tended to create.

You may give this letter such publicity as your committee deems advisable to conteract the effect of my statement and its repetition by those who heard my remarks.

May I take this opportunity to express the appreciation of my colleagues and myself of the uniform and effective cooperation which the National Food Administration has received from our Catholic fellow-citizens and the Catholic clergy? Very sincerely yours,

New York, January 29. F. C. WALCOTT.

While it was to be regretted that a United States official should repeat rumors of such a nature without the most careful investigation and unquestionable evidence, the retraction is an amende honorable which leaves nothing to be desired, and does credit to the character of the man who made it.

Chronicle

The War.—During the week there was little serious fighting in the West, except on the Verdun front. Here the forces of the German Crown Prince following up their previous attacks on the Caurières Wood on the right bank of the Meuse, where they were checked, delivered a massed assault in the vicinity of Fosses Wood. They reached the French barbed wire entanglements and occupied an element of the French position, but were again driven off, leaving behind them many dead and a few prisoners.

Bulletin, Feb. 4, p.m.-Feb. 11, a.m.

Some Americans, according to an announcement made by the German General Staff, were taken prisoners and a few others killed in raids on the American lines. The locality where one raid took place is given as Xivray, eight or ten miles east of St. Mihiel. This position lies on the southern side of the salient which the Germans early in the war threw across the Meuse. The exact position of the American troops is thus clearly known. Hitherto it had been understood to be northwest of Toul, which is southwest of Nancy. General Allenby reports from Palestine the opening of the Jerusalem railroad.

The transport Tuscania, convoyed by British warships, was sunk off the northern coast of Ireland by a submarine, with the loss of more than 100 American soldiers from more than 2,100 Americans and a large crew. Many British sailors were also lost. The American troops aboard consisted mainly of Wisconsin and Michigan contingents. The full details of the disaster and the complete list of the dead have not as yet been officially announced. In a strong note to the German Government Spain protested against the torpedoing of a Spanish ship.

On February 4, Senator Gilbert M. Hitchcock, of Nebraska, speaking in the Senate in behalf of the Chamberlain War Cabinet bill, severely arraigned the Administration for having failed to coordinate the war activities of the nation. He maintained that President Wilson does not know the real situation which the Senator characterized as worse than alarming. The Senator spoke of the President as belonging to a "school of philosophers who adhere to the belief that all important legislation ought to emanate from the Executive." Challenging the statement of the Secretary of War, Mr. Baker, that the War Department had achieved a triumph in the work it had accomplished, Mr. Hitchcock asserted that the Secretary was out of touch with the details of his department, and qualified as exaggerations the statements about our ability to ship men to Europe and to supply and equip them there. According to the Senator the problem of getting men to France is extremely grave. He calculated that 5,000,000 tons of shipping would be needed to transport 1,000,000 men to France, if indeed the men could be got there at all, and added that nowhere was that tonnage available.

The Chamberlain War Cabinet Bill

Senator Hitchcock's attack on the Administration brought a rebuke from Senator John Sharp Williams, of Mississippi, who in strong terms criticized the War Cabinet bill and the bill to create a directorship of munitions. He urged the members of the Senate to give up all spirit of partisanship in the present crisis. "Let us not," he said, "wage this war as Republicans or Democrats. Let us not wage it as Southerners or Northerners, but as Americans." Senator Reed of Missouri expressed his sympathy with the efforts of Senators Chamberlain and Hitchcock to uncover the defects of the War Department, but stated his opposition to the proposed measures as interference with the constitutional right of the Executive to assume, unhindered, the authority of Commander-in-Chief of the Army and the Navy. On February 5 the debate on the bill was continued. Senator Wadsworth of New York urged the passage of the measure. He asserted that the President lacked the authority to put an effective, coordinated war machine into operation. He argued that this was an industrial war and that the country's industries must be speeded up to "the top notch" if America is to win. This quickening, he said, had not been accomplished, adding that confusion had been caused by scattering authority over ten or more government departments and that there was no cohesive system in our management of the war. According to him all the great purchasing agencies of the Government ought to be under one head.

On February 6 a bill was offered in the Senate by Senator Overman of North Carolina, giving practically unrestricted power to the President to "coordinate and consolidate" all the government agencies as a war emergency. The measure, which came from the President, caused a sensation and was criticized as intended to provide assumption of the entire power of the Government by the Executive. The bill was handed to Senator Overman by Postmaster Burleson, the recognized intermediary between Congress and the President, and according to Mr. Burleson it recorded the wishes of the President in his effort to achieve the utmost efficiency in all war activities. Amazement was expressed at the capitol at the sweeping nature of the measure. Not only would it mean the abdication by Congress of its law-making power, Senators said, but it would carry into effect a wholesale repeal of laws by which government departments or agencies have been established. The bill offered by Senator Overman was referred to the Judiciary Committee which will decide whether it is to be reported or not.

On February 7, Representative Carter Glass of Virginia, in a speech in the House of Representatives, replied to the criticisms of Senator Chamberlain against the War Department's conduct of the war. Mr. Glass accentuated the accomplishments of the War Department. He admitted mistakes but denied that the Department had broken down. He charged Senator Chamberlain himself, as Chairman of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs, with being responsible for the nation's military unpreparedness and cited in proof the paltry appropriations made in the years preceding the war for military arsenals. He also accused Mr. Chamberlain of giving aid and comfort to the German cause, as his speech was delivered at a time when the people of Germany were in the throes of a civil uprising.

The Brest-Litovsk Conference

The Brest-Litovsk conference between the Austro-German and Russian peace-delegates seems to be passing through another crisis. German wireless dispatches to London bring the story of the negotiations up to the early days of the month, when long discussions on the question of admitting representatives of the Russian border States and Poland to the negotiations failed to bring any result. Leon Trotzky, the Bolshevist Foreign Minister, declared his readiness to recognize the independence and right of self-government of the Polish State, but contended that the fact of foreign occupation prevented him from recognizing representatives from that State under existing conditions, arguing that a State without either well-defined boundaries or without a king could be neither a State nor a kingdom. Dr. Von Kühlmann, the German Secretary of Foreign Affairs, stated that the negotiations would be facilitated if Leon Trotzky would recognize the independence of the other border States. Count Czernin, the Austrian Foreign Minister, stated that by Trotzky's recognition of the existence and independence of a Polish State, the two sides seemed to have been drawn closer together, but he did not see that the question whether the existing Polish Government was authorized to represent the Polish State or not could be submitted to another government.

Official Russian wireless dispatches state that Lettish Councils of Socialists and soldiers protested against the assertion of the Austro-German delegates at Brest-Litovsk, that the Letts demanded a separation from Russia. They asked on the contrary that the German and Russian forces be withdrawn from Lettish territory so that the Letts might freely express their will for unconditional unity and undivided national existence. The Esthonians made demands similar to those put forward by the Letts. They insisted on full and unfettered self-determination for the whole of Esthonia, including Oesel, Dago, and the neighboring islands inhabited by Esthonians. The declaration stated that the separation of the islands from the rest of Esthonia would be a gross violation of the rights of Esthonia and protested against the annexation of the island by Germany, under any conditions. The demand is made that the German and Russian troops evacuate Esthonia and allow the Esthonians to cast an unhampered vote with regard to their future national existence.

Messages sent from Petrograd to Stockholm and relayed to the New York Times state that on February 6, Lenine, the Bolshevist Prime Minister, declared that the Smolny Institute, the Bolshevist headquarters, had for several days received no communications from Brest-Litovsk. This, according to Lenine, showed that the Germans had something to hide, and that they intended by these methods to exercise pressure on the Russians. He added: "We will take steps to bring about a change in the situation." Official Berlin dispatches report that a peace agreement was signed on February 9 at Brest-Litovsk between representatives of the Ukrainian Rada and the Central Powers.

According to dispatches sent from Vienna to Amsterdam, Dr. von Seydler, the Austrian Premier, who entered into office last June, tendered the resignation of his entire cabinet to Emperor Charles on February 8. The resignation, it is understood in parliamentary circles in Vienna, was caused by the opposition of Polish deputies to special debates and to the provisional budget.

Guatemala.—The concentration of the world's attention on the war has distracted the public mind from the magnitude of the disaster which has overwhelmed and destroyed the most important city of Central America. The final shock which completed the ruin took place at half-past ten on January 4, but according to the seismographical reports of Georgetown University, it was preceded by shocks which took place December 25, 26 and 29, the last being of very great intensity. The beautiful and stately cathedral is in ruins, and its fate has been shared by many other important structures of the city. The first capital of Guatemala, which was built where Cuidad Veia now stands, was destroyed by earthquake in the year 1541, the second, situated on the present site of La Antigua, was destroyed by earthquake in 1773. The present city of Guatemala has been the capital since 1779.

For some time the people had been alarmed. Last June the capital of San Salvador was destroyed; towards the middle of November violent tremblings of the earth were experienced in the department of Amatitlan, and at other places along the western seismic zone; at the very time when the recent shocks took place collections were actually being made to succor the families who had suffered severely.

The Révista Catolica, speaking of the disaster, recalls the words spoken by the Archbishop of San Salvador at the time of the earthquake which destroyed his episcopal city. The venerable prelate attributed the calamity to the outraged justice of God, and saw in it a punishment for the war which the people were waging on God and Jesus Christ, striving as they were to uproot the old Faith and turn the people into atheists. The editor of the Révista alludes to parallel conditions in Guatemala and hints at a like reason for God's wrath.

Ireland.—The Convention still drags its weary length along, apparently without hope of an early and satisfactory settlement of difficulties. Ulster is still truculent.

Ulster and the Convention

The author of "A Londoner's Diary," in the London Evening Standard, comments on the problem as follows:

> The slight lifting of the veil of the Irish Convention shows the intractable still intractable. . . . If the Convention fails at present to realize the most sanguine hopes of England and America it is due to the absence of goodwill on the part of those who do not desire a settlement on any terms. That is the naked truth. It is not only in Ulster that this spirit of unreasonableness is found. It is to be found also in Dublin, though in circles whose influence is limited in comparison.
> The most serious effect of the intractability of Ulster will be felt in America, where the elements most friendly to Great Britain will find their difficulties enlarged. It is, I learn, premature to say that the Unionists of Munster, Leinster and Connaught have already arrived at an agreement with the Nationalists, but this much may be said, that the spirit of the Unionists of the Catholic Provinces has shown itself far more accommodating than the Orange spirit of the North.

The Irish Weekly Independent appears to think that for the present conscription is not to be applied to Ireland. The paper's confidence is based on remarks made by Sir Auckland Geddes, on the introduction of the new Military Service bill into the House of Commons.

Conscription

After declaring against the raising or lowering of the age limit he said:

> The third possibility is to apply compulsory service to Ireland, but the Government are satisfied that the reasons which led to the exclusion of Ireland from the Military Service acts have lost none of their cogency. They have decided for the present not to ask for powers to introduce compulsory service in Ireland.

The speaker seemed satisfied with the part Ireland has so far played in the war. From the outbreak of the war till now the British navy has increased from 150,000 men to 400,000, and the army from 600,000 to 4,000,000; the air service from 2,000 to 125,000, last August; this is still expanding. The men supplied to the armed forces number 7,500,000 contributed on the following percentages: England 60.4, Dominions and Colonies 12, Scotland 7.2, Wales 3.7, Ireland 2.3. From 420,000 to 450,000 men are needed for the immediate expansion of the navy and air forces. In concluding his speech Sir Auckland Geddes declared that if this number could not be raised in the ordinary way, the Government would not hesitate to adopt Irish conscription.

Rome.—The similarity between the principles that should determine the broad outlines of a just and durable peace, as set forth by President Wilson and Mr. Lloyd George, and those outlined by the Holy Father has been noted in many quarters, and has been a complete refutation of the calumny industriously circulated in many nations that the Pope had departed from his position of strict neutrality and was favoring the Central Powers. The Osservatore Romano in a recent issue gives the views of the Vatican on the subject, from which La Croix quotes the following significant passage:

The Pope's Impartiality

> The Holy See has noted with legitimate satisfaction that in their recent declarations, both one and the other [Mr. Wilson and Mr. Lloyd George] have chosen as the possible basis of peace negotiations the very same points which the Holy Father, Pope Benedict XV, in his appeal of August 1 to the heads of the belligerent peoples, laid down, not precisely as articles of a concrete treaty of peace, but rather as those essential, fundamental principles that might and should be adopted as starting points for the negotiations for which the recent pronouncements of Mr. Lloyd George and Mr. Wilson seem to be paving the way. . . . But from this statement, namely, that note has been taken, and with pleasure, of the agreement and perfect harmony existing between the said declarations and the memorable Pontifical document of last August, it by no means follows, and it would be a serious mistake so to believe, that for this reason the Holy See intends to exert pressure on either one side or the other in order to sustain or support its concrete proposals, thus departing from the line of conduct which it imposed on itself at the very beginning and has rigorously maintained through all its trials and serious difficulties.

The Osservatore Romano goes on to express its surprise at the statement made by the Tempo, that the Holy See had changed its attitude and would take a stand against the Central Powers. The Holy See, from the outset of the war has observed, says the Osservatore Romano, not merely neutrality, but absolute and rigorous impartiality, an attitude required by its international or rather supernatural character, which lifts it above the disputes and conflicts of peoples. This attitude it would continue to maintain, as it has scrupulously maintained it during the three years of the war, and assuredly it had no intention of departing from it on account of recent developments in diplomacy. The Osservatore Romano concludes by remarking that the wonder is that the Papal document, which is admitted to bear so close a resemblance to the declarations of the two eminent statesmen, did not receive when it was published the response it deserved, seeing that implicit recognition is now accorded its political wisdom and supreme importance in the slightly modified form in which its main points have been reproduced.

Marconi's Statement

In connection with this official statement as to the Vatican's attitude of impartiality, the following excerpt from an interview given to a correspondent of the New York Times by Mr. William Marconi is very pertinent:

> Asked about the attitude of the Catholic Church, Marconi said he thought there was little to complain about. Some of the priests had preached against war and on the blessings of peace, but they were dealing with the subject in a general fashion and had no intention of aiding the Germans. As for the Vatican, he continued, it has been neutral and, just as President Wilson's attitude in the days of American neutrality was misrepresented by some people, so has been the Pope's. It is difficult for those engaged in a great war to understand the attitude of those who insist upon neutrality.

This statement is the more authoritative as Marconi, who has just returned from Italy, made it while discussing the general Italian situation and especially the reasons for the Italian collapse. On other points he spoke tentatively and with hesitancy, but on the question of the Vatican there was no hint of doubt in his words. His statement is in full agreement with those made by the eminent newspaper correspondent, Mr. Herbert Corey.

Russia.—Dispatches dated Petrograd, February 3, announced the complete separation of Church and State. Through a decree issued by the Soviet and signed by Lenine, State support of the Orthodox Church is done away with and all ecclesiastical property is confiscated. Religious societies, however, may continue to use the church property exclusively for religious services, though the title is vested in the State. According to other provisions of the new law,

The Church "Taken Over"

> Religious freedom is guaranteed so long as religious societies do not interfere with social order, limit the rights of individuals, or hinder the republic. No religious scruples are to exempt persons from their duties as citizens. The religious oath is canceled and replaced by a promise. Marriage ceremonies and birth registrations are to be performed by the civil authorities. Religious teaching is abolished in State schools and in private schools with a similar curriculum. No State assistance will be given to any church, society or religious agent. No religious society will be permitted to own any property, but will merely be permitted to borrow it from the State for church services.

The Bolshevist Commissioners of Public Charity, who now control ecclesiastical property, announce that it should be "used solely for the alleviation of the lot of the classes suffering most from exploitation by capitalist society." After March 1 the clergy will receive no salaries from the Government. Clergymen who wish to continue their functions will be employed by the Commissioners of Public Charities "on the collective demand of the congregations they serve. Ecclesiastical functions and ceremonies may be continued on condition that the clergy accept as private persons remuneration from the locality where they officiate."

As the All-Russian Congress of Workmen's and Soldiers' Delegates adjourned without adopting definite plans for the distribution of land, the problem is very pressing. On February 6 Premier Lenine addressed a large gathering of agitators who are to start for the provinces with the object of confiscating the property of not only the bourgeoisie, but of rich peasants as well. "Pit ten poor peasants against every rich one" was the Premier's order. He then said:

Economic and Social Problems

> External war is finished or is being finished now. Internal war begins, but not a war with arms. This is an economic war. The masses must take back what has been stolen from them. The rich, who have hidden their wealth, think the masses will pull them through. Somehow, we must uncover the hidden wealth or, otherwise, the Bolshevist Government is bankrupt. The republic needs 28,000,000,000 rubles annually. Its prospective income is only 8,000,000,000 rubles. The hidden wealth must be uncovered and placed at the disposal of the Government.

The scarcity of metal money, the increasing distrust of paper money and the appearance of many counterfeit bills make the economic situation graver still. Paper money to the amount of 18,000,000,000 rubles—the ruble's value is about $0.50—has been issued, though only 1,633,000,000 rubles' worth was in circulation before the war, and the gold reserve is at present less than 1,604,000,000 rubles. The Russian national debt is now estimated at 80,000,000,000 rubles, about half of which was contracted since the war began.

According to dispatches received here February 8 rioting and plundering have broken out afresh in Petrograd; wine cellars, jewelry shops and clothing, food and drug stores are freely looted. Troops fired on the mobs and more than 100 people were killed, but the disorders were not suppressed. Bands of marauding soldiers enter private houses and hold up passersby and seize what they want, murdering those who resist. The number of the unemployed has grown so great that the Commissioner of Labor has organized public works to give some of them occupation, and food speculators' hoards have been discovered and confiscated.

Fighting has continued during the past week in different parts of Russia between the Bolsheviki and their opponents. A dispatch dated Stockholm, February 6, announced that the commander of the Government forces in Finland had defeated the Red Guard at Uleaborg and taken the town which is full of Bolshevist military supplies. But the Red Guard were reported to be still holding Helsingfors, where they were plundering and killing the people.

Pope, Peer and President

GEORGE E. ROE

A NEW phase in war history having been opened by the armistice in Russia, the negotiations at Brest-Litovsk and the detailed exposition of purpose made on behalf of England by Mr. Lloyd George, the preceding phase, to which the main contributors were Pope Benedict XV, Lord Lansdowne and President Wilson, passes into the diminishing perspective. What the Pope, the President and the ranking Whig Peer wrote was matter of heated controversy two months ago, but now that new and different activities are afoot their earlier contributions become matters of record rather than of present influence, and it may be found not uninstructive, before yet other events drive the period of August 17—December 4 still farther into the background, to note the relation of the three pronouncements to one another. It will be the work of the historian, later on, to examine what the relationship of any or all of them was to events which may follow.

That there were differences in angle of approach and method of treatment goes without saying. The Pope's main concern was for peace, which others would have to arrange. The President was busily engaged in preparing the United States for effective participation in the business of war, upon which he had lately and reluctantly induced the country to embark. Lord Lansdowne spoke for those against whom, after more than three years of the agony, war-weariness could not be accounted a reproach. The three could not be expected to say always the same things or only the same things. What will constitute for history the main interest in their conjunction of effort is that they were in agreement about the main things, the great things, the things which have to do not with present antagonisms but with the better ordering of the future of the world. With all three the initial impulse was very much the same. Not in December of 1917 but in December of 1916, President Wilson had said:

> If the contest must continue to proceed towards undefined ends by slow attrition until one group or other of the belligerents is exhausted; if million after million of human lives must continue to be offered up until on one side or the other there are no more to offer; if resentments must be kindled that can never cool, and despairs engendered from which there can be no recovery, hopes of peace and of the willing concert of free peoples will be rendered vain and idle.

Eight months later Pope Benedict asks: "Is this civilized world to be turned into a field of death, and is Europe, so glorious and flourishing, to rush, as carried by a universal folly, to the abyss and take a hand in its own suicide?" Again two months later, Lord Lansdowne writes of "the most dreadful war the world has known," in which "the killed alone can be counted by the million," and numbers himself with those "who look forward with horror to the prolongation of the war and who believe that its wanton prolongation would be a crime differing only in degree from that of the criminals who provoked it."

In the same speech of December 18, 1916, President Wilson spoke of his interest in the war's conclusion "lest it should presently be too late to accomplish the greater things which lie beyond its conclusion." What these "greater things" are we need not go far to learn. The first is the desire that this war shall end without injustice and the new peace begin without vindictiveness; the second is that a partnership of peoples shall hereafter prescribe the bases on which the world's concord shall be founded; the third is that means shall be invented and employed for the discipline of recalcitrants; and the fourth is that the pathway of the sea shall be made equally safe and equally free to all nations, great as well as small.

"The fundamental point," wrote Pope Benedict, "must be that the material force of arms shall give way to the moral force of right." "We desire peace," wrote President Wilson, "by the overcoming of evil, by the defeat once for all of the sinister forces that interrupt peace and render it impossible." "To end the war honorably," wrote Lord Lansdowne, "would be a great achievement; to prevent the same curse falling upon our children would be a greater achievement still. This is our avowed aim and the magnitude of the issue cannot be exaggerated. For just as this war has been more dreadful than any war in history, so, we may be sure, would the next war be even more dreadful than this."

How was this security to be obtained? As one measure designed for its realization, Lord Lansdowne mentions "an international pact under which ample opportunities would be afforded for the settlement of international disputes by peaceful means." President Wilson sees it as that "partnership of nations which must henceforth guarantee the world's peace." The question of enforcement naturally arises. Lord Lansdowne assumes that an aggressor against ordered international society could "be disciplined either by the pressure of superior naval and military strength or by the denial of commercial access and facilities." President Wilson mentions a case in which a recalcitrant nation "might not be admitted to free economic relations." Pope Benedict, premising the recognition of right before might, would proceed to

> A just agreement of all upon the simultaneous and reciprocal decrease of armaments, according to rules and guarantees to be established, in the necessary and sufficient measure for the maintenance of public order in every State; then, taking the place of arms, the institution of arbitration, with its high pacifying function, according to rules to be drawn in concert and under sanction to be determined against any State which would decline either to refer international questions to arbitration or to accept its awards

On the part of all three there is prevision that a new rule must be made for the highway of nations which we call the sea. There is variety in the treatment of this subject, also, but again, in the fundamental conception, a near approach to agreement. "We are prepared," writes Lord Lansdowne, "when the war is over, to examine, in concert with other Powers, the group of international problems, some of them of recent origin, which are connected with the question of 'the freedom of the seas.'" This may be somewhat frigid with reserve, but we must remember that the sea is a delicate subject in England. Pope Benedict is more expansive:

> Let every obstacle to ways of communication among peoples be removed by insuring, through rules to be also determined, the true freedom and community of the seas, which, on the one hand, would eliminate any causes of conflict, and, on the other hand, .would open to all new sources of prosperity and progress.

President Wilson is very outspoken, for not only does he affirm and reaffirm that the pathways of the sea must be free, but that "There must be assured and unmolested access to these pathways, not only for the smaller nations but for the greater nations as well, including our present enemies as well as our present associates." The President's conception includes access to the sea as well as freedom upon it and he mentions Servia and Poland as entitled to have that access.

In regard to these matters of high and permanent policy it is evident that Pope, President and Peer were in essential agreement. They were in agreement also about several material items of present policy, incident to the ending of this war and so entering upon the period of accomplishment lying "beyond its conclusion." About Belgium, about northern France, about the need of abandoning vindictiveness, about seeing "justice done at every point and to every nation that the final settlement must affect our enemies as well as our friends" (President Wilson) they were also in substantial agreement. Into that phase of the subject, which forms the body of international pronouncements of the hour, there need be no present incursion. What may be said is that by their concurrence in the advocacy of great and permanent policies President Wilson, Pope Benedict and Lord Lansdowne reinforced one another and not merely multiplied the effectiveness of their advocacy of after-war policies but increasingly, and at last immeasurably, strengthened the hands of those whose difficult business it is, or soon may be, to find the formulae which, when applied to the actual situation in the many quarters of the world which are disturbed by the war, will make it possible safely to begin the formulation of those new and permanent policies by which, it is hoped and is to be hoped, the future peace and ordered progress of the world may be assured. That task now rests with others, who seem, at times, to be rapidly eliminating what once appeared to be formidable difficulties and to be approaching reconciliation by reducing what were regarded as irreconcilable differences to the point where the differences may vanish. It was a great and a noble achievement, this work of preparation by the President, the Pope and the British Peer, for which they will be held in honor when the history of the period comes to be written. And happily our President is foremost in this effort; for since the foregoing article was written he has spoken again, and has condensed his news into fourteen propositions, affirming, in the most emphatic way, the propositions already dealt with, placing them in the very front of his declarations. Many who have followed the subject closely were struck with the remarkable similarity between the President's expressions in January and those of the Pope in August. These declarations are in essential agreement.

The Fourteenth Amendment and the Mass

PAUL L. BLAKELY, S.J.

MORE than once have I been reminded within the last week that "no bone-dry law," affecting the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass, can long stand out against the Fourteenth Amendment. That Amendment, one of the first to put a check upon the powers of the States, provides, among other things of very high moment, that "No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States." I cannot speak as Portia did, but it seems to me that the Fourteenth Amendment is but a weak and beggarly protection against State legislation, directly or indirectly, affecting the Holy Sacrifice. Is it my privilege or immunity, as a citizen of the United States, to say Mass or to hear Mass, after the imperial State of New Hampshire, for instance, has proscribed the Papistical religion, establishing Calvinism as the official creed? If the peerless Commonwealth of Kentucky enacts the penalty of death for all citizens, even Colonels, found with alcoholic liquor in their possession, may I, by reason of the Fourteenth Amendment, proceed with impunity to make, import, buy or sell, wine for sacramental purposes?

If we are going to rely on the Fourteenth Amendment to protect the Mass against ill-advised legislation, it would be well to define the precise scope and meaning of the Fourteenth Amendment. But we cannot. "I cannot say what construction the Federal Courts may place upon this Amendment," a legal authority wrote me recently, "because I am not the son of a prophet, nor has the Almighty endowed me with the gift of divination. For all I know, they may construe it to mean that a man may not wear a pink shirt of a Sunday, or that he must do so." In his "Origin and Growth of the American Constitution," Hannis Taylor admits that in a given case, "it is gravely difficult" to determine when an act of a State destroys a right so fundamental, "that its loss may be said to 'deprive any person of life, liberty or property,'" or to abridge his "privileges or immunities." A large and distinct body of legal literature has sprung up, because of "judge-made law" in cases in which appeal was taken, under this Amendment. To mark out its precise limits is so difficult a task, comments Taylor, that "the Supreme Court has persistently refused to undertake it," and in place of a definition, "has discreetly substituted a working rule, best described in its own language":

> But apart from the imminent risk of a failure to give any definition which would be at once perspicuous, comprehensive and satisfactory, there is wisdom, we think, in the ascertaining of the intent and application of such an important phrase in the Federal Constitution, by the gradual process of judicial inclusion and exclusion, as the cases presented for decision shall require, with the reasoning on which such decisions may be founded. (Davidson vs. New Orleans, 96 U. S. 97, quoted by Taylor, p. 367.)

This hesitancy in high places indicates the extreme unwisdom of relying for protection upon the Fourteenth Amendment. "Present your differences, and we will judge, according to a standard admittedly difficult to apply." In the case of the Holy Sacrifice, the rule shows the necessity of securing in local legislation the specific exception of wine for sacramental purposes. Privileges, rights and immunities are never presumed. They must always be proved. Should the State declare in precise terms that to hold alcoholic liquors for any purpose whatever is neither a privilege, a right, nor an immunity, but a plain violation of law, it is difficult to see a direct source of redress in the Fourteenth Amendment. True, the Supreme Court might intervene to save the Mass, but there is no plain guarantee anywhere in the Federal Constitution that it will, or can do this. In point of fact, many recent decisions of the Supreme Court confirm the right of the State to establish some exceedingly extreme forms of prohibition. Of this a notable example is the ruling handed down on December 10, 1917, in the matter of Crane vs. Idaho.

The defendant in the original jurisdiction, one Crane, had been arrested for having a bottle of whiskey in his possession, contrary to the law of the State of Idaho, providing that "It shall be unlawful for any person to import, ship, sell, transport, deliver, or receive, or have in his possession, any intoxicating liquors, except in cases where a permit is allowed." In default of permit and of bail, Crane was imprisoned, whereupon he sued for a writ of habeas corpus, basing his case on the Fourteenth Amendment, which declares that "No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States." The Supreme Court of Idaho held that the statute was not made in violation or abridgment of these privileges or immunities, and the Supreme Court of the United States has concurred.

> It must now be regarded as settled, that on account of their well-known noxious qualities and the extraordinary evils shown by experience commonly to be consequent upon their use, a State has power absolutely to prohibit the manufacture, gift, purchase, sale or transportation of intoxicating liquors within its borders, without violating the guarantees of the Fourteenth Amendment.
> As the State has the power above indicated to prohibit, it may adopt such measures as are reasonably appropriate, or needful, to render the exercise of that power effective, and, considering the notorious difficulties always attendant upon efforts to suppress traffic in liquors, we are unable to say that the challenged inhibition of their possession was arbitrary, and unreasonable, or without proper relation to the legitimate legislative purpose.
> We further think it clearly follows from our numerous decisions upholding prohibition legislation, that the right to hold intoxicating liquors for personal use is not one of the fundamental privileges of a citizen of the United States, which no State may abridge. A contrary view would be incompatible with the undoubted power [of the State] to prevent the manufacture, gift, sale, purchase or transportation of such articles—the only feasible ways of getting them.

Therefore, the State may not only forbid a citizen of the United States to manufacture, sell, transport, or receive as a gift, alcoholic liquors, but it may forbid him even to retain them in his possession; and if he violates this prohibition, the Fourteenth Amendment will afford him no relief.

But may a State extend this prohibition to genuine wine intended solely for sacramental purposes, without violating the Amendment?

I venture to affirm that it may. To proclaim with vigor and indignation that to offer the Holy Sacrifice or to hear Mass is a privilege or immunity "guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States" is too easy a solution of a serious difficulty. Besides, no such guarantee is to be found. It is better to state the case in this form: "Is it a privilege or immunity of any citizen of the United States to practise his religion in a manner which violates the law of the land?" Thus stated, the controversy assumes a vitally different aspect. The answer must be that in law no citizen enjoys any such privilege or immunity. If, as far as the Federal Constitution is concerned, any State may establish one religion and proscribe all others, I do not see what redress can be sought in that instrument, should a State make the use of wine even for the Holy Sacrifice a violation of the law. Certainly, the Fourteenth Amendment gives me no privilege or immunity to be a Hard Shell Baptist in Boston, or an unconsidered Papist in North Carolina. The State Constitutions may do this, but that is not the question. Hence, if a "bone-dry law" in any State does away with the Mass by forbidding the manufacture, sale, importation or retention of altar wine, there is no redress whatever, so far as I can see, in the Fourteenth Amendment. True, in this case, I should violate the law with an easy conscience and all the pleasure in the world, but it might be very difficult for me to violate it successfully, and if I were caught I should have to pay the piper just as did our forefathers in the bloody days of the glorious Virgin Queen.

One thing is certain: I should have no defense at law. In Reynolds vs. United States (98 U. S. 145), the Supreme Court of the United States ruled that religious belief could not be accepted as justification of an overt act, made criminal by the law of the land. A Christian Scientist, like any other "Sectary," may profess what creed seems best to him, but if his child is run down by an automobile, and he allows it to die without medical attention, he may not offer his conscientious belief as defense in a criminal action. No religious body, it has been ruled, will be allowed by the Courts "to set up its religious belief as a defense to a criminal action by the State." (Zollner, "American Civil Church Law," p. 19, where direct citations may be found.) "In defining forbidden acts, the law . . . punishes blasphemers, Mormons, fortune-tellers, Christian Scientists, members of the Salvation Army, and others, though the acts which have brought them into conflict with the law have been performed with a religious motive." (Zollner, p. 37.) Therefore, as in a State absolutely "bone-dry," the contention of the Church, requiring genuine wine for the Holy Sacrifice, would necessarily conflict with the law of the State, the Courts would perforce sustain the State against the Church. In the eyes of the law, all religions are equal, and since no religious practice in violation of the law can be tolerated, no exception could be made in favor of the Mass.

The remedy against this serious inconvenience is to avoid the conflict. On appeal, the Supreme Court of the United States might, under some broad construction, protect the Mass, and again it might not. We cannot afford to take the risk. An exception in favor of wine for sacramental purposes has been inserted into a majority of the prohibition laws, but if, even with this exemption, difficulties intervene, some of us will gladly go to jail, or, as our fathers did, offer the Adorable Sacrifice in huts and caverns. The Mass is vital, for where there is no vision of the Saving Host lifted up for the sins of the world, the people perish.

Religion's Appeal to Pragmatism

J. D. Tibbits

EVERY religion must, consciously or unconsciously, gravitate toward some philosophy. The more strongly a religion appeals to reason, so much the stronger does its gravitation toward a rational philosophy become. And conversely, whenever a theological system takes its stand upon grounds which are either irrational or non-rational, its philosophy is invariably seen to be founded upon sentiments and impressions. The rational element is distrusted if not wholly discarded.

Thus the exponents of the New Theology are tireless in their efforts to drive home the thought that religion can never rest itself upon a basis of metaphysics. They are at one with the spirit of the age in their dislike of all that savors of the abstract. It is true that their speculations lack both the depth and penetration which are always associated with the great masters of metaphysical science, and it is equally true that they not infrequently confuse what the great masters of metaphysics never did: a process of thought, with the power to realize it. Yet it is easy to see that with them the power of realization counts for all, and the thought process for little or nothing. Understanding this, it becomes perfectly intelligible how, in their system, the sentiments become endowed with an authority and a force which a purely logical demonstration would wholly lack.

This appeal, however, to the feelings, which, in last analysis, is simply a form of intellectual jugglery by which any favorable impression is made to appear as though endowed with some sort of authority, is manifestly impossible as a foundation for religion. It is in order to escape from its patent absurdities while avoiding at the same time the uncomfortable consequences of metaphysics, that the thinkers of the New Theology have reached out to another system, which is considered to have the distinctly twentieth-century merit of aiming above all else at the practical and the workable. There is little room, in this system, for what cannot be directly and immediately applied. To have value, an idea or a theory "must work," and its ability to work is at once the measure and scope of its value. Thus, the idea of God is valuable, and is to be received, simply because it works well. Nations and individuals alike do better with than without it. Subtract it and you may have the excesses of the French Revolution. Restore it and you lay, at least, the foundation of order. So with the existence of the material universe, the immortality of the soul, the freedom of the will. They are to be accepted only because they make for mental and moral efficiency. But the rational demonstration of them amounts to nothing.

Now the objections to this wholesale surrender of the reason, whether to the impressionist or the pragmatist, are so many and so overpowering that it is hardly necessary seriously to consider them. It is evident enough that once an idea is rationally proved to be true that it must surely work. To canvass first its ability to work and then to argue its truth therefrom is simply to invert the rational process, and while it is quite conceivable that this may satisfy those whom the New Theology satisfies, it is absolutely inconceivable that it should ever satisfy those who are conservative enough to think with the faculties given them for thought.

The main interest, however, in this curious grasping by a decadent theological system of the straw of pragmatism, lies not so much in itself as in the manner in which it is applied. This has not as yet been made quite clear; but if there is one fact which is clear it is that the entire method of pragmatism is essentially retrospective. History is the only field to which it may appeal for proofs. If, then, it is to be invoked to lay the philosophical foundations for Protestantism, it is with the history of Protestantism that it is chiefly concerned. To construe that history into a demonstration that Protestantism has worked is its task; while a failure so to do would be nothing less than to brand the Reformation's entire theory as a colossal error.

Now any consideration of the manner in which a religion works, is really a consideration of its effects; and the effects of any religion can be viewed from two quite different angles. The first has regard to those which are directly proper to it, such as, for example, the elevation of personal morality. Thus the difference between the morals of, let us say, St. Francis of Assisi and those of the most highly developed product of paganism, is a clear illustration of the working out of the Catholic system in the matter of transforming character. It is true that this difference can never be fully understood by any philosophy dealing wholly with externals; but it is still evident, even if in a superficial sense, and valid as far as it is evident.

The second has regard to what might be called the collateral effects of religion. And if we continue to use the Catholic Church as our illustration, we shall find many of these in the impress which she has left upon the civilization which she did so much to form. They are the common property alike of those who accept and those who reject her teaching. Had she done nothing but furnish the motive for one Gothic cathedral; had her sole bequest to us been the stained-glass window, Gregorian music, or the medieval Latin hymn, she would still have had civilization in her debt. But this is only part. Not only has she succeeded in so sanctifying the senses as to invest color and form and sound with a meaning and dignity never before conceived; but she has also succeeded in imparting to her most common functions and her most ordinary ministrations a charm which no other religion has ever approached. To this Protestants and unbelievers have borne most ample witness; and even more convincing testimony is to be found in the inspiration which today she lends to every branch of esthetics, and the zeal with which her worship is increasingly imitated.

This, then, is what we mean when we speak of a religious system as "working well." And the more clearly we understand it, so much more puzzling becomes the question as to the manner in which the thinkers of the New Theology propose to apply the test of pragmatism to their own religious past. The light which modern research has thrown upon the last four centuries of Protestantism is, to say the least, not particularly in its favor. What was taught, and seriously believed, a generation ago, to have been a step from intellectual bondage to spiritual freedom is found to be, in reality, a step from the truest form of rationalism to the most illogical of absurdities. What was then considered theological emancipation is now known to be a curious though not a specially profound psychological error. The supposed connection between the Reformation and material progress, is really its connection with economic retrogression; while as far as any contribution to morals is concerned, the result is precisely what was to be expected from a system which began with a confusion of faculties and has ended with an abandonment of reason. Complacency, the fruit of an almost impious assurance, has been made at once the reward of virtue and the measure of sanctity, with the inevitable result that natural pleasures have been viewed with suspicion, and serious sins considered as trivialities. The most extreme and irrational Sabbatarianism has failed to exclude a practical acquiescence in the evils of divorce and contraception.

And the interesting question remains, as to just what sort of foundation, in the light of modern research, it will be possible for the pragmatist to erect upon which the structure of the New Theology may safely stand. That it may be an easy matter to satisfy the New Theologians is more than probable. They have often demonstrated how little it really does take to satisfy them. But it is easy to foresee that any attempt to justify, to thinking men, the theology of Protestantism by its history, will require a degree of subtlety in comparison with which the pages of St. Thomas Aquinas will appear as simple as a child's story-book.

The Story of Yucatan Sisal

EBER COLE BYAM

IN a modest corner of the financial page of the Chicago Tribune of January 8, 1918, appeared the following:

Hoover to Rule Binder-Twine; Price to Go Higher. Washington, D. C., January 7th (special).—Food Administrator Hoover announced today that the Government will control the binder-twine output of the country during the 1918 season, but the price will be higher. Voluntary agreements also have been entered into between the binder-twine manufacturers and the food administration, centralizing the buying and eliminating competition.

It is possible that some of those who read the financial news may have seen this dispatch. It is more than probable, however, that out of 100,000 who may have read it, not one gave it serious attention or sensed what it really means. To expose the true significance of this apparently harmless and uninteresting notice, it is necessary to refer to some events of the recent past which, taken separately, are as the scattered parts of a puzzle, but when arranged in their proper order present a picture too sinister to be ignored by honest men.

Binder-twine is an all-necessary item in the American wheat-harvest. It is made from henequen, commonly known as sisal hemp, grown in the State of Yucatan. This brings us to Mexico, for Yucatan is one of its twenty-seven States.

In 1910 the aged Czar Diaz was compelled to abandon his throne from which he had ably governed for over thirty years to the great material betterment of the masses of Mexico. The revolutionary elements responsible for his overthrow were recruited largely from the vagabonds and criminals of the population, led by self-seeking politicians and fanatical idealists. Successes gave time for sober second thought which served to moderate a few of the leaders who opposed in a measure the more radical demands of the rabble seeking to rob and destroy. This endured, however, for but a few months, and soon the radicals began to gain the upper hand. As the demands of the radicals were incompatible with civilization there came the reaction with its Decena Tragica of February, 1913.

Some few well-meaning Mexicans, misled by mendacious propaganda, welcomed Madero as a leader promising progress, but those who lived soon came to repent bitterly their misplaced sympathy. The masses welcomed the change just because it was a change, nothing more. Yet, with all their sympathy and love of change, there were few to raise a hand to help Madero in the beginning and fewer still to aid him at the end.

As already stated, Madero was compelled to depend for the rank and file of his forces upon the vagabonds and criminals, and for leaders on men like Villa, an illiterate cattle-thief and murderer. With the fall of Madero, itself but an incident, there came the rise of Huerta, which was but another incident; both events being but the resultants of a long procession of causes and effects reaching back a hundred years. Mexico, however, breathed a sigh of relief, and, with a prophetic glance of apprehension toward the north, prepared to resume work and repair the damage already done.

The elements behind Madero had been composed of extreme radicals, a Socialistic-Bolshevist-I. W. W. combination, demanding the confiscation and division of all property. As Madero failed to confiscate and divide, they prepared to fight him, but in this program they were anticipated by the reaction. Discontented and discouraged, the few radical leaders retired to the northern deserts, where they cast about for means to make their peace with a government that promised protection to life and property and respect for law.

The principal figures soon materialized as Carranza and Villa, in whose company there appeared informal personal representatives of Mr. Wilson and Mr. Bryan, respectively. From discouragement over failure to obtain peace the radicals suddenly assumed an attitude of militant defiance which was soon translated into active hostility as arms and ammunition began to flow in a steady stream across the border, in spite of the embargo.

A whisper from the north completely altered the face of affairs, and, from a dawning peace, the unfortunate Mexicans were again thrust back into a night of militant Socialism. Success, however, failed to crown the efforts of the radicals. About the best they were able to accomplish was to ravish and destroy, in which activity they gave special attention to outraging Sisters, killing or exiling priests and destroying church property in their excess of Socialistic zeal.

Just as it became apparent that the Mexicans were about to again triumph over the Socialist-Bolshevist-I. W. W. vandals, the Vera Cruz occupation took place, for the finally admitted reason of driving Huerta out. Among the radicals sharing in this triumph was a fellow named Alvarado, an extreme Socialist of the true I. W. W.-Bolshevist brand. As was to have been expected, this I. W. W.-Bolshevist-Socialist victory established in Mexico the most intolerable tyranny imaginable. But that is another story. In the succession of special envoys sent to Mexico was one John Lind who exercised no restraint in expressing his opinions in favor of Carranza and Villa and against the respectable people of Mexico, especially the clergy. This Swedish "diplomat" almost outdid his natal land in favoring the enemies of civilization and decency.

Having introduced the several characters referred to, including Carranza, Alvarado and John Lind, and, having sketched the principal events necessary to the story, we shall now pass over to Yucatan where they grow the hemp from which is made the binding twine of commerce. Some of the hemp growers of Yucatan, like many farmers elsewhere upon the planet, knew not what it cost to produce their harvests, and some of them did, but, as a result of individual marketing, the price fluctuated in a most discouraging manner. Eventually an association was formed to market the hemp collectively, much as the apple- and orange-growers of the United States handle their crops. This steadied prices and held them at a reasonable figure, fair to all parties.

With the triumph of Carranza, affairs in Yucatan were taken in hand by Alvarado who was appointed Governor of that State by Carranza. As Alvarado's mission was one for revenue only he quickly discovered the hemp-growers' association, and he lost no time in replacing the board of directors with creatures of his own. The details of Alvarado's administration in Yucatan and of the manner in which he got control of the hemp-harvest are horrifying, as well as instructive, but are too long to be discussed here, though it may be mentioned incidentally that in the process he practically compelled the cessation of all religious observances by the simple expedient of exiling all the priests and turning the churches into warehouses for his personal enterprises, and he did not stop at murder to accomplish his purpose.

By such intimidation he compelled the planters to deliver to him all their hemp for which he paid them in paper from his own printing press, and, at that, gave barely sufficient paper to meet the labor charges. As he controls the railroads and the ports, any resistance means ruin, if not assassination. Having purchased his hemp with waste paper, Mr. Alvarado sells it to the manufacturers of binding twine at a constantly increasing rate, for practically the only source of supply is surrounded by his bayonets.

Mr. Alvarado buys corn in the United States and sells it to the native for the paper money received for labor; the practical result being that Alvarado gets his hemp for the actual cost of feeding and clothing those engaged in its production. Indeed, there are those who claim he does not attain even that figure. To handle the disposal of the hemp in the United States there is an organization in which, according to well-founded reports, the son of Mr. John Lind holds, or held, a conspicuous position.

The costs of producing, manufacturing and marketing hemp have been discussed before in these columns. Suffice to say, the price at the source is today several times what it need be. This is so for reasons which the perspicacious reader will at once divine. Mr. Hoover announces that "the price will be higher," and then, as a reason for the same, he remarks "Voluntary agreements also have been entered into between the binding-twine manufacturers and the Food Administration centralizing the buying and eliminating competition." This bit of news seems to make it appear that the manufacturer is to blame. The truth is that the difference between the cost of the hemp and the price of the twine leaves but a small margin for the manufacturer. Mr. Alvarado and his aids are the real beneficiaries to the extent of a possible fifty to sixty million good American dollars.

Had it not been for the Socialist-Bolshevist-I. W. W. triumph of Carranza and Alvarado, Mexico today would be at peace, its people at work for good wages and prosperous, and the oil of the North, the rubber, sugar and bananas of the South, and the hemp of Yucatan would all be flowing in a steady stream toward America and her allies. "Politics makes strange bedfellows," and the strangest of these is Alvarado, who, the reader will remember, issued the proclamation, that keynote of the Carranza revolution, saying: "Let us remember that religion is ignorance and that, as the revolution triumphs, God goes down!"

Good Friday Observance

STANISLAUS RILEY

LENT is now approaching and its proximity arouses in each of us a natural impulse to pause and gaze back, if only for a few brief moments, along the traversed road. This backward gaze will tell us what we already know, that all is not well with the world—and the cause of the ailment is apostasy from God. What is the remedy? A return to God. To hasten, if only by ever so little, the consummation of this return must be the ambition of every Christian worthy of the name. As a means most admirably suited for accomplishing this desire there is submitted to the Catholics of every community the "Reverent Observance of Good Friday Movement," which, having its inception in San Francisco in the year 1910, has spread throughout the entire State of California and even to British Columbia and the Hawaiian Islands.

Its object is to bring about, so far as is practicable, the cessation of secular business on Good Friday between the hours of twelve o'clock noon and three o'clock in the afternoon and to gather together the people at the foot of the Cross, to watch not one hour but three. The work is conducted by a committee comprised for the most part of Catholic lay-people, men and women, some representing the various organizations, fraternal and parochial, others representing no society. Always there have been as members of the committee priests whose labors have been untiring and whose counsel has been indispensable. But more important yet has been the support of the Archbishop. He has kept in constant touch with the movement, personally, and through priests whom he has delegated to represent him on the committee.

The committee mails to the places of business throughout the city a circular letter explaining the purpose of the movement and requesting employers to cooperate by closing their places of business during the three hours, or, if this be not feasible for any reason, by granting employees the privilege of absenting themselves from work to attend the devotional exercises held in the churches. In the residential districts a personal canvass of the business-places is made. The Mayor, pursuant to a resolution of the Board of Supervisors, issues a proclamation directing department-heads to extend this privilege to the municipal employees, and the fixing of the spring vacation to include Holy Week leaves free the teachers and the public-school children. Appeals are made to our Catholic people through the Catholic press, the Catholic organizations and from the altar to Catholic employers that they set a good example by closing; to Catholic employees that they ask to be excused for the declared purpose of attending the church exercises; to our people in general that they refrain during the three hours from making any purchases or transacting any business. To those employers who are willing to close there are furnished display cards reading, "This place of business will be closed on Good Friday (giving the date) from 12 o'clock noon to 3 p.m." These are displayed for at least a week prior to Good Friday that their patrons may have timely notice. Thousands of these cards are printed and distributed annually, yet the need is never fully supplied.

Early there was presented for solution the problem: If the time be granted will it be used for religious purposes or devoted to pleasure or worse? This meant that places of amusement had to be looked to. One member of the committee, a priest, working almost single-handed, has succeeded in inducing the theaters and most of the motion-picture houses to "hold" their curtains until three o'clock, and in persuading most of the saloons to close. Those down-town saloons which, because of their custom of serving a mid-day meal, have something of the status of restaurants, close from one to three.

Each of the thirty-five pastors determines for himself what form of devotions will be held in his church. The services range from the familiar discourses on the "Seven Last Words," to readings of the comparative accounts of the Passion. Some of the pastors, especially in the down-town churches, disregarding the hardship to themselves, begin their exercises with the Mass of the Pre-Sanctified.

These devotions for the three hours are not intended nor do they operate to supersede the regular morning service. They merely supplement it. They have an appeal particularly their own. There is a significance to these hours that does not attach to any other part of the day, for they are the very hours of the dear Christ's Agony. Of the tragic events which these hours record, vast numbers of Christians, even, have but a vague idea and to a great body of non-Christians they are perhaps quite unknown. That the world enters upon its accustomed round of business during the morning hours with nothing to mark the day from 300 other business days and at the stroke of twelve stops short not to resume until three o'clock, puts an incalculable emphasis upon these momentous steps in the process of our Redemption not only for ourselves but perhaps even more so for those not of the household of the Faith. The most callous of men must be brought to ask: Why this hush? and for many the answer to this question will be their first tidings of the conquest of the Galilean.

Some in their zeal would have made Good Friday a legal holiday. But wiser counselors advised against this. In the first place, it was thought not fair to our Jewish brethren to impose upon them a distinctly Christian holiday, especially one which would stress the passing of the Old Dispensation and the coming of the New. This attitude has been appreciated by the Jewish people, for Jewish employers have been most gracious in according their Christian employees opportunity to attend the services. Again, experience teaches us that none of the existent holidays is observed in the spirit of its institution, and there is every ground for fearing that the awful sacredness of the day would not preserve it from desecration. Finally, such a course would seem to take away something of the very essence of the movement that it be at all times voluntary and free from even the appearance of coercion.

It is the ambition of the San Francisco committee to introduce this movement this year into every community in the United States which has sufficient Catholic strength to support a resident pastor. The labor required is light and the draft made upon any one's time is trifling. Given four or five earnest Catholics of resolution and zeal; given the approval of the Ordinary of the diocese, without which, of course, the movement should not be attempted; given a willingness on the part of a few Catholic men and women to devote, say, an hour a week from now until Holy Week to the work of this movement, and the problem of its successful introduction is solved. The start may be modest, but the growth will be great and sure.

This year of all years should evoke the greatest zeal for this work. We have said that the ailment of the world can be cured only by a return to God. Last Good Friday marked the entry of our country into this terrible world-war. Possibly it is the scourge that is being laid across our backs to bring us to our knees before the God whom we have neglected and perhaps despised. Is it too much to ask the Catholics of the United States that they do their part in leading their countrymen to the foot of the Cross where the agonized Redeemer is suffering torments? If they will undertake this nobly and generously perhaps the lash will be lifted from us and the hand that is wielding it be stayed.

Prohibition and the Mass

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I see that the Constitution of the United States has broken out again in AMERICA. K. R. of St. Mary's, Kansas, lays down the proposition that, since the First Constitutional Amendment prohibits Congress from making any law establishing a religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, religious liberty is ipso facto, a right or a privilege of every citizen of the United States. He follows with the Fourteenth Amendment which declares that no State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States. K. R. then deduces that, because the State of Oklahoma "makes and enforces" a law which abridges "certain rights" of citizens with reference to the exercise of religion, "citizens of the United States have no rights, except such as are positively and specifically conferred on them by the United States Constitution."

Both the major and the minor premises are wrong, nor could the conclusion be drawn from the premises even were they sound. The Federal Constitution "confers no rights on citizens." It is simply and finally a written instrument, wherein the States have conferred certain powers upon the Federal Government and have defined their exercise. It is an instrument "between the States." All powers not conferred upon the Federal Government by this Constitution are reserved to the States respectively or to the people. The people of the several States derive none of their powers from the Federal Constitution. Both the Federal and the State Governments ultimately derive their powers from the people; the Federal Government indirectly through the States and the States directly from the people. The First Amendment is a prohibition on powers of Congress, placed there by the jealousy of the States against the possible misconstruction of the powers delegated to Congress in the body of the instrument. The States are free to establish any religion or to prohibit the exercise of any religion. This does not mean that they will do it, or can do it, unless the people of the State so ordain. It is therefore "up to" the people to look less to the Federal Government, and more to their own State Government, for proper laws. The Fourteenth Amendment does not restrain the States in this respect. This proposition is no longer open to argument, for the courts have decided that the Fourteenth Amendment does not so restrain the States.

In one breath K. R. endeavors to vest in the Federal Government the right to regulate the exercise of religion in the several States and in the next, criticizes the Mississippi legislature for investing the Federal Government with power to prohibit the manufacture and sale of liquor. The mere fact that power is vested in the Federal Government is no guarantee either that such a delegation of power is proper, or that it will be properly exercised. Let the people assume more power to themselves in their State Governments, rather than give away power to a centralized government at Washington.

Where Were the Catholic Books?

To the Editor of AMERICA:

A friend of mine, a non-Catholic, wanted to buy a book at Christmas time for a Catholic friend of his. Not knowing about the Catholic book-stores, he went instead to what is perhaps the best-known book-shop on Fifth Avenue. This shop is noted for the convenient way in which books of various kinds are grouped together on shelves and counters, so that the customer may browse and pick and choose; here, a department for poetry; there, a section for the latest books; yonder, the counters heaped with new fiction, and so forth and so on. There were, for further example, at least three huge counters stacked high with "occult" and "New Thought" stuff. But there was not a single shelf devoted to Catholic literature. My friend asked a clerk to help him pick out a Catholic book, and at last one was found. Since then, I've looked about in the same shop and I found none of the works of such authors as Robert Hugh Benson, Hilaire Belloc, Paul Claudel, Joris Karl Huysmans, Father Martindale, Canon Sheehan or Johannes Jorgensen, to mention at random only a few characteristic Catholic authors of works of a non-theological type. Scores more could, of course, be named. Does not this experience suggest another field for the apostolate of the press? Is there, can there be, no society or organization which could see to it that lists of typical Catholic literature were supplied to book-shops, so that they might carry in stock a representative selection of Catholic books? I think that many a truth-thirsty soul, searching these shops for books that might help them, would often choose a Catholic book rather than one of the meretricious "occult" or "New Thought" things, if some of the big book-shops were shown the practical wisdom of paying attention to this matter.

A Catholic Paper

To the Editor of AMERICA:

At the present moment, when the Catholic manhood of America and the ladies of the parishes of the U. S. A. are showing what enthusiasm and cooperation can accomplish in the K. of C. war fund, it seems to me that the time is opportune for a similar effort in behalf of the Prince of Peace. Nothing is more self-evident today than the crying need of a good daily press. It is the hour when the Divine complaint, "With desolation is all the land laid desolate because there is not in it any one who thinketh in his heart," is being manifested to the eyes of men. You and I and every true intelligent Catholic know that there can be no true peace, but "the peace of justice," and that this "peace of justice" cannot come from swords or material wealth, but only from the word of God and the Cross of Christ.

The wonderful success which the K. of C. and their friends have made of the War Fund Campaign shows the feasibility of a similar campaign waged to give men the "food of the soul" through a great Catholic daily press. I know full well that this question will appear to many as entirely inopportune and unimportant in the present condition of the country, the high cost of paper and printers' ink and the hundred and one other obstacles that stand up to bar the way of him who would work for God. Obstacles, however, have never been but an incentive to greater effort and final success when the worker is sincere and confident of the worth of his cause. We Catholics know how great is the need of a genuine Catholic daily paper. Our Catholic men have little time, in the stress and bustle of American life, to think of their one essential duty. They are rushing through life with but one thought uppermost, to get on. The ordinary man rushes from bed, through breakfast to the street or the street-car, grabs his morning paper, dives through work and dinner and work, into the evening paper; and never, in all his reading, is there a hint to remind him of his duty to Christ who gives him all he is, and has, and hopes to be here and hereafter. You, better than I, know the aggregate of Catholic members in the various Catholic societies of America. If the proper amount of enthusiasm was instilled into the various living links of these chains of Catholic citizens, and if the true leader arose to point the way, these idle Mondays could be made the most memorable days in all the history of our country. During those ten days the masters and the men, the employers and the employees of thousands of factories and business establishments will be in search of some way in which to spend their enforced leisure time. Let us, in God's name, grasp these Mondays and have our Catholic societies use them in the interests of that peace which the world needs and which "the world does not understand." If every member of the different Catholic societies gave a paid-up subscription of, say, three dollars, we would by the end of the Mondays have the $3,000,000 or $4,000,000 needed to start the primal paper of America. We could start in on the Hearst chain-plan with a certain amount of syndicated matter, say three or four pages, common to all the links of the chain, no matter from what city or town it was issued.

This syndicate matter, the back-bone of the Santa Maria, or whatever you might call the paper, could be secured from the "Catholic Encyclopedia" and the vast storehouse of the Catholic literature of the ages, from the special articles of the gifted members of the various Catholic societies, and thus a real Catholic poor man's library would be placed in the hands of the people. The three-dollar subscription price might be taken with the understanding that any surplus that remained over and above the actual expenses of the working of the chain of papers would be carried forward, credited to the individual subscriber as payment or part-payment for the next year, or it might be used as his individual share in the corporation. This would give each an individual interest in the success of the paper and a chance of becoming investors, shareholders in a holy corporation that would grow with the years. Besides the subscription means of raising the money, many men and women would invest their dollars, their hundreds and their thousands in the enterprise. New printing plants would not be needed and old ones would be easily acquired, for, according to "Ayer's Newspaper Directory," 300 weeklies, semi-weeklies and tri-weeklies have ceased publication during the past three years and, since January, 1917, seventy-six dailies have passed into oblivion. These plants could be utilized in the smaller cities and towns and the most that would be needed would be great plants for the big cities like New York, Boston, Baltimore, Washington, Buffalo and Los Angeles, with other addenda wisdom would dictate. The impending struggle, a post-bellum issue, between atheism and Catholic Faith is evident to any thinking man. In order to bring peace out of the chaos that will follow the war we need a medium to interpret ourselves to ourselves and give to the people of America "the food of the soul" that cannot be given them in a better or more effective manner than through a well-organized press. You have but to look upon the demoralization of Europe to see that human nature will need a strong food when this struggle is done. Who can supply that food save she alone that has been the conservator, purifier and defender of the best that is in us since the Santa Maria first touched this New World's soil.

Therefore, I would humbly suggest that you give this idea to your readers and have them think on it during the coming week, that we may bring from the Mondays that will remain the glory of a great Catholic daily—a Santa Maria sailing the seas of troubled thought, illuminating the stormy waves of feeling and pointing the way to the true haven whence peace comes and in which alone true peace can be found.

Catholic "Boys' Own Annual"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I have before me a large "Boys Illustrated Annual" published by Sampson, Low, Marston & Co., London, Eng. As every one who has seen such works knows they contain a vast amount of literature suitable to the boy. Besides tales of adventure and stories of college life, so pleasing to the average lad, of which there are many, biographical sketches, anecdotes, stories of inventions and inventors, descriptions of persons, places, animals, plants, short histories of countries, governments, peoples and races, of their customs and habits; narratives of travel, character and humorous sketches; accounts of sports, games and pastimes, etc.; the whole work profusely and graphically illustrated. Altogether, the book is just such a one as to attract the attention of the boy and provide him, as well as his seniors, with a great deal of recreation and much useful information.

It would seem that there is a great opening for such a work adapted for Catholic boys, or rather a Catholic work of that kind for boys.

Having before us the splendid achievement of the Encyclopedia Press, in producing the "Catholic Encyclopedia," one might suggest that that association undertake the work of producing a "Catholic Boys' Own Annual," which might, if continued during a number of years, form a veritable juvenile encyclopedia and fill a very important gap in our literature.

There is a vast amount of history, most interesting and thrilling, that should find a place in such a publication. Biblical and early Christian times, the catacombs, the arena, the crusades, penal days, early days in America, Africa, Australia, would suggest great stories. We have a long list of subjects for biographical sketches. Our saints and scholars, kings, artists, scientists, explorers, inventors should be introduced to the boy in attractive sketches.

There are thousands of interesting facts that would require a dozen or more such annuals to lay before the youthful mind. Such a work, among other things, might provide the opportunity of instilling into the mind of young Catholic America sound principles on economic, social and other questions.

Meatless Days

To the Editor of AMERICA:

A man said to me the other day: "After a while we can't eat meat any day of the week except Friday." "Is that so?" I said. "Well," said he, "Friday is a government 'meatless day' in England, and why not here, too?" "Because," I replied, "we American Catholics are more patriotic than the English, and are willing to do without meat twice a week, if necessary." "Is that so?" he exclaimed—"Patriotic? Tame, I call it." "You're wrong," I countered. "I'm right!" he cried. Am I right, or is he?

There is trouble already about pure wheat for altar bread, and about altar wine in one or two prohibition States. And all due to what Mr. Williams calls "apathy"; but my friend, above quoted, calls it mere and sheer cowardice on the part of Catholic politicians who are politicians first and "Catholics" a bad second. Am I right again?

Catholics and White Slavery

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I have read with interest the correspondence on this painful subject, which recalls to my mind the torrent of denunciation hurled at Cardinal Manning's revered head by the Catholics in England, toward the end of the last century, when he dared to condemn immorality in men, and protest against this vile traffic. Even the awful disclosures then made public in England failed to rouse Catholics. One indignant Catholic even wrote to the Cardinal, asking if it could possibly be true that he was actually going to write a pastoral letter on such a subject. In view of the express teaching of St. John that only virgins will "follow the Lamb," this attitude on the part of these alleged Catholics is, indeed, incomprehensible, and I certainly agree that it requires explanation, or, better still, condemnation, for a double standard of morality can have no place in a religion founded by Our Lord. That it has a place in the minds of many Catholics cannot be denied, and Cardinal Manning's spirited action in the cause of purity might well be followed these corrupt days. The clergy have handled men too long with kid gloves, and women with hob-nailed boots. If they reversed the order we might have a higher moral standard than now prevails.

A Catholic Defense League

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I read Mr. Michael Williams' article regarding unfair newspaper tactics in the case of Catholics, with great interest. Will you allow me to suggest a remedy for such intolerable conditions? If the main idea appeals to you, I hope you will elaborate it and present it to your readers.

Since the chief sources of popular information are the daily papers of our large cities, a Catholic Defense League should be formed under the presidency of the Archbishops. The personnel of this League should be prominent Catholic laymen, journalists, lawyers, physicians and business men, together with one or two priests. Besides an executive committee, whose members will act as censors of replies made to false or dangerous newspaper articles, several educated Catholics should act as a vigilance corps to detect such objectionable articles. Whenever such an article falls under the notice of any of these "vigilantes" a reply is to be made under the supervision of the executive committee. If two or three Catholics were assigned to each of the big dailies, little would escape that is really injurious to Catholic interests. Once the editors of these great dailies realize that such zealous and courageous Catholics were scrutinizing the articles that affected the Catholic Faith and practice, they will be chary in admitting offensive contributions. Finally, were Catholic organizations like the Knights of Columbus to support this Defense League, and were Catholic business men sufficiently loyal to their faith and courageous in their convictions to withdraw advertisements from newspapers which insult Catholics, would not these papers avoid such offenses?

St. Louis. W. A. P.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Michael Williams' letter, January 26, suggests the need of a Catholic daily paper. But even that would only partially undo the evil. This must be attacked by the Catholic laity and truth-loving non-Catholics, who read these unveracious journals. It ought to be an easy matter for Catholic Federation or the K. of C. to have the names of a few thousand persons who would constitute an informal League of Truth, the members of which would notify a central secretary by a card like this: "I subscribe for, or often buy, the New York Blade, the Chicago Star, etc., and I pledge myself when notified of a lying article in these journals, that the editor refuses to rectify, to send word to such editor that I will no longer read his paper. Signed, N. N."

Then, when occasion is thrust on us, a card would be sent out by the General Secretary to members of the League, taking the offending paper, which they would mail to the editor. The card might read as follows:

"Editor New York Blade. In your issue of January 25, 1918, appeared an article grossly misrepresenting Catholic teaching (or a statement entirely false historically, etc.). Till this matter is shown truthfully in your paper I shall discontinue my subscription."

If one thousand of these cards were received some fine morning in the sanctum, the business manager would take notice. The expense would be little, mainly the postage. I will myself promise to pay the postage ($30) on the first one thousand sent out.

The "Saturday Evening Post" as Tom Watson

To the Editor of AMERICA:

On January 19 the Saturday Evening Post, published in Philadelphia, and claiming a circulation of over 2,000,000 copies a week, had an article called "The Honor of the Force," written by Katherine Mayo. This article is an account of a fight which occurred about 1906, between the Pennsylvania State Constabulary and certain men said to be Austrians and Italians. The alien murderers with rifles and plenty of ammunition had shut themselves in a house, and the police were trying to dislodge them. When the firing had been going on for a long time, the writer says, "A priest in black robe and shovel hat," tall, lean, thin-lipped, evil-eyed, appeared as they do in five-reel movies. The police begged him to induce the men to surrender to prevent more bloodshed. He smiled in high disdain, and said, "Ha! ha!" He went toward the house, and all firing ceased. He spoke to the men, returned to the police, and "with a strong Austrian accent" sneeringly advised the police to go to and get the men if they could. Then this "lean black vulture teetered off down the road," no less! and cruelly left the poor police to their carbines.

Priests in the United States always go about the roads and streets in black robes and shovel hats, so I took the trouble to write to a prominent clergyman in the Erie diocese, in which the fight is supposed to have taken place, asking him what was known of this "Battle of Florence" in 1906. He tells me there is no priest at Florence now and there never was one there. The hamlet was an outmission as it still is. There was no tall lean priest in that entire countryside in 1906 or near that date, with an Austrian or any other accent.

The writer wished to sell her copy to the Post, and in her commercial zeal she baited her hook with this artificial Papist fly, and the Post editor swallowed the hook. The amazing phase of this affair is not that the editor was careless of several things, the reputation of the Post among them, but that the shovel hatted "Romish" vulture who "teetered," whatever that is, had an Austrian accent. What is an Austrian accent, anyhow? As one cannot take a trolley ride in Austria without running past ten languages a comprehensive and characteristic Austrian accent must be the voice of an opera chorus.

When the lady was putting that vulture into the black robe and covering the bone finial of his natural hatrack with a shovel in felt why did she not give him an accent as real as her own simple charm? An accent, say, from the County Antrim or Boston, instead of a speech which is necessarily as unconvincing as roast possum at a banquet in Moy Mell? When one is trying to play Tom Watson at the expense of the "Papishers" it is better to make the yarn plausible or you may be accused of cheap bigotry. The Post has always been decent, and it is difficult to understand how this vulgarity slipped in.

Philadelphia. AUSTIN O'MALLEY.

The New York "Tribune"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I was much interested in the communication of Michael Williams in your issue of January 26, regarding the unfairness of the Tribune toward Catholics. Papers of that class are certainly not entitled to Catholic money, either for advertisements or subscriptions, and it would not show much loyalty to either Church or God to contribute to the support of such sheets. I have cut off my subscription to the Fresno Republican for a similar cause, and if all Catholics would do likewise they would soon get more justice and respect from the secular press in general. Long live Michael Williams, and may the Holy Spirit ever guide him in making his protests; and may the Holy Spirit also guide the rest of us in supporting the Catholic press, and aiding in the spread and defense of truth.

The "New Age" and the Church

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The Supreme Council of the Scottish Rite Freemasons for the Southern Jurisdiction in the United States has as its official organ a monthly called the New Age Magazine. In every issue that publication shows hostility to the Catholic Church. In the January number, for instance, the first article, by John Leisk Tait, finds the cause of the present war in the philosophy of Germany's teachers, especially in the works of Nietzsche. It expects "the triumph of democracy," which it interprets as "the principles of Freemasonry applied to government." But it warns its readers that efforts will be made "beyond the Rhine" to save the Germanic philosophy from extinction. "Let Freemasons," it says, "beware of the sinister machinations of the mother of religio-political intrigue, whose eyes are already staring in anticipation of her own death struggle with Masonic principles," etc.

The second editorial begins with this sentence:

"All good Americans, particularly Masons, while they do all they can to circumvent and overcome our Teutonic enemies, should not for a moment lose sight of the doings and machinations of our ancient enemy, the Roman Catholic hierarchy, which, in the name of religion, is laboring mightily to enslave the world." Rome is aiming to put all mankind under its feet "by force"; it denies to all men the right to think for themselves; the Pope's "will is to be obeyed in all things"; Pope Pius IX declared that "any education or instruction outside of that given by the Roman Catholic Church is 'damnable heresy;'" Catholic "priests and editors have repeatedly stated that our public schools are hotbeds of irreligion and sinks of moral obliquity." "We have all heard," continues this Masonic official organ, "of the remonstrance of the Pope against the law of conscription. That remonstrance was repeated in this country by prominent members of the Roman hierarchy," etc. "It is now believed," by the New Age, "that the Pope is responsible for all the peace overtures that have been made, and in many quarters it is insisted that he is responsible for the recent Italian losses," etc. "We long have believed him responsible for bringing on the war in the beginning, being convinced that his attempt to corral the Serbians and force them to adopt the Roman Catholic brand of religion, was the prime cause of the outbreak." "The Jesuits," concludes this Masonic article, "being the most persistent and unscrupulous supporters of ecclesiastical autocracy, and being also from the very nature of their obligations and objects, unfit for citizenship in a free country, should not be permitted to have domicile, or even temporary residence in this or any other free country."

In another editorial on "The Pan-American Mass," the New Age declares that it was an insult, slur or slander on the part of Bishop Russell to say, in his sermon, that the reason Catholics have furnished twice as many soldiers as we should have done in proportion to our numbers is that the Catholic young men were better able to pass the physical test, they were freer from those diseases that destroy virility. The New Age grows furious over this fact, a fact that is susceptible of demonstration from the doctors' records, and it calls to mind, on the authority of one Oswandel, whoever he was, that in the war with Mexico there was a mythical St. Patrick's battalion, made up of deserters from the United States Army, who fought against the American forces at San Pablo. As to the Civil War, on the authority of one Rev. I. J. Lansing, the New Age makes the lying announcement that "it is a matter of record in the War and other Departments at Washington that only nine per cent of the Irish population enlisted in the Union Army," and that soon after Pope Pius IX answered a letter sent to him by Jefferson Davis, "seventy-one per cent of the Irish, or 102,839 out of a total of 144,221, deserted." The New Age states also that the Pope "recognized the Confederacy." It goes on to allege that "of the five per cent of native Americans noted as deserters, forty-five per cent of them were Roman Catholics." The New Age concludes its fabrications with an alleged quotation from Abraham Lincoln that he had the proof that Archbishop Hughes was "the very man who advised the Pope to recognize the legitimacy of the Southern Confederacy and put the weight of his tiara against us in favor of our enemies. Such is the perfidy of the Jesuits." Of course Abraham Lincoln never made any such statement.

Do sincere American Freemasons approve of this campaign of calumny against the Catholic Church? Does Masonry need lies to bolster up its cause? Does Masonry benefit by the services of a yellow magazine that is on a par with the unspeakable Menace and the foul Jeffersonian? Are these the principles of Masonry in action?

The Tuscania

WHAT once was the Tuscania is now a little wreckage, tossed on the rolling waters of the northern seas. The bodies of the brave men who left their homes, their loved ones, and their all, to hazard their lives for our country, now mingle with the dust of Ireland, or hear the endless requiem of the deep, while their souls, as we trust and fervently pray, are at peace in God. We have paid the first toll that war exacts, and it is bitter. We are in His hands, and so we know that if we are faithful to our great trust, He will deal with us in justice and in love, and all will be well. But even as the Son of God had His Gethsemani, and cried aloud in His awful loneliness on the Hill of Golgotha, so in the days to come, until in His mercy this fearful scourge of war is lifted, the hours may be long, and often filled with nameless dread.

But there is no fear, no craven yielding throughout this great country of ours. The disaster that has come upon us is a new and thrilling call to arms that will assuredly be answered to the confounding of the enemy. We are proud of our men who, with death in their eyes, answered the last summons, as Americans should, without fear, without regret, save that they had "but one life to give to their country." And by the memory of these dead, whose mutilated bodies now rest unknown beneath the waters or the lonely sods of Ireland, whom at the last great assize God shall call forth from the dust or the unfathomed depths of the seas, we pledge ourselves that we shall not rest until that misguided autocracy, that vaunting breaker of oaths and of plighted faith, that cold and calculating murderer of women and of helpless children, that conscienceless embodiment of fearfulness, wreaking its iniquity upon appealing and unprotected womanhood, that appalling menace to peace among nations and to common morality, is removed utterly from the face of the earth.

They have gone down to the sea in ships, and now they rest. And as of old the Saviour bade His Apostle come to Him upon the waves, so may it console all hearts grief-stricken to trust that as these gallant Americans went down untimely into the deep, the voice of Our Blessed Lord was in their ears, bidding them come to Him across the troubled waters. For they had the greater love, the love that steeled them to face death for their fellows, the love that appeals to the Heart of Christ who gave all that His people might live. They who have lost their lives, shall find them, in the grateful memory of a nation, in the Kingdom of our Father where there are many mansions.

Thrift

ON many counts Diogenes, as school-books tell us, failed to measure up to the definition of a good neighbor. For one count, he was too cynical, a dog-in-the-manger person, with a bite as well as a bark, and while history connects his name with a tub, tradition avers that he did not use it very frequently for the purpose to which tubs are ordinarily put. Living in it, he really could not, unless he were, in a manner, amphibious. Nevertheless, Diogenes was not without the virtues of his many defects. Although he lived in a mere tub, of modest design, if unusual dimensions, he was not consumed with envy because some of his fellows inhabited mansions. In fact, he scorned opulence, and very probably his food and raiment were, by choice, of a simple quality. Being set in his ways, it is reasonable to conclude that Diogenes, had a stroke of fortune deprived him of his tub, giving him in lieu thereof lands and a palace, would have retained his thrifty habits. He did not possess many of this world's goods, but, thrifty soul that he was, contented himself with conserving what he had.

Mr. Micawber is authority for the philosophy that a penny saved beyond one's income, spells happiness, and a penny squandered beyond it, is the beginning of ultimate ruin. As one acquainted with the slings of fortune, Micawber may be received with respect. Perhaps some of the curtailments made necessary by war, will teach us how many things there are that we do not need. Valuable for the country's future economic prosperity, the lesson will not be without its worth in the higher life of the soul. For the more one disentangles himself from the things of time, the fitter is he for the Kingdom of God.

The Patriotic Rabbi

A JEWISH rabbi with an unmistakably German name recently took occasion during a public address delivered at Clark University, Worcester, to make once more the familiar comparison between Kaiserism and Catholicism, and he then subjected to a searching analysis the "average Catholic individuality," as far as it has come under his observation, and triumphantly reached the following conclusion:

The average Catholic individual is made to merge his individuality and his normal human desire for self-expression with the dignity of that church. And see what becomes of the average Catholic individuality. To be sure, we find intellect and spirit, culture and moral dignity and beauty among Catholics, but the average Catholic is well—he is almost the despair of anyone who wants to believe in the future of the human race—unthinking, hostile, bigoted, antagonistic, combative, super-sensitive, sudden and quick in quarrel, utterly impatient of criticism. How dare anyone touch the church? You cannot criticize, you cannot say a word which seems antagonistic to the hierarchy without offending him and making a mortal enemy of him. He must serve his master and his master is the church.

How far the patriotic authorities of Clark University, under whose auspices the rabbi's lecture seems to have been given, indorse his unprovoked attack on the Catholics of the land we cannot say. However that may be, all sensible men will no doubt agree that at a time like the present, when the country is at war, and when union and cooperation among all Americans, whatever their religion or ancestry may be, are so necessary, remarks like those quoted above do not appear to be prompted by the highest spirit of patriotism. Moreover, when it is recalled that forty per cent of the men now in our training camps or at the front are actually made up of these "unthinking, hostile, bigoted, antagonistic, combative, super-sensitive" Catholics, the rabbi's ill-natured strictures become highly diverting, and the reader's amusement will no doubt increase when he reflects that the lamentable vices which the keen-eyed rabbi detects in "the average Catholic individual" are the very ones that some caustic critics say they discern in the modern son of Israel.

The Pope and the King

THE answer which King Albert of Belgium sent in the name of his Government to the Holy Father in reply to the Papal peace-note of last August is worthy of a great Catholic ruler. It breathes sentiments of the deepest piety and the most filial reverence to the Vicar of Christ. It is simple, manly, direct, just what we have learned to expect from the chivalrous soldier-king who would not sell his honor and his soul for a proffered bribe. It does honor to the King. It does justice to the Holy Father. In this historic document outlining the terms on which Belgium is willing to make peace, the King with the candor and sincerity of a heroic monarch vindicates his own conduct and that of his unfortunate country in the war so cruelly and treacherously thrust upon them. Like a loving son, he also champions the outraged Pope's cause and openly repudiates the slanders and the calumnies brought against him. That brave action, those noble words will go straight to the heart of every Catholic, they will appeal to the sense of justice of every fair-minded man.

"The Pope and the Papacy have failed in a great moral duty. They did not speak out against the wrongs and injustice done to Belgium. They left her alone in her sorrow and tragedy. They did not protest against the invasion of her territory by the enemy and the outrages committed by the invader." Such were the odious and untrue charges made in certain English journals, especially in those journals which had the effrontery to make the Holy Father responsible for the recent disasters in the Italian army. These irresponsible purveyors of calumny were either sadly misinformed or led by wilful malice.

If any one is entitled to speak with authority of the dealings of the Pope with Belgium, it must surely be the King and the Government of the unfortunate country. What do they say? In plain, simple but unmistakable words they desire to express their lively and profound gratitude for the particular interest the Holy Father manifested in the Belgian nation, of which the Papal peace-note of last August was a striking proof. The answer of the Government of King Albert recognizes that the Pope in his historic document stood up for the rights and the immunities of an independent Belgium. He recognized, says the note, that one of the conditions of peace was the total evacuation of Belgium by the invaders, the re-establishment of her full independence and her right to reparation for damages and the costs of war. The Belgian note also states that the Pope had in his consistorial allocution of January 22, 1915, protested against all injustice, and that later he had given the Belgian Government the assurance that in doing so it was the invasion of Belgium which he had directly in view.

Nothing can be clearer than this statement of the case by the Government of King Albert. Belgium has been the innocent victim of an odious aggression. The victim now openly vindicates the conduct of one who is falsely charged with having betrayed her in her hour of need. The affirmation is as solemn and as formal as nations can make it. It is found in an official document. It bears the signature of one of the bravest of men, of one of the kingliest of monarchs that ever sat upon a throne.

In spite of that solemn declaration, the calumny against the Holy Father will not die an easy death. It will have a long lease of life. It will be dragged out by unscrupulous pamphleteers when they want a sophism to prop up their charge that the Papacy has been false to its duties and abandoned the innocent for fear of losing the good graces of the unjust but powerful aggressor. A great King like Albert, the Lion of Flanders, a great Cardinal like Mercier of Louvain, a whole Government which with a chivalrous loyalty has remained faithful through four years of sorrow and misery to their exiled sovereign, solemnly, officially deny the charge. We can rely on their words. Impartial history will accept their verdict.

The Nemesis of Naturalism

LOOKING out sadly on a world in which men are now seeking "in all quarters of the globe to multiply pain beyond all recorded precedent," Professor

Stuart P. Sherman has been trying to find a satisfactory explanation of the phenomenon and has reached the conclusion that the progressive cult of that naturalism in art, literature and life, which has been the most striking characteristic of the post-Victorian epoch, has brought the civilized world to its present desperate plight. In the introduction to his admirable critical work, "On Contemporary Literature," Professor Sherman says that he has learned from Dante that contemporary thought, like the great Tuscan poet's "Empress of Many Tongues," "has made lust and law alike in her decree, to take away the blame she had incurred." He continues:

> It [the foregoing result] is the logical conclusion of repudiating all standards, teaching one's conscience to trot in the rut of events and making one's truth as he needs it. . . . The modern savage . . . "blasphemes the Divine power" by identifying its dictates with his appetites, so that no check of religious superstition or of reasoned reverence remains in his consciousness to oppose the indefinite expansion of his "self-love." . . . The great task of twentieth-century thinkers is . . . somehow to break the spell of those magically seductive cries: "Follow Nature," "Trust your instincts," "Back to Nature." We have trusted our instincts long enough to sound the depths of their treacherousness. We have followed nature to the last ditch and ditchwater. In these days when the educator, returning from observation of the dog-kennel with a treatise on animal behavior, thinks he has a real clue to the education of children; when the criminologist, with a handful of cranial measurements, imagines that he has solved the problem of evil; when the clergyman discovers the ethics of the spirit, by meditating on the phagocytes in the blood; when the novelist, returning from the zoological gardens wishes to revise the relations of the sexes so as to satisfy the average man's natural craving for three wives; when the statesman, after due reflection on "the survival of the fittest" feels justified in devouring his neighbors—in the presence of all these appeals to nature we may wisely welcome any indication of a counter-revolution.

Every thoughtful observer of present-day tendencies must own that the foregoing indictment of the age is just and that the cause assigned for the world's condition today is the true one. A glance through the pages of the average Sunday paper or of a "popular" magazine will show discerning readers that Professor Sherman is right. In our own land, at least up to a year ago, for America's entrance into the war has sobered us a little, many of the novels that "everybody read" and numerous reviewers praised for their "sincerity" and "artistry" were nothing better than shameless tracts for the propagation of naturalism, for these authors, as a rule, considered vice and virtue merely a matter of heredity and environment, or the results of chemical and physical reactions. The rapid perusal of a New York paper's list of amusements will also show what sort of theatrical or moving-picture entertainments is now patronized best, and the data thus gathered will strengthen the proof of Professor Sherman's thesis. As for those who would see what the cult of naturalism has done to the diplomatic and military caste of Germany, they need but recall the history of Belgium's invasion and then behold the present state of that hapless country. A world which turns away from God and flouts His eternal laws in order to abandon itself to the cult of "Nature," and to obey blindly its "instincts," ends by shamelessly adopting pagan principles in statecraft and the ethics of the jungle in the conduct of life. That is the Nemesis of naturalism.

Avoid Using Enemy Language!

"DO not use enemy language! 'Adieu' is French; say instead: 'Auf ein recht herziges, frohes, baldiges Wiedersehen!'" (Here's for a very hearty, cheerful and speedy reunion!) is the notice an "Exchange Officer" avers he read in a German hospital. However patriotic this new form of leave-taking may be, it can hardly be said to shorten or lessen appreciably the sorrow of parting. What a vast deal of foolish intolerance like that indicated in the above quotation has been showing itself in all the belligerent countries, our own included, since the present conflict began. Just because one nation happens to be at war with another, it is childish to forbid the use of "enemy language." Once the principle is drastically applied to practical life, what a multitude of ridiculous consequences follow. It is by no means enough to have ceased teaching German in our schools, as has been done in many cities, for patriotic consistency demands that like those in charge of that German hospital we should absolutely avoid the use of every word that comes to us from beyond the Rhine. Such terms for example as lager and delicatessen no true American should so much as whisper. But if he is so deplorably lacking in loyalty as to give the enemy aid and comfort by actually buying and consuming the very articles those treasonable words name, a detention camp is clearly the place for him. As for steins, dachshunds and kindergartens, stanch patriots will of course shun like the plague both the word and thing.

Extremists will no doubt maintain that strict consistency likewise demands our abstention from the use of all words in the language that are of Anglo-Saxon origin, for it must be owned that the early Germanic invaders of England gave Shakespeare sixty per cent of the words he wrote, and even now things have come to such a sad pass that we can scarcely speak without thereby acknowledging what we owe to the Angles and the Saxons. But after all even patriotism has its limits, and the mere fact that shoulder to shoulder with Frenchmen and Italians we are fighting the Germans hardly requires us to Latinize our language completely. No one should be surprised, however, if consistent loyalty to his country should make many an American not only conscientiously avoid dancing the German cotillion, playing the German flute, singing a German sixth, reading German text, writing German script, using a German hone, sewing the German stitch, eating German rice, and catching German measles, but even to resist the temptation to hoard up till the war is over so useful and valuable a metal as German silver.

Literature

FATHER HOPKINS' POETRY

"THE poet preaches God though his song may seem to the deaf, whose ears are stopped with avarice, no song. No decent human being can read a true poem without a lifting of his soul, and that at its best is prayer." True poems are none too numerous today, and still the truly exquisite poetry of Gerald Hopkins is to the world of letters practically an unknown book—the more loss to that fickle assemblage, for poet indeed he was whose lips had been purified by the fire of true poetry, and whose soul was burning with an ardent faith. He was both a poet and a priest, and in him were joined the perfections of both characters. "A poet who when he shall come into his just inheritance of human praise may well be known as the Crashaw of the Oxford movement. Very early the imperious obediences of a religious life took him from a purely literary career, and early, too, came the great Silencer:"

> Nay, God be praised, who fixed thy task for thee!
> Austere, ecstatic craftsman, set apart
> From all who traffic in Apollo's mart,
> On thy phraséd paten shall the Splendor be!

Gerald Stanley Hopkins was born at Stratford, near London, July 28, 1844, a year which marked the high-water stage of the Oxford tide towards Rome. While a student at Balliol College, Oxford, he won a valuable prize in poetic competition. There also it was Hopkins' good fortune to come under the strong influence of that gifted scholar and cultured gentleman, Walter Pater; an influence which is apparent in the exquisite care and delicacy with which each little mosaic of his poetry is finished off. During these undergraduate days at Oxford the "Kindly Light" of Divine grace was leading Hopkins Romeward towards that true peace for which he was yearning. For a year or so after he entered the Church, in 1866, he acted as an assistant to Newman on the staff of the Oratory School. During these days, joyous beyond telling, for both were living again the romance of religion, they formed a friendship "soul to soul and heart to heart" that surely endures beyond the grave. But the convert craved something higher. He prayed:

> Elected Silence, sing to me
> And beat upon my whorléd ear;
> Pipe me to pastures still, and be
> The music that I care to hear.

And when in the "elected silence" of retreat the Divine call was made manifest to him, Hopkins joined the Society of Jesus, on the feast of Our Lady's Nativity, 1868, at Roehampton. Nine years later

> "On his lips the blood for a people shed
> With hands annealed for the sacred rite," he stood at the altar "a priest forever."

For fully ten years after he joined Loyola's sons he did not write a single poem, but the inspiration and "his gift divine could not be hidden" and so he needs must break into song at last. Although he numbered among his friends such litterateurs as Robert Bridges, the Poet Laureate, Walter Pater and Coventry Patmore, still few outside these intimates ever saw his poems; indeed he had no desire to see his verses published.

True Catholic poet that he was, Father Hopkins could only sing of the things nearest his heart so his subjects are nearly all religious. Still he did not need to look beyond his own soul for wealth of subjects; the opulence was within himself. First of all he was a priest "to whom souls were always more than song," and the very ardor of his spirit was burning to express itself:

> "For Song, one saith is but a human heart > Speaking aloud, undisciplined and free."

Therein is the secret of his marvelous spontaneity; he sang only of what was in his soul. His poems are but the natural outpourings of a heart overflowing with Divine love. And from this too sprang that pre-eminent characteristic of Hopkins, his startling imagery. He saw things only as the true poet can. His imagination was peculiarly quick and original. Throughout his works we find few figures that are not new, for "If like other poets he had to live on air he was resolved at least to avoid the breath of the multitude." His figures are curious, but none the less true, as when he calls the winter's starry sky "the dim woods quick with diamonds" or "gray lawns cold where quaking gold dew lies," or

> "The world is charged with the grandeur of God
> It will flame out like shining from foil shook."

Again in that beautiful piece which is both a poem and a meditation, "The Habit of Perfection," he thus pictures the hands that touch the Tabernacle

> O feel-of-primrose hands, O feet
> That want the yield of plushy sward
> But you shall walk the golden street
> And you unhouse and house the Lord.

Nor are these isolated instances of Father Hopkins' curiosa felicitas, rather they are examples of enchanting images that are beautifully profuse. His imagery is grand and rich, and quite inimitable because it is so original: for "tiptoe on the little hill of our mortal life he had seen the white presences upon the peaks, and heard the voices of the Eternal God." Therefore in all his works "he is seen to be passionately human and so impersonally detached from humanity."

> Thee, God, I come from, to Thee I go;
> All day long I like fountain flow
> From Thy hand out, swayed about
> Mote-like in thy mighty glow.

Nature, the handmaid of God, had early attracted him, but his love of nature was not Wordsworthian nor yet Shelleian. His was even a more rapturous love for "Nature is God's daughter who stretches her hand only to her Father's friends." Hence one can know her only in proportion as he is close to the Heart of God, and Gerald Hopkins had consecrated his all to God. Hence he was a true nature poet like Francis of Assisi. Into his musical ear nature had whispered her sweetest harmonies, and poet as he was he was powerless to check the outbursts of his "gift divine." Here is one of his Nature-pictures:

> Nothing is so beautiful as Spring—
> When weeds, in wheels, shoot long and lovely and lush:
> Thrush's eggs look little low heavens, and thrush
> Through the echoing timber does so rinse and ring
> The ear, it strikes like lightnings to hear him sing;
> The glassy pear-tree leaves and blooms, they brush
> The descending blue; that blue is all in a rush
> With richness; the racing lambs, too, have their fling.

From nature his thoughts ascended to nature's God and everything in his hands served only to draw hearts closer to that fount of grace. His heart was ever united with that great Heart and so he was loved by all who came in contact with him as a man of a gentle, sympathetic character. Thus his poet friend, Robert Bridges, says "he possessed humor, great personal charm, and the most attractive virtues of a tender and sympathetic nature." Thus it is that his poems mirror the personality of the poet-priest: his charm, his delicate grace, but above all his originality. His poems are each "an intricate mosaic in words." Yet this very originality led him into a fault of which Francis Thompson speaks: "The habit of always taking the best words too easily becomes the habit of taking the most ornate word, the word most removed from ordinary speech." His excessive fondness for unusual words caused a certain obscurity to creep into his later poems. Mr. Joyce Kilmer aptly characterizes Father Hopkins' verse when he compares the figures to fragrant blossoms: "The roses are there of right—all of them. They are, it may be said, necessary roses. The red and the white of their petals come from the blood and tears that nourished their roots."

Diary of a French Army Chaplain. By Abbé FÉLIX KLEIN, American Hospital, Neuilly, Paris. Translated from "La Guerre Vue d'une Ambulance" by M. HARRIET M. CAPES. Chicago: A. C. McClurg & Co. $1.25.

To Arms! (La Veillée des Armes). An impression of the spirit of France. Authorized translation from the French of MARCELLE TINAYRE by LUCY H. HUMPHREY. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co. $1.50.

These two books will give the reader an excellent idea of the fine spirit with which France answered the call to arms. On August 1, 1914, days after the country mobilized, the [illegible] began to record the noteworthy things he saw, [illegible] he subsequently became chaplain to the Auxiliary Hospital at Neuilly, he seldom lacked interesting material for his note book. He was particularly struck by the spirit of charity and brotherhood that filled the hearts of all [illegible] when war was declared. "While the Government [illegible] decrees against the Congregations, Sisters [illegible] the direction of the German frontier and [illegible] pass those of Spain, Italy and Belgium to present themselves at the recruiting offices": the "monks we needed" exclaimed Clemenceau. The author attests that the performance of religious duties soon became a normal action [illegible] soldiers who refused his priestly [illegible] as a rare exception," and that almost [illegible] at which he assisted was by faith and hope [illegible] and holy. "Tell my dear wife I died as a good [illegible] and that I leave my blessing for the children"; "Let [illegible] that I ended life like a good patriot and a good [illegible]" were the messages with which the chaplain could [illegible] a soldier's bereaved relatives.

The time covered by the action of "To Arms!" is only forty-eight hours, from the morning of July 31, 1914, to that of [illegible] and the scene is Paris. The author, with consummate literary skill, describes so vividly the wonderful change that took place in the capital's mental attitude when the order [illegible] was posted up that the reader seems to have right [illegible] eyes everything that occurs. The central figures in the book are François Davesnes, an aviation engineer, and his beautiful young wife, Simone. Around them move their apartment-house neighbors, their charming friends, the Raynauds, and the noble, old-fashioned Catholic, Bertrand de Gardave. Mlle. Tinayre gives particularly striking pictures of what the call to arms meant to the women of France, who watched their husbands, sons or lovers entrain for the front, never perhaps to return. The chapters telling of the last hours François and Simone passed together could hardly be improved, and the scenes in the streets when the mobilization orders were published are described by a master hand. It is highly probable that "To Arms!" will be one of the enduring books which the war has produced.

Ireland in the Last Fifty Years. By ERNEST WALKER. New York: The Oxford University Press. $0.60.

Theories and theorems in a scientific treatise, for instance in geometry, are identical, whether they are set down by an American or an Englishman, by a Protestant or a Mohammedan; methods of stating the proposition may differ, but not the proposition, either in what it postulates or in its conclusions. Similarly, a historical record, even a survey of Irish years, should be as impartially written. Mr. Ernest Walker has done this in his careful account of Ireland's past fifty years. It is a clear statement, with every effort to record facts in an unbiased manner, and chronicle a half-century of a history which was intense in the making, and vibrant with present-day consequences and far-reaching effects upon the morrow. Mr. Walker's little book is not a philosophy of those vital issues, though here and there in a brief way he takes into account some of these political and national movements and examines them in the philosopher's light of cause and effect. But he tries to keep clear of sentimentalities, whether from the Irish, or what is more frequent, from the English side. The Irish question, he calmly sees, is not of today or yesterday; it is 750 years of age. There are explanations of it, but they fail to explain. Who has not observed the ridiculous attempts of a whole English library in their sleight-of-hand solutions of the problem?

Mr. Walker gives a passing glance to some of them: to Horace Plunkett's, which holds that the Irish question is the problem of Disraeli's, national existence, chiefly an agricultural existence; to his flippant: "One says it is a physical question: another a spiritual. Now it is the absence of the aristocracy; and now the absence of railways. It is the Pope one day and potatoes the next"; or Disraeli's own definition: "A dense population in extreme distress inhabit an island where there is an established church which is not their church, and a territorial aristocracy, the richest of whom live in a distant capital. Thus they have a starving population, and absentee aristocracy, an alien church, and in addition the weakest executive in the world." Explanatory comment such as this could be multiplied ad infinitum. Mr. Walker acknowledges the large grounds for complaint against English misrule; he constantly repeats his acknowledgment. Yet in the face of it all, he claims that Ireland will consult her best interests by remaining in the great British Commonwealth, that within it there is ample scope for the development of Irish nationalism. He concludes:

> Whatever the sins of the British Commonwealth, exclusive nationalism is not one of these sins. . . . There is room for Sinn Fein in the Commonwealth, room and enough to spare, if Sinn Fein will only look around with open eyes. Ourselves, not "alone" but in a living union with other free communities, a union that leaves us still ourselves, and makes us more ourselves, because it makes us richer alike in the things of the body and in the things of the spirit, this is the true motto of Ireland, as it is the true motto of every part of our Commonwealth.

A splendid assertion in what it promises; but the promise is as old as the question, and still unfulfilled. There is the rub; for English statesmanship, at its best, has endeavored to patch up only the broken and bleeding parts of Ireland's body, and has disregarded the more imperative demands of its soul. The Irish question has its roots not merely in the body, it is not merely an agrarian, a social, or a political problem. It has its roots far beyond the past fifty years of Irish history; it goes back beyond the middle of the sixteenth century, when, as Alice Stopford Green pithily says at the conclusion of one of her masterly studies, "Henceforth England had to deal with the soul of the people in Ireland."

College of Mount St. Vincent, a Famous Convent School. By MARION J. BRUNOWE. A New Edition with Supplementary Chapters by ANNA C. BROWNE. New York: P. J. Kenedy & Sons. $1.00.

A century has elapsed since Sister Rose White and her two companions arrived in New York, after a tiresome journey from Emmitsburg, Maryland, to establish a mission of the Sisters of Charity of St. Vincent de Paul in the native city of the founder of their Institute. Merely to outline the achievements of this religious community in the fields of charity and education since that date would require a much larger space than that of the modest volume that attractively sets forth the progress of a famous convent-school from an humble beginning on East Broadway, in 1830, to its final development into a widely known college. This evolution has kept pace with the social and material growth of New York, and has synchronized with the local Catholic participation in this activity. Hundreds of women who have been trained within the walls of this school have become the mothers and guides of several generations. The Sisters of Charity, while not ignoring what is profitable and practical in new educational ideals, have held fast to the good old fundamentals. Their pupils prove the wisdom of this by their high averages of real scholarship. Two of them contribute the sympathetic story that details the success of their alma mater in the pages of this little book, which is well illustrated. T. F. M.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

"Fifty Years in Yorkville or Annals of the Parish of St. Ignatius Loyola and St. Lawrence O'Toole" (Parish House, 53 East Eighty-Third Street, New York, $1.00), by Father Patrick J. Dooley, S. J., is a very readable history of "Eighty-Fourth Street Parish," from 1851, when it was organized by the Rev. Eugene O'Reilly, until 1916, when the fiftieth anniversary of its administration by the Jesuit Fathers was appropriately celebrated. There are sketches of all the priests and superiors who have helped to make the parish what it is today, good descriptions are given of the church's artistic beauties, and adequate accounts of all the parish's societies and institutions. The volume ends with a roster of the priestly and religious vocations St. Ignatius Church has nourished, and with the program of the Jubilee celebration. Though "Fifty Years in Yorkville" is, of course, to a large extent only of local interest, the book will prove of permanent value to the student of American Catholic church history and might well serve as a model for the many similar works which should be written. The volume is fully illustrated.

"The England of Shakespeare" (Dutton, $2.00), by P. H. Ditchfield will be a source of pleasure and information to many, although it may not be fully appreciated by the reading public, until the reaction, which must follow the war, will have turned men's minds with renewed vigor to literary pursuits. Canon Ditchfield's book bears the marks of his painstaking work in collecting, searching, comparing, and testing documents. But readers may not always agree with his conclusions or his principles, as, for instance, when he speaks of "Good Queen Bess," who seems to win his admiration. The purpose of the book is to give the true background for Shakespeare, which of necessity was reflected in his writings, and this end has been well attained, for the author describes the language, manners, dress, sports, taverns, court, method of travel and the college, rural and city life of the times. If the author had written with a more lively appreciation of humorous incidents, the lecture-tone atmosphere prevalent in many parts of the book would be to a great extent neutralized.

Mariano J. Lorente has translated from the Spanish of Cervantes, the picturesque story of what befell "Rinconete and Cortadillo" (Four Seas Co., Boston, $1.50), two light-hearted young rogues, the first a card-sharper and the second a pickpocket who are made members of a band of thieves. Various characters belonging to the underworld of Seville in the seventeenth century, are introduced, and they all affect, often with amusing results, the stilted and courteous language of grandees. The people Cervantes describes are rich in faith but poor in charity. Two women of the street, for example, burn candles to the Saints, and an old granny with a basket of stolen clothes in her house, goes to church to pray God "to guard and keep us in our perilous profession, without any surprises by the police." The translation seems to be a good one.——James Lane Allen's "The Kentucky Warbler" (Doubleday, $1.25), has a promising opening, but soon peters out. It is the tale of a boy whose quest of a singing bird makes him a better Kentuckian. The book is a far cry from the author's earlier volumes.——Mary Dillon's "Comrades" (Century, $1.40), is a story with the present war as a setting and with the romance of an English lord and an American maiden as its theme. Spies are active, the hero wins distinction at the battle of Mons, and sails in the Lusitania but is among the rescued. The story is free from bitterness, and even its German characters are human.

The Macmillan Company will publish, among its spring books, "The High Romance," by Michael Williams, an author whose work is familiar to readers of AMERICA. The book is described as a "spiritual autobiography" with the frankly personal story of its author's adventures and experiences as a Socialist and radical newspaper man and magazine-writer in many parts of the United States, together with unusual and remarkable investigations of occultism, culminating in his conversion to the Catholic Church. "The High Romance" is a repudiation of paganism in art, and of State-worship in religion, and like the work of Huysmans, Claudel, Benson, Chesterton, declares that the total disentegration of civilization can only be averted by Catholicism. Other books of interest to Catholics, lately published or soon to appear abroad, are Cardinal Mercier's "Manual of Modern Scholastic Philosophy," Vol. 2, which treats of natural theology, logic, ethics and the history of philosophy; A. M. d'Herbigny's biography of "Vladimir Soloviev, a Russian Newman"; "Major William Redmond," by Mgr. Arthur Ryan, and "The Last Lectures of Wilfrid Ward," edited by his widow and daughter. Longmans will publish this month Cardinal Farley's biography of Cardinal McCloskey; Benziger, a new book by John Ayscough; Moffat, Yard, a life of "Charles Carroll of Carrollton," by Lewis A. Leonard, and Kenedy will bring out Father Papi's "Religious Profession" and Mr. Mitchell's translation of "The Origins of Contemporary Psychology," by Cardinal Mercier.

The last stanzas in "The Poems of Frank Dempster Sherman," who died in the fall of 1916, are entitled "The Immortal Flower," and run thus:

Lord, in whose hands I am but dust,
  Make Thou of me a vessel whole,
  Worthy to guard the precious soul,
Thou givest me in trust.

Keep me unmarred by strife and sin
  Throughout my little span of years;
  Let joy's bright sun and sorrow's tears
Keep pure the flower therein.

Grant if Thou wilt mine eyes to see
  It grow to beauty at Thy feet—
  To find at last the blossoms sweet
Of immortality.

And when this body that is mine—
  This mortal shape which Thou hast made—
  Is dust and with the earth-dust laid,
Lord, take the flower for thine.

EDUCATION

THE WAR AND THE SCHOOLS, II

THAT the schools of America are being braced by the war is beyond question. What they are losing in numbers and finances, they are more than making up in spirit, in increase of vigor, and in progress along the lines of character-construction. They are facing new problems and learning how to solve them; problems of service, of practicability, above all problems of spiritual development. In the matter of discipline alone, the gain to the schools has been enormous, and this is true of the secondary schools as well as of the higher institutions. Teachers and superintendents, professors and deans, in all sections of the country, unite in the verdict that never before in school or college were the problems of discipline so few and so easily solved. A new appreciation of discipline, a new amenability and readiness to obey, to make sacrifices, to work, have sprung up. As one educator has put it, "The students seem suddenly to have learned just exactly what they are in college for, and to have become filled with a determination to get it." Boys and men are attending to business as they never did before in the memory of living teachers. The incentive to work and earn after school hours, and on school holidays, so accentuated by the war, has given many boys a new and serious view of things. On the whole, the students in our schools and colleges may be said to be doing more work and better work since the war, and because of the war, than they ever did before.

More Work, Less Play

ALL this relates to the regular school duties. But in addition to their studies, the students of our schools and colleges are accomplishing a vast amount of actual war-work, besides achieving not a little in the solution of the problems of school maintenance. The war-work is mostly Red Cross work, of course. For instance, at one Catholic college, a woman's college, where an auxiliary Red Cross chapter has been established among the students, a total of 300 hours a week is now being given to work on surgical dressings and other hospital supplies. At Vassar, as a result of the shortage of gardeners and maids, the radical plan was adopted of having the students aid in the necessary work on the college grounds, besides helping with the housework, and in the dormitories. The effect on the young ladies can be imagined. It is decidedly a good effect. Indeed, it had its immediate result, for at once the social schedule of Vassar was reduced appreciably, both the junior and senior "proms" being done away with, and all the various clubs voting to cut their functions and expenses at every angle. But these things were not original with, nor peculiar to, Vassar. Such curtailments, and consequent gain, not only in finances, but in time, energy, and character-making, may be said to be common to all American schools during war-time.

Teaching Thrift

THE Liberty Bonds had a heavy sale in all schools, from the parochial and public schools, up to the colleges and universities; and the consequent obligation put upon students has had its own excellent effect in the teaching of both thrift and patriotism. At Tufts College, further to encourage this, it was announced that Liberty Bonds would be accepted in payment for tuition. As for the teaching of thrift, it has, by reason of the war, been given such an impetus through practical application as could not have been achieved by word of mouth in a hundred years. Even down to the detail of the too-full dinner-pail, the children of America are now learning in school, how to save and conserve, and how to do with simpler food than once was considered fit for the daily school-lunch. A teacher in one school recently found that some children had thrown away some sandwiches at the noon hour. She took the discarded bread, and exhibiting it in every room, gave the youngsters a practical talk on what that food was worth, and how much it was needed. Another tells how the tune has been changed in regard to the appearance of children coming to school in new or pretty clothes. Now the praise is for the neat darning or the home-made garment. Teachers of domestic science, of course, can accomplish veritable wonders along the lines of thrift and conservation.

The Gain in Patriotism

FINALLY, there is the immeasurable gain in patriotism, through all these agencies, and most directly through military training, which, with its inevitable fruitage of improved physical setting up, must be counted as one of the big assets of the war. Military training in the schools, let it be remarked, does not mean merely tactics and drill. It connotes a general development in physique, it means improved hygiene, better teeth, better breathing, better health, and a whole physical revolution in the youth of the land. Its introduction in the schools has likewise resulted in a remarkable broadening of the curriculum, so that now the cultural and the practical go hand in hand as never before. Young men are learning now that to serve and make sacrifices are the best things in life. They are, as one has expressed it, "finding the range"; and this fact could ask for no better demonstration than that which has recently come from a university in North Carolina, where the students have begun the publication of a journal, aptly called the Range Finder, devoted to the fostering of patriotism. That undergraduates all over the country are waking up to a feeling of interest in questions of broad public moment is undeniable. Never again, in this generation at least, will it be said that our college men, when quizzed, do not know the difference between a democracy and an autocracy!

ECONOMICS

The Drive for Free Trade

THE assurance that the United States will adopt a low-tariff policy, if not absolute free trade, is based on the fact that, if our financiers are to be paid, European goods must be imported in quantities forbidden by a protective tariff. We are told by a portion of the press that we must afford a market for the products of the Allies so that it may be convenient for them to pay us. And, one article of the recent terms of peace sent forth by the President was not too fearfully, and perhaps preparingly, interpreted as intimating the removal of trade barriers between nations as a means of preventing wars in the future.

The Socialists and capitalist internationalists join forces in the drive for world-markets. As England needed free trade to maintain her foreign trade, so does any nation having the same purpose. For we cannot sell to the nations of the world without being in a position to buy an equal amount of goods. Only by buying can we be paid for our sales. The proposition is not a paradox, but a reality.

It may appear strange that the immediate demands of Socialism are so much in harmony with the desires of its arch-enemy the capitalist. Yet, just at a time when the people have learned to buy bonds we find the followers of Marx preparing government ownership of the railroads, while the magnates do not seriously attempt to discourage them.

Tariff and Exchange

SO long as a tariff is protective, it matters not, as to profit, how high it is. There has to be sufficient competition in the home market to force efficiency, if the schedule is kept stable, and it is known it will be let alone. It is the reduction of the rate, or a threat to reduce it, that affords opportunity for unearned profits. For such action scares off capital that would otherwise enter the industry in competition. Professor Taussig, Chairman of the Tariff Board, will be a great influence in propelling the nation into free trade. His presentation of the tariff question is the most appealing: that a country should produce that which it can, to the best advantage, and exchange with other lands for the goods in the production of which they are more efficient.

If free trade meant the absolute freedom of exchange of goods at the cost of production in the respective countries, little could be said in support of it. But the Webb bill, recently signed, enables our merchants to combine to take advantage of the foreigner's necessities, just as others combine to get the most favorable price from us. Therein is one great difference between foreign trade and trade between the States; such combination as the Webb law permits, in foreign trade, is admittedly illegal in domestic business. But when such combination is permitted at all, it might as well be general, for the foreign price determines the domestic price. And even if the aim of such combination is to secure the market where the goods are most needed, the result is the same, for such a market pays the highest price, and this then becomes the price to our own people.

In considering the question of free trade, thought may be given to the Socialist theory, that all socially necessary labor is of equal value, or, at least, to a compromise of that theory, that all socially necessary labor may be equal, for example, to the production and distribution of coal at the present time. With universal compulsory education to the age of twenty-one, the young gentleman street-cleaner would get an equal, if not a greater, compensation than the chap in the counting-house, for he would be competent for either job.

A Single Tax Theory

THE single taxers, also, have a theory that has an important bearing on the free trade problem. They hold that the worker's wage is determined by the productivity of the land available to him. In that hypothesis, the fact that land is extremely productive a thousand miles away does not benefit the distant worker a particle. And it is a fact that the standard of living varies greatly in different sections of the United States, where no trade barriers exist. The efficiency of the cotton-mill operative in the East, and the intensity and confinement of his labor, compares with that of the Colorado miner, but the compensation of the factory worker is much less. Why? Because the miner gets the benefit of the productivity of the land available to him. Colorado could have mills as well as mines; New England is limited to mills. Even the wages of the union bricklayer in the West are higher than in the East, for the same reason. The people of the United States are the most prosperous of any, because our natural resources are unsurpassed by those of any other country. We can hardly claim that our prosperity is due to a superior class of labor, for the majority of toilers in our mines and factories have been immigrants. True, they become superior by reason of their opportunity to live better.

If it is true that the worker's wage is dependent solely on the productivity of labor applied to land available to him, his interests are not advanced by foreign trade. If foreign trade was to his benefit, he would be taking advantage of the foreigner: if he gets more, the other must get less. Is the single tax proposition true? Consider if the skilled labor of the Swiss is compensated on a scale at all comparable to similar labor in this country? Is the standard of living in England equal to that of our people in corresponding employments? Yet, the markets of the world have been England's, and the greatest resources of the earth are in her dominions, and she has free trade too.

The Ban Against Free Trade

AN English economist makes the strongest case against free trade. He says that England might as well produce all the wheat she requires, for the price she has to pay the foreigner, however low the cost of production abroad, is the price it costs to raise wheat in England. Is that true? Well, a great quantity of wheat is raised in England, despite free trade, and of course it cannot be sold at a higher price than foreign wheat. Why does not labor benefit by foreign trade? Because such trade is sought for its especial benefit to the capitalist. He is not obliged to give labor a better standard of living than it can secure in the territory in which it is located.

If the proposition is true that the land available determines the attainable standard of living, then the problem for the worker is to increase his labor efficiency. If in the land where they grew rank, bananas constituted the sole sustenance of the people, no compensation could be given. Yet the price the capitalist would charge the people of his own country for the bananas would be "the highest the traffic would bear," which price would tend to be that which would afford him the most advantageous profit. If the people of a tropical land acquired, or were educated to, a liking for whiskey and shirts, the price they would have to pay the foreign capitalist in their labor for such commodities would not be the cost price, plus the profit available in his home market, but the profit that could be secured to him through the desire of the savages for the articles, coupled with their inability to produce them. In the seductive free trade theory they should produce only bananas, and pay the price of their inefficiency for all other goods. If they acquired intelligence, and were permitted by the capitalist, they would learn to produce all their wants and have their bananas too.

Free Trade and the United States

HOW would the free trade theory apply to the United States? Admit we are able to beat the world in producing raw cotton and the finished product, and that the markets of the world are open for our oil, coal, steel and wheat. Consider the labor efficiency required for their production. Is it not, generally, the crudest, most laborious, seasonable, and most confining of all? The less of that type of labor required in this country the better. Let us have no more of it performed than is necessary for our own needs.

Again, the more of such products we sell abroad, the poorer we are in the natural wealth of our mines and land. We sell our wealth for the foreigner's skilled-labor value. The more he sold us the more skilled and valuable his unsold labor power would be, and he would have our wealth in addition; while we would tend to bankruptcy both in wealth and in skilled labor. But the capitalist would blossom to the greatest rotundity. He would be enabled to take advantage both of our labor inefficiency and the European's poverty of natural resources. His profits promise to be so enormous that the drive for free trade will very likely succeed. The only hope of escaping such a crime against the United States is in whatever uncontaminated strength lies in our manufacturers for the domestic market. However, too many are apt to grasp for the shadow which is their comparatively small investments abroad, through Government bond issues and other foreign loans, and lose the bone; and our industrial workers and artisans will hunger with them.

NOTE AND COMMENT

God's Hour in China

IN 1882 the mission of South Shantung in China was opened by the Fathers of the Divine Word with but 158 Christians. Today, we are told, there are 86,150 Catholics, 52,660 catechumens, one Vicar Apostolic, sixty-six European priests, seventeen native priests, ten Brothers and fifty-one Sisters in that same field. The number of adult baptisms for each year is 3,500 and an equal number of children receive the Sacrament of Regeneration. "China," says the little book-mark printed at Techny, Ill., "with its 400,000,000 inhabitants, is the largest and most important mission field in the world. If this great nation should become Catholic, it would be the greatest triumph of the Church since the beginning of Christianity." There are now 1,839,177 Catholic converts and 429,343 catechumens in the entire land of China, including Tibet, Formosa and Korea. The number of foreign missionaries is 1,539. To these must be added 831 native priests. This is a mere handful in the country's population, but a mustard seed which by the grace of God can grow into a mighty tree. All realize that the hour of conversion has struck in China. Are we prepared to avail ourselves now of our opportunity?

General Pershing's Plea for Army Chaplains

THE following important cablegram has been sent by General Pershing to the United States War Department. It is the most striking testimony that has yet been given to the significance of the chaplain in the camp and on the field. General Pershing's recommendation as to the number of chaplains, it is to be noted, coincides perfectly with the bill now in Congress calling for one chaplain for every 1,200 men.

> In the fulfilment of its duty to the nation much is expected of our army and nothing should be left undone that will help in keeping it in the highest state of efficiency. I believe the personnel of the army has never been equaled and the conduct has been excellent, but to overcome entirely the conditions found here requires fortitude born of great courage and lofty spiritual ideals. Counting myself responsible for the welfare of our men in every respect, it is my desire to surround them with the best influence possible. In the fulfilment of this solemn trust it seems wise to request the aid of the churches at home.
> To this end it is recommended that the number of chaplains in the army be increased for the war to an average of three per regiment with assimilated rank of major and captain in due proportion and that a number be assigned in order to be available for such detached duty as may be required. Men selected should be of the highest character with reputations well established as sensible, practical, active ministers or workers accustomed to dealing with young men. They should be in vigorous health as their services will be needed under most trying circumstances. Appointees should of course be subject to discharges for inefficiency like other officers of the National Army.
> It is my purpose to give the chaplain corps through these forces a definite and responsible status and to outline, direct and enlarge their work into cooperative and useful aid to the troops.

The request made by General Pershing is not merely for an increased number of chaplains, but for well equipped and experienced men who will be able to exercise a profound spiritual influence upon the soldiers under their charge. Our efforts in the interest of the chaplains' bill should be greatly stimulated by this document.

Catholics Enrolled in Army and Navy

SOME very interesting data concerning the part played by Catholics in every American war, and particularly in the present enrolment of American soldiers and sailors have been gathered by Condé B. Pallen. The following estimate of the number of Catholics in our army and navy is from a letter written September 28, 1917, by Paul R. Martin, director of the Knights of Columbus publicity department on war activities:

> Such reports as we have received would lead us to believe that the army must be forty per cent Catholic. The navy chaplains, who have done more statistical work of this kind than any one else, say that the United States navy today is sixty per cent Catholic. The regular army has been in the past as high as seventy-five per cent Catholic. This was owing to the fact that the great bulk of enlistments come from Catholic centers, such as New York, Illinois, California, and Massachusetts.

In full agreement with this is the statement made by the Rev. Louis J. O'Hern, official representative of the American hierarchy at Washington for the placement of Catholic chaplains. In an address on "The Chaplains and the Camps," he said:

> It is an actual fact that the ratio of Catholics in the volunteer army is far out of proportion with our population, which speaks well for our patriotism. Both the regular army and National Guard contain so many Catholics that I honestly believe forty per cent is not an overestimate.

The proportion of Catholics in the navy is claimed to be even higher. Thus the Rev. Thomas Regan, U. S. A., chaplain aboard the U. S. S. Minnesota, reports that out of 1,300 men 800 are Catholics, and out of 1,200 aboard the Von Steuben 900 are said to be Catholics. The following is the statement of Father O'Hern:

> In the Marine Corps, which is known as the most efficient body of fighting men in the world, there is supposed to be the highest average rate of Catholics in any branch of the service, namely, fifty per cent. I have no definite figures at my disposal, but I believe this estimate to be correct.

These figures plead eloquently for the need of additional chaplains in both army and navy.

Success of the Pure Food Law

THE results of ten years' enforcement of the Pure Food act of 1906 are reviewed in the annual report issued by the bureau of chemistry in the Department of Agriculture. The following are the salient points in the report:

> The act's chief contributions to the people's health have been its corrective effect on the drug and patent-medicine industry and its control of the trade in unclean milk and harmful foodstuffs. The report shows more than 6,000 prosecutions have been terminated in the courts, many thousands of factories inspected, and 750,000 shipments of domestic or imported foods and drugs examined. Interstate shipment of oysters from polluted waters practically has ceased and there has been a general improvement in the condition of all prepared foodstuffs. Adulteration and other prominent abuses prevailing prior to the enactment of the law have been minimized, the report continues, and there has been an encouraging development in the direction of factory sanitation and laboratory research.

Few laws, apparently, have been so far-reaching in their results and so beneficial to the nation, in a material way, as the Pure Food act.

A Hundred Years of Charity

ON February 2, 1918, St. Mary's Female Orphan Asylum of Baltimore celebrated the centenary of its devoted services to Church and society. During that period it has cared for some 3,290 girls. The labor and outlay implied in these figures are thus brought home by the writer of the beautiful souvenir volume:

> Saint Mary's Asylum takes children at six years of age and supports and educates them until they are fourteen. Thus practically all the children spend about eight years in the home. Multiplying the number of children by the eight years during which they have been cared for, the result is the great figure of 26,320. That is to say, the institution has compressed that many years of individual care and instruction into its century of only one hundred years.

It is particularly interesting to note that St. Mary's, starting as a free day-school, was established eleven years before the first public school was opened in Baltimore. It was then known as St. Mary's Free School of the Metropolitan Parish. On June 7, 1821, the Sisters of Charity from Emmitsburg, Md., came to take charge of the new home which at that time had been newly leased for the continuation of this work. Under their loving and skilful care the institution is now entering upon its second century of increased usefulness and blessing.

The War.—The week passed without major operations on any of the fronts. The German artillery vigorously shelled the French trench-works near Nieuport, on the coastal section of Flanders; also near Juvincourt, on the bend of the line near Reims, and in Champagne, in the region of Moronvilliers. Artillery duels were frequent east and west of the Meuse, on the Verdun front, and in the Vosges, in the sectors of Bonhomme and Voilu. In the Woevre the French raided the enemy trenches, capturing 250 prisoners, while in Champagne they gained a position in the German lines at Tahure, and inflicted some losses on the foe near the Butte du Mesnil. Field Marshal Haig reports minor but successful operations around Lens and west and south-southwest of Cambrai, as well as near the Houthulst Forest, northeast of Ypres. In their sector on the Lorraine front the Americans were exposed to gas attacks which were successfully repulsed. On the Italian front there was heavy artillery fighting in the eastern sector of the Asiago Plateau and in the area west of Monte Grappa. German attempts to seize positions east and west of the Frenzella Valley, as well as places recently won by the Italians on Monte di Val Bella and Col del Rosso, proved ineffective. An Austrian detachment which endeavored to rush the southern slopes of Sasso Rosso was beaten back. Rome also reports that there were encounters with enemy patrols in Villarsa and in the Ornic Valley. At Zenson a German party attempting to land on the right bank of the lower Piave was checked by heavy artillery fire, while east of Cortilazo, also on the lower Piave, the Italians captured stores of arms and ammunition. Berlin reports that after a day of lively artillery fire on the Sette Communi Plateau, the Austrians cleared the Italian positions, south of Sasso Rosso, and took about 180 prisoners. Eight British craft which were hunting submarines were sunk in the Straits of Dover by a raiding flotilla of enemy destroyers. After having sunk these vessels, seven of which were "drifters" and one a trawler, the enemy destroyers fled northward before they could be engaged. Shortly after a submarine shelled the town of Dover.

Bulletin, Feb. 11, p.m.-Feb. 18, a.m.

The war cabinet situation, overshadowed for a while by other events, is not yet settled. The President and the Secretary of War seem for the moment to hold the advantage. Mr. Baker, to forestall the threatened war-cabinet and ministry reorganized the general staff in four divisions. He was upheld in the administration of his office against the attacks of Senator Weeks by Messrs. Glass and James. Meanwhile the President called a conference of Congressional leaders to show that he should be given the power asked in the Overman bill which would invest him with blanket authority over the war bureaus. The Overman bill, however, has been "toned down" and there seems to be some hope of a compromise which may be acceptable to all parties. The President ordered an investigation of the much-discussed Hog Island shipyard contracts to determine if there has been any criminal misuse of money in a project which estimated to cost $21,000,000 has already cost twice that amount. The President's personal action settled the shipyard strikes in the East, which, in spite of the appeal to the laborers of Edward N. Hurley, Chairman of the Shipping Board, had, by the end of the week, assumed alarming proportions. The delay caused by the strike might easily be fatal to the successful prosecution of the war and might endanger the lives and the safety of our men at the front. There has been already talk of Government ownership of the yards and of a Federal conscription of the workers. The strikers stood for the principle of the "closed shop" and for a scale of wages similar to that of the men on the Pacific coast. A drastic war measure was adopted on February 15, when President Wilson issued proclamations making subject to control by license the entire foreign commerce of the United States. These proclamations give the Government control of imports and exports and commerce with every nation of the world is affected. The imperative need for the release of ships to carry troops and munitions to France made the step necessary. It is estimated that 1,000,000 additional tons of shipping will be made available for military purposes. The President acted under powers given him by the Espionage and Trading with the Enemy acts. It is expected that trade with South America and the Orient will be largely affected. It is surmised that some imports and exports not essential to the war may be reduced fifty per cent.

The President Answers Hertling and Czernin

President Wilson, addressing Congress in joint session on February 11 replied to the recent peace-speeches of the German Chancellor, Count von Hertling, and the Austrian Foreign Minister, Count Czernin. Chancellor von Hertling's statement, the President said, was very vague and confusing and led to no definite conclusion. It was very different from Count Czernin's, which the President described as very friendly in tone. Mr. Wilson repeated his former declaration that the United States had no desire to interfere in European affairs and "would disdain to take advantage of any internal weakness or disorder to impose her own will upon another people." He reiterated again that the United States would put forth its whole strength "in this war of emancipation." The test, he added, of whether it is possible for either Government to go any further in this comparison of views is simple and obvious. The principles to be applied are these:

> That each part of the final settlement must be based upon the essential justice of that particular case and upon such adjustments as are most likely to bring a peace that will be permanent; that peoples and provinces are not to be bartered about from sovereignty to sovereignty as if they were mere chattels and pawns in a game, even the great game, now forever discredited, of the balance of power; every territorial settlement involved in the war must be made in the interest and for the benefit of the populations concerned, and not as a part of any mere adjustment or compromise of claims among rival States; all well-defined national aspirations shall be accorded the utmost satisfaction that can be accorded them without introducing new or perpetuating old elements of discord and antagonism that would be likely in time to break the peace of Europe and consequently of the world.

The President affirmed that a general peace upon such foundations can be discussed. "Until such a peace can be secured we have no choice but to go on." These general principles, the President added, have been accepted by every one except the military autocrats of Germany. In conclusion he warned the Central Powers that the vast resources of the United States would accomplish in the end what might be accomplished by peaceful negotiations.

The Lloyd George Speech

On February 12 there were stirring debates and dramatic developments in the British House of Commons, including a challenge to the House by Lloyd George, the Prime Minister, either to accept his policy or to turn the Government out, and a sharp exchange of rather heated words between the Prime Minister and the former Prime Minister, Mr. Asquith, ending in an apology by Mr. George to Mr. Asquith. The most important feature of the debate was the Prime Minister's declaration that owing to their uncompromising attitude, he saw no hope of peace in the recent speeches of the German Chancellor, Count von Hertling and the Austro-Hungarian Foreign Minister, Count Czernin. It was therefore the duty of Great Britain to continue her preparations to establish international justice by force of arms. The Government, the Prime Minister said, did not recede the least from its war aims as they had been stated. "The German Empire, or those who at present are in control of it," he exclaimed, "are not in the mood to discuss reasonable terms of peace with the Allies. I regret it profoundly, but there is no use crying peace when there is no peace." "Until there is some better proof," said the Minister, "than is contained in these speeches that the Central Powers are prepared to consider the war aims of the Allies, it must be the duty of Great Britain to make every effort to bring back international right in the world."

A few days after the debate in which the Prime Minister answered the Hertling-Czernin peace terms, it was officially announced that General Sir William Robertson, Chief of the British Imperial Staff, had resigned. General Sir Henry Wilson, Sub-Chief of Staff and British representative on the Versailles War Council, takes the place thus made vacant. General Robertson was unable to accept any appointment as military representative on the Versailles Council or to continue as Chief of Staff with limited power. The official announcement says:

> The extension of the functions of the permanent military representative decided on by the Supreme War Council . . . has necessitated the limitation of the special powers hitherto exercised by the Chief of the General Imperial Staff. . . . In these circumstances the Government thought it right to offer General Sir William Robertson the choice of becoming the British military representative on the Supreme War Council at Versailles or continuing as Chief of the Imperial General Staff under new conditions. General Sir William Robertson, for reasons which will be explained . . . did not see his way to accept either position and the Government has with much regret accepted his resignation.

In an interview given to the London Times, General Robertson is reported to have stated that he did not resign, but that he would not accept either of the positions offered him.

The German-Bolshevist Imbroglio

Early in the week, dispatches from Amsterdam, later on confirmed by news from Berlin and Brest-Litovsk, announced that the President of the Russian delegation at the Brest-Litovsk peace conference had stated that while Russia desisted from signing a formal peace-treaty, it declared the state of war ended with Germany, Austro-Hungary, Bulgaria and Turkey, and that it had simultaneously given orders for complete demobilization of Russian forces on all fronts. The news at first caused enthusiasm in Germany, but gradually the enthusiasm gave way to doubts as to the permanence and the validity of a peace concluded under the circumstances which prevailed at Brest-Litovsk. The Berlin Zeitung am Mittag expressed the opinion that the old chaos would continue, and that therefore it would be necessary for Germany to continue to safeguard her frontier, both from a military and a diplomatic point of view. The Norddeutsche Allgemeine Zeitung said: "Trotzky is a sphinx, who presents the world with a new riddle." By the end of the week, after Germany had signed her peace with the Ukrainians, against whom the Bolsheviki are now said to be moving troops, a change took place between Germany and the party with which she had just concluded a quasi-peace. Berlin dispatches to the Kölnische Volkszeitung said that the Central Powers did not intend to be robbed of the fruits of the lately concluded peace. The Cologne paper added that it had probably been decided at the Imperial Headquarters to resume operations on the Northern Russian front for the protection of the Ukraine. That Germany and Austria were still at war with Russia was the opinion of von Kühlmann, the German Foreign Secretary, at the concluding session of the Brest-Litovsk conference after Trotzky had made his final statement that Russia was out of the war and her armies would be demobilized, but that she would desist from signing a formal peace-treaty. The acts of war, Dr. von Kühlmann said, ended when the Russians and the Teutonic Allies signed the armistice some weeks ago, but when the armistice ended the warfare had to be revived. He added that the fact that one or two of the contracting parties had demobilized their armies would in nowise alter the situation. Later official dispatchès stated that Germany had resumed war with Russia. Austria declared that her troops are not to be used on the Russian front without her formal consent. There have been riots, looting and murder in Petrograd.

A treaty of peace was formally signed at Brest-Litovsk between Germany, Austria-Hungary, Bulgaria and Turkey, on the one hand, and the Ukrainian People's Republic on the other. The more important articles of the treaty provide for the cessation of hostilities between the contracting parties; for a determination of the frontier of the new republic whereby in the north she gets an increase of territory at the expense of Russia; for the immediate evacuation of her soil by the armies of the Central Powers; for the resumption of consular and diplomatic relations between the contracting parties immediately after the ratification of the peace-treaty. The Central Powers and the Ukraine renounce the reimbursement of their war costs and all indemnities for war damages; allow their respective war prisoners to return home, or with the approval of the State concerned to remain where they are or to proceed to another country. The Bolsheviki are threatening war on the new republic. The Ukraine has about 30,000,000 inhabitants and is the richest and the most fertile part of Russia. The value of its new ally to Germany may be estimated from the fact that the Ukraine supplies one-third of the whole Russian production of bread-corn, that it has 30,000,000 head of cattle, coal in superfluity, sugar, petroleum wells, quicksilver mines, iron mines and deposits of manganese.

The Central Powers and the Ukraine

France.—On February 15, Paul Bolo, known as Bolo Pasha, was condemned to death on the charge of treason. The military court over which Colonel Voyer presided, returned a unanimous decision after fifteen minutes deliberation. Colonel Voyer pronounced the sentence of death. The following day Bolo filed an appeal from the decision of the court-martial. The sentence of death was likewise pronounced by default against Filippo Cavallinie, who is under arrest in Italy. Darius Porchère was sentenced to three years imprisonment, after a vote of six to one for conviction, on the lighter charge of commerce with the enemy.

Condemnation of Bolo Pasha

The arrest of Bolo was due to information forwarded by the Government of the United States to the Government of France to the effect that more than 10,000,000 marks had been appropriated by the Government at Berlin to be used in disseminating pacifism in France, and that $1,683,000 had been paid to Bolo by five different banks at the order of former Ambassador Count von Bernstorff. Bolo returned at once to France and immediately purchased a controlling interest in the Paris newspaper Le Journal. At the same time there appeared in French weeklies and dailies a number of articles directed to peace propaganda. The prosecution went on the assumption that Bolo was an active agent in the interests of Germany and was engaged in the effort to destroy the French morale by spreading the impression that it was impossible to beat Germany; its task was to show that the money received by Bolo was used by him either in whole or in part to depress the French people and induce them to come to terms with the enemy. Bolo denied that he had received money from the Germans. Cavallinie, who is an Italian subject, could not be extradited and will be tried in Italy.

Ireland.—Early this month the Rt. Rev. Dr. Fogarty, one of Ireland's most illustrious prelates, wrote the following letter about the war and conscription to Mr. J. K. Kett, of the County Clare Council:

A Bishop on Conscription

I always knew that in writing as I did I was but giving expression, however inadequately, to what almost every man in Clare felt, and feels, on the subject at issue. Events have proved that Dr. Mannix was right. Australia has pronounced against conscription on an overwhelming vote. The disinterested Archbishop, and not the vainglorious Premier, was the true exponent of Australia's mind.

The whole thing is most instructive, and shows how nations and peoples may be, and often are, led against their will into false and horrible positions by a few ambitious muddlers, or schemers, at the head of the Government. Had they not a referendum in Australia, Mr. Hughes, with his Cabinet and Parliament, would have easily conscripted the country to death.

It is the same way with this horrid war itself. Were there a referendum to the people tomorrow in all the belligerent countries there is little doubt that it would result in an imperative demand for peace. Yet this accursed war is kept going, and the earth deluged daily in human blood and the biggest interests of mankind shoveled about like sand by a powerful but unscrupulous ring of politicians, profiteers, and pressmen.

Ireland is menaced with conscription, as was Australia, with this difference, that Australia was a free country and could protect itself. Ireland is not free. But it is just as well that the Morning Post and the Irish Times, and the class they speak for, should clearly understand at once that any attempt to force conscription on this country will be attended with the most disastrous results.

At the annual meeting of the Dublin Chamber of Commerce, the President spoke these encouraging words about the Convention: "Quite recently rumors of a rather exciting character were circulated through the city with regard to the breaking up of the Convention. Personally, I do not see any reason why these rumors should have been circulated. I am very optimistic as to the result of the Convention. Little differences do arise from time to time, as is quite natural, but I have every hope that with moderation, a little common-sense and a little give-and-take from all parties, a solution, so far as the Convention is concerned, of the present unfortunate differences that do exist in Ireland will be found, and with good results to the country. I went to the Convention not representing any section or party; I went there for the purpose of doing as I thought best in the interests of Ireland, and I intend following out that resolution to the end."

The Convention

This optimistic view is not shared by any large number of the Irish people, as is evidenced by this, among other facts, that Sinn Fein is still growing in popularity.

Mexico.—According to press dispatches under date of January 15, an agreement between the United States and Mexico is about to be consummated. Its terms include the following concessions by the United States to Carranza:

A New Agreement

The United States Government agrees to advance Carranza 10,000,000 pesos gold or approximately $5,000,000 to establish finances on a substantial basis. This 10,000,000 pesos gold will go to the so-called Bank of Emission or bank authorized to issue its own notes. The United States agrees to provide the gold before April 1.

The United States Government agrees to provide Mexico with 3,000,000 bushels of corn to tide over the corn famine until the new crop comes in.

The United States Government offers to provide Carranza with a quantity of rice.

The United States Government agrees to supply Mexico with farm implements and tractors, besides much needed agricultural machinery to enable cultivation of the plantations.

The United States Government agrees to supply boiler tubes and other necessary parts for rolling stock, etc., in order that the Mexican railroad system may be built up.

In return for these concessions Mexico agrees

To raise the embargo on the twenty-five per cent of silver exports which has hitherto been in force.

To provide sisal fiber at a cut price (later to be determined exactly) in order to supply the needs of the United States for grain bags, etc.

To make other stipulations regarding trade exports to the United States which are based on the prospect that virtually all Mexican trade for the present will go to the American people.

Two other problems appear to be left undecided, namely, that Mexico be supplied with ammunition from the United States, and that, if Carranza permits American soldiers to cross the line into Mexico, in pursuit of bandits, our Administration should grant permission to Mexican soldiers to come into the United States, for a like purpose. Under date of February 16, Secretary Lansing denied that a loan of $5,000,000 was to be granted Mexico; our Government, however, will permit gold to be exported to an "American banker in Mexico City." This, no doubt, is a reward to Carranza for his ardent pro-Germanism and anti-Americanism.

Rome.—In an interview given recently to Cardinal Dubois at the Vatican the Holy Father expressed his satisfaction at the reception which the chief points of his own peace proposals had recently received in the speeches of President Wilson and Mr. Lloyd George. A brochure just published by the Bureau Documentaire Belge explains the views of the Belgians on the independence which should be theirs after the war. These views are in complete accord with the formula proposed by the Holy Father last August and are a striking refutation of the statements of Baron Sonnino, who, it will be remembered, characterized the Pope's formula as inspired by the Germans. Meetings of considerable importance have been held in England for the purpose of organizing a united Catholic protest against the bullying of the Pope by his enemies all over the world.

The Holy Father

The Osservatore Romano in a recent issue published a letter in which are given some of the details of the Pope's beneficent action especially in the Ottoman Empire. At the direction of the Holy Father, untiring efforts have been made by the Apostolic Delegate, Mgr. Dolci to assist those visited by the scourge of war, with no distinction of nationality or creed.

Spain.—Elections of Deputies, or representatives in the lower Chamber, will be held on February 24, and of Senators, or representatives of the Upper Chamber, on March 10. Every effort is being made by the Government to secure the utmost freedom and liberty in voting, but the state of Spain is far from favorable for holding the elections. The country is still suffering from the recently attempted insurrection, and grave disturbances have occurred in many places as a result of the scarcity of food supplies and other necessities of life. The principal blame is placed on the selfishness of politicians who have persisted in subordinating the interests of the people to their own personal advantage. For these reasons it was thought that the dissolution of parliament and the new elections would be deferred, but the absence of anything like a serious crisis in the Government was apparently taken as an indication that the elections would be carried out in a spirit of fairness and without difficulty. On January 18 the new Spanish Ambassador to the Holy See was formally received by the Pope.

The War Policy of the Pope

JAMES CARDINAL GIBBONS

IN my experience of many years with my countrymen I have always found them fair-minded and just. They have that decent regard for the opinion of others and that sense of tolerance and fair play which are rightly looked upon as the distinctive mark of a great democratic people. They willingly listen to both sides of a question and judge it on its merits. They are generous and sincere. In the trying times through which they are now passing and which are testing their mettle, they have given a noble example of fidelity to duty and of the spirit of self-sacrifice. Ready and armed in the cause of justice they are prepared for a long and cruel war and are willing to give their treasures and their lives to bring it to a successful end. But they would not prolong it one single moment beyond that term when it would become either useless or unjust. They are enlisted heart and soul for a just war. But they long intensely for a lasting and durable peace.

The world today is full of peace-terms and rumors of peace. When we consider the sorrows and the tragedies which the war has caused, and try to take measure of all the financial and industrial losses it has entailed both here and abroad, and look forward into the future in an endeavor to compute the misery and the ruin it will surely entail if prolonged, we cannot but yearn for the day when that just, honorable and durable peace is given to the world.

My heart goes out to all the sufferers of the war, to my own countrymen first of all, who, though alert and ready for every sacrifice in the cause of justice, are nevertheless suffering for no fault of their own, to the widows and the orphans it has left in its cruel passage, to the halt and the blind whom it has returned to their sorrowing homes. I mourn over the countless dead. But one lone and majestic figure calls for all my sympathy and love. More perhaps than any other single individual our Holy Father, Pope Benedict XV, has suffered in this tragedy. Others have but their own individual sorrows. He bears the sorrows of all. Wherever he turns his eyes from the Vatican he sees his children locked in deadly strife. He counts them by the thousands among our own countrymen who have generously answered their country's call, and among the Allies too, just as he does among the enemies whom they are facing on the field of battle. And though the triumph of justice always consoles him, yet he cannot but mourn over the slaughter of his spiritual children.

It is not astonishing then that the Holy Father, lifted above the noise and the strife of world-policies has constantly and consistently worked for a just and enduring peace. Reasonable men expect that from him. He is a priest. To millions of Catholics throughout the world he is the Supreme Pontiff commissioned by Christ to rule and guide His flock. Like his Master he rules not by the sword, but by love. He is the universal Pastor. As such he cannot become a participant in the strife. And though he should condemn and has actually condemned all violations of the laws of war, yet as far as is consistent with morality and religion, he must hold the balance of an equal judgment between the contending parties. Those who wish that he had done more, misunderstand the nature of his office. He is not an ordinary neutral. His position has peculiar features that make it altogether unique. He is a co-sufferer with all the nations in the conflict. Except in rare cases where it was his duty to act, he was bound to look upon all alike, and by counsel and warning endeavor to bring the combatants to a mutual understanding, and in this he has not been entirely unsuccessful.

It must not be thought that his silence, when he thought it necessary, came from cowardice, worldly prudence or political and selfish motives. From the first letter which the Holy Father addressed to the world on September 8, two days after he had been crowned, in which he expressed his horror at the awful catastrophe into which the war had plunged the nations, down to the eloquent protest of a few weeks since, in which he solemnly condemned the useless and cruel air-raids on the beautiful city of Padua, as contrary to the law of nations, he has not been afraid to speak out in favor of peace and against cruelty. Two months after his election, in his Encyclical "Ad Beatissimi," he made an earnest appeal to the nations to put an end to the war. He spent the following weeks of that year in a generous and truly Christian endeavor, unfortunately not crowned with success, to obtain a cessation of hostilities during those hallowed days when the world celebrated the coming of the Prince of Peace.

Scarcely a month of his Pontificate passed without some word of warning from him, some appeal for the prisoner, the war sufferer, some protest against the horrors and injustices of the fratricidal struggle. On January 22, 1915, he again earnestly pleaded for the cessation of armed strife. He appointed February 7 for Europe and March 21 for the rest of the world as a day of public prayer for peace, by the millions of his children throughout the world. In the month of May of that same year he asked his subjects, wherever found, to turn to the Immaculate Heart of the Mother of God and to pray to her that order, peace and love might soon be restored to a suffering world. Towards the end of that year, in the Consistorial Allocution of December 6, he made one of his memorable statements, one that may be considered as the seed of every legitimate movement for peace undertaken since, when he declared that a way to a just and durable peace consisted in a clear and straightforward formulation by the respective parties of their aims and purposes, to be followed by a conference in which, all injustice being laid aside, mutual concessions and compensations should be made in the spirit of equity. In 1916 he urged the practice of the spirit of penance in the families of the belligerents and appointed a general Communion day for the children, for the return of peace. A few months later he protested against the malicious charges made against his impartiality and solemnly affirmed that no selfish interest guided his acts, but that he was working for the cause of suffering and bleeding humanity. The following year witnessed again his untiring efforts in the cause of order and civilization. His work culminated in his peace note of August 1 to the heads of the many nations at war, a document which, in spite of its critics, is a monument to the universal affection, the prudent diplomacy and the strict impartiality of the Vicar of Christ. That document has been misunderstood by some, by others wilfully misinterpreted. It was not meant to be a final award. It purported to be but an effort to bring the nations together, in the persons of their representatives and delegates for the purpose of beginning a discussion of peace. It was not a judicial decision. It was a diplomatic effort. It contained the broad outlines of a plan of settlement. Unless I am much mistaken, when the peace congress assembles the final verdict of the nations will be based on the general principles pointed out by the Holy Father.

It has been said again and again that Benedict XV has forgotten Belgium, that he did not speak up for her in her hour of betrayal by the superior forces of her invaders. When Benedict XV came to the throne, Belgium had already been invaded by the German armies and a considerable part of her territory overrun. The flagrant injustice had already been committed. When the invasion took place the saintly Pius was already in the shadow of death. On coming to the throne the new Pope did not wait long to let the world know of his sentiments with regard to the violation of Belgian territory. He spoke at first with prudent circumspection, for not all the facts were in his possession. But he soon learned the truth and acted conformably to it. According to the letter written by the Papal Secretary of State, Cardinal Gasparri, to M. Van der Heuvel, Belgian Minister to the Vatican, "The violation of the neutrality of Belgium, carried out by Germany, on the admission of her own Chancellor, contrary to international law, was one of those injustices which the Holy Father in his Consistorial Allocution of January 22 strongly reprobated." And the Hamburger Fremdenblatt (January 29, 1917), in allusion to this, complains that "The one belligerent power against which the Vatican has spoken is Germany." Writing to M. Laudet, editor of the Revue Hebdomadaire, in July, 1915, the Pope also protested against "the martyrdom of the poor Belgian priests and so many other horrors on which light has been cast." He protested also against the Belgian deportations and had hundreds of victims of these cruel measures returned to their homes. Such has been his solicitude for the martyred nation that it has called for the most profuse thanks from the two great heroes of the war, King Albert and Cardinal Mercier. His Holiness also protested to Russia against the violence to persons and to conscience displayed during the early occupation of East Prussia and Galicia, and against the harsh treatment of Mgr. Szeptycki, the venerable Archbishop of Lemberg. He has labored for the prisoners of war, for the crippled and the blind of the war's countless battlefields. Not once has he forgotten that he is the Father of the Faithful. His conduct towards the Italian Government has been marked by such a spirit of conciliation, justice and absolute impartiality that high government officials have praised him and those under his jurisdiction. The silly and cowardly slanders recently brought against his patriotism by radicals are so gross as not to deserve a refutation.

The Holy Father has faced a terrible ordeal. He is facing it still. On all sides he is surrounded by pitfalls. Every act of his is watched, scrutinized by jealous, critical, hostile eyes, only too ready to find fault and to register blame. More than ever he needs the support of his loyal children. The Roman Pontiffs of the past have ever found in American Catholics a whole-hearted devotion. We are not going to fail our Holy Father, Pope Benedict XV, in this supreme hour. For all that he has done so nobly and so unselfishly for the cause of peace and humanity his faithful children here in the United States, for whose people he has more than once expressed his admiration and love, are profoundly grateful. Though at war in order that all the peoples of the earth may be really free, we wish with him that a just peace may be soon regained. For that peace he has nobly and generously striven. Men may not now realize the extent and the nobility of his efforts, but when the voices of passion are stilled, history will finally do him full justice.

As a last word I beg to congratulate my countrymen on the generous ardor with which they have rallied to the support of our beloved President in his dark hour of trial. He has striven for high ideals and has found a reward in an enthusiastic response from his fellow-citizens. They have not failed him and will not do so in the future but will continue to give him and his colleagues that loyal support which is an earnest of complete victory and of a return of the happy peace for which he and the Holy Father are earnestly laboring, each in his own sphere.

Rise and Fall of Protestant Prosperity

JOSEPH HUSSLEIN, S.J.

THERE was a time when much was said and written of the material prosperity of so-called Protestant countries. The voices that then were heard have died into silence or are but feebly audible now. As an argument against the Catholic Church this vaunt of prosperity was never to be taken seriously. Yet we can readily understand its power of appeal to the masses, since even the Apostles were misled by such tests and standards of religious truth before their minds had been more fully enlightened by the outpouring of the Holy Spirit. "Blessed is he that shall not be scandalized in me," was the warning of Our Lord.

Christ had not come to restore to the Jewish nation the vanished glory of Solomon, the golden splendors of the ancient temple, the porch of pillars and the house of precious stones. His disciples were to be driven from city to city, and men were to glory in afflicting them as if performing a service to God. Christ Himself was to be, in the eyes of the world, the most monumental failure of all. Only when He was lifted up upon the Cross was He to draw all things to Himself.

Yet from the teachings of His Church there was to spring, as the flower from its seed, the most perfect material civilization the world had seen. The paintings of Raphael, the sculptures of Michael Angelo, the poems of Dante, and those majestic cathedrals whose beauty and value the modern world has just learned to appreciate are eloquent expressions of her great ideals. Wherever the Catholic Church advanced there likewise sprang up thousands of nameless builders who wrought into monuments of stone the inspirations of their faith. There, too, were to be found in every city and town those splendid co-operative associations, the Catholic gilds, which in the period of their perfection expressed the truest ideals of human brotherhood and the highest principles of economic justice and Christian charity to which the world has yet attained.

But time came when the statues in her sanctuaries were smitten to earth by the destructive mallet of the Reformer; when her libraries of classic and patristic lore were pillaged and her archives scattered to the winds; when her gilds were ruthlessly stripped of their accumulated wealth devoted to charity and the service of God; when her richly illuminated missals, bright with gold and all the living colors borrowed from earth and sky, were cast upon the blazing pyre; when her storied windows, all aglow with scenes from Holy Writ and the lives of saintly men and women, were broken into thousands of fragments; and the matchless music of her Solemn Masses, that rolled in mighty harmonies through the high cathedral vaults, was silenced by relentless edicts. The creed of sixteen centuries of Christianity, the perfect and complete expression of the Gospel teaching, which alone had given being to all this mighty art, had suddenly become a pernicious superstition in the eyes of men whose own lives bore no imprint of the sanctity of Apostolic times. Enter today the doors of the world's greatest museums and view the wonderful collections of painting, sculpture, architecture and the marvelous works of the loom, and you will find yourself standing in bewilderment before the mere fragments and remnants of Catholic art.

Yet when this had been swept away, so far as the hand of man could complete its ravages, and the desolated fanes had been newly dedicated to a worship which their builders would have abhorred no less than the Egyptian idolatry, a new culture arose. It began in Germany and soon took even more exclusive possession in more northern lands, while Catholicism, which nowhere could be completely destroyed, retained unbroken hold in the more sunny countries of Italy, France and Spain. Yet even into these lands the new culture spread, in spite of their ancient and Apostolic Faith.

Upon that new culture is based the Protestant prosperity of which the world was for a time to hear so much, and which today is weighed in the balance and found wanting by the universal consent of mankind. Sociologists, economists, labor unionists, Catholics, Protestants, Jews are all in accord upon this one fact: that the new civilization, as it gradually developed since the days of the Reformation and reached its complete expression in the years immediately preceding the great world-war, was a dismal failure and a sad mistake. There can be no disagreement on this, however the minds of men may vary in their proposed plans of social and economic reconstruction.

That the material prosperity from which the world has turned in protest today is essentially the result of the Reformation, no one can doubt who has wisely studied the economic history of the past four centuries. Such it has always been proclaimed by Protestants themselves. Careful reflection will show that it is based upon strictly Protestant principles, not in so far as these principles are Christian, but in so far as they are Protestant, that is in opposition to Catholic doctrine. It is important that this great truth be thoroughly grasped in order that the new reconstruction may be based upon more sound and lasting foundations. There is supreme need for Protestant and Catholic alike to find the reason for the failure of the past and to base the new social structure four-square upon the unchangeable and indestructible rock of Christian principles.

It is true that the new Protestant culture brought a certain type of prosperity. It is true likewise that this prosperity reached its culmination before the world-war. But it is equally true that it differed in an essential way from that Catholic ideal of true prosperity which the world is seeking again today, though it is still blindly groping in the darkness after Socialist delusions and deceptive dreams. It rests with the Church to show the path to real Christian Democracy.

Protestant prosperity was first a civic and later a national prosperity. It reached its highest development in modern Germany and England. In its nature it was never identical with the common good, as true prosperity must always be. The latter provides for the real good of all; the former for the inordinate enrichment of a few. Upon this excessive opulence of the wealthy classes the claim of the false prosperity was founded. It is a commonplace of history that the greatest oppression and impoverishment of the masses can coexist with the highest external splendor, wealth and material culture of a nation. Such were the conditions in Rome and Greece in the day of their decadence. Such was the splendor of ancient Egypt, of Babylon and Nineveh. More significant than men commonly understood was that question asked in one of our prominent secular magazines: "Is America riding to a Roman fall?" The same question could have been asked as well of England and of Germany, or of other countries which had all in a greater or less degree adopted false economic standards.

Strange, therefore, though it may still appear to some, the peculiar nature of the new prosperity was not directly due to the invention of machinery but to the newly invented doctrines of the Reformation. Such statements are not made in the carping spirit of criticism, but are based upon evidence. The new teaching rejected the Scriptural truth that Christ established His Church not merely for the administration of His Sacraments, but likewise to keep His doctrine pure and undefiled to the end of time. He had for this purpose promised her freedom from error by the assurance of His abiding presence. All this the Reformation ignored. The Church was no longer regarded as the official interpreter of the Sacred Scriptures, though these Scriptures themselves warn us that men, left to their personal interpretation, may wrest them to their own perdition. Each one might read out of the Bible or into it his own favorite prejudices. This false individualism in religion soon had its parallel in the false economic individualism on which the Protestant prosperity was founded.

In all social and economic relations the Church demands that the common good be first and always kept in view. All private privilege must yield to it. But with the new doctrine a new ethical code arose. Each one sought, under the new individualism of the Reformation, to enrich himself to the utmost without regard for the common good of his fellow-men. In Catholic times this tendency of fallen nature would likewise have striven to exert itself, but against it there would have stood forever the teaching of the Church. Under the new individualism the duty of State interference and regulation was furthermore ignored, since the State too interpreted the Bible after its own prejudices. This meant a slavish compliance with the desires of the rich and powerful who asked for nothing more than an absolute freedom of individual bargaining with labor. The latter was thus stripped of all its power of collective action which the Church so jealousy safeguards. As a consequence enormous individual fortunes soon grew up side by side with the most abject impoverishment and oppression of the masses.

Though labor, after centuries of struggle against these false principles, regained many of its rights, yet discontent and dissatisfaction grew. Men could but ill conceal their disquiet at the intermittent volcanic rumblings that waxed constantly more ominous beneath the bright surface of the new social and economic prosperity for which Protestantism was so eager to take the full credit.

In vain did Catholic leaders like Bishop Ketteler in Germany, Cardinal Manning in England and the great Pope Leo XIII point out the deception underlying this Dea-Sea fruit. In words never to be forgotten the Pontiff thus described both the history and nature of the false prosperity at a moment when it was approaching its very zenith and was receiving the adulation of its worshipers:

> The ancient workmen's gilds were destroyed in the last century, and no other organizations took their place. Public institutions and the laws have repudiated the ancient religion. Hence by degrees it has come to pass that workingmen have been given over, isolated and defenseless, to the callousness of employers and the greed of unrestrained competition. The evil has been increased by rapacious usury, which, although more than once condemned by the Church, is nevertheless, under a different form but with the same guilt, still practised by avaricious men. And to this must be added the custom of working by contract, and the concentration of so many branches of trade in the hands of a few individuals, so that a small number of very rich men have been able to lay upon the masses of the poor a yoke little better than slavery itself.—("The Condition of Labor.")

Such is the true picture of the misery that lay hidden beneath a mere public or national prosperity. Since that time conditions have changed considerably in many regards. Labor has asserted itself and is fast gaining strength. The future fate of the nations is likely to turn upon the question whether labor will use its power prudently, justly and religiously. A new era is dawning, a great world-crisis to which the struggle of warring nations is only a prelude. There are glorious prospects for the world today if it will heed the voice of the Church: "Not in Socialism," she cries in accents of earnest warning, "not in capitalism as based on the Reformation, but in Christian co-operation lies the hope of the future!" Only through a return to her can this hope ever be fully realized.

The Convert in the Church

CHARLES PHILLIPS

"I HAVE been in perfect peace and contentment. I have never had one doubt," wrote Cardinal Newman, when speaking of his state of mind from the hour that his conversion to the Faith was consummated; and there is not in the world today a convert who, enjoying the graces of God's Church and the Sacraments, will not echo his declaration. But Newman was speaking of spiritual peace and contentment. He was not always made happy, however, externally happy, sensibly happy, by reason of the great change he had undergone. On the contrary, he was often made very unhappy, and not alone by the Charles Kingsleys of his day, seeking to impeach his sincerity, but by fellow-members of the very fold into which he had come expecting, naturally, a welcome. And in that experience, as well as in his achievement of "perfect peace and contentment" of soul, how many and many a follower in his footsteps has shared, with heartburning and tears and much bewilderment!

"The convert!" How lightly is that little word spoken, as though signifying merely a passage from one church to another! But how much it stands for!" Percy Fitzgerald, himself a convert to the Catholic Faith, once said,

> For what agonizing wrestlings and tortures of mind, unseen and unknown! What rendings and bendings of the conscience! What struggles and calls resisted and finally obeyed! What tearings of the heart-strings! How awful the almost cruel disregard of family ties and interests, the light and truth having often to be purchased at the sacrifice of all that is dearest in the world.

There is an ever-increasing army of souls in this country brought to a deep appreciation of those words, which so well describe their own trying experiences; for yearly the number of converts increases amongst us. That is an old story now. A few years ago a conversion was rare, an event novel in its infrequency. Today, in every city in the land, numbers upon numbers of men and women, young and old, are entering the Church annually. Missions are being given from one end of the country to the other: the sun never sets on the missionary Cross. The tireless machinery of the Apostolic Missionary Union, with its diocesan bands scattered all over the United States; the systematic preaching to non-Catholics carried on year in and year out, by the Jesuits, the Paulists, the Dominicans, by all of the preaching Orders: all these are beginning to garner a heavy harvest over the land, a harvest that increases and waxes richer every year and every day. The figures now run into the thousands annually.

And what of these converts? Do born Catholics appreciate their relation to them, or the trials they undergo? Percy Fitzgerald's words are the simple truth: there are ten thousand souls to verify them with their own bitter scars of loneliness and misunderstanding, loneliness among their new-chosen brothers, loneliness away from their old-time friends, now cut away from them; and misunderstanding on both sides. Monsignor Benson, the foremost English convert of the last decade, put the plea for his fellow-newcomers into the Church in memorable words:

> I do entreat Catholics to have special consideration for converts. Do not make them feel more clumsy and awkward and less at home. I ask you to remember that converts have often much to suffer, and that the Church was built upon a convert, and one who was not perfectly satisfactory, St. Peter himself having in one dark hour fallen away. Remember the number of saints who have been converts, and do not despise the converts of your own acquaintance and treat them as if they were half-baked Catholics. The phrase "Catholics and converts" is one that never ought to be used.

The Catholic, newly received into the Church, and inevitably sensitive, is bound to ask himself, if not others, "Am I not just as much of a Catholic as they are?" Yet there are many of us who have seen converts treated in such a way by those born in the Faith as to shrink from contact with the latter, so trying is their position made. Sometimes they are frankly looked upon as mere curiosities; or again as faddists who have blown in with a batch of new ideas with which to refresh the old leaven, and the manner in which "born" Catholics, with some pet grievance against priest or Pope, will flock to them to unburden their disgruntled hearts is not edifying, to say the least. Sometimes it is enough to shake the new-built faith of the newcomer. And it is not alone the layman who can make the convert uncomfortable! Converts who are priests can tell their own stories of the treatment they have received from brother-priests; and there are converts among the laity, too, who could unfold a tale of embarrassment and discouragement suffered at the hands of suspicious and uncomprehending shepherds of the flock. The fear that rules the hearts of some of us that the convert may get his head turned if he receives too warm a welcome to our household often seems to drive worthy souls to an extreme of rigidity that is frost-biting in its effect. "Put yourself in his place!" What a rule of life that is! In Monsignor Benson's words:

> Before you criticize converts make perfectly sure that if God had called upon you to do what many of them have to do, you would have done it. I don't think, making all due allowances, that it is really because of any uncharitableness on the part of old Catholics that this criticism becomes necessary; and probably you do not say those little things that might hurt them. But on the other hand, be sympathetic, and you will find a ready response.

"Old" Catholics, as Monsignor Benson called them, have a double relationship to the convert: they have the responsibility of helping him; and they have the duty of learning from him. There was never a newcomer into the Church yet who did not need and desire "the touch of a friendly hand" to make the so-new and so-strange ways of his Father's Mansion easy and familiar for him; and there never was a convert yet, the new-born vigor of whose faith, whose joy in possessing the truth, whose aspirations and ideals, could not quicken and enliven the religious life of those who have had the good fortune to enjoy the Church's graces and benefits all their days.

Some foolhardy critic once had the temerity to call Monsignor Benson a "turncoat." "I deem it no disgrace," responded the Monsignor, "to turn my coat because I had it on inside out." Catholics who have the right spirit will not make the newcomer uncomfortable by pointing out with the finger of curiosity, or the finger of imagined superiority, the fact that sometimes the convert's coat hangs a little strangely at first, or doesn't seem to be exactly a tailor-cut fit.

An Issue Between Science and Faith

ALFRED RAHILLY, M.A., B.Sc.

IN spite of the numerous and excellent treatises on apologetics now accessible, it is not always easy to grasp the precise issue between science and faith; the essential becomes obscured in the multiplicity of detail. A schematic illustration may therefore help us to appreciate the problem. Suppose that there are two men, one of whom, A, sees, or claims to see, an object which B emphatically declares he cannot see. In the discussion which arises, A maintains that, as far as concerns this particular class of objects, B is blind; whereas B roundly denies that there is anything at all to be seen. As a literal fact, this is the impasse to which the discussion of Blondlot's famous N-rays led; but I instance it here merely as typical of the conclusion to many a religious controversy. The question is: Can we get beyond this barren contradiction? Could not B, for instance, maintain that the laws of vision which A upholds are self-contradictory or at least have no possible analogy with the ordinary visual laws acknowledged by both? And A might retort that the admitted deficiencies in B's vision render further lacunae probable, and that B ought to improve his vision either by practice or with extraneous optical aid.

This latter stage of the controversy seems more promising and it is here that the analogy will be helpful. B, the man of science, maintains that his vision represents the triumph of pure reason and that the vision of faith claimed by A is the outcome of some mystical process which is essentially irrational or at least non-rational. Now what can A answer in defense of faith? He can deny that there is any such absolute distinction between the methods of science and faith; he can show that faith is the higher analogue of science and equally rational in its workings.

In what sense, then, is science rational? In the same sense as man is rational, as an ideal rather than an actuality. Reason is but a single factor in us, often weak and dormant, requiring extraneous help and appeals to sense-intuition. This is not stated in order to decry reason, but only to urge that the process by which we reason, the faculty wherewith we see reasoning, is conditioned and finite in every one of us. There are, no doubt, great differences of degree, but none of kind. None of us is rational in the sense that he can apprehend argument apart from sense-impressions and independently of acquired mental habits. Pure reason carries us only a very short way; if the modern student progresses rapidly, it is simply because he can climb on the shoulders of a Euclid or a Newton. Every professor knows how indispensable are appeals to intuition and experiment to aid the reasoning even of advanced students, how strenuous a resistance preconceptions make to the entrance of fresh ideas, how slowly and painfully is room made for new facts and new theories. The reasoning may be faultless, but nevertheless without careful psychological preparation the pupil will not apperceive it, he will not "take it in." And it is important to notice that the historical development of science is parallel to its growth in the individual mind. In each generation, of course, the men of science regard themselves as the embodiment of pure rationality, but to the next generation they appear encrusted with the limitations and prejudices of ordinary humanity. So too the individual student, "scorning the base degrees by which he did ascend," is at each stage oppressed with a sense of finality and cocksureness, which is dissipated only if he makes further progress.

In this matter of scientific truth it is important for us to acquire historical perspective and to rise above the dogmatism of the current text-book. To do this it is not necessary to revert to Thales or Aristotle; a few modern instances will suffice. It was in the heyday of the enlightenment (1790) that the Paris Academy received with ridicule and incredulity a report submitted by the municipality of Juillac in Gascony, wherein more than 300 signatories testified to a fall of stones; contemporary science had no room for meteorites. It was through the opposition of Laplace, the very ideal of frigid mathematical logic, that Fresnel's researches on light-diffraction were long delayed, mislaid and even lost. The now famous memoirs of Mohr, Mayer and Helmholtz were refused publication in the best scientific periodicals of their time; Ruskin's "Unto This Last" met a like fate at the hands of the economists. Even in mathematics we meet the same reluctance or inability to admit new ideas; the influence of Newton for centuries retarded mathematics in Cambridge; the first edition of Grassmann's "Ausdehnungslehre" (1844) was sold as waste paper and Grassmann took to philology and translated the "Rig Veda." To come nearer our own day, the biological researches of Mendel and Gibbs's great memoirs on energetics were for a whole generation ignored. And to show that contemporary science is no exception I might instance the opposition of Kelvin to the newer ideas on radioactivity, the horror which some chemists feel even yet for ions and electrons, the repugnance to the theory of quanta still shown by adherents of the classical mechanics, the scientfiic boycott—the word is not too strong—which still exists among Darwinians and Monists against the facts and proofs of Mendelism and vitalism, the scornful rejection, on the part of older psychologists like Wundt and Titchener, of the newer methods inaugurated at Würzburg and Louvain.

In the face of all this how can we set science apart from the other cognitive efforts of the human mind or invest its conclusions with unique certitude? The perception of any type of truth is psychologically mediated, it is dependent on the development of a corresponding faculty or habit, it is therefore subject to inevitable limitations. This principle, as I have shown, applies not only to faith but to science itself. Faith, indeed, presupposes a more searching preparation of soul and demands a deeper experience; but it is not the less rational on this account, rather the contrary. Anyone can grasp the elementary truths of mathematics or physics, whereas ethical appreciations normally require cleanness of life: nothing so prejudices our moral judgments as an immoral life. Are we therefore to conclude that ethics is less stable or less true than physics? We ought rather to deduce that the higher and more complex is the domain of truth or beauty, the greater preparation and the more complete faculty do we require for its perception.

To the man of science, then, I would say: the pedagogy of faith is but the higher analogue of the teaching of science. You cannot have science unless you first create the scientific mind; so you cannot have faith without first having the faith-mind. Blessed are the clean of heart for they shall see God. You rightly object to a theologian discoursing on science without having had a scientific training; but you are wrong in assuming that faith is at the beck and call of everyone, that a classical scholar or an archeologist or biologist can without further ado reject the light of faith. What if faith be beyond their competence as science is beyond the layman and moral ideals beyond the depraved? Perchance they lack the light because they lack the vision? For the vision of God's Kingdom is promised not to scientific experts, not to philological specialists, but to little children. It is quite true that the man of faith cannot understand science unless he become a specialist; it is equally true that the man of science cannot enter into the kingdom of God unless he become a little child. It sounds very crude and old-fashioned in this great twentieth century; nevertheless it is the teaching of Christ.

Catholic Chaplains in the Mexican War

THOMAS F. MEEHAN

WHEN the war with Mexico, resulting from the annexation of Texas, began there were, as there have been in all the wars in which the United States have been engaged, many Catholic soldiers in the army that took the field. At that time the law did not provide for the appointment of chaplains, and much indignation was rife throughout Catholic circles over the punishment inflicted by fanatical military chiefs on Catholic soldiers who had refused to attend Protestant services sanctioned by regimental officials. This trouble greatly annoyed President Polk, Secretary of State Buchanan, Secretary of War Marcy and other civil officers. By request Bishops Hughes of New York, Portier of Mobile and Kenrick of St. Louis, who were in Baltimore in attendance at the Sixth Provincial Council of the Hierarchy, went to Washington, on May 20, 1846, and called at the White House where President Polk consulted them about the appointment of Catholic chaplains for the army. He expressed a great wish to have such appointments made and asked the Bishops to give him the names of two priests to whom commissions would at once be issued.

After a very pleasant interview with the President the Bishops retired to Georgetown College and decided that two Fathers of the Society of Jesus should be selected. On consultation with Father Verhaegen, the Visitor of the Society, Father John McElroy, then pastor of Trinity Church, Washington, and Father Anthony Rey, the Minister at the College and Secretary to the Provincial, were designated for the chaplaincies. Their names were sent at once to President Polk, who directed that they be appointed chaplains for the Catholic soldiers. What happened after this is told by Father McElroy in a reminiscence he contributed to the Woodstock Letters (Vol. XV, 1886):

> In a few days, says Father McElroy, the two Fathers called on the Secretary of War for instructions how to proceed. He (Mr. Marcy) received us very affably, expressed his desire that we should visit the President, and ordered his chief clerk to prepare letters for the Commanders of different posts to facilitate our journey; besides he requested me to give him my views of what he should expect while with the Army, which I sent him a little later in writing and which he embodied, almost transcribed, in his despatch to General Taylor. The Secretary introduced us to the President who received us with great kindness and regard, he expressed a hope that our mission would be one of peace; that we carried not the sword, but the olive branch, that our mission would be a refutation of the erroneous opinions held in Mexico, that the United States warred against their religion, etc. He continued to state very frankly the great desire he had to bring their matters of dispute to an amicable conclusion.
> As neither of us could speak Spanish I proposed to the President the propriety of associating with us a third clergyman who was familiar with the language. He very promptly adopted my suggestion and told the Secretary to embody that in his despatch to the General-in-Chief, where it will be found.
> In a subsequent interview the Secretary of War asked us what we thought sufficient for our expenses. I replied that I was ignorant of it, not knowing the country, our manner of living, etc. He observed that when the law authorized chaplains their pay was from $1,000 to $1,200. I told him that this would appear to be sufficient, he inserted in his despatch the larger amount. Although there is no law of Congress authorizing the appointment of chaplains for the Army the President in our case made out our commissions by virtue of his discretionary power, besides the pay of $100 a month, our traveling expenses to and from the seat of war were to be defrayed. An advance to each of three months' pay was made and $100 each for traveling, making in all $800. This sum we received at the Quartermaster's office in gold on June 1, 1846.

The letter of the Secretary of War to Father McElroy states the views of the President precisely and was as follows:

War Department, May 21, 1846.

Sir:

The President is desirous to engage two Reverend gentlemen of the Roman Catholic Church to attend the army of occupation now on the Rio Grande to officiate as chaplains, etc. In his opinion their services would be important in many respects to the public interest, particularly in the present condition of our affairs with Mexico. Having sought information as to the proper persons to be thus employed, his attention has been directed to you, and he has instructed me to address you on the subject in the hope that you may consider it not incompatible with your clerical duties or your personal feelings to yield to his request.

It is proper that I should apprise you that the existing laws do not authorize the President to appoint and commission chaplains, but he has authority to employ persons to perform such duties as appertain to chaplains. Should you consent, as the President hopes you will, to visit the Army and remain some time with it you will be allowed a reasonable compensation for expenses and services. Your views of what that ought to be you will, if you please, suggest to me.

When the law authorized the appointment of chaplains as it formerly did, the pay and emoluments were about $1,000 or $1,200 per annum. This amount would be readily allowed together with the expenses of traveling to and from the Army.

I should be pleased to be favored with a reply to this communication at your earliest convenience.

I have the honor to be,

Very respectfully,
Your obedient servant,
W. L. MARCY,
Secretary of War.

To the Reverend John McElroy,
Georgetown College.

A similar letter was sent to Father Rey and both communications, as will be seen, were written the day after the visit of the Bishops to President Polk. The instructions given to General Taylor by Secretary Marcy in regard to the standing, pay and expenses of the two chaplains are to be found in the following letters:

(Confidential)

War Department, Washington, May 29, 1846.

Sir,

The President has been informed that much pains have been taken to alarm the religious prejudices of the Mexicans against the United States. He deems it important that their misapprehensions in this respect should be corrected as far as it can be done, and for that purpose has invited the Reverend gentlemen who will hand you this communication, Mr. McElroy and Mr. Rey of the Roman Catholic Church to attend to the army under your command and to officiate as chaplains. Although the President cannot appoint them as chaplains yet it is his wish that they be received in that character by you and your officers, be respected as such and be treated with kindness and courtesy, that they should be permitted to have intercourse with the soldiers of the Catholic Faith, to administer to their religious instruction, to perform divine service for such as may wish to attend whenever it can be done without interfering with their military duties, and to have free access to the sick or wounded in hospitals or elsewhere.

It is confidently believed that these gentlemen in their clerical capacity will be useful in removing the false impressions of the Mexicans in relation to the United States, and in inducing them to confide in the assurance you have already given that their religious institutions will be respected, the property of the Church protected, their worship undisturbed, and in fine all their religious rights will be in the amplest manner preserved to them. In fulfilling those objects you are desired to give these gentlemen such facilities as you may be enabled to afford, and at such times as in your judgment may be most prudent.

You are requested also to cause to be provided for them such accommodations as will render their abiding with the Army comfortable to themselves. It is believed that when chaplains were allowed by law to the Army, they received in pay and emoluments from $1,000 to $1,200 per annum. This amount will be paid to the gentlemen named in this letter.

As these gentlemen do not speak Spanish they have been desired by the President to associate with them another clergyman who both understands and speaks it; such person recommended by them you will receive on the same footing as themselves.

Very respectfully,
Your obedient servant,
W. L. MARCY,
Secretary of War.

Major-General Z. Taylor,
Commanding Army of Occupation on the Rio Grande, Texas.

The letters issued to the chaplains to facilitate the details of their traveling and accommodations on the way to the front were worded in this fashion:

War Department, May 29, 1846.

Sir,

The Reverend gentlemen (Mr. McElroy and Mr. Rey), who will hand you this, are the bearers of a communication from this department to Major-General Taylor, who will please provide them with cabin passages, in good sufficient transport to Point Isabel, whence they will receive safe conduct to General Taylor's Headquarters.

Very respectfully,
Your obedient servant,
W. L. MARCY,
Secretary of War.

Lieutenant-Colonel Thos. Hunt,
Deputy-Quartermaster General,
United States Army,
New Orleans.

The letter to the commanding officer at Fort Polk, Point Isabel, Texas, said:

War Department, May 29, 1846.

Sir,

The Reverend Mr. McElroy and Mr. Rey are the bearers of a communication from this department to Major-General Taylor; they are recommended to your courtesy and hospitality, and you are requested to take such measures as will ensure their safe conduct to the headquarters of General Taylor.

Very respectfully yours, etc.,
W. L. MARCY,
Secretary of War.

Fathers McElroy and Rey left Georgetown on June 2, 1846, and arrived at Fort Polk on July 2. In the hospital there they found fifteen wounded Catholic soldiers all Irish except two, who were Mexicans. Thence they passed on to Matamoras which was reached four days later. The Mexican Padre Cura Rodriguez received them hospitably and invited them to stop with him, but they took rooms in the house of an American paying him $10 a week for their board. When they called on General Taylor he "received us in the most friendly manner and begged us to give him the opportunity of rendering us all the service in his power." Father McElroy thought Matamoras had no houses of importance, "no good churches . . . so much for the effects of the revolution. Since the Spanish yoke was cast off not one church as yet has been erected throughout all Mexico whereas in towns existing when the revolt commenced are to be found good substantial churches well adorned."

Early in August General Taylor advanced to Comargo on the road to Monterey, and as a large proportion of his command were Catholics Father Rey accompanied him. He was present at the battle of Monterey fearlessly ministering to the combatants, but, some time after, venturing out into the country alone he was murdered by Mexican guerillas. His body was never recovered. Father Rey was born at Lyons, France, March 19, 1807, and became a Jesuit novice in Switzerland in 1827. From 1840 he had labored in the United States as professor of philosophy at Georgetown, as Secretary to the Provincial and Vice-president of Georgetown College.

Father McElroy continued to act as chaplain for most of the war and then returned to Boston where he labored for seventeen years during which time he built the Church of the Immaculate Conception and founded Boston College. He frequently visited New York and was with Archbishop Hughes when that prelate died. In 1868 he lost his eyesight, but an operation restored it for five years. He then became totally blind. Born in 1782, in the County Fermanagh, Ireland, he landed in Baltimore in 1803. Three years later he entered the Jesuit Novitiate at Georgetown and was ordained priest in May, 1817. As he lived until September 12, 1877, he was a link from the days of Carroll almost to our own.

Apropos of this Mexican war episode it may be noted that, when thirteen negro soldiers were hanged for mutiny at San Antonio recently, the Associated Press sent out a statement from Washington that there was no precedent in the annals of the United States Army for such an execution of mutineers save one case of the members of "St. Patrick's Battalion," who had deserted to the Mexicans at Chapultepec, and having been captured by General Scott's soldiers were shot by his orders. I sent to Washington for the official data of this Chapultepec case and Adjutant-General McCain answered with the statement that a search of the official records had been made several times and nothing had been found concerning the "St. Patrick's Battalion" episode. He said he regarded it as a myth, and that various persons had tried in years past to find something authoritative about it but without success. The inferential slander of the statement and the malice of its originators, who have sent it broadcast on several recent occasions, are perfectly obvious.

COMMUNICATIONS

Letters, as a rule, should not exceed six-hundred words.

Newman's Correspondence

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Replying to Mr. Thomas F. Marshall, who, in the issue of AMERICA for February 2 seeks a reason for the non-appearance of letters to W. G. Ward, Hope-Scott and Faber, in the "Letters and Correspondence of John Henry Newman," might one suggest that most probably there was no correspondence between the great Tractarian leader and the gentlemen in question previous to the year 1838? Hope-Scott, Ward and Faber can hardly be called contemporaries of Newman. Born respectively twelve, fourteen and twelve years after the great Oratorian, they were undergraduates at Oxford when John Keble in July, 1833, mounted the pulpit-stairs of St. Mary the Virgin to sound the tocsin of the great movement, and consequently (with the possible exception of Hope-Scott) unknown to Newman at the time the movement got under way. It is only by the widest acceptation of the term that they can really be called Tractarians at all. Certainly, we have the Cardinal's own word for it that Ward was not. "Your father," he writes to Mr. Wilfrid Ward as recently as 1885, "was never a High Churchman, never a Tractarian, never a Puseyite, never a Newmanite." They were all three of that body of younger men who "cut into the original movement at an angle, fell across its line of thought and set about turning that line in their own direction." This, if we are to believe Newman's own words, was about the year 1838, when he first met Ward and Faber.

Our Oldest Girls' School

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Would you kindly allow me to call attention to an error in historical data in an article published in AMERICA for December 22, 1917? Our copies of AMERICA, whose weekly advent we hail with so much pleasure, have been very much delayed in the mails during the last six weeks. This accounts for our not having written to you at an earlier date.

In the interesting article entitled "The Patron of the Destroyer Jacob Jones," by Thomas F. Meehan, we read the following:

> Commodore Jacob Jones was the father of Sister "Stanny" Jones, who, from 1825-1879, was one of the most famous educators at the Academy of the Visitation, Georgetown, D. C., the oldest Catholic institution for the higher education of women in the United States.

The Catholic Encyclopedia gives June 24, 1799, as the day of the opening of the school in Georgetown. The Ursulines arrived in New Orleans on August 7, 1727, and within a few days began their zealous labors as educators of the young girls of the colony and of the newly founded city of New Orleans (1718). One of these pioneer Ursulines, writing to her father in France, on October 27, 1727, speaks of "more than thirty boarders" in the academy, besides a larger number of day pupils.

[Our correspondent is assuredly aware of the fact that Louisiana was not ceded to the United States by France until December 20, 1803. The writer of the article in question meant to imply nothing more than that the Visitation Convent of Georgetown, D. C., was the oldest of the Catholic educational institutions for the higher education of women founded in the original United States territory.—ED. AMERICA.]

Some Irish Old and New

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Mr. Philip J. Libby, on whose letter, published in a previous issue, Mr. J. O'Brien made some comments in AMERICA for February 2, passed to his eternal reward on December 18, 1917, fortified by all the rites of our beloved Catholic religion. He was a man of profound scholarship and sound and unostentatious learning. As one of his life-long friends, I should like to answer Mr. O'Brien's letter, and reply to a few of his remarks, pointing out those which show some reason in their argument, or which seem to me important. An education at some of our secular universities, near Boston, would have produced in the scholar some of the qualities hinted at in Mr. O'Brien's letter, but Mr. O'Brien is profoundly ignorant of a Holy Cross training, otherwise his letter would bear a different tone. His conjecture as to the origin of Mr. Libby's family is very amusing, being, like Mahomet's coffin, "between the devil and the deep sea." An argument should be followed by facts, not conjectures based upon the dreams of the imagination. Mr. Libby's family came from the counties Cavan and Meath; "whose families were never anything in Ireland" is an argument of little weight; statements can easily be made without fear of successful contradiction, especially when the facts and data are 3,000 miles away from the scene of the argument. A loose thinker may content himself with a single statement or expression for a large class of related ideas; hasty conclusions are sometimes made upon unverified information. Mr. O'Brien ought to know that a question cannot be answered by asking another. I still insist that he has not convinced me that Mr. Libby was not right in every respect when he penned the statements contained in the letter which was published. The writer has one regret in life: he received his education in a secular university; if he had to begin life over again he would choose a Catholic college to equip himself for the battle of life, but, thanks to good Catholic parents, he has succeeded in retaining the faith, which he came dangerously near losing in a secular university.

Boston. JOSEPH MATTHEW SULLIVAN.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In your issue of February 9, L. J. attempts to diagnose the Irish character and comes to the conclusion that the average Irishman is a "truckler of a very vicious species." Both the "mere" Irish and the "made-over" Irish come in for their share of denunciation. I think that one or two of the statements therein made might stand correction. In general L. J. finds that the Irish, as a race, have displayed very little constructive ability here in America. The Irish, in my opinion, have contributed more than any other race to the upbuilding of this country. In the first place they have come here, made their homes here and become citizens here. They have brought up their children as loyal and patriotic Americans, and in time of war, as history will attest, they have been at the forefront as defenders and preservers of the Union. Likewise they have been the upbuilders of religion and morality among us. What position would the Church in America hold today in the eyes of the world had the Irish, clergy and laity alike, been shirkers and slackers and not upbuilders? The presence of the Irish in America, as an integral race, has been a living protest against the decadance of morals, which is so rapidly becoming a characteristic of the American people. Now this is more than can be said of some other races. Do not these efforts to preserve both the Church and the State show constructive ability? If not, what more could be asked for? As for an example of "aping the English," L. J. would be wiser if he looked to the Vanderbilts, Goulds, "Walled-off" Astors and other native, well-bred and blue-blooded aristocrats than to the Irish. Perhaps they have not fashioned their manners after the rules of Anglo-Saxon hypocrisy, but at least let credit be given where credit is due.

Manchester, N. H. J. M.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The Irish should be organized, writes E. J. S. in your issue of February 9, they should be taught the glories of the Irish in Ireland and America. But I would add that they should be taught the glories of the past only as motives for making men of Gaelic blood glorious in the future. The emphasis must be laid on the glorious deeds that the Irish should accomplish. Irish glory, and this they must be taught above all things, is spiritual glory, or it is nothing. The Irish have accomplished no work worthy of the world's admiration, but apostolic work. In this their glory is transcendent. Talent they have, but their sensitive psychology is such that they need an apostolic motive, a spiritual motive to sustain them to the completion of any task.

It is a mistake to imagine that the Irish in America are unorganized. They have organizations, but often they have not the right motives for such organization held before them. An Irish organization whose motto is not "For God and Souls" can only breed children of violence or a gospel of hate. The Irish who bicker, lack charity; they also lack broad education. And here, to my mind, lies the crux of the Irish problem in America. The sons and daughters of Irishmen who have made money here, have only learned by their education that the bickering Irish are absurd. They have not learned what they should be taught, that they are the natural leaders of the Irish in America. They have a mission to convince America that the Irish have traditions, pre-eminently that of St. Patrick: "Souls must be saved at any sacrifice." There are corollaries which follow from this. All the old families can study them in their great men who laid all their talents at the service of the Church, whether as laymen or as priests.

Too many children of Irishmen, who have graduated from Catholic colleges and academies, think they do enough if they stay in the Church. They are in a state of transition. It is dangerous. They should make friends with the "organized Irish," from whom disgust has too often estranged them. They should try to solve the Irish problem in America. In Irish celebrations there is too much recurrence to the past; too much flag-waving, too many periodic sentences. We must talk about the future, and a spiritual future at that. We have other things to do besides freeing Ireland.

Drifting on Shoals

Of all fundamental conditions of society none is of greater moment than that of the propagation and preservation of the human race. Beside it all other sociological and material conditions fade into insignificance. It is self-evident that only a few decades without a single birth would mean practically universal depopulation, and though the supposition is an improbability, still we are undoubtedly facing a diminishing birth-rate, especially among the better class of American-born citizens. There is no need of statistics to support the above: we need only compare the number of children born twenty-five years ago in our immediate neighborhood with the number born these days, and I feel certain the comparison will drive home the point.

It is the great middle class, the class from which have sprung, and from which will continue to spring, the ablest, the cleanest and the best of men and women, which leavens the whole mass and constitutes the backbone of our nation. In this class, the birth-rate has most materially fallen off. This means that the curse of selfishness is sapping the very roots of life. It means the decay of spiritual ideas, the death of true patriotism, and the breaking up of homes. It means the divorce court and the triumph of sensualism. It means the loss of the incalculable benefits of parenthood.

The responsibility which children bring inculcates self-denial and self-restraint. Thinking for others becomes a habit. Those who are childless through their own wrong-doing, do not know the pleasures of self-denial; their natures become narrow, selfish and warped, and their souls self-indulgent. It is a truism that from large, well-born families come our best citizens. They early learn self-reliance, are free from false sentiment, are tolerant and helpful, without the egotism and self-consciousness so commonly seen in the only child. Luxury seldom enters into such a home, satiety is unknown with its blasé expression, want may even show its gaunt shadow. Despite this, there are more manly men and womanly women found in large families, and more real happiness than is ever dreamed of by a childless couple, or where a single child is surfeited, stunted and spoiled by needless luxury and display. The large families of our forefathers were big factors in the upbuilding of our country. But we are slowly drifting upon the shoals of a decreasing birth-rate, on which France has already stranded her best hopes, with the selfishness, worldly prudence and sensualism for which it has stood sponsor.

We are not brought into this world for ourselves alone. Humanity has placed a heavy mortgage upon each one of us and demands satisfaction, or she will exact a penalty. And is it a hard mortgage to satisfy? Is a little bundle of pink and white helplessness so very objectionable? Is there anything in this world—position, wealth, honor or achievement—that can balance it? Parents know there is not. It is to the little graves we turn and not to the larger mounds, in our keenest anguish; to the little graves our hearts are drawn in our hour of triumph. The little shoes, the little dresses, the little tin soldiers covered with rust, and the memories sweeter than dreams of a honeymoon—these are life's immortelles that never fade.

There is a certain proportion of marriages, proportionately small in numbers, that are unfruitful through no individualistic cause; but as a rule, the childless couple is childless, and the one-child family is limited to a single offspring, through deliberate restriction. What reasons and what influences are operating to produce this state of affairs? They are many and various: the extra expense which children bring, plus selfishness that refuses to deprive itself of any pleasure or luxury for the child. Many young men in the various walks of life will not marry until financial success is an established fact, or, if they do marry, they refuse to be burdened with children. Girls who had been earning their own living previous to marriage, and who often acquire erroneous ideas of life through their associations, frequently refuse motherhood. Another factor is life in boarding houses or apartments where children are taboo. It is considered almost vulgar and bourgeois in a certain class to have a family. How the modern mother pities her darling daughter if she be an expectant mother! Many, many reasons, but never a valid one, and every one of them based on selfish motives. The world does homage to the man who works and the soldier who fights, but to a greater extent should a civilized community do homage and reverence to the married woman who performs her duty.

The "Non-Sectarian" Y. M. C. A.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I am under the impression that the following account of my experience as an American and a Catholic with the "non-sectarian" organization known as the Y. M. C. A., will not only interest the readers of AMERICA, but will also open their eyes to the realization of the anti-Catholic and un-American body of women and men at the helm. In the first week of December I applied through that organization for the opportunity of going "Over There" as a canteen worker. I was some few years beyond their age limit, but to that they made no objection, for they had sent over many just as old, and older, so long as I was physically fit and could pass their physician's examination. They did not, as you will see later, give me a chance to comply with this last requirement. I was accepted, references being satisfactory, with gusto, for two reasons: I had offered to pay all my own expenses, amounting to not less than $3,000 a year, and I am thoroughly at home in the French language and know northern France and its people. Before leaving their office I made out my application papers and gave the four references usually required. The latter were looked up at once, possibly with the hope that there would be a loophole for refusing me. Among the written questions is "What is your denomination?" The secretary, Mr. Hamlin, who looked over my paper and noticed what mine was, immediately began telling me of the most harrowing conditions "over there," and asked whether I was "quite sure," and so forth, that I could "stand it." To all this I had one reply, "Yes."

Finally at the end of five weeks I received a letter asking me to meet the Appointment Committee at the Y. M. C. A. This consisted of two women, Mrs. Mead and Mrs. Cutting. The former, while very courteous, began the same tactics as Mr. Hamlin, placing horror after horror before me. As I was not to be daunted, the latter could hold out no longer and blurted out, "You are a Roman Catholic, are you not?" When I looked my surprise at the question, and asked what religion had to do with an American citizen trying to do her duty toward her country, her response was, "Why do you not go to France under the auspices of the Knights of Columbus? They are in the field to compete with us." The result of all this was to postpone their decision for three weeks more. By this time I had decided to push them to the wall and make them show their hand. I was called again to meet the "Appointment Committee," the hour set being 10 a. m., and after waiting an hour and a half, I was permitted to meet the "Appointment Committee" (of one), Mrs. Slade. Without loss of time she informed me that they had just received a cable from France not to send over any more canteen workers at present. By this time you will observe that they had had me on their list eight weeks. When I questioned her true reason for refusing and accused her of being influenced by the sectarian principles of the Y. M. C. A., and as proof called attention to the question, "What is your denomination?" on the application paper, she answered, "That is for the purpose of securing religious workers. As a matter of fact those with whom we have had trouble abroad are our workers who lay claim to no religion." So you will observe that anyone so long as he is not a Catholic may go abroad through the Y. M. C. A.

These canteen workers of the Y. M. C. A. do not, as is generally supposed, live in the huts built by the Y. M. C. A., but live in the houses of the peasants of France. Is it not possible to send over half a dozen Catholic women who could look over the ground and start the ball rolling? Once on the spot it would be easier to decide just what is needed. From this distance the matter seems much more complicated than it is in reality. It is much to be regretted, when our country needs every available man or woman who is willing to do his or her duty that the question of what church you attend, or whether the first initial of your religion is a "C" or a "P" should be the cause of holding back those who consider themselves capable of benefiting our soldiers on the other side.

Worse than Apathy

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In your issue of January 26 there was an interesting letter from Mr. Michael Williams, who justly complains of Catholic inertia and gives an illustration of its damaging effects. Such a complaint might be lodged against Catholics in every city, with few exceptions, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, in Canada as well as in the United States. But while the subject is under consideration I might take occasion to register a complaint against not only the inertia and apathy of Catholics, but also against the hostility of Catholics to our defense of the Church through the medium of the secular press. Even when it does happen, as in the case of Ottawa, Canada, that the newspapers allow us to present the Catholic side of the case, we meet with a chorus of protests from our people, who attempt to discourage us in our endeavors to uphold the Faith. Were this my own personal experience alone I would regard the protests as a hint of my own incompetence to deal publicly with the various questions that come up. But I find on consulting other persons, clerical and lay, of undoubted ability, that they, too, have been discouraged in similar efforts.

What is the cause of this opposition? It seems to me that we in America, or to be more precise, the Irish Catholics in America, who have been emancipated from the condition of slavery under the British oligarchy, have not yet realized what that emancipation means. We still imagine, as the Canadian Freeman remarks, that we live in penal times, or rather, that we exist on the sufferance of our former oppressors, or that we are beholden to Protestant benevolence for our present liberty. This is a delusion that may have disastrous consequences if we persist in it. If we do not take advantage of our freedom to dispel ignorance concerning the Church, its doctrines and its aims, we may once again be reduced to a position of subservience, or see the influence of the Church decline. Witness the alarming state of the Philippines after three centuries of Catholicism. Behold Mexico. When have the enemies of the Church ceased in their attacks, or drawn the line as to how far they would go in oppressing us?

If we are not called upon to suffer for the Faith in these countries it is because we are enjoying the fruits of the sufferings of our forefathers. But our fancied security should not make us fail to defend the Faith, whenever and wherever it is attacked. Our pens are our weapons. We should keep them ever ready for use. With the Masonic forces, with their agnostic cult, holding a strong grip on education in North America, we have a tremendous battle to fight, not only to safeguard the Church, but to uphold Christianity.

The Magazine Campaign Against the Pope

ONE of the most outrageous calumnies against Benedict XV, the Italian clergy, and the Catholic Church that has appeared since the beginning of the war, was given a place of prominence in the Saturday Evening Post for February 9. The manner in which that weekly has met the protests of outraged Catholics leaves but one conclusion possible. It is that decent men of every faith, and all good Americans, whose first aim is a united drive against the common enemy, will henceforth feel obliged to avoid a magazine whose editors are either too ignorant to know that they are disseminating calumny, or perfectly willing to malign a religion to which forty per cent. of America's fighting forces give allegiance.

In an article grotesquely misnamed "The Red Cross in Italy," Miss Elizabeth Frazer undertakes to outline the cause of the Italian reverses in the campaign in the North. "The chief coefficients," she finds in "the destructive peace propaganda carried on by the Austrians, the Catholics, and the Italian Socialist party . . . instigated, of course, from Wilhelmstrasse." That is to say, Italian Catholics, and first of all Italian priests, joined with the Socialists, Germans and Austrians, to preach treason. For Miss Frazer leaves us under no manner of misapprehension. "And so peace talk began to spread and to be disseminated—first by the parish priests in obscure country villages among the women whose husbands and sweethearts were bearing the brunt of the war," and, after the ground had been prepared by these false priests, the propaganda was continued by the Socialists and the Austrians. This carefully calculated scale gives to Catholic priests the first place in the ranks of dishonor. "So peace was breathed into their ears by their wives and sweethearts, and voiced openly by the Pope." The result was inevitable. It was the Italian rout.

In view of facts which all the world knows, it is difficult to see how the Saturday Evening Post can advance the excuse of ignorance, or escape the charge of a deliberate attack upon the loyalty of the Italian Catholic clergy and the good faith of the Holy Father. To the patriotism of the hierarchy, the Italian Government itself has borne witness, reluctant, perhaps, but unmistakable. In England, Cardinal Bourne forced the withdrawal of the miserable calumny uttered against the Holy Father by the Morning Post, while certain journals which unwarily preferred charges against Cardinal Merry del Val, were dealt with in summary fashion by the former Papal Secretary of State. How the Saturday Evening Post can have remained in ignorance of these facts is inexplicable. Furthermore, the Cardinal Secretary of State has been followed by a number of the Italian hierarchy in his open challenge to the calumniators of the Italian priesthood. These challenges have been met by further calumny in Italy and France, and now, it would seem, the campaign is to be introduced into the United States by a publication which claims the largest circulation of all American weeklies.

Are Americans, non-Catholics as well as Catholics, prepared to allow the campaign of calumny, engineered by men who hate the Catholic Church simply and solely because they hate Almighty God, to begin its operations in this country? In all good faith, many Americans accepted the persecution of the Church and of the Religious Orders in France, which began some fifteen years ago, as the just revolt of a burdened State against a tyrannical hierarchy. Only within recent years have they begun to understand that the powers which closed the churches in France and expelled inoffensive priests and nuns, are identified with the forces which would gladly tear Almighty God out of the heart of every citizen. It is that same spirit which today engineers the "drive on the Pope." Not without treason to our highest ideals can Americans allow this infamous thing an entrance into our united Christian country. The plain duty of the Saturday Evening Post, and of the Red Cross in Italy, so generously supported by American Catholics in their poverty, is a prompt and complete disavowal of Miss Frazer's utterly unfounded charges.

No Hymns of Hate

THE Committee on Public Information has issued an instruction, urging its "Four-Minute Men" to give no countenance to those insane diatribes against the enemy which have been aptly termed "hymns of hate." By this wise action the Committee has made the country its debtor. Contrary to a rather common persuasion, fostered by certain public journals and public speakers, the Committee believes that even in war hatred is out of place. From the military standpoint, it is always useless, and ordinarily, hurtful. A soldier who spends his hours trying to think up new motives for hating the Turks and the Germans, will have no more time for keen and careful fighting than the old woman who employed all her days in the chimney-corner, nursing her wrath to keep it warm. For "a busy man," observes the Committee,

"thinks mainly of his work," and the work of the soldier is to fight, according to the directions of his superior officer. "Frightful resolves" stirred by the recital of some atrocity, and carried into effect by deeds of individual rashness, have no place in a disciplined army. Our cause is just, and we are battling for the preservation of Christian ideals of truth and honor, which must be kept unscathed, if Europe is to remain civilized. For this reason, if for no other, appeals to so base and selfish a passion as hatred are altogether deplorable.

It is worthy of note, however, that the Committee's excellent instruction seems to be quite unaware of the distinction so familiar to all Catholics, of the vast difference between hating the sin, and hating the sinner. One is a Christian duty, the other, a transgression of the natural as well as of the Christian law. No one ever hated sin as did our Blessed Saviour, because as God, He alone understood its unmeasured evil, yet no one ever bore so great a love to sinners as He who died that they might live. In the present great conflict, we can have nothing but hatred for the greed and dishonor which has brought wo unutterable to half the world. As children of God, followers of Christ, we must hate sin above all things, and show our hatred, first of all, by keeping sin out of our own souls, and by doing all that we can to keep it from the souls of others. But in our conduct towards the sinner himself we fallible and short-sighted mortals can strive for no higher model than is exhibited in Him who was called the Friend of sinners. To give all that our country asks, generously and in abundance, that the war may be brought to a successful conclusion, thereby re-establishing the world on a firmer basis of peace and prosperity, is our plain duty, both as Catholics and as citizens. But as for those who are our enemies, let us ask from on high the strength which will enable us to utter with sincerity the words of our Blessed Saviour on Calvary, "Father, forgive them." For in truth, "they know not what they do."

Foolish Imaginings

THE sinking of the Tuscania and the consequent anxiety that tortured countless hearts in the interval between the announcement of the fact and the publication of the names of the victims have emphasized a tendency of the human mind which it is worth while to point out. By some strange inborn fatality the imagination of those who love is prone to run riot in timorous apprehension and gloomy foreboding upon the least pretext. By preference it conjures up the very worst and paints the most improbable disasters in such vivid colors as to give them a semblance of reality when they are only the creations of a disordered fancy. Men and women, who are wise, exercise a strong control over their imaginations and refuse to accept hallucinations as facts.

It is nothing less than folly to weep over the possible contingencies of the future. They may never come to pass, and in that case the tears shed over them are idle. There is no justification for the weakness of those who torment themselves with the prospect of sorrows that may never materialize; and people who allow themselves to be made the sport of such illusions show a lack of self-control that is reprehensible. Sensible people turn their minds from the contemplation of foolish phantasms almost as ruthlessly as they do from thoughts against faith. Such imaginings can only do harm, they cannot possibly do good. Wise precautions, based on cold reason, should of course be taken to prevent catastrophes; but to let the fantasy dangle before the anguished mind the details of cruel bereavement or bitter sufferings, that are at most merely possibilities, is not only useless but positively wrong. Let us wait until such things actually come to pass, we shall then have time, and enough, to lament them.

Savage Philosophy

QUITE recently a writer in a popular magazine denounced with a great show of indignation the "savage" philosophy of Prussia. To it he laid the world's ills, the groans and wasted blood of men, the sighs and tears of women and children. And he was right, for the Prussian military caste, intent on rapine, found a ready instrument of infamy in Kant, Goethe and Nietzsche, three apostles of emotion, who did much to obliterate from men's minds the saving idea of an objective norm of truth, entirely distinct from human whims and superior to them. The progress from Kant's practical reason, through Goethe's Gefühl ist alles to "Zarathustra," on whose pages the superman howls like an enraged demon, is easy and swift, for once emotions are exalted above intellect and will, degeneracy is instant to follow. The higher passions of the soul are soon submerged by the lower, and the claws of the beast forthwith appear. This is just what happened in Prussia, to the delight of the army, which was quick to erect the philosophy of crass passions into a coherent system of sheer brutality which aggrandizes itself at the cost of the blood of innocent folk.

The popular writer was correct in his estimate of Prussianism, but it is to be regretted that his drive ended with philosophy. A step further would have brought him to Prussian theology as evolved and expounded by such men as Ritschl and Schleiermacher. In this he would have found cause for more furious epithets, more vigorous denunciations. But perhaps he was sensitive of the feelings of theologians, and in the present crisis this is not a bad trait. But it is distinctly bad, and maybe cowardly, not to have uttered a word of warning against destructive tendencies in American thought. Such exist and have existed for some time past. Indeed, it is difficult to see how any German could be more lawless than Emerson, for instance; more blasphemous than Alcott, more reckless of standards than James. We have been saved from Prussianism not because our philosophy has been better than Prussia's, but rather because the individualism and innate sense of decency of most Americans prevented the erection of blasphemy and wild emotions into a system. For this we should be thankful, and in gratitude for our escape from such turpitude we should see to it that America shall never be brought to blush because of the ravings of those who set themselves up as leaders of thought.

The Good Novelist's Tasks

THE late Mgr. Benson believed that nowadays the most effective way of teaching apologetics is through the medium of the artistically constructed novel. How successful he himself was in making that conviction practical is proved by the vogue his works of fiction have enjoyed. Protestants and agnostics who read his stories eagerly imbibed without realizing it the principles of Catholic belief and practice, while the children of the Church, who followed absorbingly the arguments for the truths of Catholicism which he so deftly wove into his plots, finished each successive Benson-book prouder than ever of their faith and better equipped than before to defend it. Such authors as John Ayscough, Canon Sheehan, Henri Bordeaux, René Bazin, Henry Harland, Mrs. Craigie and Miss Clarke in their novels have achieved with consummate artistry the same objects as Mgr. Benson. The tasks these authors set themselves are not easy ones to accomplish. For the thoughtful and responsible writer of today, as described by Professor Sherman, must know:

> How to present a view of life both wise and brave, answering to experience as well as to desire, serviceable to art as in the daily walk . . . How to give pleasure without corrupting the heart, and how to give wisdom without chilling it. How to bring into play the great passions of men without unchaining the beast . . . How to recognize the role of the nerves in human actions without paralyzing the nerve of action. How to admit the weakness of man without dashing his heroism. How to see his acts and respect his intentions. How to renounce his superstitions and retain his faith. How to rebuke without despising him. How to reform society without rebelling against it. How to laugh at its follies without falling into contempt. How to believe that evil is fleeing forever before good, but will never be overtaken and slain. How to look back upon a thousand defeats, and yet cling to the fighting hope.

If every high-principled fictionist, while keeping the interest of his readers sustained, and maintaining a fine quality of literary workmanship, has to discover a satisfying solution of the foregoing problems, a Catholic novelist, who is gifted with the qualities requisite for a successful story-teller, ought to find the problems mentioned easier to meet and settle than does the Protestant or unbelieving writer. For the Catholic novelist has at his command the deep knowledge of the human heart possessed by the ancient Church; he hears her living voice explaining the meaning and the application of God's eternal laws, and he knows with the certainty of Divine faith that her teaching is true.

But the Catholic novelist, however gifted he may be, seems fated to receive but scanty practical appreciation from large numbers of his coreligionists. Some will praise him enthusiastically but seldom read his books. Other Catholics, largely of the "wish-bone" type, will greet the mention of his name with a scornful sniff and bury themselves in a best-seller that "everybody is reading." Larger numbers still, because they have never learned to feel interest in any "literature" but the newspapers and the cheap magazines, are not even aware that Catholic novels exist. An excellent Lenten "devotion" for these three classes of Catholics to adopt would be the cultivation of a first-hand acquaintance with the works of our standard Catholic novelists.

Soldiers at Attention

FROM Camp Johnston, in Jacksonville, Florida, comes a letter which doubtless is but one of many that could be written in a similar vein. It tells of the wonderful success of a mission just given to our soldier boys by four Dominican Fathers. So great were the throngs in attendance that it was necessary to hold four services each day. At the earliest Mass two of the priests were daily occupied for more than half an hour in giving Communion to the men. Yet to attend this Mass the Catholic soldiers were obliged to rise an hour before reveille. On the closing day of the mission two priests continued for over an hour and a half to distribute the Holy Eucharist to the rows of eager soldiers that succeeded each other without intermission at the Holy Table. Some 2,000 listened in the open air to Father Cahill's closing peal of eloquence, impassioned with patriotic fire.

> A great deal of apostolic work is done by the men, writes the Knights of Columbus chaplain apropos of the Massachusetts soldiers gathered in this camp. They bring in delinquents, and those out of the fold who seek for instruction. Their religion is as open as a book. They do not parade it; they simply live it with great simplicity. Thus a number of them, on the way from the North, did not hesitate to recite their beads in public. "How many Catholics here?" asked one of them as he looked about in the car. Twenty or more gave the sign. "Come on up to the front and say the beads." There they gathered, knelt down, and said their rosary aloud. I tell them, adds the chaplain with enthusiasm, they put the "Mass" in Massachusetts.

In this spirit of religious devotion our country possesses the most unfailing assurance of success that can be given her. These men will be loyal to their Flag as to their Faith. They will be an honor to their nation as to their Church. They will preserve their hearts pure and their thoughts chaste, so that the strength of each will be as the strength of ten. They will not flinch before the foe as they do not flinch before those who might fail to respect the sacredness of their religious devotion. They will, in fine, respect the dignity of womanhood, whether at home or abroad, as they honor in the sight of men the Virgin Motherhood of her who brought to us the world's salvation, Christ her Son, the Model of every militant Catholic.

Literature

"MY FAVORITE AUTHOR"

IF you have ever made the experiment you have perhaps already noticed that few of your friends have favorite books or authors; and that of those few fewer still honestly enjoy a real favorite. Real favorites, I say, because it is so easy to deceive one's self in selecting or declaring a favorite author; and even if one has selected and declared, having is not using, nor is saying doing.

Where we are most apt to deceive ourselves in a "favorite" is with the vogue authors. Here that most elusive elf, vanity, will change mud to gold before our very eyes. What a pity it is to hear a high-school innocent proclaiming her infatuation with Browning when we know that not even the dons have cracked the Browning nut! The story of the society belle who had sounded the depths of Scott is not exaggerated. She was expressing her love of Sir Walter to a Southern colonel in terms like "adorable Ivanhoe," "enthralling Kenilworth," "sublime Guy Mannering" and so on, until at last the colonel coughed knowingly and asked for an appreciation of "Scott's Emulsion." "More wonderful than Ivanhoe!" was the exclamation. Such a blind friendship with vogue authors is not rare. We are too prone to read an author because other people do so, to be up to date. We profess to enjoy his company because fashion says he is a remarkable writer. If this is the way we reckon our favorite author, then those charming personalities who attract us on an initial meeting when all we know of their characters or sympathies has come by hearsay, may be said to be our favorite friends. How many air-baskets would not Aristophanes have for vogue authors if he lived today, that their coterie of gullibles might clasp hands in rapture, affecting to love what they do not in the least understand and to understand what they have never thought about at all!

Sometimes it happens that the vogue author is our favorite because he satisfies our passion for excitement rather than our thirst for friendship. O. Henry or Rudyard Kipling may become our favorites merely because they are full of the little surprises of life, require little of our attention, and are easy reading. True, most readers will have these "delightful writers" for friends and find in them much to love and admire, but these friendships are not based on sympathies that elevate and inspire.

Closely allied to the vogue favorite is the authorized favorite. Here instead of fashion or love of ease being the tyrant over our predilections it is literary authority. Of course, there is nothing like favoring the very best, but it is not necessary, and often not discreet. When we choose our friends we favor those whom, according to principle, we like best as most suitable for us. Shakespeare and Milton, Scott and Dickens, Burke and Newman are not the best authors for every spirit, much less favorites. Nine out of ten times those who boast of them as favorites must get in the rear and push themselves to read them. They are then favorites of the will, not of the heart. Because Olympus thunders "Shakespeare," we tie ourselves down to that book and suffer the embarrassment of misplaced sympathies instead of turning to more simple and congenial authors until the time is ripe for making a more hearty and hopeful trial.

The making of true friends can seldom be forced. Kindred spirits meet, smile, shake hands and fuse together unconsciously. If you find a best author your best friend, very well. Richard Grant White says something about reaching from his rocking horse—or was it his high-chair?—for his Shakespeare. A happy predilection! We can surely learn to love the best authors, and every encouragement should be given to the person who says "I will"; but only when we have learned to give them the first place in our hearts, and not during the days of formalities, can we honestly call them our favorites. Our first meeting with books is generally vicarious. And the grown-up who introduces us may become a good or a bad angel for us. A youth of twenty once startled a friend by declaring that he was four books deep in his third reading of Dickens. His explanation was that when fourteen, while reading Conan Doyle, his father had suggested that he was old enough to be trying Dickens or Scott, and he had done so with blessed results, now finding in Dickens his best of friends.

There is generally something wrong, too, with the man who has too many favorites, or is constantly changing them. Newman could wander from Addison to Johnson and Gibbon, but always with Cicero at his side. Stevenson could make out a list of "books that have influenced me," but must lead off with Shakespeare, and suggest a special mark of affection for his favorite, Hamlet. Most people will give a whole list of "favorites" with the appendix "I liked them all." But it is often this indefiniteness or fluctuation that hinders their making true particular book-friends. They are like the religious novice who was accused of having "particular" friends. The accuser kept giving names until over half the community had been mentioned; then the novice-master interposed with: "Well, if everyone is his particular friend, he has no favorite."

In the cases mentioned it is clear how one may be deceived in avowing a favorite author. A real favorite is rarer than a particular friend. Your best friend is not likely to be one imposed by fashion or authority, nor a mere popular good-fellow, nor a puppet of self-indulgence, nor one of a dozen equals amidst whom you vacillate. Favorite authors of these stamps are to be suspected. It is better to start all over and to cultivate a true favorite than to be deceived in the possession of a false one.

After all it is a matter of taste whether we favor this or that author. But in any case he must be a friend we like particularly well and preferred before all others, with nothing small or forced in our affections. One we can turn to at any time to feed our minds and console our spirits. In hours of silence he takes us along the paths of happiness, teaching us how to rejoice with simplicity and heartiness, and to act with sincerity and effectiveness, drawing always a smile for mean ambitions and unworthy aims. And when the hours are dark and all seems against us he opens his arms and speaks of courage and love, of the wise and beautiful things of life, or suffering and kindness and God. His old familiar thoughts, his noble feelings, his warm sympathies, studied time and time again, feed our hearts rather than our minds, and give a meaning to life and its nobler things that grows on us with each reading. This friend that knows so much of life, that speaks so well and sympathizes so perfectly with us—this is our favorite author.

A writer once asked what author besides the spiritual writers his readers would take to the death-chamber if given a month to live. Have you one to take? Which one? That is your favorite author.

REVIEWS

Epistemology, or the Theory of Knowledge, An Introduction to General Metaphysics. By P. COFFEY, Ph.D. 2 Vols. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. $7.50.

The thinking Catholic who is familiar with Dr. Coffey's excellent volumes on logic and ontology will welcome any philosophical treatise written for our schools of philosophy by this distinguished master. His preceding books combine clear treatment and an attractive style with a thoroughness unequaled in English text-books on scholastic doctrines. Nor in this respect do they surpass the two volumes under review, which treat of human knowledge itself and the truth-value of that knowledge. Since many a system of false philosophy has gained vogue in schools because of the smooth insinuating style of its author, it is gratifying to find the true doctrine presented as attractively as Dr. Coffey presents it. Outlines of Catholic philosophy we have in abundance, and jejune text-books are multiplied to excess, but their frail frame needs the vivifying spirit of the professor's exposition.

The introduction of the work gives in historical outline the rise and development of theories of knowledge, and calls attention to the fact that the forerunners of the Cartesian and Kantian systems of epistemology lived some centuries before the Christian era; relativism and subjectivism received merely a popular recrudescence at the hands of Descartes and the seer of Jena, Greek sophists and Platonic academies having been long since ready-made prototypes. It is a pleasure to note that the author gives well-merited credit to the lately published manual of philosophy of Père Jeannière, S.J. While the present volumes are designed by their author as "primarily a text-book for the use of university students in philosophy," they are invaluable to the critical inquirer who would have in transparent English a clear and safe solution of those knotty problems which ever cling to the knowing of knowledge. The difficult question of evidence, the supreme criterion of truth and the ultimate motive of certitude, is elaborated per longum et latum, though there is necessarily presupposed a full knowledge of the author's volumes on the science of truth. Pragmatism and humanism, popularized by James and Dewey in this country, by Bergson in France and Schiller in England, and still holding sway as our latest philosophical fashion, are treated with conciseness and precision, the dilemmatic syllogism serving as the weapon of attack. Three main arguments are marshaled against the pragmatic school: its logical demolishment of all intellectualism, its self-contraction in the relativity of truth and its disastrous moral consequences. The popularity of pragmatism in this country is easily explained by our business tendency, which would put all things, even objective truth, on a strictly practical basis. A splendid refutation of this doctrine is found in the latter half of the second volume. W. C. N.

The Riddles of Hamlet and the Newest Answers. By SIMON A. BLACKMORE, S.J., A.M., Litt.D. Boston: The Stratford Company. $2.00.

So much has been written about the plays of Shakespeare in general and about Hamlet in particular that it seems as if nothing remained to be said, or at least nothing worth saying. And yet the volume before us proves that Father Blackmore found something new to say, and has said it well. He is intimately acquainted with the principal commentators of Hamlet, but his book is not a mere compilation. Where commentators disagree he ventures to decide, after summing up and weighing the arguments pro and con. He supplies a vast amount of erudition in a comparatively small space, and for that reason his book will be a great saving of time and a valuable aid to Shakespearean scholars, whether professors or students. The most original feature of the book is that it furnishes a new answer to old riddles by viewing controverted points in the light of Hamlet's religion. He shows that the hero was a Catholic by birth and education, that his faith was a living, abiding influence within him, and that his conduct throughout the play must be interpreted according to the principles of Catholicism. This point of view constitutes the chief merit of the book.

The 500-page volume is divided into two parts. The first part treats of general topics and collateral matter. The second is a detailed commentary. The first chapter examines how far the principal characters can be identified with the contemporaries of Shakespeare. In melancholy and weariness of the world, Hamlet resembles the dramatist himself; in other respects he bears a striking resemblance to Sir Philip Sidney, who was a favorite at the court of Queen Elizabeth. The next four chapters discuss the religion of Denmark in Hamlet's day, his education in Germany, and show that he was not a Positivist, a Pantheist or a Protestant, but a Catholic born and bred. The following chapters expose the nullity of the Queen's marriage, Hamlet's claim to the throne, his supposed madness, his apparent vacillation and other alleged defects of character. The writer holds that to admit the real madness of the Prince is to strip the tragedy of a tragic motive. The hero's hesitation is not due to excessive thinking or to weakness of will, but to real conscientious scruples. He wanted to be quite sure of his uncle's guilt before striking the avenging blow. On this and other important questions it is interesting and instructive to note how the author in his new and well-sustained views controverts the opinions of many famous critics of the past three centuries. The book is an invaluable contribution to Shakespearean literature. The writer lectured on the great dramatist for many years, and the maturity of his scholarship is reflected in his book. G. N.

Locomotor Ataxia (Tabes Dorsalis). An Introduction to the Study and Treatment of Nervous Diseases, for Students and Practitioners. By WILLIAM J. M. A. MALONEY, M.D. (Edin). New York: D. Appleton & Co., $3.50.

Locomotor ataxia, or tabes, is a severe disease of the spinal cord which always interferes seriously with locomotion, sometimes makes the patient absolutely bedridden and occasionally adds blindness to its other symptoms. It is probably the most studied of nervous affections, for there is scarcely a distinguished neurologist for the past two generations since the discovery of the disease who has not paid special attention to it. To make a fresh contribution to the subject of locomotor ataxia therefore is a difficult matter. Yet undoubtedly this is what Dr. Maloney has succeeded in doing, for he has invented a mode of treatment not by using drugs, but by so teaching locomotion that bedridden patients have been enabled to walk and those who could get along only with a pair of crutches or a pair of canes have been able to dispense altogether with such aids. The incapacity to walk is due to the loss or the serious disturbance of sensory nerves and the consequent distrust of self which comes as the result of the obscure messages that reach the brain from the affected limbs.

It had long been noted that in the cases where the disease attacked the eyes and blindness resulted, patients suffered much less from ataxia, that is from loss of their power of co-ordination of muscles. Usually the tabetic patient helps out his defective sensations from his limbs by the help of vision and this had always been encouraged by those who have previously treated the disease. Recalling the better co-ordination of blind tabetics, Dr. Maloney blindfolded some of these patients and found that they could be retaught to walk better when they were not disturbed by having to pay so much attention to themselves through their eyes. His observations have thrown so much new light on the whole subject of locomotor ataxia, and have cleared up so many obscure points that his system of treatment will undoubtedly serve to enable a great many who have felt quite incapacitated for ordinary locomotion not only to get out of bed and out of their houses, but even to take up work which they had abandoned before. The book, however, contains much more than the story of Dr. Maloney's discovery, its application and its development, for there is probably no study of locomotor ataxia issued in recent years—and there are many—that is so valuable and suggestive as this. Most of the work was done while the author was Professor of Neurology at the Fordham University School of Medicine. J. J. W.

Fabulae Tusculanae. Fasc. I-V. Palaestra. Part I. By ARCADIUS AVELLANUS. New York, 61 West Fifty-second Street.

The series of pamphlets issued by Mr. Arcadius Avellanus, under the general title of the "Tusculan System," is a demonstration of the direct method of teaching Latin for actual use in the classroom. It consists of two parts. The first, "Palaestra," is the primer of the system, which, when completed, will consist of thirty brochures of about sixteen pages each. The second, "Fabulae Tuscalanae," a reader made up of fables, old and new, is supplementary to "Palaestra," and designed for use in connection with a Latin grammar. The entire course is calculated to occupy the four years of high-school Latin, and professes to put the student in ready command of an enormous vocabulary and to furnish him with a working knowledge of the principles of syntax, prosody and versification.

This is rather an audacious program, but, at all events, the system has a great deal to commend it. As a manual of the direct method, "Palaestra" is easier to handle than anything of the kind we have seen. For instance, the first lesson, teacher at the blackboard, begins with such obvious pronouncements as "Hoc est punctum," and "Haec est linea," and by ringing the changes on similar phrases throughout some twelve lessons, teacher and pupil find themselves after a week or two running into such adventurous excursions as "Sunt aliquae litterae quae sunt lineae curvae, tales sunt B, C et etiam aliae; sed litterae A et Z, quae sunt prima et ultima, nequaquam sunt litterae curvae, sed rectae, obliquae et planae."

To the system as a whole one practical objection presents itself: to adopt it would involve a radical change in the Latin curriculum sanctioned by long usage and by present authority. Cæsar, Cicero and Vergil would be banished from the high school and consigned to the college class exclusively, and hence a large number of students who end their studies with the high school would bid good-bye to Latin before achieving the very end for which—possibly—Latin is set before them. I say possibly; for indeed this is the very crux of the Latin question. We can never decide on the merits of this system or of any other, until we make up our minds what precisely our purpose is in teaching Latin at all. Do we teach Latin primarily that our pupils may be able to speak Latin? Is it in order to acquaint them with the Latin masterpieces of expression? Is it to bring them into contact with Roman life and thought? Is it to cultivate their thinking powers by guiding them through the nice exactitudes of Latin syntax? Here are four distinct ends that would naturally be reached by four distinct methods of teaching. Which one do our Latin teachers set before them as their prime motive? To an observer they would seem to be groping after all four ends promiscuously; and who can be surprised if there is indecision in adopting and adhering steadily to any fixed program?

A Glory of Maryland. Poem by M. S. PINE, Philadelphia; The Salesian Press, $1.00.

Despite much talking about a renaissance in poetry, rarely does one see a biography done in verse. Yet this is what Sister Mary Paulina of the Georgetown Visitation Convent has successfully accomplished. The subject, whose life-story is the central theme of the poem, is the Most Rev. Leonard Neale, D.D., missionary and apostle of Maryland during our great Republic's period of construction. The chief events of the zealous Archbishop's life, as priest of the Society of Jesus, missionary in British Guiana, Vicar-General, President of Georgetown College, and Archbishop of Baltimore, are related in such a way as to win the reader's admiration. The author has a gift of expression peculiar to poets who deal in the heroic, as is evidenced by the following apostrophe to the Papacy:

O glorious and undying Papacy!
Since Christ from His exultant tomb hath risen
Thou speakest! Thy great Creation hath the race
Endued with virtue, might, divinest love—
Fruit of thy Heaven-made Democracy.
Thy years are ages; lo! the people move
In multitudinous review
Before thy throne, firm-set as earth,
And sink with kings and dynasties into Oblivion's arms; while thou shalt boast new birth
Successive, of thy spirit sovereignty
O'er the wide emerald globe and watery main. . . .

The poem contains an admirable encomium of the religious state, tributes to the great pioneers of Catholicism in the United States, together with a resumé of the Church's progress during a century or more of its American existence. Notes on the chief characters and the historical events referred to will be found interesting and instructive. J. H. C.

The Cruise of the Corwin. Journal of the Arctic Expedition of 1881 in Search of De Long and the Jeannette. By JOHN MUIR. Edited by WILLIAM FREDERIC BADÈ. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Co. $2.75.

In July, 1879, Lieutenant George De Long, an American naval officer, set sail from San Francisco in the steam yacht Jeannette in search of the North Pole. Two years later, as it subsequently transpired, the vessel was crushed in the ice and De Long, with ten of his crew of thirty-four, died of exposure and starvation. "The Cruise of the Corwin" is the log of the ship that made an unsuccessful attempt to save Lieutenant De Long and his party. Early in the volume there is a good account of the Aleutian Islands, and their Indian inhabitants, who numbered in 1881 about 2,000, and whose chief occupation was to kill and flay the 100,000 seals taken annually by the Alaskan Commercial Co. Another interesting portion of the volume is the author's description of the Siberian Chukchirs, a hardy Mongolian race, who can sleep peacefully in the open air, with heads uncovered, while an icy wind sweeps by. The author jots down the observations he made of the flora, the fauna and the glaciation of the regions visited during the cruise, gives gruesome pictures of the villages filled with the corpses of Eskimos, who had starved to death, and he has a particularly interesting chapter on "Tragedies of the Whaling Fleet." Mr. Muir writes that in 1871 thirty-three vessels were destroyed at once by a huge ice pack, but their crews escaped. In several places in the book the Arctic hunter is roundly berated for his harsh "treatment of his brother beasts," whose "rights" he refuses to recognize. But the moment the Siberian walruses, reindeer and polar bears begin to be conscious of their "duties," a society will no doubt be formed to protect their "rights." W. D.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

The February 22 number of the Catholic Mind contains Professor Alfred J. Rahilly's lecture on "Faith and Facts," which he delivered before the Catholic students of University College, Cork. He examines the testimony which such well-known unbelievers as Gibbon, Renan, Huxley and Darwin have given regarding the way they lost their faith in Christianity, and shows that the unbelief preceded the investigation of alleged facts. He remarks:

> When I am told that such and such a one has suddenly lost the faith by reading a book or by dissecting a slug, I do not for a moment believe that this is the full explanation. His faith was for years being slowly undermined by his own carelessness, it was atrophied from mere disuse, and when the shock came it snapped. Mind, I do not say > that every unbeliever is leading a bad life; that would be a grossly unfair accusation. But I do say that faith is generally lost by disuse or neglect. If you were to lose your eye or your hand, it might be through some disease or cancer. But it is also quite possible to lose it through mere atrophy and want of functioning, in a word, through sheer local starvation. Now faith is sight. You may lose your spiritual sight by acquiring some moral disease, or you may lose it simply by living always in the dark. Men lose their faith because they become blind.

The second paper in the number is the address Edward P. Kilgalen made to the soldiers of Camp Meade, Maryland, on "The Seminarian and the Soldier."

It is to be regretted that the brave and light-hearted soldier who writes such an interesting account of his war-experiences from the day of his enlistment in the First Canadian Contingent until a German bullet put him out of the fight at Ypres, has not a better developed sense of religious and spiritual values. The presence of such an element would round off the book and fill up the gap which everyone who reads the story of "Private Peat" (Bobbs-Merrill, $1.50) will regretfully observe. The gallant soldier's notions of religion are quite primitive, some of them very unsound. Few war books are so racy, lifelike and full of incident as this. It is not at all of the bookish kind, but records the thoughts and views of a thorough-going soldier set down without gloss or varnish and in right soldierly fashion. It is a vivid picture of all the horrors and, if there be such a thing, the humors of war.

The average reader will probably be unable to make much out of F. Matthias Alexander's "Man's Supreme Inheritance" (Dutton, $2.00). The book seems to be a jumble of New Thought, Christian Science, evolution, "free expression" and what not. It would appear that the war can be brought to a speedy end, and success and happiness placed within the grasp of everybody if children are only taught to keep an "open mind" and to stand, sit and breathe correctly. There are some good pages on children's play.——Another book which aims to keep the body a perfect instrument of the soul by doing "fifteen minutes work a day for health's sake," is J. P. Müller's "My System" (G. E. Stechert & Co., New York, $1.00). Forty-four illustrations accompany the detailed description in the text of how to do the various physical exercises prescribed.——"The Theory and Practice of Educational Gymnastics, for Boys' and Girls' High Schools" (John Joseph McVey, Philadelphia, $1.25), by William A. Stretcher, B.S.G., a useful book for gymnasium directors, contains a variety of exercises for boys and girls who range between the ages of eight and twenty.

In "George Edward Woodberry" (Poetry Review Co., Cambridge, Mass.), Louis V. Ledoux studies the philosophy and the art of the bard of Beverly. The tribute paid to him by his highly eulogistic but evidently sincere admirer, is in many ways deserved. The sketch is concerned only with the poetry of Mr. Woodberry and leaves out of the question the prose writings by which he is perhaps little known. Mr. Woodberry, as his admirer admits, is a poet's poet. Perhaps he will never have a very wide appeal, but thanks to his idealism, his broad sympathy with his fellows and the spiritual note so clearly uttered in his verse he deserves a high place among our American singers.——"Growth in Silence" (Putnam, $1.50) by Susanna Cocroft, is a collection of essays with a hazy sort of social uplift for their theme and a false philosophy and theology for their foundation. An altruism that relies in a pantheistic view of life for its cogency and which must be bolstered up by a denial of hell, rejection of all dogma by fiducial faith and private interpretation of the Bible is foredoomed. Vague generalities, inaccurate definitions and half-truths abound and they are stated with an air of finality and oracular assurance quite inconsistent in a book which relegates all dogma to the rubbish heap. Of course, some good things are said, and said well, but this is in spite of the false principles on which the essays are based.

"The Prison and the Prisoner" (Little, Brown, $2.50) is a symposium of fourteen essays outlining the principles and spirit of modern penology. Among the contributors are noted the names of Judge Wadhams, Earl Kirchwey, George Gordon Battle, Dr. Salmon and Thomas Mott Osborne; among the topics treated are the "Indeterminate Sentence," "Mutual Welfare League," "Industrial Training," "Community Centers" and "The Delinquent." The collection is announced by the editor, Julia K. Jaffray, as containing the result of seven years of study and investigation by the National Committee on Prisons and Prison Labor and as constituting a broad, scientific background of fact upon which can be based in future years the training of prison workers, the reform of our institutions and the individual study of their inmates. The unstinted praise accorded the indeterminate sentence is at variance with the recent condemnation of the same made by Justice Cropsey while imposing a light sentence on a politician convicted of primary frauds. The new Sing Sing calls for a receiving station and clearing house for all New York State prisoners. Here they will undergo a probationary period of three months during which will be given medical and mental treatment and a record of their life-history, ancestry, character and aptitudes carefully drawn up. Then will follow a distribution to other institutions. Affiliation to some other university is suggested to enable prisoners to follow extension courses. In view of all the improvements planned for the new Sing Sing, the Ossining prison would appear to be a very attractive home.

"The Historical Development of Religion in China" (Dutton, $2.00), by W. J. Clennell, has for its purpose to show the influence that various stages of Chinese history have had on the progress of religious belief in that country. The method of treatment is popular, not technical, and withal so plausible that heresy and false philosophy lurk almost unperceived. For instance, in seeking to explain the acceptance of Buddhism, Taoism, Confucianism and Christianity the author must fall back on Modernism and define religion as "those universal and eternal experiences which uplift the heart." "As experience expands, institutions and doctrines must adapt themselves to these various stages of growth and knowledge." Mere human cults may have appealed to Chinamen in proportion to their power to satisfy some natural craving, but Catholicism is God-given and no evolution of man can outgrow the obligation to live up to its teachings, once they have been freely embraced. Indeed all such evolution as the author holds must be rejected for it is based on the principle that moral values are shifting and not eternally measured by God's eternal decrees. He speaks flippantly of saints and sacred things, has a horror for ritual and dogma and ceremony, and of course glorifies the Reformation. Though the author expresses admiration for the Catholic missionaries that labored for souls in China, he does not always appreciate the purity of their motives.

In the revised edition of their "Laboratory Exercises to Accompany 'First Principles of Chemistry'" (Allyn & Bacon), Messrs. Brownlee, Fuller, Hancock, Sohon and Whitsit have produced practically a new work, both in substance and form. Many fresh experiments have been added, offering a great range of material, and those that also appeared in the original manual have been remodeled and improved. The laboratory directions are well detailed, especially in the first experiments where the student has need of extra help, and a number of new drawings and half-tones have been added. The characteristic feature of the new manual, however, appears in the helpful questions asked in each experiment. A few of the experiments seem to be beyond the range of the ordinary high-school student, but many of them are required by certain State departments of education.——"Espana Pintoresca, the Life and Customs of Spain in Story and Legend" (Ginn), by Carolina Marcial Dorado, deserves a hearty welcome from teachers of elementary Spanish. The editor, realizing that sympathy with the manners of and customs of a people is necessary for a right understanding of a country's literature, has succeeded in presenting a faithful picture of heroic Catholic Spain, almost every phase of Spanish life and character seem to be represented. The selections in prose and verse being intended for beginners are simple and the imitation exercises and the questions based on the text should prove helpful and suggestive.

In Louise Collier Willcox's "A Manual of Mystic Verse" (Dutton, $1.25), a new edition of an anthology which first appeared seven years ago under the title, "A Manual of Spiritual Fortification," there are good selections from such Catholic poets as Coventry Patmore, Father Hopkins, Alice Meynell, Louise Imogen Guiney, Francis Thompson, etc. These stanzas called "The Happiest Heart," by John Vance Cheney, are less familiar than most of the compiler's selections:

Who drives the horses of the sun
  Shall lord it but a day;
Better the lowly deed were done,
  And kept the humble way.

The rust shall find the sword of fame,
  The dust will hide the crown;
Ay, none shall nail so high his name
  Time will not tear it down.

The happiest heart that ever beat
  Was in some quiet breast
That found the common daylight sweet,
  And left to Heaven the rest.

American Social Legislation.

FOR a number of years our country lagged behind the rest of the civilized world in matters of social legislation. The mental attitude of our people favored a policy of extreme individualism, and saw little need of concern about the welfare of the working masses. They were complacently supposed to be in far better circumstances and to enjoy greater opportunities than their unfortunate European brethren. When unpleasant murmurs of discontent began to disillusion us and to disquiet our smug self-satisfaction, the peculiarities of our Constitution rendered futile for a while our first legislative attempts to remedy a situation whose crying evils were fast becoming obvious to even the least discerning.

As we grew to be an intensely industrial nation, industrial accidents became more numerous. They generally incapacitated the worker for some time, and often were followed by total disability or death, leaving his dependents in want. The claim agent at times settled with the latter for a small monetary consideration and a waiver. Workmen had no other means of redress except through long and costly litigation against rich and powerful employers, who were often determined to evade responsibility and the payment of compensation by all the means which the law put at their disposal. The outcome, always uncertain, was frequently disappointing. This patent and exasperating injustice became a most prolific source of discontent, the more so when set over against the ever-increasing dividends of the large corporations, responsible for the greatest number of accidents.

Social Legislation in Germany

IN Europe this same problem had become acute long before we began to realize how pregnant it is with consequences fateful in their import, unless dealt with in a spirit of justice and fair play. Having to face the mounting tide of Socialism and its strident but sometimes equitable demands, Germany was compelled very early to turn her attention to the solution of this and related questions deeply affecting the welfare of the working masses and ultimately of the whole State. In 1876 the Sickness Insurance bill received the sanction of the imperial parliament. The Accident Insurance law, passed in 1884, became operative in 1885. The Act for Insurance Against Old Age and Invalidity was approved in 1889 and completed the trio of the laws which constitute the component parts of the German social insurance system. These laws were consolidated and codified by the Insurance Consolidation Act of 1911. While at first limited in scope, they were eventually extended to all classes of workers, and made practically universal in their application. Though insurance is made compulsory by law, it would be erroneous to suppose that it is a State insurance system; for, with the exception of the old age and invalidity pensions, the Government makes no contributions to the insurance funds. Thus the Sickness Insurance bill prescribes that the employers shall contribute one-third and the employees two-thirds of the funds necessary for the support of the system.

Social Legislation in England

THE adoption of the workmen's compensation principle in England and its enactment into law were very gradual and of more recent date than the German system. The latter was formulated and adopted in its entirety as a well-defined social program, in an extension of the recognized function of the State to further the welfare of all its citizens. The English Workmen's Compensation Act, on the contrary, was the forerunner of a more complete program of social insurance. Its adoption was slow because it involved the repudiation of the individualistic principles which had long been dear to the ruling British theoretical economists of the Manchester school. It was brought into being gradually as the result of constant agitation against various specific evils of which the workman was the frequent and helpless victim.

The first Workmen's Compensation Act in England was passed in 1897. It applied only to undertakings that might be classified as hazardous. But it was amended in 1900 and again in 1906 so as to make its application practically universal, covering all occupations. This law was the cornerstone of the English social insurance system. There were added an old age pension scheme adopted in 1908 and extended in 1909; a system of sickness insurance through the National Insurance Act of 1911, and an experimental scheme of insurance against unemployment limited in its scope to the building and engineering trades, also established by the National Insurance Act. State paternalism was developed on a larger scale than in Germany. Thus the old age pension scheme is supported wholly by the Government. So is the system of unemployment insurance. The sickness insurance system is supported by contributions from the employer, the employee and the State. The German system was for a number of years the subject of sharp criticism in England, and hence the country's thorough conversion to the principle of social insurance, largely through the efforts of Lloyd George, is all the more significant.

Beginnings of American Labor Legislation

WITH the more complete industrial development of the United States and the endless litigation resulting from accidental injuries, an agitation for the enactment of laws similar to those of Germany and England, but suited to American conditions, was gradually brought about. No determined program was followed. The first steps toward the adoption of the workmen's compensation principle were taken by the enactment of many laws to ameliorate labor conditions. Such were the laws relating to the hours of labor; the laws relating to safety and health in industry, in transportation by land or water, in mining and other underground work; and still other laws relating to the employment of women and children. The number of these laws became truly bewildering, and may be appreciated by the statement that the labor laws in force at the end of 1913, as published by the Bureau of Labor Statistics, Department of Labor, Washington, fill two volumes of nearly 2,500 printed pages.

The State labor departments, acting through factory inspectors, were charged with the duty of enforcing these laws. But their very number and variety precluded adequate enforcement. Moreover the inspectors in many cases were political appointees, without due qualifications for their work, which consequently was done in a perfunctory manner. The laws on the statute books made for better conditions. Accidents, however, kept increasing in frequency and severity, because the administration of the law and the enforcement of rights remained subject to the older forms of procedure necessitating litigation in many cases where the employer refused to recognize his liability towards an employee.

Legislative Difficulties

IT became increasingly clear that any amendment of the common law, however well-intentioned, would fall short of the needs to be met. The problem could be solved only by a system under which industry would be compelled to compensate for the injuries which it caused, thus eliminating all uncertainty as to the amount an injured employee was entitled to receive, as well as all delay in enforcing through the courts the right to compensation. Two difficulties were to be overcome. Labor legislation of necessity favors a certain class as against other classes, and the cry of unconstitutional "class legislation" would not down. Moreover, labor legislation should be national in its scope in justice to the employer as well as to the employee. But our Constitution provides that the Federal Government possesses only those powers which have been specifically delegated to it by the several States. The States, however, have retained control of practically all matters of domestic concern such as the regulation of industry. Besides it was contended with good reason that the passing of stringent liability laws, such as those contemplated by the English Employers' Liability Act, would work greatly to the disadvantage of the manufacturers in those States which adopted them, if other States refused to enact them. The added outlay of providing for industrial accidents must necessarily mean an increased cost of manufacture, thus making the cost of the finished product higher to the manufacturers in those States which had strict liability laws than in the States having no such laws. This inconvenience was serious enough; yet it was a minor objection when compared with the constitutional difficulty. It was generally felt that if the latter could be overcome, the road would soon be cleared of all other obstacles.

Elective Compensation

WHILE attempts at compensation laws, for the most part ineffective because of the constitutional handicap, were being made in various states—Maryland, Massachusetts, Illinois, Montana, New York—a principle was found on which to base laws that would stand the test of constitutionality: it was the principle of elective or optional compensation, leaving both employers and employees free in their acceptance of the provisions of the law.

> If an employer does not elect to pay compensation according to the terms of the law, the defenses of assumption of risk, contributory negligence and the fellow-servant defense are removed and are not available in bar of any claim which an employee may bring against him for an occupational injury. If in turn an employee rejects the benefits of the law after an employer has accepted it, the employer has the right to establish any of the common law defenses in bar of a claim which may be made by the employee for injuries received during the course of his employment.—(J. E. Rhodes.)

This was to some extent a piece of legislative trickery where compulsion is disguised under an appearance of voluntary insurance, but it was recognized as a practical and feasible method of relief, and it passed the test of constitutionality in the Supreme Court of the United States in March, 1917.

Our Present Status

COMPENSATION laws began to be put on the statute books in 1911, and are now in force in two-thirds of the States of the Union, while Congress has passed a law establishing a compensation system for Government employees. As our system now stands, it is an adoption of the English and German systems. Its form and substantial provisions are based on the English law, whilst those provisions that make insurance compulsory and provide special administrative machinery are adapted from the German system.

As this brief survey shows, we have come to realize that we have a social question to solve, and we have made noticeable progress towards its solution. However, we are still far from the more comprehensive systems of England and Germany, providing old age pensions, sickness insurance and insurance against unemployment. But the principle of the State's responsibility towards the workers now being firmly established, there is little doubt that the force of circumstances and continued agitation will also bring these eminently just measures into being. The Government has entered the life insurance field for the benefit of our soldiers and sailors. By executive enactments of almost revolutionary extent it has reached deep into the fabric of the social body. It is safe to say that the intense individualism of pre-war times has gone never to return. While we have not lived up to our reputation of being in the vanguard of progress where matters of social justice were concerned, we are on the eve of great changes, that promise to put us on an equal footing with the best European legislation in the field of social endeavor.

Crass Evolution in the School

MOST naturalists have by this time abandoned the Darwinian theory in its exclusive form. More than twenty years ago, Dr. Hans Driesch arraigned Darwinism in the rather plain words: "It is a matter of history, like that other curiosity of our century, Hegel's philosophy. Both are variations on the theme, 'How to take in a whole generation,' and neither is very likely to give ages to come a high opinion of the latter part of our century." Six years later, in 1902, the same eminent zoologist said: "For men of clear intellect, Darwinism has long been dead, and the last argument brought forward in support of it (by L. Plate) is scarcely more than a funeral oration in accordance with the principle De mortuis nihil nisi bonum, and with an underlying conviction of the real weakness of the subject chosen for defense."

Evolutionary Humanism

NEVERTHELESS this antiquated vagary is still worshiped as a fetish in some educational circles where the enlightened educators make it "function" in educational theory and method. An instance in point is an article entitled "Evolutionary Humanism in Education," printed in recent issues of the American Schoolmaster, a magazine devoted to the professional aspects of teaching, and published by the Michigan State Normal College, Ypsilanti, Mich. The author of the article is Dr. Orland O. Norris, Assistant Professor of Latin in that institution. Frankly, and plainly, and most insistently this writer advocates a new ideal in education which must be translated, first of all, into the elementary school, and it is the evolutionary ideal. The article embodies one of the crassest pleas for "crude evolution" ever made. Mr. Norris appeals to the small voice of "the species consciousness within him" (man) and holds that "any view that does not take into account, the doctrine and the process of evolution is a miserably foreshortened one, wholly lacking the perspective afforded by modern science."

> For the greater portion of this incomprehensively long progression, man has been directed over his hazardous course by gross sense and instinct, being for long nonexistent as the differentiated species that we know as man. An average of the guesses made by those best qualified for such guessing, would make the age of man as a distinct species 500,000 years, his entire age as a mammal 5,000,000 years, and the gross extent of organic history 100,000,000 years. Increased evidence and study tend to increase rather than diminish these figures. The real humanism . . . may be made to function in the underlying struggle of the species after biological immortality.

No other quotations are necessary to prove that Mr. Norris offers a real plea for crass and unscientific evolution. In fact, he not only out-Darwins Darwin, but almost succeeds in out-Haeckeling Haeckel.

Terms Not Ideas

THE favorite expressions "species ideal," "species continuity," "species consciousness," "racial immortality," "biological immortality of the race," are repeated as if repetition might be counted on to stand for proof. In one sentence on page 249, these expressions occur four times. To leave no doubt about his final aim, the writer says distinctly, "My purpose is definitely to bring the evolutionary doctrine within the domain of educational philosophy and to declare, in view of its manifest meaning for us, that any subject to justify a position in our public school curriculum must make a claim to tangible species value." It is extremely difficult to find in Mr. Norris' treatise any explanation as to how this species value is "tangible." It is readily granted that there is this much of truth in the species value, namely, that every human being is a member of the human family, that every individual should be interested, not only in his family, his State, his nation, but in the human family at large. We should have an interest in, and love for all members of the human family, because all are children of God. This interest is not abstract and impersonal, but must extend to the individual, and in the first place to those who are near to us. But the individual has his own individual and specific value, that is, expressed in Christian terms, every human being has his own immortal soul to save. It may be fairly questioned whether this "species value" would induce anyone to make a sacrifice of property or life for our country. Men do not die for a biological phrase.

In arguing his case, Mr. Norris stops not even at allusions to quotations from Scripture. The attempt reminds one of Shakespeare's line that the devil can quote Scripture to suit his purpose. A mere fling is ever a poor argument, and certainly Mr. Norris' sneer at the narration in Scripture of our first parents does not make a "myth" of a stubborn and undeniable fact.

Educational Jargon

IT is something of a mystery how this crude and incorrect article found its way into the pages of the American Schoolmaster, an exponent, usually of sound views in education. It is refreshing, for instance, to read Mr. John E. Winter's paper, "The Moral Ideal in Education," an article highly creditable both to the writer and to the magazine. Further, whilst Flexner's "Modern School" is heartily indorsed by Mr. Norris, this indorsement is not shared by the American Schoolmaster, as is evident from the note on the Princeton Classical Conference.

It may be irony, and it may be fate that the September issue of the American Schoolmaster contains an excellent paper, "Educational Jargon," in which E. A. Strong offers a severe criticism of the unintelligible pedagogical language affected by so many modern writers. As an instance he quotes a lecturer, who to inform his audience that "children like play" could do no better than to repeat as many as five times the formula, "Play functions largely as a factor in the psychology of the child." A lecturer on pedagogy used the expression "group motivation" twenty-two times during a single discourse. It would be interesting to know, but tiresome to ascertain, how many times Mr. Morris uses the expression "species value" in his paper. As a sample of pedagogical language the following may serve: "A proper motivation of life and its activities from infancy must certainly result in great conservation of energy through properly integrated and spontaneously controlled conduct, and also in more certain, dynamic effort" (p. 245).

It is confidently hoped that the unscientific and harmful statements set forth in the paper under stricture are not taken seriously by the readers of the American Schoolmaster. For these vague and incorrect ideas are subversive both of American and Christian aims in education.

NOTE AND COMMENT

The Censor's Perplexity

LAST November, reports the Chicago Tribune, the friends of a former student of St. Louis University, who is now a lieutenant in France, cabled to him the result of the Thanksgiving football game in the words: "St. Louis, 13; Washington, 0." For days and days the French censor, puzzled over the cryptic message which seemed on its face to be both un-American and anti-French, for the great St. Louis had after his name the ill-omened number 13, and the immortal Washington actually appeared to be appraised at zero. Could it be that some German spy was scornfully using such honored names to cover a treasonable code-message to his confederate in France? Of that the censor could not satisfy himself for a long time. After nearly a month's delay, however, the cablegram was delivered. Our soldiers "over there" should teach our French Allies the mysteries of score keeping.

War Resolutions of Catholic Alumnae

THE latest bulletin of the International Federation of Catholic Alumnae contains the following war resolutions adopted at the executive meeting and reflecting the loyalty and devotion of our Catholic alumnae to their country's cause:

> Therefore, resolved, That this organization reiterate the pledge of 50,000 federated women in every State in the Union, in the provinces of Canada and as far north as Alaska, and offer its service whenever and wherever the Government calls. It urges cooperation in food conservation, purchase of Liberty Bonds, Red Cross work, relief work for soldiers both in Canada and the United States, the education of child victims of the war, support of moral zones surrounding the army cantonments and systematic aid in providing proper homes for girls flocking into cities to succeed to the work of soldiers. This work will be facilitated by cooperation with the women's committee of the Council of National Defense, the National Catholic War Council and the Knights of Columbus.

Catholic women are bearing a proportionate share in the heroic sacrifices which this war exacts from the nation.

Report of New York Children's Court

WAR conditions are reacting disastrously upon American children. The increase in juvenile delinquency noted in European countries is already manifesting itself in a pronounced way in the United States. The annual report of the children's court of New York City shows that 14,519 children came before the court last year. This truly terrifying number represents an increase of 2,094 over the previous year. It is stated that such cases multiplied most perceptibly toward the end of 1917. The immediate causes assigned are the scarcity of food and fuel, and the difficulty of making proper provision for some of these children. It is obvious that both economic and religious remedies must be applied to stay this avalanche.

How He Came Back

THE little incident narrated below, as told by a Knights of Columbus field secretary, admirably illustrates the good accomplished in our camps by the Knights:

> He was rather an attractive boy, weak-willed perhaps, a little overindulgent, but he was subject to good influences just as he had been to bad. He came to the building first to write a letter, and then he became interested in a basket-ball game which was being organized. He made few friends, but for several evenings during the week he came, not participating to any great extent in the activities, but looking on with the attitude of one who felt he was not entirely entitled to participate in the joys of others.
> I stood near him and we conversed about the ordinary things of camp life. Naturally, I did not ask him whether he was a Catholic, but the next morning, Sunday, I saw him in the rear of the building during the celebration of Mass. He had neither beads nor a prayer-book, although he stood and knelt with the rest of the men. That evening he came to the building again and asked me if I could give him a prayer-book. This I did, and he seemed greatly pleased. The next night he came to me and told me that he wanted to come back. I misunderstood him, and asked whether he wanted to go back home. "No," he replied, "I want to come back to the Church. You see I should be a Catholic, but my mother died when I was young, and I have not paid much attention to religion. But I'm a Catholic all right, and when I see these other fellows at Mass and Communion, I want to be a real Catholic. Tell me how to go about it." I called the chaplain and they had a conference. The next morning he assisted at the chaplain's Mass and received Holy Communion.

The field secretary who tells this story declares that dozens of similar instances came under his own observation.

Amos Pinchot and the Protestant Churches

ASKED to express his opinion of the help to be expected from religion after the war, Amos Pinchot made the following reflections upon the Protestant churches:

> From religion as expressed in our churches, I fear we cannot expect very much. I am familiar with Protestant churches only, but I have seen very few of these that do not preach a Christianity that is worldly, essentially un-Christian in its philosophy, and generally used as a kind of offset or apology for the anti-social activities of the congregation. Of course, we cannot blame the clergy for this. Our churches are unfortunately maintained by our rich people, and it is as natural that the pastor of a church supported by privilege should be anti-Christian and the buttress of privilege, as it is that the editor of a newspaper owned by members of the privileged class should be anti-democratic and the protector of that class. The only chance that I can see of having Christian churches is to have people's churches, supported by the people themselves, or by individuals who represent in their own lives the aspirations of real Christianity.

Should the good fortune, or rather the Divine grace, of a close and thorough acquaintance with the Catholic Church, of which he admits his ignorance, be accorded to Amos Pinchot, he will not be obliged to seek further for a Church that is truly the people's Church, supported by their hard-earned daily wages, and whose just pride it is, today as ever, that by it the poor have the Gospel preached to them.

Limits to Academic Freedom

THAT limits should be set to "academic freedom" is one of the lessons that our secular universities have learned from the war. Thus in a joint report to the trustees of Columbia University, made by the Committee on Education and the Special Committee on the State of Teaching, the principle is laid down that the relation of confidence between an officer and the university necessarily terminates "when the conduct or utterances of any academic officer, either within or without the university, imperil its influence or reputation or are inconsistent with his implied pledge in accepting appointment." The Joint Committee furthermore concurs with the opinion expressed in President Butler's annual report for 1910, that freedom implies responsibility, and that academic freedom is naturally subject to "the limitations imposed by common morality, common sense, common loyalty and a decent respect for the opinions of mankind." It may be stated without fear of contradiction that all these conditions have in the past been freely violated in our secular universities. There is little hope that morality and religion will not continue to be outraged in these seats of learning where rationalism and atheism sit entrenched, and where, consequently, common sense and historic veracity are equally ignored when Christianity, and in particular the Catholic Church, enter into question. Though open disloyalty to the flag was certainly no greater evil than the attacks upon religion, and only a natural consequence following upon them, yet in the present crisis of the nation such disloyalty could not fail to bring home the truth of the principle, acknowledged in theory at least, by the Joint Committee, that limits must be set to academic freedom. It is not to be imagined, however, that hereafter, any more than before, secular universities will become a fit place for the education of sons and daughters whose parents are concerned for the spiritual welfare of the souls entrusted to their care.

Chronicle

The War.—Only minor operations have been reported from the western and Italian fronts this week. In Champagne, after heavy artillery preparation, the enemy delivered an attack on the positions captured a few days ago by the French southwest of Butte du Mesnil. After a spirited engagement the French drove the Germans from the trenches in which they had managed at the first rush to gain a footing. In Lorraine, north of Bures and east of Moncel, northeast of Nancy, French detachments penetrated the German lines deeply on a large front and, according to the official Paris bulletin, made more than 400 prisoners and won back a considerable extent of territory. In their sector the American troops were exposed to heavy artillery fire. Their positions were the object of close scrutiny and continuous raids by enemy airplanes. From the Roman headquarters it is officially announced that between the Posina and Astico the Italian batteries greatly hampered the movements of the enemy in the Laghi Basin, while on the Asiago Plateau the Italian artillery shelled enemy troops marching along Galmara Valley and concentrated a heavy fire on the sector of Val Frenzella and Val Brenta. Near the Monte Solarolo salient there were protracted artillery duels. The British War Office reports the capture, on February 21, by General Allenby's troops, of Jericho in Palestine. The Australian troops which entered the town encountered little opposition. Subsequently the Australians established themselves on the line of the Jordan and the Wadi Auja. In the capture of the town General Allenby made another stride forward in his task of clearing Palestine of the Turks. Possession of Jericho means in addition, control of the roads leading northward to the Turkish base at Nablus and of the roads to the coast and the direct mountain highway from Jerusalem.

Bulletin, Feb. 18, p.m.-Feb. 25, a.m.

Berlin announced officially on February 18 and 19, that German troops had advanced into Russia and occupied in the north the fortress of Dvinsk and in Volhynia that of Lutsk. An official Bolshevist statement signed by Premier Lenine and Foreign Minister Trotzky was almost immediately after received at London saying that Russia was forced to declare its readiness to sign a peace as dictated by the delegations of the Quadruple Alliance at Brest-Litovsk. The statement, which was also transmitted to the German Government, reads as follows:

Russian Peace and War

> The Council of People's Commissaries protests against the fact that the German Government has directed its troops against the Russian Councils' republic which has declared the war was at an end and which is demobilizing its army on all fronts. The Workmen's and Peasants' Government of Russia could not anticipate such a step because neither directly nor indirectly has any one of the parties which concluded the armistice given the seven days' notice required in accordance with the treaty of December 15 for terminating it. The Council of People's Commissaries in the present circumstances regards itself as forced formally to declare its willingness to sign a peace upon the condition which had been dictated by the delegations of the Quadruple Alliance at Brest-Litovsk. The Council of People's Commissaries further declares that a detailed reply will be given without delay to the conditions of peace as proposed by the German Government.

A dispatch to the London Times from Petrograd quoted Trotzky as declaring in his report that the German peace-terms included the retention by them of Poland, Lithuania, Riga and Moon Island and an indemnity of $4,000,000,000, presumably in gold. A little later, the following order signed by Krylenko was addressed to Russian headquarters and all the fronts:

> The Council of People's Commissaries has offered to the Germans to sign peace immediately in order that in all cases where Germans are encountered massed pourparlers with the German soldiers should be organized and the proposal to refrain from fighting made to them. If Germans refuse, then you must offer to them every possible resistance.

Meanwhile rumors were again rife that Russian peace-terms had been forwarded by wireless to Berlin. General Hoffmann, the German Military representative at the Brest-Litovsk conference telegraphed to the Bolshevist Government for a written authentication of the dispatch and stipulated that the authentication must be sent to the German command at Dvinsk. The demand was complied with. During these pourparlers the German advance continued. German troops entered Esthonia, and Werder was occupied. On both sides of the Riga-Petrograd railway the Russian positions were crossed and German troops penetrated about sixteen or seventeen miles beyond their former front. Between Dvinsk and Lutsk they advanced on wide sectors, pressed forward beyond Lutsk and marched on Rovno, taking more than 2,000 prisoners. By February 22, while forty-five German warships were approaching Reval, the Germans entered Minsk, passed through Wenden and were drawn up before Wolmar. Regiments from Moon Island crossed the frozen Moon Sound, marched into Esthonia and occupied Leal. Other forces advancing along the shores of the Gulf of Riga reached Pernigal and Lemzal. At that time the additional captures made by the advancing German troops included the Russian General in command of the army, several divisional commanders, 425 officers and 8,700 men, 1,353 guns, 120 machine guns, 4,000 to 5,000 motor cars and a vast amount of other war material. But little resistance was offered to the invader by the Russian troops. Later dispatches stated that the Germans had reached Walk, ninety miles northeast of Riga. At the present time Russian wireless Government dispatches received in London quoted a new offer of peace from Germany which, it said, was signed by Von Kühlmann, the German Foreign Secretary, and the Lieutenant General, Commander-in-Chief of the Army. The following are the main conditions of the new treaty:

Both to declare the war ended.

All regions west of the line indicated at Brest-Litovsk to the Russian delegation, which formerly belonged to Russia, to be no longer under the territorial protection of Russia. In the region of Dvinsk this line must be advanced to the eastern frontier of Courland.

The former attachment of these regions to the Russian State must in no case involve for them obligations toward Russia. Russia renounces every claim to intervene in the internal affairs of those regions. Germany and Austria-Hungary have the intention to define further the fate of these regions, in agreement with their populations.

Germany is ready, after the completion of Russian demobilization, to evacuate the regions which are east of the above line. So far as it is not stated otherwise, Livonia and Esthonia must immediately be cleared of Russian troops and Red Guards.

Livonia and Esthonia will be occupied by German police until the date when the Constitution of the respective countries shall guarantee their social security and political order. All inhabitants who were arrested for political reasons must be released immediately.

Russia will conclude peace with the Ukrainian people's republic. Ukraine and Finland will be immediately evacuated by Russian troops and Red Guards.

Russia will do all in its power to secure for Turkey the orderly return of its Anatolian frontiers. Russia recognizes the annullation of the Turkish capitulation.

The complete demobilization of the Russian Army, inclusive of the detachments newly formed by the present Government, must be carried out immediately.

Russian warships in the Black Sea, the Baltic Sea, and the Arctic Ocean must immediately either be sent to Russian harbors and kept there until the conclusion of peace or be disarmed. Warships of the Entente which are in the sphere of Russian authority must be regarded as Russian ships.

Merchant navigation of the Black Sea and Baltic Sea must be renewed, as stated in the armistice treaty. The clearing away of mines is to begin immediately. The blockade of the Arctic Ocean is to remain in force until the conclusion of a gener peace.

The Russo-German commercial treaty of 1914 must be en forced again.

Official Russian dispatches of February 24 announc that Lenine and Trotzky, acting for the Central Execu tive of the Soviets accepted these terms. This surrende gives Germany some of Russia's richest provinces and a the western extension of the former Empire.

Lloyd George Wins Again

For the second time within a week, Mr. Lloyd George the Prime Minister, rallied to his support his most de cided opponents in the House of Commons. His Ver sailles policy in accordance wit which it had been decided to set u a central authority to co-ordinate th strategy of the Allies, was the subject under discussion With regard to Sir William Robertson, who lately re signed as Chief of the General Staff, the Premier state that the Government had been anxious to retain the serv ices of that distinguished soldier, so long as it was pos sible in accordance with the policy determined upon i common with Great Britain's allies. This policy he con tinued, was based upon the assumption that the Allie had suffered in the past through lack of concerted and co ordinated efforts. The Premier explained that he wa hampered in discussing the decision taken at Versaille by a resolution passed at the conference by the militar and civil representatives, and that it was not desirabl to give any information about the general plan arrived at He thought, however, that he could make clear where th controversy had arisen, and asked for the judgment o the House on the action of the Government. On thi point he said:

The general principle laid down at Versailles was agreed t whole-heartedly by everybody. There was no conflict as re garded the policy, but only as to the method of giving effect t it. There was agreement as to the policy; there was agreemen that there must be central authority to exercise supreme direc tion of that policy; there was agreement that authority must b inter-allied authority, and there was complete agreement tha that authority should have executive power. The only questio that arose was as to how that central authority should be con stituted. That was the only difference. It was the whole issue and, in my judgment, an agreement was reached at the con ference even in regard to that.

After exposing the various plans submitted to the con ference the Premier made the startling statement that th recent changes in the British army leadership resulting from the Versailles conference were due to the repre sentatives of other governments, notably that of th United States. "The argument presented by America i favor of unity of war control," said Mr. Lloyd George "is one of the ablest documents ever submitted to a wa council." Asserting that the Allies were face to face with "terrible realities," the Premier demanded an imme diate decision for support or non-support. The House gave him its approval. It later became known that Gen eral Bliss, American Chief of Staff, drafted the plan so highly praised by the Prime Minister.

Ireland.—During the week, Dr. Patrick McCartan, Envoy to America of the Provisional Government of Ireland, gave to the press a memorandum he had sent to Mr. Lansing, on the Anglo-American treaty, "whereby residents in the United States who are claimed as nationals by Great Britain may become available for military purposes." The document reads in part as follows:

The United States and Conscription

The Irish-born who reside in this country are separated by the American Government into three categories: (1) American citizens by naturalization; (2) declarants, "or such as have taken out their first naturalization papers and thereby declare their intention and desire to become full citizens of the United States," and (3) aliens, those whose status as Irish nationals is beyond question. Over the members of the first of these categories, the United States, alone, exerts authority, an authority which the contemplated treaty cannot influence, and which the Provisional Government of Ireland fully recognizes. The formal declaration of intention to become a citizen of the United States is accompanied by an explicit statement of purpose to renounce allegiance to the sovereignty to which the declarant is subject. Basing its action upon this purpose of renunciation, Congress ordained, by the selective Draft Act of 1917, that cobelligerent-declarants were liable to military duty in the United States, on the same terms as citizens by birth or by adoption. In other words, citizens and declarants were placed upon an equality of sacrifice in defense of the United States. The ratio of cobelligerent declarants called, to those accepted for service, was higher than that among citizens naturalized by prewar legal forms, and only slightly lower than that among citizens by birth (Provost Marshal-General's report, p. 55).

Civic sacrifice carries with it an inalienable right to privileges. This principle is well recognized by your Government, and already modifies the process of naturalization for enlisted aliens in the army and navy. No State can in equity require the sacrifice of life to civic duty from any but a citizen. The enforcement by the State, and the acceptance by the cobelligerent declarants, of the supreme duty inherent to citizenship constituted a contract between the State and cobelligerent declarants. That contract implicitly extended to cobelligerent-declarants the right to the privileges of citizenship of the United States. The Selective Service Act of 1917 in equity naturalized cobelligerent-declarants, and was in accord with the established policy of the United States as laid down in Section 1999 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

As the Provisional Government of Ireland is maintaining on a front where allied unity is not at present possible, the principle of self-determination; and as the United States Government entered the war to champion that principle, our respective countries are de facto cobelligerents, associates in a common struggle for this common cause.

The inclusion of the Irish-born, who are declarant-citizens, in the scope of the pending Anglo-American treaty would be contrary to justice and equity; would be a reversal by treaty of the action of Congress in the expatriation law of 1868, and in the Selective Service Act of 1917; would be an unconstitutional exercise of treaty-making authority, and would be a repudiation of the traditional American principles and policy. Hence, the Provisional Government of Ireland refuses to believe that the Government of the United States has in contemplation any treaty with Great Britain which would discriminate against a group of coöpted American citizens, the Irish declarants, who in this war have shown themselves the most devotedly loyal of all American citizens.

A treaty with Great Britain may properly concern only American residents of British origin, who have made no legal expression of intent to become a citizen. The term British is correctly applied only to the English, Scotch, and Welsh. The Government of Great Britain, i.e., of England, Scotland, and Wales, has the right to enter into agreements with the United States regarding only the British resident here, and the resident who was formerly an inhabitant of a British Crown colony, such as Jamaica, which is governed from the British Colonial Office. But Great Britain cannot enter into agreements on behalf of the self-governing Dominions, such as Canada. Hence, I am informed, Canadian aliens are included in this treaty by a separate convention with the Government of Canada. Canada could enter into such an arrangement, for the draft is legal in Canada. But citizens of a self-governing colony, which, like South Africa, has refused to consider conscription; or which, like Australia, has specifically rejected conscription, cannot be made subjects of draft conventions between the United States and Great Britain, without impugning their jealously cherished rights of sovereignty. To conscript Boers or Australians here would be not only to deny the right of self-determination which these peoples claim, and now enjoy, but would be also tantamount to American recognition of the right of England to conscript Boers and Australians as the Romans conscripted the barbarians, without the sanction of the conscripted, and for the benefit of the Empire that is England.

Last summer, the British Premier in the name of, and by the authority of, the British Government, declared that a convention of Irishmen should meet to determine a plan for the government of Ireland within the Empire. He thus conceded that Ireland is a small nationality, entitled to government by Irishmen; and in somewhat "Teutonic" form, he applied the principle of self-determination to Ireland by creating the Irish Convention. Even the British thus pretend to recognize Ireland's right to be self-governing. Even the British do not attempt to apply conscription in Ireland. And the Provisional Government of Ireland wholly denies the authority of Great Britain, or of any other State, to conscript such Irish nationals as circumstance has for the moment removed from the protection of the Provisional Government of Ireland. It has not been the habit of the Government of your great, liberty-loving Republic to exploit the defenseless; and I am confident our Government need be under no apprehensions now on this score. Hence, in submitting this memorandum against the inclusion of Irish nationals in the scope of the pending treaty, I wish clearly to disavow all intention to impute to your Government the motive which might be supposed to require this protest.

The memorandum proceeds to say that in the American Army about twenty-five per cent of the draft are of the Irish race and that "among the cobelligerent aliens here who were called in the draft, and who, waiving the exemption to which they were entitled as aliens, were accepted for service, the Irish ranked easily first in devotion to the country which was giving them sanctuary." The following percentages are added:

Alien Cobelligerents	Percentage of the total called who waived exemption and were accepted
Ireland	30.4
Belgium	24.4
Scotland	24.2
England	22.5
Wales	22.0
Servia	21.7
Canada	21.0
France	19.4
Italy	16.8

Dr. McCartan justifies the publication of this document on the ground that "To the principle of 'open covenants openly arrived at' the Government which I have the honor to represent, gave whole-hearted adherence."

Rome.—The Corriere d'Italia in a recent issue made the following announcement, saying: "We learn that the Republic of Cuba has answered in its turn the Pontifical note on peace. The answer was made some weeks ago and was transmitted to his Eminence the Cardinal Secretary of State by Count de Salis, Minister of Great Britain to the Holy See. The point of view of the American Republic is the same as that exposed in similar documents sent by the Entente."

The Pontifical Note

The note was not published because it seemed that, taken by itself, it had not the importance which it acquires today in the group of the other answers. Nevertheless it should be remarked that following the replies of the United States, Brazil, and Belgium, all the European and American Powers which belonged last August to the group of the Entente have answered the Pontifical note, with the exception of the four Powers, England, France, Russia and Italy, that signed the secret treaty of April 25, 1915, which was drawn up with the view to Italy's participation in the war and in which, we can make the statement in spite of all denials, is comprised an article which excludes the intervention of the Holy See in relation to the war.

The denials to which the Corriere d'Italia refers are those of Italy and Great Britain. Lord Cecil subsequently explained his denial in the sense that although the fact of the agreement as to the exclusion of the Pope was true, the form of Clause XV as given to the world by the Maximalists in Russia was merely the résumé of a project and not the article itself. Baron Sonnino at first denied the existence of Clause XV of the secret agreement. He too has now seen fit to admit, in answer to a question put to him in the Chamber of Deputies, that he spoke falsely. According to a dispatch sent from Rome to the Catholic Press Association, Baron Sonnino maintained that the version of the clause was "incorrectly quoted by the Bolshevist Minister Trotsky for the purpose of creating dissensions among Italians." The dispatch continues:

That incorrect version, he said, was calculated to offend the Catholic sentiment of devotion to the Holy See; and it was for this reason that he had a month ago denied the existence of the clause. The object of that clause, he now explained, was solely to prevent any participation by the Pope in the Peace Congress. He went on to state the attitude of the Italian Government on the "Roman Question"; the Pope's position is established by the Law of Guarantees and is a matter which concerns Italy alone. It is evident that the Government's objection to the participation by the Pope in the Peace Congress is founded on its refusal to consider efforts to "internationalize" the "Roman Question," to which that participation might lead. Baron Sonnino then paid a just tribute to the loyalty of Italian Catholics to their country. His speech is regarded by some as the holding out, personally, of an olive branch to Italian Catholics, and it will tend to mollify their ruffled feelings.

The Vatican, of course, refuses to allow any interference, even in the interpretation given by Baron Sonnino to Clause XV, with its sovereign rights or with the Pope's position or action in reference to the question of peace or war; and Italian Catholics join in this refusal. This speech of the Foreign Minister, however, has served to clear the air somewhat and no disturbance of the present good relations between the Italian Government and the Holy See is expected. The Osservatore Romano accepts the speech with reserve, promising to discuss it in detail later on.

The Holy Father's all-embracing charity is well exemplified in the following letters, reproduced from the Revista Católica. The first was directed to the Pope by the Military Chaplain from a prison camp in Ingolstadt. It reads:

The Pope's Benevolence

Holy Father:

The officers and soldiers of the Italian, French, Belgian, English and Russian nations, who are detained as prisoners in Camp No. 9, extend to your Holiness, together with their gratitude, the expression of their filial affection. During their long exile and separation from their families, they have heard no words of affection. For this reason they have been given much joy by the words of paternal solicitude, conveyed to them from your Holiness by the lips of your Envoy. They have long known that your Holiness was concerned to lighten their lot; but in the future it will be their great consolation to be able to say that the Holy Father is constantly thinking of them. They are very grateful to your Holiness for the message you have sent them, and for your benediction, which they have received in the spirit of piety. Please accept, Holy Father, from your prisoner-sons the sincere expression of their profound respect. For the officers and soldiers of Camp No. 9.

THE MILITARY CHAPLAIN.

The second letter is addressed to the Papal Nuncio of the Holy See, Mgr. Pacelli, by Colonel Chautts:

On behalf of the Russian officers and soldiers, prisoners of war detained in the Camp of Orff, we beg you to convey our thanks to his Holiness, Benedict XV, and to assure him that we, the Russians, have been much moved by the attentions of which he has made us the object. Since your visit, for which we now express our gratitude, we have received, and with much pleasure, the packages which your kindness has had prepared for us and for which we are profoundly grateful. For the officers and soldiers.

COLONEL CHAUTTS.

The Roman correspondent of La Croix quotes the following item from the Osservatore Romano:

We see reproduced by the press a statement which was published a few days ago by the official Norddeutsche Allgemeine Zeitung concerning the exchange of interned German and Belgian civilians. In this statement, contrary to an announcement made in a dispatch of the Agence Stefani, emanating from Havre last December, and copied by ourselves, the happy conclusion of the agreement in favor of these innocent victims of the war is attributed principally to the action of the Holy See.

In this statement we see another proof of the beneficent action of an absolutely impartial neutral who is concerned for the spiritual and temporal welfare of his children of all nations.

Catholics and the War

JOHN CARDINAL FARLEY

THE law of sacrifice binds nations as well as individuals. When the individual neglects that law, he becomes self-centered and cold-hearted. If a nation forgets its lessons it foregoes its highest destinies. Hard as that law is, the individual and the nation that practise it generously ever rise to the highest pinnacle of personal and national dignity.

In times of peace the lessons of sacrifice may be for a time forgotten. For it is natural, when wealth and power are easily attained, to listen to the voice of the temptations which follow in their train. Nature too readily yields to the flatterers who appeals to its love of pleasure and comfort. It can easily then be turned from the path of personal and civic duty. But in a day of a just and honorable war, when the call to arms reminds a nation of the duties that face it, the law of sacrifice reasserts itself and summons men from their apathy. And undoubtedly the law has reasserted itself in full vigor in America.

We are a peace-loving people but history has shown that we are good fighters. We proved it when a mere handful, we fought against the greatest empire in the world for our national independence. The men who followed Jackson and Lee and those who fought with Sheridan and Grant showed that Americans know how to fight for their ideals and principles, that in the field they are resourceful and fearless, just as after the contest they are generous and kindly to the vanquished. But we do not like war. No one can ever say that we have gone about rattling the saber or seeking a cause for quarrel. We did not want to enter the conflict now threatening the very existence of civilization. We were forced into it. We are not in it for any selfish aims. The millions of our countrymen who have listened to the words of the President of the United States when he defined our purposes and our aims in the war, know well that we want no territory, no annexations, no money or indemnities. We are fighting for a principle. We want justice for all peoples. We are fighting that a great wrong may be righted, that the world may be safe for all nations, safe for democracy.

The ideal has made a wonderful appeal to the inborn generosity and chivalry of the American people, to its sense of fair play and honor. Americans have been called commercial, materialistic, selfish. I have not found them so. They are kind, fair-minded, just. Speak to them of any noble cause, their hearts and their purse-strings are opened immediately. They are idealists in the best sense of the word. They want the triumph of justice and truth.

When the war threatened the foundations of our civic and national life, the American people did not hesitate. With an order and promptness rarely equaled, and in obedience to constituted authority, tens of thousands of our young men went into the cantonments prepared for them, there to undergo the training necessary for the soldier. The patriotism of the American people admirably asserted itself and gave undeniable proof that it was thoroughly sound. Every section of the country, every portion of the population did its share.

I do not wish to minimize what others have done. I would be the first to do justice to their loyalty. But, as too often the patriotism of my Catholic fellow-countrymen has been called in question, I should like briefly to call attention to some of the ways in which they have shown that they are thoroughly loyal to the country's cause.

The great test of patriotism is the willingness of the citizen to serve under his country's colors. Entrance into such service is an open profession that he is willing to lay down his life for the flag and all that it represents. Judged by that test the Catholics of the United States have every reason to be proud. Every branch of the service is filled with Catholics and it is the testimony of all who are qualified to judge that their patriotism, their efficiency, their orderly and soldierly conduct are of the highest type. There is not a division, there is scarcely a regiment that has not a large percentage of Catholic troops. The figures are eloquent. According to the Secretary of War, Mr. Baker, thirty-four or thirty-five per cent of the army are Catholics. The better Catholics they are, the better soldiers they are going to be. If there is one principle that must be the guiding star of the soldier it is the principle of authority. Obedience is the soldier's duty. The necessity of that duty has been deeply impressed upon Catholics. By inculcating that principle upon her children the Catholic Church has conferred a lasting benefit upon the State, a benefit the results of which are beginning now to be apparent. Submission to authority is the backbone of an army. The Catholic soldier is already predisposed by his training to respect that fundamental law.

In the navy also the percentage of Catholics is exceedingly high. Well-informed authorities have stated that Catholics number fifty per cent of the men, while in the marine-corps they number sixty or more per cent. One of the ranking officials of the navy is Admiral Benson, a man of the highest character, as distinguished for his thoroughgoing patriotism and efficiency as for his genuine piety. Every cruiser and battleship, every submarine or torpedo-boat that flies the American flag and guards the seas against the attack of the foe, counts Catholic sailors and officers in its crew. In some of the ships more than half the men are Catholics, on the Minnesota over sixty per cent, on the Van Steuben seventy-five per cent. When it comes to deeds of heroism in presence of the dangers or accidents that face the men who go down to the sea in ships, the names inscribed on the records of our brave American navy are the old familiar names that eloquently tell of Catholic faith and Catholic blood. It is the same in the lists which come to us from the front where the American troops are now fighting the battle of freedom. There is scarcely one that does not contain the name of a Catholic soldier. Sad as those lists are and tragic the tale they bring to American families and to the hearts of American fathers and mothers, there is one consolation: the wounded and the dead have suffered for their country. No man could wish for a nobler fate.

Out of evil, God in His mysterious ways always brings good. One result of this terrible scourge now devastating the world will be that here in the United States our countrymen will know each other and love each other better. The call to arms has thrown them together in a great family. The military camps and cantonments where our men are preparing for the contest have become great schools where shoulder to shoulder Catholic, Protestant and Jew, rich and poor, the son of the millionaire father and of the humbler worker will be brought together. Old prejudices and misunderstandings will be swept away. Our countrymen will begin to know each other better and in the light of that knowledge better appreciate the generous fund of noble virtues which exist in their hearts. As an American, as a priest, as an Archbishop and Cardinal I rejoice that Americans will also be drawn to a better knowledge of Catholics and the Catholic Church.

The camps, as I said above, are literally filled with Catholic soldiers. To take some instances:

The following census taken at Camp Logan, Houston, Texas, shows that Catholics are twice as numerous as members of the sect ranking next in number.

And though Catholics constitute but eighteen per cent of the population, the story of other camps is the same. At Camp Dodge, Des Moines, Ia., Catholics are in excess of members of any other individual denomination; at Camp McClellan, Anniston, Ala., they number 13,000 out of a total of 30,000; at Camp Grant they constitute thirty-two per cent of the soldiers; at Camp Lewis they total 7,390 out of 30,000.

A glance at lists from other camps would yield I believe, very nearly similar results. At Camp Upton, L. I., Catholics number about forty per cent of the men. The distinguished Catholic scholar, Dr. Condé Pallen, makes the following statement: "The Catholic population of the country is something over 18,000,000 out of a total population somewhat over 100,000,000. Out of every hundred sons eighteen are Catholics. We would then expect that out of every hundred in the military service eighteen would be Catholics. But as nearly as can be ascertained by such means as are available, the proportion is as high as thirty-five per cent, and is reckoned by some as high as forty per cent." Catholics are therefore doing their duty by the flag. And be it noted that thousands of these Catholic soldiers did not wait to be drafted. They voluntarily enlisted under the colors. Among the sons of our Catholic families there were no slackers or shirkers, or so few that they are forgotten in the splendid devotion and loyalty of their companions.

In every field of war activity Catholics have taken a prominent part. To the liberty loans they have largely subscribed. Bishops and priests, whole communities of religious men and women have generously given out of their small pittance to the needs of the country. Catholic artisans and laboring men, the poor toilers, whom, thank God, the Catholic Church can boast of by the tens of thousands and who are proverbially generous, have gladly given up their small earnings to help the American cause and the cause of justice and of liberty. A Catholic War Council, with a committee of Catholic Bishops, has been organized, with the Right Rev. Peter J. Muldoon as chairman, with four other Bishops to assist him, whose purpose, heartily approved by the Catholic Hierarchy, is to represent the Catholic Church in all war activities. The work of the Knights of Columbus for the welfare of the soldier, not only of their own Faith, but for every man that wears the uniform of the United States, no matter what may be his creed or his color, has deserved the recognition of the President of the United States, of the Secretary of War, of our highest military authorities and of the country at large. The splendid work of the Red Cross, so dear to the heart of the American people and to the Catholic Church in whose bosom its aims were first fostered, has been splendidly supported by our Catholic brethren. Thousands of our Catholic women, from every rank of society, are laboring side by side with noble women of other creeds for the relief of the wounded hero, for our fighting men no matter who they be, who are facing danger, sickness, the perils of the sea and the air and the horrors of the trenches.

Surely our patriotism has stood the acid test of trial. Is there a single thing that Catholics could do for their country which they have not done? Can a single field be named where their work does not testify to their loyalty? Can any sincere and upright man say, in the face of all that we have accomplished, of the money we have given to our country's cause, of the devotion of Bishops, priests, laymen, of our noble-hearted women, in presence of the hundreds of thousands of bright, clean, morally fit and physically sound soldiers, whom Catholic fathers and Catholic mothers are offering as a sacrifice on the altar of freedom, that Catholics are not loyal, are not true to their country and that they have deserted her in her hour of need?

The great heart of the American people will, I know, do us justice. But I know, too, from sad experience that in the hearts of some misguided men bigotry and prejudice are endowed with an incomprehensible vitality. In spite of our patriotism at every crisis in our natural life, we have been branded by the unfair and the unthinking as traitors, and described as men who had no sympathy with our country's cause and ideals. It may be that in the future the same cry will be raised. It will be painful to have to refute it once more, as we have so often done in the past. We shall then give the same answer to the slander which we are giving in the present war. Our deeds will speak as they are speaking now. Those deeds have answered for us in no uncertain voice. It could not be otherwise. For the Catholic recognizes that loyalty to country is next to fidelity and obedience to God.

The Philosophical Blues

DANIEL A. LORD, S.J.

THE interest of unbelievers in St. Francis of Assisi is to my mind one of the most encouraging signs of the present day. For if any man stood for a life different in every least detail from modern paganism that man was the dear St. Francis. He loved the simple, the unaffected, the natural. The sun and the rain, the north wind, and birds, flowers and little children he drew close to his heart in a passion of simple love. In all things he saw God, their maker, so that his heart sang all the day long. To him our artificial, intricate, hectic life with its preference of electric lights to the sun, of violet water to fresh rain, of ventilation systems to the north wind, of jazz bands to larks would have seemed unreal, hideous. And the frank conspiracy to keep little children out of God's world would have stricken the song from his lips.

In spite of his utter dissimilarity to neo-paganism, men cannot but admire the troubadour who, with an unconquerable optimism, saw beauty everywhere, who loved creatures with a Christ-like love, and whose soul throbbed with a long, sweet canticle to his God. They admire St. Francis even though he is the embodiment of Christian optimism.

But it is not a matter of ancient history since the optimism of St. Francis was preceded in popular favor by the pessimism of a very different stamp of man. Schopenhauer was read and discussed and admired; and Schopenhauer taught that "the only positive feeling is that of pain," "that the world is a hell which surpasses that of Dante," "that life is a path of red-hot coals with a few cool places here and there." Delightful philosophy for armchair consumption, is it not?

Yet of the modern pagans those, namely, who affect to admire St. Francis and those who follow Schopenhauer, the latter are by all odds the more logical. A pagan has not the least right to be an optimist, and anyone with the slightest acquaintance with the ancient classics knows the drab melancholy which formed the background of pagan life. A follower of almost any of the modern un-Christian schools of philosophy is by his own choice logically doomed to pessimism. The philosopher who adopts the optimism of St. Francis without accepting his beliefs in God and Our Lady and the brotherhood of all men in Christ is simply a parrot who has mimicked human laughter without understanding why he laughs.

There is no conviction more chilling, more destructive of joy than the one by which a man is persuaded that he is being consistently deceived. Deception on the part of those we trust, even though we only suspect it, is enough to ruin our lives. It throws about us a mordant distrust which affects our attitude toward everything. It breeds suspicion, takes the firmness from the handclasp, deadens the love-light in the eye. A generous man can forgive an honest blow struck him in the face far sooner than he can a deception practised upon him by those he trusts. If all the misanthropes of the world were mustered in one grisly army, it would be found that those who had not been soured by the deceit of some trusted friend would scarcely number a corporal's guard.

And certainly there is no friend on whom we are forced to rely half so much as we are upon our own senses. We are obliged to depend upon them for at least the beginnings of all our knowledge. What, then, should be the logical effect of a philosophy which teaches that our senses are constantly deceiving us, that we really have no bodies, and that whatever information we acquire through sight and hearing and touch is false and chimerical? For here we are confronted by a deception as constant as our waking lives, a deception which no effort on our part can ever hope to overcome.

If such a philosophy does not breed the blackest pessimism, a distrust of everything, it is because the philosopher who holds it lives a life quite independent of his beliefs. Though from a professor's chair he may preach that all matter is illusion and that only soul exists, he does not neglect to bandage a cut finger or to take his daily exercise in the university gymnasium. He may write learnedly about the untruthfulness of the senses, but for all that, he dodges when he sees a steel girder falling from a skyscraper. Living as he claims to do in the midst of constant deception, supplied with faculties that continually play him false, he should logically believe in nothing, trust no one, plunge himself into the utter depths of pessimism and despair. But because he lives quite independently of his philosophical creed, he can smile trustingly into the eyes of his friends and speak glowingly of St. Francis of Assisi.

If our democratic world has one overpowering hatred, it is the hatred of slavery. We cannot bear the thought of it even where the yoke presses on another; and the rattle of chains, binding soul or body, will drown the most entrancing music. Unless, then, a man's philosophy teaches that his will is free, it is impossible to see how he can logically escape the misery which is the birthright of every slave. Bound hand and foot, driven forward under the lash of a blind chance or an irresponsible fate, he can no more lift his voice in song than could the galley slave chained to his oar. Difficulties impend over his terrified head, and he knows he is powerless to ward them off; temptations sweep down upon him, threatening his dearest happiness and the happiness of his loved ones, yet he has been convinced by his philosophy that no effort of his can stem the overwhelming tide.

For the philosopher of the slave-will there can be happiness only in so far as he uses his God-given freedom to ignore his own creed; for happiness is the companion of freedom alone. There at least, the dour old disciples of Calvin in England and in colonial America were brutally consistent. Their philosophy of life taught them that men are not free; so, with relentless logic, they trampled out the lights of the theaters, plucked the Maypole from the green turf, and banned from their vicinity the music of organ and of voice, and human laughter.

Readers of current philosophy will have noted the recurrence of phrases like " Passing on the torch of life to future generations," " The immortality of the life-spark." When these expressions mean anything more than a vague sentimentality, they are a poor sop thrown to a world hungry for immortality. Instead of a genuine immortality, these philosophers dole out a diluted substitute in the assurance that we live again in our children and that immortality is found in the memory of our friends. There is no doubting the longing of man for an immortality not only for himself but even more, at times, for the loved ones he sees passing into the silence beyond. No man, even at the end of the longest life, feels that he has lived long enough, that he has exhausted the possibilities of knowledge, or sounded the depths of love. No man can bear the thought that his wife or his mother has ceased to be, that death is a barrier which means irrevocable separation. Without immortality or the hope of it, the longest life must end in pessimism, in the conviction that all is lost and lost forever.

But for the philosopher who denies a personal soul, immortality in any true sense is beyond the possibility of question. If he believes that we have nothing but our bodies, he bounds human life with a meager span of hurried years. If, as a substitute for immortality, he talks of absorption in the great all-spirit, he offers a solution positively repulsive to men who cling passionately to their own individuality and who devotedly love precisely the individuality of other persons. And in this absorption into a Pantheistic god, all individuality is lost.

Only a philosophy which, like ours, gives man the positive assurance that he has an immortal soul can take the horror from death. For most other philosophies, death is a breaking with all we cling to most ardently; for the rest it is at least the sacrifice of the individuality which is dearer to us than any other possession. That way lies pessimism, drear and unrelieved.

No man can be happy in mere denials; no mind can be satisfied with negations. For that reason modern philosophy is so largely a dreary waste, repulsive to the man whose life is in touch with the beautiful and the real. It has denied or questioned the certainty of our commonest knowledge, doubted the very faculties on which all our activities depend, shackled our free-will with bonds of steel, torn God from His Heaven to substitute there a blind chance or a machine-like evolution, stripped man of almost all his glorious prerogatives, and offered the grave or oblivion as our ultimate bourne. No wonder that such a series of pitiful denials should have been climaxed with Schopenhauer and his systematic pessimism.

On the contrary, it was the philosophy which rests firmly on positive affirmations, which upholds man's faculties in their quest of an attainable truth, which points out the glory and the responsibility of his free-will, which lifts the finger of hope to a directing Deity who is the source of our life and the guardian of our destinies, which marks man as the chosen son of the Most High with a life unlimited by range of years or ages, that woke the song on the lips of St. Francis and has made Christian philosophy the only source of consistent, systematic optimism.

Personal Recollections of Newman

REDFERN MASON

CARDINAL NEWMAN'S presence in Birmingham during the closing years of his life was spiritually discerned rather than sensibly felt. Everyone knew that in the red brick building at Edgbaston there lived an old, old man who, in his slight frame, embodied a chapter of the spiritual life of England; but few of the seething thousands of the Midlands had seen him and fewer still had heard him speak.

To the Faithful of the Oratory he was a familiar figure; but to the world outside he was an abstraction, a tradition. He was a force which, long quiescent, might spring into activity under the impulsion of some national emergency.

I was a reporter on one of the Birmingham newspapers in those days and it fell to my duty from time to time to inquire of the Fathers concerning the Cardinal's health. Telephone the Oratorians had none; so every day someone had to make a visit to the Oratory. It was not a pleasant duty. Father Neville would wrinkle his brows anxiously, disturbed to be reminded that his friend was flesh and blood; Father Ignatius Ryder would do his best to be urbane; the Irish janitor waxed irascible.

Leading their life of recollection, the Fathers disliked the intrusion of the world. To them the Cardinal was a visible link with God and our visits were so many reminders of the frail tenure on which that link was maintained.

On the rare occasions when the Cardinal preached, a stenographer would be present to take notes of what he said. But he had to be secreted behind a pillar where the speaker could not see him. But, hidden or visible, the press did its work and the Oratorians tacitly recognized that, though the accomplishment of that work might disturb their quiet of mind, its neglect would be of much graver consequence.

For to the world at large Birmingham existed mainly as the home of the author of the "Apologia." Its steel and its jewelry would become dust; but men knew that the words of John Henry Newman would affect generations yet unborn. The Cardinal was the city's one vital source of interest. Joseph Chamberlain might symbolize the activities of life; but Newman typified the things of life beyond life.

When the boys of the Oratory School gave a Latin play, people would go there, regardless of the slimness of their Latinity, hoping against hope that the Cardinal, as the arranger of the text of "Aulularia" or "Phormio," whatever the play might be, would be in his place. The papers were never long without reference to him. Now the Times would print a rumor that he was troubled in mind and contemplated a return to Anglicanism; now the statement would go forth that his sole joy in life lay in the Mass. One editor, Henry J. Jennings, since famous in financial journalism, wrote a popular life of the Cardinal, bound in a cheap red cover like the "Dolly Dialogues." Someone showed it to Newman and, glancing it through, he said it was clever, but the work of a "literary scavenger." The Athenaeum dismissed the book as "platitudinous twaddle" and Jennings' young scribes vied with one another in trying to get the phrase into their own sheet. One rash youth, named Hands, afterwards wounded at Mafeking, succeeded and we waited trembling for the editorial axe to fall. But it did not. Jennings was not the man to show that the words had stung him. Besides that, Hands was valuable.

Happy were those of us who had a copy of the precious first edition of "The Present Position of Catholics," for it contained the great Oratorian's vivisection of the apostate, Achilli. "Yes, Father Achilli," said Newman, in answer to one of the ex-priest's taunts, "the Church of Rome does stand ashamed; she stands ashamed that she should have brought forth a son like you." And then came the damning list of Achilli's seductions and ravishings. The English courts ordered the paragraph excised from the work; but the Times declared that, if that was English justice, then trial by jury itself stood condemned. If you wish to add the Achilli paragraph to your Newman, you will find it in Wilfrid Ward's biography.

I well remember the famous visit which Mr. Gladstone made to Birmingham at the time of the first Home Rule bill. Between the engagements of his political progress, the great premier seized the opportunity to visit his old friend and, in my mind's eye, I can still see Hagley Road black with people, watching him on his way and wondering what manner of conversation the two friends would have together. There were no dictaphones in those days, else some Oratorian might have stretched punctilio to the breaking point.

The Cardinal was a great lover of music and I sometimes went to the meetings of the Little Oratory in the hope he would be present. But I was not fated to see him. I did see him, however, one morning at the Birmingham Festival. Richter was conducting Beethoven's Fifth Symphony and, for Newman, Beethoven and Mozart were the apostles of tone. He sat in the front of the great gallery and I recall the thrill that went through the assemblage when the word went round that Newman was present. English decorum is against demonstrations of personal regard. They leave that to Latins and Slavs. But, in their restrained English way, the people showed how profoundly the genius of this leader of thought had entered into their lives. You divined it by whispers and eager glances, by a psychic tremor that ran through the whole audience.

"He seemed lost in the mystery which is music," a friend said to me afterwards. Indeed, the Cardinal's love for music was as perplexing to the Cardinal's clerical brethren as his fine taste in wine was to teetotalers. "You see he fiddles," said Archbishop Ullathorne half apologetically, when Newman had praised a Mass by Mozart which had proved too hard for the archiepiscopal comprehension.

As in a spirit of saintly irony, Newman chose for the music to be sung at Dr. Ullathorne's obsequies the C minor Requiem of Cherubini, a noble work, sculptured and architectural. I remember him as he appeared in the Mass, a figure almost unbelievably fragile, supported by a priest on either hand. Then it was that he spoke the only words I ever heard from his lips, the Divine formula, Requiescat in pace.

When next I saw the Cardinal he lay between two rows of tapers, his hands folded on his breast, his face fixed in the expression of eternity. The Oratory was in darkness save for the glimmer of the funeral lights; the church was full of praying people. The silence was unbroken save for an occasional sob and the footfalls of men and women as they stole in to look on their dead friend, or sadly turned away to see him in this life no more.

Newman's face has often been compared to that of Caesar. But in no portrait that I have ever seen was the resemblance so strong as it was when he lay in his last sleep. The envelope of flesh was not emaciated. Fair as the face of a child, it seemed the chrysalis from which the soul had just emerged. The jaw was firm, but not heavy; the receding of the flesh gave the nose a boldness that suggested an eagle surveying the infinite.

I knelt in that atmosphere of prayer and the beauty of it sank into my soul. I was not a Catholic in those days, though the "Divina Commedia" had begun to undermine my youthful Voltaireanism. The Cardinal's face, stamped with the seal of final faith, seemed the silent proclamation of things unseen. The fingers that had penned the words of "stern anger" against Kingsley were still; the eyes that had looked affectionately on the towers of Oxford were closed; but "The death of His saints is precious in the sight of the Lord" and that preciousness seemed imprinted on the august visage before me.

Now he lies in the little cemetery at Rednall, a place of pilgrimage for the Faithful of many lands. The place is quiet and recollected; peace has spread her wings there. Far from the fret and fever of the world the great Cardinal proclaims from his last earthly tenement the reality of the things of the spirit and the transiency of the illusions of the flesh.

War Mothers

F. J. McNiff, S.J.

THERE is an old saying among philosophers to the effect that use and custom throttle surprise: Assuetis non fit passio. The man who first ventured into the streets of London under the protecting shade of an umbrella, found his novel contrivance more useful in warding off improvised missiles than in shielding him from the sun or the rain. But who takes note of an umbrella now, except it be his neighbor's? So has it been with the telephone, the automobile, the airplane, and a host of other inventions that set the world agog for a brief day's astonishment, but are now accepted as the ordinary, and even necessary, instruments of convenience. Use and custom have indeed throttled surprise, so far forth indeed, that we seem to have dropped the wonder point from our code of punctuation, and taken nil admirari for a hall-mark.

Some years ago, one of the smaller towns of New York State had a lady coachman, the owner and driver of a public conveyance. The story was that her husband fell ill, whereupon the wife, who doubtless had always held the reins of the household, took up also the ribbons that guided the family steed. She succeeded, she won out over mere male rivals; and, to make her supremacy the surer, she laid about her, at times, with her trusty horsewhip. One man, rasher than his fellows, dared in a whisper to christen her Madamazon, a contraction for Madam Amazon; and, by accounts, she merited the name. But the most casual observer could see that the townsfolk were not accustomed to the usurpation. Surprise was everywhere, even indignation. Had the cocherette appeared in New York, there would have been surprise, too.

For a long time both tradition and instinct forbade a woman to take up what was reckoned as distinctively a man's work. At first, women acting as office help caused no small stir, but not for long. It was soon recognized that women are good typists. Besides, they cost less, and are often more painstaking than men. Women doctors and women agents may be said to have habilitated themselves, and women lawyers and managers are in the way of doing so. Naturally males prefer to buy such commodities as shaving tools from men clerks. Beyond this we bargain with a woman behind the counter as a matter in ordinary, and without compunction. Use and custom have been stopping the mouth of surprise progressively.

Then came the war. Men volunteered or were drafted. Under the wand of skilled industry, great cantonments were reared almost over night. Marvelously, armies assembled, scouts were mustered, policing extended, civilians organized, products commandeered, various economies introduced, till the country became a vast military camp. But an army needs food, and clothing, and firearms, and ammunition, and ships, and airplanes. Meanwhile, thousands of men, erstwhile producers, have gone to the front, or are on the seas, or in training camps. Whence came these recruits? Physically and mentally, from the best in the land. They trooped in legions from the rich and the poor, from the factories, from the farms, from the colleges and the universities, from the offices and studios, from the professions. They have left homes that must be kept together, work that must be done, somehow or other. And now who are to fill up the gaps, who are to turn producers, keep the factories going, homes together, and our industries abreast of our needs? Why, the women, of course. It was the women themselves who first said "of course." They said it in a very matter-of-fact way, without bluster or bragging. Employers, seeing the straits they were in, said "of course" in turn, but doubtfully, as men will who are forced by necessity to make a quick choice. The doubt was short-lived, as it always is when choice brings immediate success. Go to the munition plants. There you will find women operating machines which call for accurate and delicate handling. The work is efficiently done, just as efficiently as it ever was. The parts turned out come up to standard. Women overseers and superintendents look to that. So up and down the line of employments to the latest innovation on the elevated and surface-car lines, the conductorette. We had been looking for the conductorettes as a natural development; and if they had not given a decidedly military cut to their uniform, they would have caused no comment of surprise. The element of surprise came not from the fact that they were acting as "ringers-up" of fares. Not at all; but solely because they made change and turned the crank of the coin box, while garbed in a serviceable and jaunty costume.

Here, then, is an anomaly, or apparent anomaly that will bear examination. The country has been made over, in great part, yet no one shows surprise. Things have been turned topsy-turvy, yet there is no confusion that we do not recognize, none that is past our power of remedy, none that we are not steadily proceeding to set to rights. Everywhere women are doing effectively what no one thought the "weaker sex" could ever accomplish Again, no one is surprised. One would think that the present order is the slow development of years, not the sudden outgrowth of the moment. Two explanations, or better, a two-fold explanation comes offhand. First, in a crisis, a person either takes in the situation directly, sees what is to be done, acts quickly, then mentally and physically adapts himself to conditions suddenly reversed: or, upset and confused by "the sudden element that changes things," collapses helplessly. A vigorous people, like a vigorous man, naturally and even easily takes to the first method. Instant action being the requisite, there is no temptation for a versatile nation to dally with surprise. Hard situations are great educators just because they compel quick and timely thinking, with action suited to the thought. So we experience that difficulties often bring about in a short space developments what years of easy success would not have ensured. Anyhow, our people are not wont to make such a juggernaut of hardship, that they cast themselves prone, and let the ugly thing crush them.

The second part of the explanation is hardly less obvious than the first, and is by far more interesting. Once when I was visiting a student who was seriously ill, his mother remarked that during the month or six weeks the young man had been kept abed, no one but herself had given him any medicine, nor so much as a spoonful of water. It was perfectly clear, as anyone who knows mothers will understand, that there was nothing of a brag in the remark. It was just what the ordinary mother would wish to do. There were others in the household who could have helped with the nursing; but medicine administered by mother would have a double efficacy: it would be given betimes, mother would see to that. As to the sick boy, it would come from her who most of all sympathized with his needs and his pains. A stroke of a mother's hand imparts an inexplicable virtue to the doctor's potion. Now, woman is by nature motherly. You recognize that in the little girl with her dolls. You recognize that when you see the keen interest that draws girls around the cradle in the nursery, and the perambulator in the street. You recognize that in the devotion and self-sacrifice of the "little mothers" upon whom so much devolves in the homes of the poor. You recognize it wherever trouble has entered, comfort is needed, and woman is at hand. You recognize it in the hospitals, and in the "huts" near the battle line, as every soldier from the trenches will testify. Here you see nature unhampered by guile, nature her own proper interpreter, nature as God made it. For you can throttle surprise, and, at one time or other, almost every emotion has been schooled into silence. Never yet has man or woman successfully gagged nature. Given the occasion, nature will cry out, even in the depraved.

Heretofore, following her bent, woman has mothered the individual, now she is mothering the nation. Fundamentally, the instinct that prompts her to care for the family, the needy, the sorrowful, is the same that urges her to aid her country in a crisis. God has made her as a helpmeet; and since God does nothing by halves, he has gifted her with all those high qualities that render aid most acceptable and efficient. Our womanhood is sound. The war will not undo it. She will move hereafter in a larger sphere. That means she will be capable of greater good, and will have assumed graver responsibilities; but she will still move as woman. As occupation does not make the man, so it need not unmake the woman. And no one will see more thoroughly than our women themselves, the vanity of aping what they cannot become; the folly and utter loss to society of failing to become what the wisdom of God plans they ought to be.

Doubtless there will remain the generation of those who have left father, mother, and all things for an improvised pulpit in the public square, and a place in the sun of notoriety. They will continue to recite their pieces about the "slavery" of woman and her "emancipation." Neither will they lack an audience and applause. Free shows seldom do. When all is said, perhaps it is just as well that the hysterical ones should not disappear. At least, they demonstrate that which woman normally is not; that to which we all pray she may not descend. It is no new thing for reformers to set themselves the task of erasing the laws that the Master has engraven on the rock bed of creation; but their travail has only succeeded in moving ant-hills. Let them go on shifting ant-hills, no matter how often, and with what ado. They will never convince us that the tracings they leave in the sand mark the path of a prehistoric glacier.

Faith and a Mountain

MICHAEL WILLIAMS

THIS is the story of Brother—Brother Joseph, I shall call him; though that is not his name. Nor may I tell his name, nor the name of the mountain where he did show forth the faith that was in him, and which now through centuries to come, will upbear the testimony to that faith. For the Fathers of the Order of which this Brother is a most humble member, asked me to keep quiet. Journalist that I am, I should have shouted the wonderful story from the housetops of all the world. But in their prudence and their reserve and their modesty, virtues which journalism does not promote, they reminded me of the fact that Brother Joseph—which, remember, is not his name—is still living, and that one who is himself so truly humble, so self-resistant, should not be too hastily made a subject for publicity, even the publicity of the Faith. So I merely sketch the marvelous tale, and show forth its wonder under veils.

I shall begin by giving you its moral. All good stories have morals, of course. And one moral of this true story is that it is not necessary to dig dusty books from the upper shelves of monastery of seminary libraries if you would know about great deeds of faith, and the high romance of the love of God; nor is it essential to go on pilgrimages to far lands for that purpose. Here, today, in the year of Our Lord, 1918, in this America of ours, Almighty God shows forth His power, and His marvels even as He did in the dawn of Christianity, or in those splendid centuries of vital, well-nigh universal faith when saints were in every city, and the paths were traced to places of pilgrimage that remain through all the ages.

It was at St. Anne de Beaupré, in Quebec—another great story which I must write, if no better pen appears: but that story must be a whole book—where I heard about Brother Joseph. A day or two before my arrival at St. Anne's, a prominent citizen from a great city in the United States had come to the little village on the bank of the mighty St. Lawrence, where, since 1650, millions of pilgrims have visited the miraculous shrine of the Good St. Anne, mother of Our Lady. He had called upon one of the Redemptorist Fathers who have charge of the famous basilica, and told him how one year before, on that very day, being in the city of Quebec, and hearing for the first time about St. Anne's, he had visited it, drawn by the casual curiosity of a non-Catholic tourist. He was, he said, a man who found it hard to amuse or interest himself outside of his work, because for years he had been almost stone deaf.

Accordingly he entered the far-famed church, wherein the power of centuries of ardent prayer and potent faith may be felt most tangibly, and saw the people at prayers, and saw the mountain of crutches left by cripples miraculously cured, and read the tablets commemorating other cures. And he said to himself, so he told the priest, "This is very wonderful. Oh, that I could have faith like these poor people, and that this good St. Anne would be good to me." Then, because his time was limited, he turned to go. He thought, he remembered, that the church, though so beautiful and impressive, must be a singularly poor place in which to preach—non-Catholics usually think of churches in terms of preaching, poor souls deprived of sacramental worship—for even through the muffling veils of his deafness, he said, he heard the roaring sound of the voices praying. So he went to Quebec. Packing his bag that night to go away, he also wound up his watch, and suddenly he became aware that he could hear its ticking. And when he reached his home city, and his specialist, he knew and was assured, that his hearing was fully and to all appearances permanently restored. So this year he had come back to St. Anne's, for the express purpose of telling the priests what had happened, and to show that he was grateful. Will this event, in the end, give this man a full measure of that flash of faith which caused his prayer of power to the good St. Anne? We do not know. But, anyhow, we may pray that it will be so.

This event, naturally, set us all talking, at St. Anne's, about similar wonders, there and elsewhere. Then it was that somebody told me about Brother Joseph, "a living saint." He lived in a great city through which I would be passing on my journey to New York. Why not make a pilgrimage there? I did so. Unfortunately, only having an hour or two to spare, I missed Brother Joseph, who was attending the funeral of a life-long friend, that day—Ah, Catholic friendship goes on beyond the grave that is the end of so much for so many unhappy souls!—and I was obliged to go away before he returned. But from a Father of the Order, I heard the wonderful story, and saw its evidence crowning the hill of faith; and, now, with only a little space to spare, I may only indicate barely the outlines of the tale. This humble Brother is attached to the service of a teaching Order which has many colleges in the United States and Canada and elsewhere. The college buildings stand at the foot of a mountain. This humble Brother began, some thirty or forty years ago, to climb this mountain-side, when his duties permitted him an opportunity, for duty came even before prayer with Brother Joseph, or, rather, duty with him was prayer itself. By and by, the Fathers began to notice that Brother Joseph was being visited by an ever-increasing throng from the nearby city, begging him to pray for them. Numerous stories came to the ears of the Fathers about people cured, conversions, spiritual benefits, attributed to Brother Joseph's helping prayers which were offered by him through that paragon of prayer, that pattern of perfect duty, that truest friend of the Divine, St. Joseph. Yet, as I was told, Brother Joseph differed in no wise from numerous other good Brothers in the Order; he was neither more pious, and certainly not more loyal. But for all that apparently, his faith appeared to be deeper than with most; it seemed to be of that type which Our Lord said could move mountains. At any rate, it was the occasion of an oratory being built on this particular mountain, where once or twice a year a Father would offer up the Holy Sacrifice, and where at other times Brother Joseph could offer up his prayers. And ever the visiting crowds grew more constant and more dense; and now, on the crown of that mountain, there is arising a mighty basilica, built by the gifts of the Faithful, stirred by the faith of Brother Joseph.

I would that I could have met that dear Brother, and begged him to pray for me. It is written in one of the books of St. Teresa, that above all saints she trusted in the good St. Joseph. Therefore, I longed to complete my pilgrimage to this mountain of faith by meeting one who had not merely read that it is wise to pray through Joseph; but who had prayed, who had prayed with faith; and so, in the end, had crowned a mighty mountain with a towering basilica which shall be a sacramental of that faith. But it was not to be; so I went upon my way, leaving Brother Joseph, undisturbed by the journalist, to sweep his floors, and to work in his garden, and to smile upon his thousands of friends, and in all simplicity to pray for them to God, through the good Joseph, who guarded Mary, who served Our Lord.

The Lay Apostolate

Just what are the Catholic laity doing to spread the knowledge of Catholicism and bring people to the Faith? This is an interesting inquiry and never more interesting than now when America is about to experience the sufferings of war, and great numbers will turn to religion as they have done already under the stress of sorrow in other countries. For the most part lay efforts are confined to the teaching of the members of the Church. There are settlement workers, Sunday-school tutors and associations of lay catechists. Also there are the public-school teachers who give from their free time after hours to instruct Catholic children in their religion. Surely this is noble work and it is pleasing to note evidences that it is growing.

But the lay apostolate has more to do if it is to answer the call of the Master. A vast multitude, in our country well over half the population, own no religion at all. One may say that in the mass these people are too hard, too worldly, to bother about spiritual matters. The average Catholic is afraid to approach them for fear that his pride will be hurt by a rebuff. Is this a mistaken attitude? Some of us converts think it is and we base our opinion on what we have seen done by the few who have taken the other course, who never lose a chance to talk Catholicism, who do not fear to be aggressive in proclaiming their faith and letting others know its riches of truth and of happiness.

Of course it is not by any means the convert alone who answers the description of the layman militant. The proportion among reared-in-the-Faith Catholics no doubt is quite as high. But a convert, fresh from the inquiry class and the baptismal font is more often the type that insists on being heard. His enthusiasm makes him bold. Moreover, he is a constant challenge to people on the outside who cannot understand why, when he was born and brought up a Protestant, he should turn and become a Catholic.

The convert then by the nature of things has more opportunities for discussing his religion with non-Catholics than the Catholic-born. And having greater opportunities his responsibility is the greater. It is here that the convert leagues come in. They recognize both opportunity and responsibility and they also perceive that as an organization of laymen they are practically alone in the field. The clergy give their splendid missions to non-Catholics but the leagues are the only associations, managed by laymen, which seek to organize the lay apostolate and direct its energies, and to impress upon its members the militant missionary idea.

At one of the recent meetings of the Convert's League of New York something interesting happened. A man, bitterly anti-Catholic, had finally been induced more from curiosity than anything else, to attend. The speaker chanced to be an ecclesiastic of prominence, of eminent culture, a convert to the Church. The visitor who had the familiar Protestant notion that Catholics on the whole were socially and intellectually inferior, found himself awakened with a start. To make a long story short he sought an introduction to the speaker when the meeting was over and the conversation ended with a resolution, which it appears is now being carried out, to become a Catholic.

The main point is that this man could never have been induced to enter a Catholic church on any general invitation to non-Catholics. He is of the many whom the non-Catholic mission would not get because of the fear of the church edifice or the distaste for a religious service. In the Rose Room of the Hotel Plaza he would not be at this fancied disadvantage. Hence he came.

Convert leagues should aim to be instructive, for their members who include "born-Catholics" as well as converts. They should aim to inspire the zeal and spirit of the missionary in spreading the Faith by personal example and by personal conversation. If they do not do these things they will not succeed or accomplish any broad results. If they do perfect their organization with these motives to the fore, they can become a great power in the growth of Catholicism in America.

The "Saturday Evening Post"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

"Be good if you can, but if you can't be good, be careful," is a counsel of worldly wisdom which occurs to me as I read Dr. Austin O'Malley's letter in your current issue, relating how the Saturday Evening Post, with a circulation of 2,000,000 copies a week, printed a story which vulgarly and falsely cast odium upon a priest. I am reminded of the counsel I quote by what Dr. O'Malley says in closing his delightfully mordant epistle, namely: "The Post has always been decent, and it is difficult to understand how this vulgarity slipped in." For I must point out to Dr. O'Malley, but more particularly, to the Post, that this instance of carelessness is not the only one of the kind, and that the Post needs to be taught the lesson that if it can't be good, it had better be careful. For in the issue for February 9 it printed the article by Elizabeth Frazer, dealing with the work of the Red Cross in Italy, to which AMERICA took exception in its issue of February 16. This article, in a number of places, repeats the poison-gas innuendoes which would attach to Pope Benedict XV part of the blame for the recent Italian defeats; vague, yet evil gossip which would class the Holy Father with pro-Germans and unpatriotic pacifists. I wrote to the editor of the Post and complained. I offered to supply an article which would place before the readers of that widely read journal the truth about the Holy Father's absolutely disinterested and lofty position in this matter of the war. The Post cavalierly retorted that there was nothing to justify my complaints in Miss Frazer's article, and impolitely ignored my offer to write a paper which would have been an act of justice on the part of the Post to publish. I do not wish to become a public scold; but the attitude of many of the periodicals is far too unfair to the Faith to be tolerated by Catholics, at least by those Catholics who feel some little sense of gratitude to God for the gift of faith, and of loyalty to His Church. But what can a few, unorganized writers accomplish? We do a little; but such a little, in comparison with the work that cries aloud to be done. However, this issue of AMERICA is most encouraging, with its many letters from zealous, wide-awake Catholics bearing upon this great problem of publicity for, and defense of the work of the Church. Spring is coming, after a grim, dark winter. Easter will close the terrible Lent that is now upon us. Let AMERICA, our champion of the apostolate of the press, keep up the good work. The day will come when suggestions such as that offered by Father Durward and by W. A. P., of St. Louis, will be acted upon, and made tangible. We shall have a national press apostolate. We shall have our national daily paper. We shall obey the wishes of the Holy Father; who only repeats, with an urgency required by the times we live in, the exhortations of his holy predecessors, Leo XIII and Pius X. God speed the day!

New York. MICHAEL WILLIAMS.

Some Irish, Old and New

To the Editor of AMERICA:

With some interest I have been following the discussion of "Some Irish, Old and New," and have felt both ashamed and grieved at the charges brought forward on each side of the question. It ill befits a newcomer in your circle of critics to question the views of men who are perhaps in a better position to know the truth than I, and whose experience confers upon them the privilege of expressing their views. However, a certain loathness to accept their statements as being of very wide application compels me to doubt the general or even considerable extent of such reprehensible practices as Messrs. Libby and O'Brien enumerate. If, however, their charges be well founded, the state of affairs is unfortunate indeed, for now, perhaps as never before, the welfare of the land over the seas, toward which both "the old" and "the new" must, unless their blood be wholly polluted, entertain both loyalty and regard, demands unity of thought, word and act, on the part of Irishmen and Irish-Americans.

The St. Vincent de Paul Society

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I have followed with much interest the correspondence in AMERICA about the St. Vincent de Paul Society, and while I am in substantial agreement with your correspondent, T. V. A., in the issue of February 9, where he says the society in the city of New York, including Brooklyn, "is chiefly a relief-giving organization," I wish to offer a word in explanation, or if you prefer, in defense.

The public machinery in this city for relief of the poor does not include assistance to poor families in their own homes, except in the case of a very limited group of widows. Yet in a population running into millions there must always be families who owing to misfortunes arising from one cause or another need temporary, pecuniary aid, which their friends or relatives cannot supply. Amongst this group are many Catholic families, and we cannot deny that, as Catholics, they have some claim on our charity. How shall such families be relieved? There is no public fund from which they can obtain aid, and we naturally do not care to refer them to private charitable organizations under non-Catholic management. Nevertheless something must be done.

The Society of St. Vincent de Paul in this city endeavors as far as possible to give temporary aid in such cases, although the rules of the society, as laid down in the "Manual," are occasionally somewhat strained. I fear that your correspondents, R. S. and K. B., in their haste to prove that the St. Vincent de Paul Society is a modern up-to-date relief organization have, unwittingly no doubt, given the impression that it is merely a relief-giving society. I assure the readers that in spite of our material atmosphere we do not forget that the Society of St. Vincent de Paul is a strictly religious organization, although the members, with a shyness which is easily understood, do not say much about the religious side of their work.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In his letter on the spirit and the methods of the St. Vincent de Paul Society, T. V. A. has correctly pointed out that the primary object of this society is a spiritual one. This spiritual object is, however, often misunderstood. Some seem to think that thereby is understood the spiritual aid that is given to the poor, when ministering to them bodily aid. A close perusal of the "Manual," for whose rules T. V. A. asks a closer observance, and with much reason, shows that the spiritual advancement of the Vincentians themselves, who go about their works of mercy, is the primary object of the society; all else, spiritual and corporal works of mercy, are but a means thereto. The "Manual" says vrey plainly: "It is also to be remarked that the primary object which the society proposes to its members is their own edification." And again: "Still if charitable works are not the primary object of the society, they are the principal means made use of to attain that object" (edification).

This, it is true, puts Vincentian work on a basis of self-love, but it is a self-love acting under the purest of motives. Such self-love will be an incentive to conscientious and thorough work. What we do for ourselves we generally do well. It will put spirit, personal interest, kindness, generosity into the ministrations to the poor. Such self-love is the best guaranty for neighborly love: "Love thy neighbor as thyself," the Master said. Self-love must be the measure of neighborly love. The more pure and perfect self-love, so much more pure and perfect will neighborly love be.

Self-interest has always been considered one of the greatest motive-powers for development. By recognizing this and by spiritualizing self-love so as to lift it from the plane of worldly self-interest with consequent dangers of a destructive selfishness, the organizers of the St. Vincent de Paul Society have put an undying spirit into Vincentian work. With such a spirit Vincentians need not fear to make their work "scientific." This simply denotes order and method in charity work. St. Vincent de Paul was a friend of such a "science" of charity; he had a scientific temper. Arthur Todd, professor of sociology at the University of Minnesota, gives him this splendid tribute in a recent article to the Survey: "Not a little of the best in so-called organized philanthropy (both spirit and methods) is traceable to the work of St. Vincent de Paul." This great Saint recognized the need of scientific principles.

St. Vincent de Paul's great work may be said to have begun by a recognition of this principle. You remember his first case: a benevolent lady had asked him to recommend to his parishioners a certain needy family. He did so at the morning service. In the afternoon he visited the family only to find them already almost overwhelmed with gifts of food and money. "Behold noble but ill-regulated charity," said the saint, and set to work at once to make the benevolent impulse effective through vision and organization. That was the scientific spirit.

The spirit of this great Saint must live in all Vincentian work; the aim of this work must be well defined; the rest will then take care of itself.

The Lepers of Dutch Guiana

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The American Leper Society, on which falls the task of providing for over 100 lepers located at Surian, in Dutch Guiana, is dependent on the generosity of American men and women. A heart-rending appeal has recently been sent by the director of the colony in Guiana, begging that the assistance which has been so promptly and generously given in the past may be continued in the present, for if the revenue hitherto contributed by this country fails he knows not where to turn for aid. The world-war and the suffering entailed by it have seemingly diverted into other channels the funds which were formerly spontaneously contributed to the needs of the hopelessly afflicted lepers; but the director earnestly implores former benefactors not to forget the claims on their charity of his poor charges. Mrs. Frank Avery, whose address is 108 Lincoln Place, Brooklyn, N. Y., is the financial secretary of the American Leper Society, and she will be happy to acknowledge the receipt of the annual dues, of one dollar, from all lapsed members, and also to enrol new names on the list of the society's benefactors.

Heresy in the Established Church

To the Editor of AMERICA:

A remarkable and significant controversy is taking place in England at the present time in the Church Times, London Nation and Spectator over the appointment of the Dean of Durham, Dr. Hensley Henson, to the see of Hereford. An exact counterpart of the present controversy now centering around the appointment of a clergyman as bishop to this same see, because of heresy, was the appointment of Dr. Hampden just seventy years ago this year. Dr. Hampden, in 1836, delivered the Bampton course of lectures at Oxford University. In them he broached "heretical" views, and was bitterly denounced by both the "high" and the "moderate" parties in the "Establishment." Twelve years after, however, he was appointed to the see of Hereford.

The Jerusalem bishopric affair, along with other vital considerations shook Newman's faith in the Establishment, and the appointment of Dr. Hampden, in 1848, and the Gorham Judgment brought Manning into the true fold in 1851. With him came many who shared his convictions, but nothing like as many as those who opposed the appointment of Dr. Hampden to the see of Hereford.

Now, after seventy years, there is raging in England the same trouble over another "heretic" and that very see, but when the Prime Minister confirms the appointment and Convocation says Amen, no doubt all will run as smoothly as before. Well did one of the Oxford movement converts, T. H. Marshall, style the action of the Protestant bishops, "The Comedy of Convocation."

Another striking instance of appeasement by compromise was the furor created by Dr. Weston, Protestant Bishop of Zanzibar, over the Kikuyu affair, because two other bishops admitted dissenters to the "sacrament." A tremendous row was stirred up in England by this well-intentioned man, but when "Convocation" met and the inevitable compromise was arrived at, Dr. Weston subsided, like Keble and Pusey of old, and remains in the Protestant Establishment.

One of the saddest and puzzling thoughts, bearing on those apparently sincere people, who rebel against Protestantism as dominating the beliefs and practices of their church, is that they can be satisfied to remain in it and believe themselves Catholics, with no infallible authority to guide and direct it.

Prohibition and the Mass

By the shade of good Jeff Davis! S. L. B. of Covington, Ky., in AMERICA for February 16, seems so fond of "State rights" that he can think of no other useful divisions of government except States. On the question of "Prohibition and the Mass," he counsels: "Let the people assume power to themselves in their State Governments, rather than give away power to a centralized Government at Washington." Why this warning against a "centralized Government at Washington," when our difficulty is the tyranny of the State Government's prohibiting the mere possession of wine for Mass? Why not advocate a decentralizing of the State Government's power in respect of prohibition?

But what interested me most in the letter of S. L. B. was his statement that the Constitution of the United States "is simply and finally a written instrument, wherein the States have conferred certain powers upon the Federal Government and have defined their exercise." Does he really mean all of that? What does he mean?

New York. ROBERT E. SHORTALL.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

If K. R. of St. Mary's, Kansas, with many others, wishes to know why the inferences he has deducted from the First and Fourteenth Amendments of the Constitution do not commend themselves to the law, it is because these inferences are not warranted by the premises.

The First Amendment provides that: "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof." Hence, as long as Congress does not prohibit the free exercise of the Catholic religion, or of any other religion, this Amendment is held not to have been violated. It does not concern the legislative power of a sovereign State.

The Fourteenth Amendment reads in part: "No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty or property, without due process of law;" etc. This amendment does not guarantee directly liberty of conscience, or the free exercise of religion. Privileges and immunities are not to be taken for granted; they should be specified and defined. The legislators of Oklahoma did not make the importation, transportation, etc., of wine for sacramental purposes an exception to the prohibition law; they did not grant the desired privilege or immunity, and the Court held that they did not violate or abridge any privilege or immunity. There is no decision of any Court declaring wine for sacramental purposes a privilege or immunity. But there is a very recent decision of the U. S. Supreme Court rendered on December 17, 1917, the day before my petition for mandamus against the Santa Fe Railway was argued in the District Court of Oklahoma, according to which, in the opinion of Justice McReynolds in the case of Crane appealed from the State of Idaho, there was nothing in the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution to prevent the legislature of the State of Idaho from making alcohol in any form by its enactment absolutely prohibitive.

Hence, neither the First nor the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution prevents State legislatures from passing strict prohibition laws preventing the sale, transportation, etc., of wine, even for sacramental purposes.

A Brigadier General and the Pope

BRIGADIER General Charles Dyer Norton of the Red Cross was recently sent to Europe by President Wilson to investigate war conditions. In view of the work that was to be done, perhaps no better selection could have been made, for the General is a man of open mind and large experience. He was secretary to President Taft, is a member of the Red Cross War Council, is president of the National Security Company and vice-president of the First National Bank, offices whose duties demand intellect, honesty and courage. It is just these qualities that make the General's recent words on the Italian defeat most important. In an address recently delivered at the Hotel Astor, New York, before the New York Life Underwriters he said:

> My visit along the Italian front occurred during the week just preceding the great November retreat, and at the front-line trenches above Gorizia and Monte Santo I saw the very spot where later the line broke and the Germans burst through. Fighting almost everywhere on enemy soil, the Italian armies had captured positions nearly impregnable. . . .
> Yet it was possible even for a civilian to then and there record a premonition of impending disaster. And why? The answer is to be found in that hard-worked word "morale." There was trouble behind the lines and the men knew it. Every day along that front noticeably large numbers of soldiers were sitting outside their tents at midday writing letters home. It was explained that the few north and south railway systems through the long, narrow country were heavily overtaxed. South Italian soldiers had been on that mountain front for twelve to eighteen months without once revisiting their homes. . . .
> The Italian soldiers are hardy fellows, but, as the third winter's campaign came on, homesickness became acute, and the news from home was disconcerting. The frugal Italian woman is accustomed to fill her jars with wheat and macaroni somewhat in advance of daily needs. I saw in Rome a double line of police with arms interlocked surrounding a mob of women who were waiting for a pasta shop to open its doors. In the eager confusion a woman and her child were trampled to death by those women. In another city we saw the broken park railings in a square where one week earlier, during bread riots, five hundred civilians had been killed by machine guns. So that the Italian army, which had won a greater measure of tangible success than any of its allies, which had been held up in its August rush toward Vienna only by failure of its supply of heavy ammunition and guns, became aware, as winter drew nearer, that their allies who have the coal and the wheat had failed them; that there was a shortage of coal and wheat at home.
> The chlorine gas-shell of the early days of the war was devised for use in the level plains of Flanders. It did not prove so effective or dangerous in the north Italian mountains, but when that sudden November storm of the new invisible, deadly mustard gas came down upon the Italians, it fell upon regiments whose morale at that moment had been impaired, and they broke. Comfortable, well-fed war critics in America have said too much of treachery, of hostile propaganda; there was something of both, and a few officers and men were shot for it; but a grossly unjust aspersion has been cast upon one of the bravest, the most successful, and the most devoted of our allies.
> There is the whole sad story, and in it there is not a word or an insinuation against the finely patriotic Pope, another proof that the heroic conduct of the Holy Father not only frees him from suspicion of disloyalty, but places him among the heroes of the war, in the estimation of everybody except irresponsible "penny-a-liners" who vent their spleen in the Saturday Evening Post and in one or two obscure frowzy evangelical papers that smell of lies and bitterness.

The Laborer's Wage

THE labor difficulties which for a time promised to hamper seriously the vigorous prosecution of the war, have again disappeared from public view. Perhaps it is too much to say that the main points at issue have been settled, or even that a definite program has been reached. The simple truth seems to be, that, in answer to a legitimate appeal to patriotism, the workers have agreed not to urge their claims in any field where pressure might mean embarrassment to the Government. That they will keep the faith they have pledged is certain. But the questions put aside for the moment cannot be forgotten by labor, and should not be forgotten by the general public. They are not the exclusive concern of the millions who earn a precarious living in the sweat of their brows. They affect the welfare of the whole people. For no nation can proceed far along the path of genuine prosperity against the drag of a body of citizens, unable to obtain social justice.

War has disclosed with startling clearness the disagreeable fact that we have too long been willing to look upon the important relations of employer and employee, of capital and labor, as little more than subjects for debate among college sophomores, street-corner agitators, and Socialists. For our unwillingness to face disagreeable questions, long clamoring for solution, we may soon, certainly after the war, be asked to pay a heavy price. The years following the Civil War were a period of tremendous commercial expansion. They mark a time in which, under the stress of domestic and foreign competition, capital grew to regard the worker not as a man, precisely, but as part of a productive machine. "Systems" grew up, and reached a stage of fixity against which, even today, the wisest efforts of organized labor strive in vain. To the economist as to the laborer, these facts and their implication are plain. To regard man, whose dignity God Himself respects, merely as an economic factor, is the apotheosis of the most stupid and crass materialistic philosophy. Not only does it destroy his worth as a rational being, made in the image of God and destined for immortality, but it makes him, ultimately, a productive factor of dubious value.

It is, therefore, disheartening to know that many Catholics, presumably men of education and certainly leaders in their communities, are utterly unaware of the danger to society in any social program which fails to guarantee justice to the worker, and, primarily, his right, founded on the natural law, of entering into a free contract in disposing of his labor. Nearly a generation has passed since the great Leo XIII gave to the world his incisive Encyclical on the Condition of Labor, yet even today it is not uncommon that the Catholic editor or publicist, who insists upon the principles laid down in that immortal document, is looked upon by ultra-conservative brethren as a fire brand or a Socialist. In our anxiety to vindicate the right to property we have minimized the fact that man's right to live, in a manner befitting human dignity, comes first. The ultimate solution of our social problems lies in the adoption by the State and its citizens of the principles of Jesus Christ, and vain and hurtful is the remedy which rejects or disregards those principles. But surely, we shall not reach a solution by insisting upon the rights of the capitalist and forgetting the equally pressing rights of the laborer.

A Lesson from Russian Anarchy

RUSSIA in the throes of death is a spectacle to angels and men. Beset by domestic and foreign foes the great country is in process of painful dissolution. By ill fate, too great to calculate, the crafty offscourings of the people have destroyed even the semblance of decent government, and the basest passions of anarchists have assumed the form of untamed beasts which delight to lap up human blood. Murder is a diversion; theft, a pastime, and, worst of all, a furious and systematic war is waged against religion and morality. The church, which had degenerated sadly since its sinful break with Rome, has been torn to pieces: its temples have been outraged, its sacristies looted, its priesthood reviled. Not content with this, the Bolsheviki, under the leadership of the mad Jew, Trotzky, have popularized divorce to such an extent that 38,000 applications for severance of the nuptial bond have been made in Petrograd alone. Thus the dance of death proceeds; and murder, lust and robbery are partners therein.

It is a significant circumstance that as Russia, so Mexico. Similar forces have been at work, and similar crimes have been committed in both of these unfortunate countries; the International has finished two masterpieces, two ruined nations, which are as valleys of dried bones where the abomination of desolation reigns supreme. In this event is found a double lesson. One of these is for the capitalist, to wit: that the people in trying to come into their heritage only too often fall under the leadership of savages whose passion for destruction is unlimited. From this the captain of industry should learn to stoop to the overworked and the underpaid laborers that he may stave off the day of reckoning.

The second lesson is for the workmen. All honest men rejoice that the collective voice of the sons of toil is gaining in force and influence: no one with any sense of justice or charity would deny the laborer one jot or tittle of his rights and privileges, but pity for him leads every upstanding man to warn the laborer that the road to emancipation from economic and social ills does not lie through anarchy. Belial was never a sure guide or a generous sympathizer. Anarchy is an abyss in which civilization rots: Christian democracy is a mountain top where the flowers of virtue and prosperity bloom before the face of God.

A Dangerous Bill

THE Congress and State legislatures are very often made the depositaries of amusing bills which seldom find their way out of the committee room. Once in a while too a really dangerous measure, apparently prompted by sinister motives, is proposed for the consideration of law makers. Among the latter class of contemplated enactments is a bill which was recently introduced into the House of Representatives and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. It reads as follows:

A BILL

To make unlawful depositing in the mails of the United States advertisements of alleged exposures of the secret work of fraternal orders.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, without authority from the governing body of such order, no letter, postal card, circular, newspaper, pamphlet, or publication of any kind containing any advertisement or offer to sell purported or ostensible exposures, copies or extracts of the ceremonies, instructions, or work of a fraternal order, such as Masons, Odd Fellows, or Knights of Pythias, which, by the laws or rules of such order, members thereof are forbidden to disclose to persons who are not members thereof, shall be deposited in or carried by the mails of the United States.

SECTION 2. That any person, firm or corporation violating this Act shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than six months, or both: Provided, That upon the trial of any person, firm, or corporation charged with violating this Act no witness shall be required to disclose the ceremonies, instructions, or work of any such fraternal order of which he may be a member, nor to establish said offense shall proof be required as to the true nature of such ceremonies, instructions, or work.

At first sight this bill appears bad enough; on second thought it is seen to exceed all bounds of safety, and hence of propriety. Should it emerge a law any group of rascals can have themselves set up as a "fraternal Order" and then proceed to carry out nefarious plans in a dark and inscrutable atmosphere, generated and protected by the Congress. Nothing could be more favorable than this to lawless elements which, with all our watchfulness and publicity, embarrass the Government to an exasperating degree, especially in time of crises. Does the Congress really intend to abet propaganda subversive of legitimate authority? If not, it should either discountenance this bill altogether or else draw all its fangs. Moreover, by what right, human or Divine, may fraternal Orders guard secrets from the legitimate scrutiny of the State? Yet, in effect, this will be the outcome of the bill. For in one section it sets up a criminal and in the next it protects him from punishment, for fear that secrets of the Order may be revealed in court. This is a perilous process, one more step towards the constitution of a state within the State, an event which always contributes to the destruction of the latter. And we would have the Congress promote the consummation of this infamy!

When Senator Johnson was Governor of California he vetoed a similar bill for these very wise reasons:

> First, it contravenes Section 9 of Article 1 of the Constitution [of the United States], that every citizen may freely speak, write and publish his sentiments on all subjects, being responsible for abuse of that right, and no law shall be passed to restrain or abridge the liberty of speech or of the press. . . . Thirdly, there may be secret societies whose work ought to be exposed, and, of course, the bill, to be general in character, makes no discrimination between good and bad secret societies. There have, in the past, been many secret societies whose rituals, oaths and the like were inimical to the government and subversive to society. I would not make it a crime to expose the secrets of such organizations.

What can be the reason for the present anxiety of the Masons, Odd Fellows and Knights of Pythias? If their policy is good, knowledge of it would benefit the world, if bad, exposure would benefit the State which the fraternal Orders profess to serve with unexcelled devotion. And why be so exclusive? Sisters have been calumniated viciously of late years, so have Brothers, and though neither group has secrets to guard, yet each has rules and ceremonies quite as real as those of the fraternal Orders. This whole affair is indeed quite mysterious.

Belief and Action

IT is somewhat less than fifty years ago that, on the reception of the Red Hat, Cardinal Newman delivered his famous "Biglietto Speech" on liberalism in religion. For fifty years, this venerable champion of the Christian Faith had resisted liberalism, only to find in his old age that "never did Holy Church need champions against it more than now." As the great Cardinal foresaw, this false liberalism, "the doctrine that there is no positive truth in religion," has become "an error overspreading, as a snare, the whole earth." Today a great part of the world proclaims itself religious, but, unfortunately, many who profess to be Christians can be allowed the name only by courtesy. For they really do not believe that God has revealed a body of truth to His people, or that He can do this; or, granting the fact of revelation, that He has entrusted it in a special manner to the keeping of a visible Church, founded by His Son.

Almighty God may have spoken, or He may not. The modern world has no time for such questions. Hence it takes refuge in the easy solution that "what one believes makes little difference; what is important is what one does," and the parrot-phrase is repeated, as though it were a whole Summa Apologetica, in parrot-fashion, and with all a parrot's inability to grasp the psychological truth that, in reference to action, the belief of the individual is of supreme importance. I act or refrain from acting, not blindly, but because my intellect, after examining the facts in the case, presents its conclusions to the will; and in a normal human being, the will does not act, except in conformity with facts apprehended by the intellect. Hence the vital importance of arriving, or of striving to arrive, at the truth, and of refusing to act under the influence of emotion or sentiment.

Except in questions of religion, no man cares so to expose his intelligence to question, as to urge this utterly silly maxim that "it makes no difference what one believes." It would not be well to advise the mathematician, engaged in plotting a path across the seas for our transports, to throw off the shackles of dogmatism, at least to the extent of admitting that it makes no difference whether or not the sum of two plus two is four or five. Disaster would inevitably follow the calculations of so liberal a mathematician. Similarly mankind has always been persuaded that the whole is greater than any single part, stubbornly refusing to admit any liberalism in the matter, and even the most dry-as-dust scientist holds most dogmatically to a number of principles, as well as to some axioms, which in the very nature of things, can not be proved. Only when the all-important question arises, "Has Almighty God revealed certain truths which I can know and which I must accept on peril of my soul?" do men bring up the preposterous assertion that "it makes very little difference what one believes." In no other field is it so absurd, so fraught with danger. It is of first importance that I satisfy myself on the fact and the content of God's revelation of Himself to this world. In comparison with that, nothing else matters.

Catholic Street-Preaching

THE sea shore, the mountain side, the private home or crowded street and highway served equally well for the promulgation of Christ's glad tidings in the Gospel days. Two by two the disciples were sent forth through the towns and villages to make known their Master's message. It was all a question of convert-making, of preaching a new doctrine to people who perhaps had never heard of it before. In the open and before all the world the Apostles proclaimed their teachings to the multitudes who came to listen, whether attracted by curiosity or urged by motives of religious zeal. In the same manner Christianity was of necessity brought to the pagan nations, while even at home, in the centers of Catholicism, we find men like St. Francis gathering their audiences about them in the public streets and city squares to announce to them the need of penance and reformation of life.

In modern days we have, with some laudable exceptions, discontinued these methods in our towns and cities and have confined them to the distant missions. Yet there can be no other way of satisfactorily reaching the broad masses of the people except by going out to meet them and by speaking to them in our city squares and public halls.

There has been in the past a hesitancy and a fear that such methods might detract from the dignity of the Gospel. Whatever we may think of the prudence of such conduct at the time, the reason for it no longer exists. This has been proved to demonstration by the success which everywhere has attended the open-air lectures upon the Catholic Church delivered by Mr. Goldstein before non-Catholic audiences, and in public places, from his touring autovan. Thus at Oakland, California, a city thought to be very hostile to things Catholic, an audience of 2,000 gathered about the street corner to listen with intense interest for two entire hours to his exposition of the claims of Mother Church. Not only did they listen with courtesy to the truths which they had never heard before, but many were induced to purchase copies of Father Martin's "Catholic Religion." Thus the study begun in the open street could be continued by them in their own homes. The same story has been repeated in every city, without a single exception. There has been universal courtesy and good-will. At the opening lecture in San Francisco 7,000 gathered about the speaker in the civic center of the city.

It has been Mr. Goldstein's plan to avoid controversy, to make no attacks and give no offense, but in a spirit of Christian charity to place the attacking party at once upon the defensive. He has contented himself with making known the beauty and truth of the Catholic Church, and this in itself is a novelty sufficient to hold and attract a non-Catholic audience, while the grace of God will not be wanting to stir hearts. Such a speaker, it is evident, should be duly authorized. Mr. Goldstein has gone forth only after receiving the blessing of his ecclesiastical superiors, and has entered the various dioceses, with the consent and the warm welcome of the local ordinaries. In his arrangements there are no charges for services and no hall rents. All that is asked is the necessary publicity, the selection of a park, square, street or church-ground for the autovan, and the appointment of a committee to aid in disposing of Catholic literature, an item of the highest importance.

But aside from all other considerations, Mr. Goldstein's work has accomplished its greatest service to the Church in convincing Catholics that the time has come when Americans are willing and even anxious to listen to the claims of our holy religion. We can fearlessly go forth in public and with true American liberty and full reliance on the respect and interest of our fellow-citizens propose and explain the great truths of the Faith. We could hope for nothing better than that our century should witness a revival of Catholic public preaching in the streets and public places of our cities.

Literature

THE POETRY OF THOMAS WALSH

ONE cannot say of Mr. Walsh that

> "Our feelings lose poetic flow
> Soon after twenty-seven or so."

First we had "The Prison Ships" some nine years ago, and then, six or seven years later, "The Pilgrim Kings"; and now, most heavily laden and richest of all, "Gardens Overseas and Other Poems." (Lane.) The poet has passed from strength to strength; his impulse has developed in force and depth and variety, and his craftsmanship has mastered new excellences of ease and perfection. It would be prophecy to go on to say that this latest volume represents the art of Mr. Walsh at its highest and best,—very arbitrary prophecy. But it is such solid and brilliant achievement that it bears the character of fulfilment rather than of promise; of a journey done rather than of a pause, though the road is to be taken again on the morrow. This victorious air of finality is sure to challenge serious critical attention and to demand careful appraisement.

The thoughtful and disciplined quality of its culture is the first characteristic of Mr. Walsh's verse to recommend it to the reader. It has the mellowness of tone, the eager sympathy with humanity in every age, the nice precision of epithet which we associate with the best literary traditions. You move in subdued lights among antique hangings and rose-colored damasks where casements open out unexpectedly on busy pavements and quiet country lanes. There is golden plunder here from Greece and Rome and Celtic twilights and, above all, from where Spain lies dreaming of the past.

It is interesting to observe how Spain links the poet with the semi-barbaric sensuousness of the Orient. It is a curious commentary on the survival of Moorish influences in a Christian land, and recalls the lesson—as old as Roman civilization—that of the two powerful weapons of the East, its studied and picturesque indolence is far more effective in the long run than its furious and fanatical militarism. Mr. Walsh has affinities with Edward Fitzgerald. His philosophy saves him from following the music of Omar into Persian wilderness and sand-encircled Paradises of the flesh; but he has followed it eagerly where the spirit of Teresa robs it of its deadly secrecies. The "Alhambra Songs," published in "The Pilgrim Kings" and continued in the latest volume, are exquisite attempts to revive the wild romance and perfumed languors of the Spanish Moor.

If Mr. Walsh can catch the gleams of beauty from afar, he is also swift to note their immediate presence—and here he differs to his credit from Edward Fitzgerald. His title poem is a short sequence of Villon lyrics—of gossamery lightness and distinction—full of sad brooding on the great war. The same theme inspires "The Great Adventure," with perhaps a more poignant and more personal note of tenderness and yearning. "The Harbour Fog" and "Moonrise on Manhattan" are airy shapes that rise from the tumultuous life beating outside the poet's door-post. And the little commonplace things are not without their persuasive power to draw a song from him. Few people will fail to feel the delight of recognition in the experience of which "In the Mushroom Meadows" is a record:

Sun on the dewy grasslands, where late the frost hath shone,
And lo, what elfin cities are these we come upon!
What pigmy domes and thatches, what Arab caravan,
What downy-roofed pagodas that have known no touch of man!
Are these the oldtime meadows? Yes, the wild grape scents the air:
The breath of ripened orchards still is incense everywhere;
Yet do these dawn-encampments bring the lurking memories
Of Egypt and of Burma and the shores of China seas.

There are memorable phrases and happy descriptive touches in abundance, as when in "Chrysanthemums" he calls them "shaggy-headed urchins from the gardens of Japan"; and in "One Night" he says:

"The ancient spiders with a flutter spread
Their misty marvels through the withered flowers."

This latter poem, with others, is "after" a Spanish original; but they are often so fresh and spontaneous in their English guise that we have our suspicions. Like some of James Clarence Mangan's translations they may have started "after" and forged ahead, rejoicing in their own strength.

After a man has proved himself a poet the most interesting point to be determined about him is his philosophy of life, his interpretation of the universe, and human existence. The vocation of poet is perilous because it is so high. The pursuit of beauty is an affair of dizzy altitudes and slender causeways, and needs careful regard for the Angel who has been given charge over us lest we stumble. The making of poems is a harassing business for all its rare delights; and the vice, "which is the mere reaction of unhealthy toil," leaves more pitiful and more far-reaching marks of its infamy upon them than upon those who ply more remunerative and less glorious trades.

Mr. Walsh is on the side of the Angels and belongs heart and soul to the modern school of Catholic poets, whose white flame is one of the Catholic consolations in a literature devoid of hope or faith. Mr. Walsh has never yielded to the cheap temptation of shocking prosodists and theologians. The restraint, too, may have been practised at the cost of a wider popularity. In "With the Air-Fleets" the poet glances at the deeper spiritual issues of the times:

We swing to the ultimate offing,—
But our anchor is dug in a star;
The while the black squads of the scoffing
Go battling afar
To the Infinite,—such is their boasting—
His riddle to read,—
As urchins the precipice coasting—
To face Him indeed.

See them pass!—like the flocking of ravens!
Do they reach unto Godhead?—Who knows?
From out of their spaces or havens
No signals disclose!
But the star pulls hard at our cable,—
Shall we loose on their track?
Or leave them to madness and fable,
And homeward draw back?

In this very remarkable poem a practical triumph of modern science is pressed very imaginatively and effectively into the service of a great moral truth. As all flying—in the sense of directed and controlled motion through space—is impossible, except for the very thing which makes flying difficult at all, namely, the physical law of gravity, so in the quests and adventures of the moral world; whoever would destroy a law because it hampers him, destroys the very conditions of rational movement and ultimate attainment. Law is the jumping-off point of all progress: without it we have mad and grotesque kickings in the empty air.

It is not the least of Mr. Walsh's merits that he has kept his anchor dug in a star. In this respect he is on the side, not only of the Angels, but of the greatest poets as well. Lover of light, color and sunshine, and the magic of old names though he be, he is not deaf or indifferent to spiritual rumors of high import. He is a poet of virile choice. The asceticism of commanding minds, which preserves the joy of life from becoming trivial and corrupt—the "dry light" of Plato's beauty, which keeps the vision whole and perfect is to him an inheritance of Faith and an artistic possession.

THE SOLDIER DEAD

There is a field where poppies blow,
And Angels walking to and fro,
Sing sweetly high and sweetly low
For soldiers sleeping there.
They chant their orisons at eve;
At night when waking mothers grieve;
And in the morn when sad hearts weave
New hopes to conquer care.

Within the poppies' crimson sweep,
Like weary sentinels at sleep,
The little crosses bend to keep,
Their tryst with those below.
Softly the Angel Matins fall,
The far sky leans above them all.
God keep them till the last long call—
At rest, where poppies blow.

REVIEWS

Luther and Lutherdom From Original Sources by Heinrich Denifle. Translated from the second revised edition of the German by Raymund Volz. Vol. I., Part I. Somerset, O.: Torch Press, $3.50.

Protestantism in Germany. By KERR D. MACMILLAN, President of Wells College. Princeton, N. J.: Princeton University Press, $1.50.

Denifle's work on Luther calls for no introduction. Like the monumental psychological study of Grisar it is a classic to which all impartial Luther students must have recourse. Its appearance in an English version is therefore to be welcomed. Father Grisar, in his determination to set aside even the most remote possibility of any accusation of unfairness, appears at times almost to assume the rôle of a Luther apologist. The most favorable interpretation is given to every action and intention of the apostate friar, thus rendering the case against him only the more hopeless in the eyes of the discerning reader.

Denifle is no less fair and just; but his methods are very different. He enters the arena as a champion armed for battle in a righteous cause, and strikes hard and doughty blows. There is no escape from his facts and his logic, and the Luther myth is demolished with relentless power and a spirit of complete unconcern as to what men may think or may say. He has but one purpose in view and that is to reveal the bare and undisguised truth. This he does with incontrovertible success. "I had no intention," he writes, "of sending forth an 'incendiary work' among the people, but rather of writing, in plain and unadorned sincerity, a book for the learned." What then was his surprise when the first edition of the German work was exhausted within the first month after its appearance. It is to be hoped that in issuing the second edition of the present translation the English will be revised.

The volume upon "Protestantism in Germany," by the President of Wells College, is based upon the same unfortunate misconceptions regarding all things Catholic which we have recently observed in so much of the Luther literature of our day. Writers seem to consider it sufficient to gather their views of the Catholic Church and her history from her professed enemies. They are like a jury that will listen to but one side of a case that is supposed to be tried in court. Yet they render their verdict with the utmost assurance of dispensing impartial justice. The present book is only another instance in point. The object of the author is to show that the present German Protestantism is in no way representative of Luther's teaching, but that it is on the contrary a degeneration into medieval Catholic conceptions of the relations between Church and State. This is unjust and calumnious in the highest degree. It was Luther who insisted upon making his Lutheran prince the sole spiritual authorities in the land, a doctrine utterly abhorred by the Catholic Church and condemned by her in the strongest terms. No power in matters of purely temporal concern is ever given by her to ecclesiastical authorities, nor has the secular prince any rights in matters purely spiritual. It was merely accidental that a prince bishop or abbot happened at times to be likewise a secular ruler, and so too the temporal power of the Pope within his narrow domain, was merely intended to secure his safety from interference on the part of secular potentates. His spiritual dominion may not be subjected to intermeddling from any temporal ruler, but must extend with impartial sway over the entire Christian world. All Catholics of every nation are alike his children.

On Contemporary Literature. By STUART P. SHERMAN. New York: Henry Holt & Co., $1.50.

Those who, during the past few years, have grown tired of reading the immoderate encomiums which our facile reviewers have heaped upon each succeeding volume of such naturalistic writers as H. G. Wells, Theodore Dreiser, George Moore or Anatole France, will find Professor Sherman's sane and wholesome volume of critical essays as refreshing and invigorating as could be desired. The author has been accused of being a "besotted Victorian," incapable of appraising correctly the literary work of his contemporaries. But he is a clear-headed humanist who sees in the usurpations of the naturalistic philosophy, particularly in the field of fiction and of literary criticism, so grave a menace to Christian civilization that unless the servants of "the law for man" can conquer the masters of "the law for things," unless the true humanists can continue "to work out in the world that ideal pattern which lies in the instructed and disciplined heart," the future of our race is dark indeed.

In his opening essay entitled "The Democracy of Mark Twain," Professor Sherman finds that that author's "humor not infrequently depends upon a disregard of proprieties, and occasionally it consists of little but a disregard of proprieties." Catholics, however, will hardly agree that Mr. Clemens' blasphemous book, "The Mysterious Stranger," is harmless reading for children. The paper on "The Utopian Naturalism of H. G. Wells," is an admirable demonstration of how that writer in each new "message" he delivers completely cancels his previous messages. The author shows how in "fumbling for God" Wells has invented indeed a deity of a kind "but has not yet invented his righteousness; and that singular omission leaves his deity out of all characteristic employment."

For the novels of Theodore Dreiser, who protests that he only records what he has "seen," Professor Sherman, unlike so many palliating reviewers of the day, feels nothing but disgust. He shows that Dreiser "cannot observe without a theory nor compose and record his observations without betraying his theory to any critical eye," for the Dreiserian philosophy makes man, and particularly woman, merely an "unstable chemical compound." Professor Sherman does not undertake to make a critical analysis of Arnold Bennett's philosophy, but he finds that author supporting at least a "decent theory of human conduct." In the excellent chapter on "The Esthetic Naturalism of George Moore," Professor Sherman well brings out the despicable character of the man who has boasted of his "original hatred" of his native country and his "brutal loathing" of Catholicism. He proves him to be only a talented posuer and a belated imitator of the French decadents. M. France's skepticism too is largely a literary pose. He pretends to be a passionate seeker of all truth but selects only the melancholy ones. The rest of Professor Sherman's volume is made up of literary appreciations of John Synge, Alfred Austin, Henry James, and George Meredith, and ends with a good paper on "Shakespeare, Our Contemporary." James's distinction was that he refused to exploit la bête humaine as so many of his contemporaries exploited it, Meredith's mission was "to instruct men in the proper uses of the comic spirit," and Shakespeare by making carnality either ridiculous or abhorrent, shows in that as in other respects, how far above the post-Victorians he stands. The student of contemporary literature cannot afford to miss reading Professor Sherman's book.

Encyclopaedia of Religion and Ethics. Edited by JAMES HASTINGS. Vol. VIII, Life-Mulla. Vol. IX, Mundas-Phrygians. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $7.00 each.

These two instalments of the Hastings encyclopaedia maintain the same general scope and character as the previous volumes already reviewed in AMERICA. The interest is very largely historical and ethnological, and the purpose is rather a clear exposition of the content of various religious and ethical beliefs than a critical appreciation of their rectitude. From this point of view it has a value for specialists and may serve a useful purpose in the case of those who have need of such a book of handy reference. It is not, however, to be recommended to the general reader. Too often its viewpoint is strongly colored by rationalistic tendencies, and except in the few instances where Catholics have written articles is not a trustworthy guide in the matter of philosophy or Catholic doctrine.

The most remarkable thing about the volumes, perhaps, is the utter disregard they display for Catholic literature. In spite of the fact that many volumes have been written by Catholics on many of the points of philosophy and religion treated, these works are either unknown or deliberately passed over in silence. There are some exceptions, but this is the rule. Even where a point is elaborated which is peculiarly Catholic, the source of information and the writer chosen to treat it are frequently non-Catholic. The scant references to Catholic works are practically never to the standard treatises on the subject treated. Catholic ethicists seldom get a hearing and Catholic theologians are apparently not considered worth mentioning.

The article on Mary is very unsatisfactory and has been written with marked anti-Catholic bias; the only Catholic treatise on the Blessed Virgin of which the writer makes use, and this with disparagement, is St. Alphonsus Liguori's "Glories of Mary": the theological classics on the subject are not even noticed. The article on the Papacy apart from the fact that it is prejudiced and polemic, is disfigured by contempt for the Popes in general and the later Popes in particular, and is devoted to depreciating them in the estimation of the reader. Original Sin is tested by modern anthropology, biology and genetic psychology and rejected. The treatment of marriage leaves much to be desired. The discussion on moral obligation, on which the scholastic schools, medieval and modern, have expended such critical analysis, leaves it to be implied that no such works exist. Instances such as these could be multiplied, but these are quite sufficient to indicate very clearly the unscholarly character of the work. One wonders why a Dominican rather than a Jesuit should have been asked to write on Molinism. J. H. F.

New American History. By ALBERT BUSHNELL HART, New York: The American Book Co., $1.72.

It is not often that a new text-book calls for extended notice, but this "New American History," apart from the prominence of the author as one of our foremost American historians, is noteworthy in several respects. For in basing his conclusions on the latest research, he does much to correct the narrow and erroneous impressions on our early history that former sectional and prejudiced text-books tended to foster. Thus for example into its pages has crept the newer and saner view of the Revolution, more evenly apportioning the blame, giving less prominence to the tyrannous tax-measures, and bringing into relief the fact that the colonists were only logically following out the spirit of complete self-government they had inherited from the mother-country itself. That the war of 1812 was about equally divided between humiliation and triumph has long been known to everybody except our school-boys, and due stress is also laid on such varied facts as the folly of the nation's attempting to prosecute a war actively before proper preparation, on the threatened secession of New England in 1814, the growth and expansion of the South American Republics, the real though indirect influence of Canning on the adoption, and of Adams in formulating the Monroe Doctrine. All this is done without departing from a just and uncompromising estimate of American claims and ideals, and the book amply justifies the remark of a recent British historian, Ramsay Muir, in his "Expansion of Europe": "It is to American scholars that we must have recourse for a more scientific and impartial treatment" of the Revolution.

The volume is also remarkable for its arrangement and proportion, for its subordinating facts to the guiding ideas of politicians and statesmen, and for its review sections that ably and succinctly sum up these ideas at the end of each period. Maryland is given due credit for the first complete policy of religious toleration, and it is at least implied that its loss in that colony was due to the influx of Puritans about 1649. The Catholic teacher will have to supplement and correctly interpret the author's assertion of no religious persecution after 1680 in the colonies and give the complete picture of the position of Catholics in general throughout the period and later. The value of the book is enhanced by the references and research topics after each chapter, and the appendices and general bibliography at the end. But mention should have been made of such important works as "The Jesuit Relations," and Dr. J. G. Shea's histories.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

"Carolyn of the Corners" (Dodd, Mead & Co., $1.35), by Ruth Belmore Endicott, is a "look-up" book in which a little girl, very materially assisted by a very remarkable dog, brings sunshine into many lives. It is wholesome and interesting.

"The Tree of Knowledge" (Macmillan, $1.50), by May Sinclair, is a war novel, treating of the various mental attitudes towards the struggle, of several members of an English family, the inevitable claims of patriotism, the devastation worked in the home by several deaths in battle, and the laceration of a mother's heart by sacrifices which she makes, not altogether willingly, but bravely, for her country. In spite of its careful style and sharp delineation of character, the book is not pleasant reading and passages of brutal frankness in the matter of illicit sex-relations, not altogether irrelevant, but certainly in no sense essential to the development of the story, disfigure a number of the pages. It is a book setting forth modern conceptions of life, and current aspirations after emancipation from established standards of morality. It serves a purpose in that it fails to create anything but unhappiness out of so unsatisfactory and unattractive a state of affairs. The thread of gloom which runs through the story is its own refutation; but even apart from this, the book's general tone and the absence from it of definite principles will annoy the Catholic reader. The author apparently is wedded to the view that the conventions of good taste in the matter of reticence are not worth considering.

The poor little book entitled "The Church and the Man" (Macmillan, $1.00), by Donald Hankey, is another war-time cry for Christ by a soldier-author who was killed on the Somme. It is the old story of a mind clear enough to see that the Church of England is not as big as England and that Protestantism is too small for man, yet deluded enough to offer Modernism as a solution. His plan is to take advantage of the breadth and freedom of view permitted in the Anglican communion to foist upon that already over-encumbered denomination a creedless Christianity.——In "Militant America and Jesus Christ" (Houghton Mifflin, $1.00), Abraham Mitrie Ribbany who as "one of the Master's Syrian countrymen" claims "an inward realization of His sayings" would prove that "America by taking up arms is not virtually fighting against Jesus Christ." Catholics scarcely need this brief confirmation of what they never doubted. Others will find with each of the quotations gathered from the New Testament a hasty attempt at expressing its "inward realization," but are likely to wonder if that realization would not be more worth while from those who know Christ as more than a Syrian countryman.

Mr. H. G. Dwight's "Persian Miniatures" (Doubleday, Page, $3.00) is a rather disappointing book. The reader is constantly being led up to some alluring surprise, and when he arrives there is chagrined to discover how ordinary it turns out to be. However, the author frankly disarms adverse criticism by his foreword, which he termed "Confidential," wherein he warns his readers not to jump from title to conclusion and then visit their disappointment upon the scribbler's head, as the volume is made up of nothing but a rambling collection of sketches not intended for the serious-minded. The author's readers are repeatedly told that he is of English ancestry, but whether one regards that fact as a cause for boasting or not, the repetition becomes tiresome. ——Our present interest in peace-proposals is appealed to by Theodore Marburg's "League of Nations" (Macmillan, $0.50), which explains recent developments in the problem of establishing and guaranteeing peace by international agreement. Details of the plan and possible operations of "The League to Enforce Peace" are followed by a sketch of its growth in favor here and abroad. Nothing but an authentic outline of the movement is proposed, so its basic principles are not discussed. For the reader the evident recentness of this movement, which in print seems quite ideal, is often emphasized by such statements as "the time has now come to devise and create a working union of nations." But that time came centuries ago when its needs were satisfied, not in print, but in fact; namely, by the Papacy.

In the Rev. Dr. Tixeront's little book of "Apologetical Studies" (Herder, $0.75) there is an excellent paper on "The Origin of the Belief in the Trinity," another on "The Origin of the Belief in Our Lord's Divinity," and a third on "The Founding of the Church by Jesus, with the Characters of Catholicism." The second half of the book contains an admirable historical "Essay on the Sacrament of Penance in Christian Antiquity," in which such writers as Charles Lea and Harnack are effectively answered. The author proves that the Sacrament of Penance from the earliest times comprised confession, satisfaction and absolution, that confession was always de jure secret, that satisfaction has been private since the eighth century, that absolution was public till the eighth century, and that during the first seven or eight centuries of the Church the Sacrament of Penance, except in monasteries, was received as a rule, only once a year.——A new and cheaper edition of Canon Sheehan's "Early Essays and Lectures" (Longmans, $1.25) has recently appeared. In a substantial volume of 354 pages are printed a dozen essays, literary in character for the most part, which were contributed to magazines before the author became famous as a novelist, and seven lectures he delivered on such occasions as the foundation of the Mallow Literary Society. "The Fiftieth Anniversary of O'Connell's Death" and at a meeting of the Irish Catholic Truth Society.

The February Month opens with Father Sidney Smith's well-reasoned paper on "Tradition the Test of Doctrine"; Father Cortie reaches the conclusion that "So far as we know from science, whether experimental or theoretical, there is so far no proved connection between gunfire and rainfall"; Father Thurston subjects to a like scrutiny the phenomena of telepathy and finds that it is probably "of much more frequent occurrence than is commonly supposed"; Edith Cowell has a frank paper on some "English National Characteristics" that should be corrected, and Mary Chadwick has written on the religious vows three good sonnets, the third of which, entitled "Obedience (St. Teresa's Day)," runs thus:

Strong winds that sweep the earth, imperial Powers,
The thundering legions, Governors of War,
Horses and reckless riders,—from afar
I watch their glory and their crowded hours,
The siegey-battered cities, desperate towers,
Fierce stricken captives 'neath the swinging sword,
Wild throats that shout the prowess of their lord,
Valor and death—Dear God, this life of ours!

—And I unto Thy service bind me fast,
Man's heart is wild, fretted with hot desire,—
But I a censer filled with sacred Fire
Swing in Thy Hand and have no will at last
But to go burning, pass I low or high,
Teresa, Servant of His Majesty.

It is not clear for a good number of pages just what Mr. Conrad Aiken "would be at" in his "Nocturne of Remembered Spring and Other Poems" (Four Seas Co., $1.25). But by the time the patient reader has reached "Dust in Starlight" a long string of couplets which bears the highly suitable subtitle, "Earth Triumphant," he will find that adultery seems to be the most tangible of the author's themes.——Dr. Dorothy Scarborough's "The Supernatural in Modern English Fiction" (Putnam, $2.00), is a mediocre book with a misleading title. It is a running commentary of occasional interest and frequent bias, on works of fiction dealing with the uncanny. But the noblest examples of the supernatural in modern English fiction are not mentioned.——"The Breakfast of the Birds and Other Stories" (The Jewish Publication Society, Philadelphia) is the title of some tales for children, which Emily Solis-Cohen, Jr., has translated from the Hebrew of Julius Steinberg, a Russian Jew, who believes in his religion and draws moral lessons for young readers from his stories.

"The Formation of the State of Oklahoma" (University of California Press, $2.00), by Roy Gittinger, Ph.D., narrates the series of events which, from the Louisiana Purchase in 1803, involved the nation in its perplexed Indian policy, up to 1906 when that policy finally culminated in the union of the last Indian Reservation with the then existing Territory of Oklahoma and the formation of the present enterprising State of Oklahoma. The data of the work are drawn from authentic sources, chiefly from official reports published by the Government. Anyone interested in this phase of our history will find in the volume an exhaustive fund of information written in a clear and pleasing style.——"California: The Name" (University of California Press, $0.75), by Ruth Putnam, is a well-written and interesting discussion of the origin of the name, California, tracing its origin from the earliest sources. The Spanish Romance "Las Sergas de Esplandian" or the fifth book of "Amadis de Gaula" is cleverly interwoven in the work adding an entertaining flavor to the historical researches.——Under the title "Voices of Our Leaders" (Hinds, Noble & Eldredge, New York), William Mather Lewis has gathered into a small volume five of President Wilson's valuable State-papers, including the message to the Pope, and several of the speeches made by the allied visitors to this country last spring and summer.

"The Dreamers" (Doran, $1.25), the poem which gives a title to Theodosia Garrison's latest volume of lyrics, runs as follows:

The gypsies passed her little gate—
  She stopped her wheel to see,—
A brown-faced pair who walked the road.
  Free as the wind is free;
And suddenly her tidy room
  A prison seemed to be.

Her shining plates against the walls,
  Her sunlit, sanded floor,
The brass-bound wedding chest that held
  Her linen's snowy store,
The very wheel whose humming died,—
  Seemed only chains she bore.

She watched the foot-free gypsies pass;
  She never knew or guessed
The wistful dream that drew them close
  The longing in each breast
Some day to know a home like hers
  Wherein their hearts might rest.

———

One of the finer lyrics in "Dreams and Images" (America Press, $1.60), Mr. Joyce Kilmer's "Anthology of Catholic Poets" is Miss Louise Imogen Guiney's "The Wild Ride," with such ringing lines in it as these:

I hear in my heart, I hear in its ominous pulses
All day, on the road, the hoofs of invisible horses,
All night from their stalls, the importunate pawing and neighing.

Let cowards and laggards fall back! but alert to the saddle,
Weatherworn and abreast, go men of our galloping legion,
With a stirrup-cup each to the lily of women that loves him.

The trail is through dolor and dread, over crags and morasses;
There are shapes by the way, there are things that appal or entice us:
What odds? We are Knights of the Grail, we are vowed to the riding.

Thought's self is a vanishing wing, and joy is a cobweb,
And friendship a flower in the dust, and glory a sunbeam;
Not here is our prize, nor alas! after these our pursuing.

A dipping of plumes, a tear, a shake of the bridle,
A passing salute to this world and her pitiful beauty;
We hurry with never a word in the track of our fathers . . .

We spur to the land of no name, outracing the stormwind;
We leap to the infinite dark like the sparks from the anvil.
Thou leadest, O God, all's well with Thy troopers that follow.

EDUCATION

False Tendencies in Education

A PROFESSOR of English at a famous university, recently expressed his astonishment at the scanty knowledge of the English classics displayed in his class of literature. In a test, quotations from standard authors and allusions to well-known characters, were as Sanskrit to the students. The test may serve to indicate what is becoming a general condition, and the fact that love for the classics can wane, in an age in which education is everywhere held in honor, affords a basis for an interesting inquiry.

It is strange that, in spite of the attention given to classical studies, the intellectual appetites of our youth seem to become dulled. There appears to be no longer any room for Shakespearean plays, because the comparatively few who would appreciate them, do not warrant the financial risks involved in their production. The moving-picture, it is asserted, has usurped the place of Shakespeare, and the strain of modern living is proposed in extenuation for the vast number of frivolous novels that are appearing and disappearing with the rapidity of scenarios. On the other hand, our universities, colleges and high-schools are yearly sending forth thousands. If these graduates have been really "refined" and "educated," their intellectual tastes could hardly disappear so easily. Perhaps, it would be a more logical, if less plausible, explanation, to venture the suggestion that there are tendencies in modern educational systems at variance with the cultivation of refined tastes. Part of the trouble may be discovered in an inclination to impart a varied and expert knowledge at once, but the main difficulty is probably rooted in a disposition to overlook some of the essential steps in the path to knowledge, reading, for instance. For the purpose of this inquiry, it is sufficient to indicate how a neglect of reading, as an example, can vitiate the entire plan of education.

The Requirements of Education

AT the outset, it is well to formulate one's views on the requirements of education. Education is not so much concerned with bringing a good name or tone to any particular school or institution, as with individual culture and refinement. The line of its horizon is not graduation-day, but life's close. It does not gauge success by graduation honors, but by the impulse given to the higher things of life. It is, therefore, most solicitous for the years which follow school years. In fact, the ideals of education are better realized in a student whose intellectual appetites have been developed, though he fall far short of graduation standards, than if he had won the highest honors, but continued an intellectual laggard in after years.

An evil akin to the modern unconcern for the classics, is the very general disregard for the art of correct speaking. The evils are hardly the result of direct neglect, because all school systems provide for the study of models, and for the teaching of English grammar and syntax. They are probably traceable to an incidental neglect. In other words, our youth have not been taught the need and beauty of pure English, or else, they have not been led to a habit of appreciation. An appreciation of pure speech is the natural outgrowth of an acquaintanceship with proper models; and while reading with a view to good expression for its own sake, is secondary to a higher ideal, the assimilation of noble thoughts, it is none the less important. In fact, it is an initial step towards the attainment of the higher ideal, for, the world's best thinkers are, ordinarily, the world's best writers. The weak point of the modern system seems to consist in regarding standard models from a wrong angle. The healthy development of the mind, like the growth of a tree, is outward. It can be said of the modern system that it is rather engaged with filling in than with drawing out. It is grafting subsidiary studies on the main stem. Consequently, the real purpose of education is missed. Even giving education its most commercial signification, whatever profession one chooses, he arrives at the knowledge of it, directly or indirectly through reading.

The Art of Reading

THE art of reading, therefore, demands attention. Again, it is common to find students who read much and widely, and yet have no interest in real reading. They come to regard reading as a diversion, not a means of mental nourishment and recreation. They read cursorily to extract the burden or plot of a theme, and leave the moral untouched. "They have eyes and see not." Thus, the more they read, the more inane becomes their reading matter, and the more dissipated their minds. But there is a quality of reading which starts the quest for knowledge in the right direction. Its educational value is limitless. Intelligent reading implies a readiness to grasp a good thought and to express it; it inspires emulation and a taste for study; it quickens the habit of observation; it stimulates the memory; it excites a taste for the good and beautiful; and most important of all, it subserves the truer ideals of education, because it interprets them most faithfully by laying a real foundation for the future. When rules of prosody and the freaks of languages are revived only in occasional nightmares; when our youthful attempts to become poets in foreign tongues give occasion to periodical bitter memories; when the intricacies of science point the moral that little really can be known, the only part of early training that will be sustained to the grave, is the love for browsing on the world's best thoughts, in whatever form or language they happen to be clothed.

Thus, a false direction given to study, frustrates the real purpose of education. The little fence about a sapling is a contributing factor to the strength and beauty of the matured tree. There is a healthy and unhealthy maturity of the mind; the latter state does not argue neglect so much as lack of direction. The mind, like a tree, needs something which, though not a part of itself, helps it to utilize properly those things which are necessary to its development. So equipped, it is ready for the process of assimilation; but unprovided, the more nourishment it receives, the more distorted it becomes.

Multiplied Subjects

ANOTHER failing in the modern system which is closely allied to the tendency discussed above in its results, is the disposition to cramp the youthful mind by a multiplicity of subjects. To state it more accurately, the present-day student career is frequently too busy for exacting studies. In many instances, the newer generation are not merely extending their acquaintance over too many departments of knowledge, but they are dissipating their intellectual energies over too many phases of the same subject. The ordinary school edition of Shakespeare, for instance, is half text and half glossary, notes, and perhaps, critical essays. The very make-up of such a volume arouses the prejudice of the student. He approaches it in somewhat the same attitude with which he takes up a Greek author. As a consequence, the average student consigns Shakespeare, like Greek, to oblivion when school days are past. Shakespeare to him is not Shakespeare. He is merely a study in the evolution of language, a treatise on the use of English, a text-book on essay-writing. This is the natural result of beginning at the wrong end. An author is primarily to be read. Great thoughts and beautiful turns of language unfold themselves to intelligent reading; taste is thereby developed; the desire for further investigation grows accordingly, and analytical study then gets its logical place. In the infancy of the republic a less enlightened generation heard and felt the patriotic addresses which came burning with the emotions of the pioneer statesmen who spoke them, or they drank them in through the medium of the press of the times. Now they are annotated and analysed for modern youth, as if they possessed the vagueness of an utterance of the oracle at Delphi. A similar tendency is evident in the domain of history. To the young undeveloped mind a close application to the study of ancient history is ordinarily unattractive. The same is true of an exacting study of the history of foreign countries, but when historical studies are linked to momentous dates or great events, a living interest is imparted.

The Teacher

SINCE the purpose of education is largely concerned with the development of a taste and love for knowledge, the need of emphasizing a certain phase of teaching becomes obvious. While too much can be expected in the matter of the mental equipment of a teacher, an exaggerated attention can hardly be given the teaching art itself. Successful teaching, like oratory, presupposes an ability in the teacher to impart his own genuine enthusiasm to the pupil. It requires some latitude for initiative. Tastes are a personal asset, and success in imparting tastes is in a great measure determined by the freedom to retain one's own. Many a good teacher is trammeled by the rigid requirements of rule and school curriculum, and many a mediocre teacher remains mediocre because a cruel fate places him in fields where he cannot give play to his natural bent. Of necessity, certain courses must be prescribed, but they need not be so slavishly followed as to root out every vestige of individuality in teacher and pupil. The trained hand that would initiate tiny fingers into the mysteries of penmanship, sets before itself a model, not its own. The ideal penmanship is, after all, machine-made. It possesses its greatest value in so far as it gives occasion to the judicious communication of a fully-aroused individuality to an individuality that is in process of development. In spite of a common model, there will be as many hand-writings as there are writers, but each writer will be improved by the good direction of a careful instructor. In literature, especially, the most carefully conceived course must be objectively mechanical. Tastes are so manifold that literature cannot serve as a common ideal. The most it can do is to afford opportunity for the intercommunication of tastes between teacher and pupil, to the benefit of the latter. If it accomplishes this little, and nothing more, the nobler aims of education will be safeguarded.

Suppressed Catholicism of Labor

"IT seems to me," wrote Father Plater recently, "that the working classes of this country are suffering from suppressed Catholicism. The old pre-Reformation instincts for freedom and security have broken the husk of an un-Christian economic theory and practice." What is said of England is true of the entire world. Suppressed Catholicism is at the heart of the labor movement. Suppressed Catholicism is at the center of the great social unrest. Suppressed Catholicism is the spirit struggling for liberation beneath the crackling, breaking, bursting shell of an unnatural and un-Christian social order. It is the pre-Reformation spirit of social freedom, which the Church alone can prevent from degenerating into lawlessness or injustice once it has achieved its liberation.

The Contrast

THE Church does not make common cause with Socialism in its opposition to private capital, nor would the labor movement do so, if it were not deceived or betrayed by false leaders. But the Church is opposed in the most unqualified way to the selfish spirit of capitalism that sprang into being after the Reformation and continued in its development until the great world war. There is no possible defense of a system which permitted the accumulation of mountainous fortunes by a few clever and probably highly unscruplous financiers who hold in their hands the fate of millions of their fellow-men, and have in their grasp the power of the press by which they form the opinions of the very people who helplessly look to them for their dole of daily bread.

Pass through the fashionable streets of New York during almost any month, from the first pleasant days of spring to the fall of the last leaves in autumn, and you will see the blinds of the houses closed and the doors boarded: no one at home, except perhaps a few servants in care of the forsaken premises on which a fortune was expended. While some members of these households are doubtless engaged in providing for their business interests, others are mere parasites of society, motoring through the land in search of pleasure and excitement or living lavishly in seaside villas and hotels, surrounded, it may be, with a retinue of servants. Then pass through the congested streets, into which a few steps will lead you, and see the poverty, squalor and human misery on every hand.

Dangers of Excessive Wealth

SUCH excess of wealth is dangerous for the possessor, since we have the Divine assurance that it will be as difficult for him to enter into Heaven as for the camel to pass through the eye of the needle. It is possible, Christ tells us; but only by the grace of God and on condition that all seriously inordinate affection for his wealth is cast aside and that the money be used in the true spirit of Christian stewardship. Not such is the doctrine of the capitalism which sprang up after the rejection of the Catholic religion. Its main tenet was that each man might use his wealth as he pleased and its main purpose was to accumulate still greater riches and to acquire more exclusive control of the gigantic modern industries and commercial enterprises.

Such excess of wealth is equally dangerous for the poor who behold the toppling fortunes of the rich growing ever more portentous and eye askance the idle lives of so many of our dames of wealth, whose sole concept of their purpose in life appears to be little more than personal comfort and social pleasure. No matter that the workers themselves may be drawing larger wages, they see the stupendous contrast between themselves and so many of the selfish or idle rich, whose wealth in countless instances has been accumulated by methods socially and religiously unsound and unjustifiable.

The Message of the Church

THE Church does not, like Socialism, cultivate that constantly growing spirit of enmity, jealousy and hatred which threatens to submerge the entire world in the tremendous cataclysm of universal social revolution. It is not in these passions that the suppressed Catholicism consists, which is at the heart of the labor movement. They are only the excesses to which the movement itself will doubtless lead if not controlled by the principles of Christianity as interpreted by the one Church which Christ has founded. She alone comes down from Him through all the centuries to bring His message to the laborer of our day. At the present moment of social reconstruction it is more important than ever before that this message be placed before the world in all its strength and clearness. Capital and labor alike must heed it if they would avert the threatened catastrophe.

Class Struggle Avoidable

THE assumption is not made by the Church, nor does labor itself make it, that all employers and capitalists are in harmony with the spirit of selfish, post-Reformation capitalism which the Church condemns in words as severe as any that have yet been spoken, though they are uttered by her in a spirit of Christian restraint and charity. Sincere Christian employers and capitalists are themselves eager to be freed from a system which they know to be false and unacceptable, but with which they are obliged to compete if they would not be submerged in the stream against which they are struggling. They, too, are suffering from that suppressed Catholicism which is at the heart of the masses who have not as yet been totally perverted by a hopeless atheistic radicalism.

The Church does not join in the Socialistic hue and cry against private capital in itself. The Church strictly condemns the Socialist doctrine of an essential class struggle between capital and labor, but insists upon the possibility as well as the duty of a friendly cooperation. In the last of his regulations on Christian Democracy, Pope Pius X particularly admonishes Catholic writers that, in taking up the cause of the poorer classes, they may not use language that might arouse hostility in the heart of the people, nor speak of claims of justice where there is question of the obligations of charity: "Let them remember that Jesus Christ desires to unite all men in the bond of mutual charity, which is the perfection of justice and binds us all to strive for the good of one another." (Christian Popular Action). There is no need of a class war. All that is required is social legislation along Catholic lines, which will secure the welfare, not of a favored few, but of the entire community. Such, too, is the sentiment of the more reasonable labor element.

Excessive Industrial Enterprises

IT is an entirely false notion that the enormous fortunes of our day are an economic necessity, and that social legislation which would curb them in future and give as many as possible a share in productive ownership is detrimental to the large scale industries required in our time. It is now commonly admitted, in the first place, that such enterprises can readily reach a stage of development when, because of their vastness, they cease to be economic, and when smaller competitive enterprises would be more productive and less wasteful. Moreover it is not impossible to conduct extensive undertakings, and at the same time impose such conditions that the greatest number can share in the ownership and control of the industry. The abomination of watered stocks and all similar methods must be abolished. By such abominations a few have been able to skim the cream of the entire wealth produced so as to leave merely the bluish remnant to be divided among the uninitiated holders of shares, who were deceived in common with the general public.

Curbing Large Profiteers

HOWEVER radical labor may seek to pervert the popular mind, and however organized labor may at times fall under the spell of radical principles and allow itself to be deceived into accepting them, yet the great demand at the heart of honest labor is that all privilege should be swept away, which leads to abuse and to inordinate profits, and that the common welfare should be consulted in all things. Here precisely is the suppressed Catholicism of labor. It is this which the Church likewise demands with the utmost insistence. In the days of the Catholic gilds large fortunes by industrial profits were rendered impossible by the restrictions placed upon employers, in regard to the purchase of the raw material, the number of journeymen and apprentices they might engage in their workshops and so on. The object was to prevent any single man or group of men from controlling the labor market or monopolizing a local trade. Every man was enabled to gain an honest livelihood, and no man was permitted to grow enormously rich through the labor of others. No man might ply two trades. Times have changed, but there is no reason why the underlying principles cannot be applied again through legislation that is adapted to our own economic era.

Socialist and Catholic Program

IT is suppressed Catholicism, the newly awakened spirit of pre-Reformation Christianity, and not Socialism that is at the heart of the laboring man. The Catholic principles of the widest diffusion of ownership would be gladly accepted by him rather than the Socialist ideal of the destruction of all economic freedom and the impossibility of ever acquiring a personal title to productive ownership. He has seen enough of political chicanery and should have learned to pause before entrusting his whole future fate and fortune to the tyranny of Socialist politicians in power. Yet the danger of Socialism lies not in its positive constructive program, but in the fact that it appeals to the laborer as the one political party specially designed for him and for his interests, the only party that is wholly devoted to him alone. Under such specious pretexts the Socialist canvasser may gain the laborer's vote.

The lesson is obvious. Catholics must clearly and succinctly propose their own principles, which labor will not fail to welcome. Capital, too, which is not consumed with the one purpose of enriching itself at the expense of workmen, will understand the Christian spirit of our program. As for the radicals of labor and of capital alike, we can hope nothing from them but war to the bitter end. We shall have with us the great body of the workers in our honest fight against these vultures of society with whom we can make no truce and from whom we expect no concessions.

The Supreme Difficulty

FINALLY it is true that false notions upon many vital questions have taken possession of the popular mind. Here is the supreme difficulty we are facing in our work of social reconstruction. If all the world were Catholic we could appeal to it in a language intelligible to all. As things now are there is no power to restrain the passions of men or to overrule their prejudices. There can be no greater social work than that which consists in bringing men back once more into the one true Fold.

Joseph Husslein, S.J.

NOTE AND COMMENT

"War Lunatics"

"WAR industries have created a new class of laborers, a homeless class, one that, at the slightest feeling of dissatisfaction, will become dangerous to the community." Such was the opinion of Professor Carlton H. Parker, of the University of Washington, expressed at the joint conference of the American Economic and the American Sociological Associations. Shiftless as many of these workers are, regardless of religious influences and without the restraint of family ties in their present occupations, living moreover under intensive conditions, there is doubtless danger that some may lose their mental and moral balance. Hence the class which he describes as "industrial lunatics," to whom he claims the war is giviug birth. "These 'industrial lunatics' are joining the I. W. W. and other organizations and they are putting America in a sort of anarchistic state, almost similar to that existing in Russia. Society is in an economic chaos as a result of the war."

Marriage Between Relatives

THE wisdom of the Church's regulations is constantly borne out by facts. One very interesting verification was that contained some time ago in an issue of the Ladies' Home Journal. The confirmation came from no less unsuspected a source than the study of eugenics, which we are informed has settled once more that marriages between relatives are always dangerous. The tabulated result of a close study of 833 such marriages gave the following figures regarding the children sprung from these unions: 1,131 were mentally defective, 262 were idiots, 142 were deaf mutes, 83 were blind, 39 were insane, 59 were epileptic, 94 were deformed, 299 were tubercular and 867 passed away very young. Only a very few were normal at the time of the investigation. The physical explanation offered is that marriage between relatives permits defects, which have been latent in the family blood, to reappear in the children though the parents themselves are not afflicted by them. This, however, is presented as a mere hypothesis.

Delivering Coal to the Poor

A VERY helpful service was undertaken by the Catholic charities of Toledo during the severe cold at the beginning of this month. The statement had been made public that certain dealers had sufficient quantities of coal in store, but were unable to deliver them. Father Karl J. Alter, director of the Toledo Catholic Charities, therefore immediately made an offer of ten free teams to Mayor Schreiber, enabling him to convey the coal to the poor of the city, who stood in greatest need of it. According to the Toledo Blade, deliveries were made first to the families of widows with children and next to families in which there was sickness. Other deliveries were made as the necessity seemed most urgent. "Father Alter," wrote the Blade, "says the coal should cost the poor only the price at the yards, the Catholic charities paying all delivery expenses. No religious distinction will be made, but the coal will be delivered free to as many families as possible where the need seems greatest."

Catholic Big Brothers

THE erection of a new building, whose cost is estimated at about $350,000, has been decided upon by the Catholic Big Brothers of Bronx County, New York. A centrally located site, valued at $40,000, was recently donated for this purpose. The building is to contain recreation rooms, swimming pool, gymnasium, class rooms, reading rooms, a large auditorium and sleeping quarters for 250 boys. The object of the Big Brothers' League is to give personal attention to youths who stand in need of such guidance and to extend to them a friendly hand, that they may develop into good, moral and religious citizens. No sooner is a case brought to the notice of the League than a Catholic Big Brother devotes to it his special and persevering care, gently correcting the faults of his youthful charge and preserving him from confinement in penal or correctional institutions. Often the boys are paroled by the courts into the custody of a Big Brother, who then from time to time reports the progress made by his ward. Representatives of the Association are in constant attendance at all the criminal courts to look after the welfare of Catholic boys who may be brought before the judges for trial and sentence. They work in harmony with probation officers and mutual welfare policemen. During the course of the past year the Bronx League gave personal supervision to over 1,000 court cases and procured positions for nearly 1,500 boys. This is a true form of practical Christianity. It is to be hoped that the Bronx Catholic Big Brothers' building will give an impetus towards the erection of similar structures in all our cities. A drive for a 25,000 membership is to begin in all the parishes of Bronx county on March 1.

Government Control of Railways

THE following official vindication of the present government control of railways is of considerable interest. It briefly enumerates the economic arguments in favor of such control if efficiently carried out.

> Already a more efficient operation of the railways taken under control by the Government has been effected. Duplication of service, especially of passenger service, has been eliminated, with more freight traffic made possible as a consequence. The common use of terminals has avoided much delay, and shipment by the most direct routes, instead of by longer routes designated by shippers or dictated by the respective railroads' interests or traffic agreements, has saved much time. In short, conflicting corporate interests have all been subordinated to the one national purpose of rapid and efficient moving of traffic, with the result of a distinct speeding up of freight movement. Government operation will be more economical. Much duplication required by competitive operation of the railroads is rendered unnecessary and other expenses, too, will be eliminated.

An order has been issued forbidding the use of railroad revenues for political purposes, to affect legislation or to influence the elections. Free passes are also forbidden, except such as are expressly authorized by the Interstate Commerce act.

Music in Parish Schools

MRS. JUSTINE WARD contributes to the January number of the Catholic Choirmaster an excellent paper on "School Music in Its Relation to Church Music," in which she suggests a practical way of carrying out the wish of Pope Pius X, that "The Faithful may again take an active part in the ecclesiastical offices as was the custom in ancient times." According to the plan which Mrs. Ward has found to work successfully when religious teachers really take an interest in the matter,

> . . . not less than twenty minutes a day should be given to music during the first four grades, this time being spent not in the mere singing of rote songs, but in fundamental work, which, incidentally, interests the children far more than an appeal to the purely imitative faculties. In the first year they should master, so as to use them intelligently, the major scale and the tonic and dominant chords. In the second year the subdominant chord, the minor scale, with its two chief chords, and the modulation into the dominant; in the third year, a freer use of previously learned intervals, the direct study of thirds, fourths, fifths and sixths, modulation into the subdominant, and from major to minor and minor to major. In the fourth year chromatics, modulation into all related keys and an introduction to the Gregorian modes (the Gregorian melodies having previously been learned by interval). Meanwhile the voice will have been carefully placed and developed.

The author maintains that the parish-school teachers can easily be taught the principles of voice-training as applied to children and also how to cultivate the pupil's ear. If the boys and girls now in our parochial schools learn to sing the Church's music, Mrs. Ward believes that the liturgical offices will eventually be sung by all the people as "they were in the golden ages of Catholicism."

The So-Called Socialism

AN editorial in the Saturday Evening Post may help somewhat to clarify popular notions concerning that extension of the power of the State, which we have recently witnessed in Western Europe and America. Whatever we may call it, and however we may be mentally disposed towards it, we should not confuse it with the Socialism which Socialists have preached:

> What has happened is an enormous concentration of power in few hands. Our trusts look like toddling infants in comparison with the vast powers over industry now exercised by a few men at Washington, London and Paris. This new control is no more Socialistic in the Marxian sense than the old control was. Its one object is to quicken the pace, to increase production.
> Essentially it is the capitalistic system seeking dividends in military efficiency. The workers no more elect its managers and fix its conditions than they did before, not so much, in fact.
> American railroads illustrate the situation. They are operated in the same way, by the same persons and in the same spirit as before; but the operators are armed with new powers. The roads had gotten into an almost impossible situation. Government neither directed them itself nor permitted private management to direct them efficiently. It takes them over, guaranteeing private owners the same returns as before and paying labor the same wages. If it raises wages it must raise rates to the public, and private owners were willing enough to do that. Labor has no greater share in the management or in the earnings.

What has been taken over everywhere consists almost wholly of old standardized things, like railroads and steamships, which capitalism had already developed and exploited until the return on the invested capital had declined to a fairly fixed and quite moderate rate. If government retains those fully developed and standardized things capital presumably will simply turn to fresher fields.

Whether these developments will intensify the growth of the Socialist movement is quite another question.

Isabella's Jews or Jewels?

"COLUMBUS UPSET AGAIN" is the heading given to a letter printed in the Philadelphia Public Ledger. "Did Isabella send him forth on the strength of jewels or of Jews?" is the query set by the editor in heavy type. Then follows the communication, signed by Edward R. Robbins:

> Sir—Under the auspices of the Easton Y. M. C. A., one evening last week a lecture was delivered by a reverted Jew from New York City, defending his race from the popular prejudice against it. In the course of his remarks on the patriotism of the race as proved by history, he made three statements worthy of attention, if true, and of public denial if false. These were: first, that it was not Queen Isabella's jewels that really financed the exploration of Christopher Columbus in 1492, in which year America was discovered, but "Queen Isabella's Jews"; second, that the first mate on Columbus's vessel was a Jew, and, third, that it was a Jew by the name of Solomon, who gave his entire fortune of almost three-quarters of a million of dollars to Robert Morris, thereby enabling him to finance the American Revolution. These statements, with many others, were made before a large and deeply interested audience. Can they be verified? Can they be successfully denied?

To defend the Jews, or any other race, from "popular prejudice" is a praiseworthy task, since prejudice, in the writer's sense, implies that an injustice is being done. Statements like the above, however, are to be regarded as mere wild and whirling words, the commonplaces of Sunday supplements and platform oratory, unless the speaker himself substantiates them by authentic historic references. There is no reason why others should be concerned with verifying or denying them. It is not impossible that Queen Isabella borrowed money from the Jews at the prevailing rate of interest. It matters little whether the first mate of Columbus was a Christian or a Jew. Certainly the ship's crew was predominantly Catholic and the Admiral himself was a Catholic. Finally, we have still to learn the facts of the gratuitous financing of the American Revolution by an Israelite. It is a subject of merriment in American Jewish literature that Columbus himself is written down a Jew.

The New York Yiddish Renaissance

YIDDISH, according to Isaac Goldberg in the Bookman, is today enjoying a literary renaissance. Its center is New York, which, "Since the beginning of the European war, has fairly wrested from Warsaw the position of literary capital of the Jews." The revival, as we have stated before, is almost entirely confined to the radical elements whose revolutionary outlook on life is not confined to economics, but embraces the field of morality. One of the particular stars in this Yiddish renaissance is Sholom Asch, a resident of the New World metropolis since the beginning of the war, "one of the arrivals that helped swing the Yiddish literary center from Warsaw to New York," and perhaps the most popular of living Yiddish writers. Goldberg's enthusiastic defense of this decadent incidentally reveals the Sodom and Gomorrah underlying much of the Yiddish literature:

> It is natural that Asch should have been accused of eroticism, yet it should be constantly borne in mind that the Yiddish public will listen to and read, without hiding it, much of what the American public would affect not to care for, only to read it surreptitiously. The racial sense of humor is so strong, so elemental, often so Rabelaisian, let us say, that what to outsiders would appear a question of morality is really nothing but a problem in humor. At other times the presentation of certain scenes is an artistic obligation which the author cannot shirk. Thus, in Asch's "Mottkethe Scamp," which ran serially in the columns of the New York Forward, the world's largest Yiddish daily, and was afterward published in book form, achieving an enormous sale, there are certain passages to which Comstockian readers would certainly object strongly in an English version. And yet, the story of Mottke's progress, or retrogression, from his birth in the cellar so common to Jewish fiction, to his final imprisonment for self-confessed murder, demands those scenes and is spoiled without them. American squeamishness and hyper-puritanism have much to profit from Yiddish fiction and Asch's healthy elementalism in particular.

The most sinister comment of the entire article is its concluding words: "If America would understand its great population of Jews, nothing could lead to such an understanding better than a knowledge of New York's Yiddish writers." A paper of higher moral standards, such as the American Israelite, would doubtless resent this imputation. In fact it has itself called attention to the dreadful immorality and national peril contained in the great Yiddish papers that are daily printed and sold in enormous editions.

The President's Message to the American Farmers

IN his message to the farmers of the United States, President Wilson pays them glowing tributes, both for their patriotism and their economic efficiency. He reminds them that it was by the farmers of America that the first shots were fired at Lexington, which "set aflame the revolution that made America free." Farmers have not been exempted from the draft, and he takes it for granted that they would not wish to be placed in a class by themselves in this regard, although the attention of the War Department has been seriously centered upon the task of interfering with the labor of the farmers as little as possible. The farmers themselves have responded in a splendid fashion and the President adds the following words of praise for their agricultural achievements:

> I dare say that you are aware that the farmers of this country are as efficient as any other farmers in the world. They do not produce more per acre than the farmers in Europe. It is not necessary that they should do so. It would perhaps be bad economy for them to attempt it. But they do produce by two to three or four times more per man, per unit of labor and capital, than the farmers of any European country. They are more alert and use more labor-saving devices than any other farmers in the world. And their response to the demands of the present emergency has been in every way remarkable. Last spring their planting exceeded by 12,000,000 acres the largest planting of any previous year, and the yields from the crops were record-breaking yields. In the fall of 1917 a wheat acreage of 42,170,000 was planted, which was one million larger than for any preceding year, three millions greater than the next largest, and seven millions greater than the preceding five-year average.

The present crisis demands that these achievements must even be exceeded. "It involves not only labor, but sacrifice, the painstaking application of every bit of scientific knowledge and every tested practice that is available. It means the utmost economy, even to the point where the pinch comes. It means the kind of concentration and self-sacrifice which is involved in the field of battle itself."

Chronicle

The War.—The week has been one of almost complete inactivity on the various war fronts. The British have carried out a number of more or less successful but unimportant raids on the German trenches, and the Germans have repeatedly attacked the sector of the western line entrusted to the American troops. General Pershing's men have on every occasion repulsed the attacks, and although the engagements have been on a small scale they have resulted in comparatively large losses to the Germans. In Mesopotamia the British have again begun to advance. Although by reason of the armistice concluded between the Russians and Turks as a preliminary step to peace, the British have been left to fight alone, their troops operating along the Euphrates have taken Khana Burayet, fourteen miles west of Ramadieh, and their patrols have advanced to a point only eighteen miles distant from Hit.

Bulletin, Feb. 25, p.m.-Mar. 4, a.m.

It is difficult to disentangle the Russian situation, but the following seem to be the facts. The rapid and practically unimpeded advance of German troops into Russia, which followed the resumption of hostilities on February 18, came as a complete surprise to the Bolshevist leaders and particularly to Trotzky, who had resisted the German proposals of peace on the ground that the Germans would not risk further military operations. As a consequence of the invasion, however, when a courier arrived at Petrograd from Dvinsk on February 23, with the peace terms printed in last week's issue of AMERICA, a meeting was hastily called, and Trotzky agreed to the policy of Lenine. Accordingly a wireless was sent to the German authorities at Berlin, stating that the Revolutionary party accepted the German terms and that a representative would start on February 24 for Dvinsk for the purpose of transmitting to Germany Russia's official reply to the peace conditions.

The Russian Situation

The German armies continued to move towards Petrograd, and the Bolshevist commander-in-chief sent a telegram to the German Staff at Berlin, asking if the armistice was restored automatically by Russia's acceptance of the German terms, on the same conditions as regulated operations before the state of war was resumed on February 18. Germany formally refused to agree to the armistice, and continued the invasion. Accordingly the following official proclamation was issued at Petrograd on February 26:

> In spite of the fact that the Government has accepted the peace conditions imposed by the German and Austrian Governments, the imperialist assassins are nevertheless continuing their monstrous advance into the interior of Russia. The cursed minions of William and the German Kaledine, together with the White Guard, are advancing against and shooting the Soviets, reconstituting the power of the landlords, bankers, and capitalists, and preparing for the restoration of the monarchy. The revolution is in peril. A mortal blow will be struck against Red Petrograd. If you workers, soldiers, and peasants wish to retain power and the power of the Soviets, you must fight these hordes, who are now seeking to devour you, to your last gasp. The decisive hour has struck. Workers and all oppressed men and women, you must swell the ranks of the Red battalions. To arms, all of you, that the struggle may only cease with your last breath!

In spite of this proclamation the Russian soldiers at first made no attempt to withstand the Germans, and the latter having occupied Pskov on February 25, took Reval, Dorpat, Polotsk, Boriseff, Kief and Gomel. For a time the Revolutionists succeeded in halting the German progress, but later they gave way, and the advance rapidly continued.

Germany officially declared that military operations would not be interrupted until the peace terms had been actually signed, three days being allowed for negotiations. Two other proclamations were issued at Petrograd calling on the people to rally to the defense of the capital. The American and Japanese Ambassadors withdrew and there was talk of transferring the seat of government to Moscow. On March 3 the Bolshevists signed without discussion the German terms, among which was one which detaches the regions of Karaband, Kars and Batoum from Russia.

The steadily growing disintegration of Russia has caused serious anxiety over the situation in Siberia. More than a month ago the Prime Minister of Japan declared that his Government would not fail to take proper measures should the Russian internal disorder spread to the East. For some days an exchange of "conversations" between Japan, France and England and the United States has been in progress as to the advisability of Japan's occupying Vladivostok and adjacent territory in order to be in a position to take military action to prevent the seizure by Germany of large quantities of stores delivered to Russia by this country and Japan before the Bolsheviki assumed the reins of government, and also to insure the continuance of order in the East. Japan has made known her views to the United States through Great Britain. It is expected that Japan will utilize a portion of her army for the aforesaid purpose, and it has been a matter of public speculation whether troops of China and the United States will be associated with Japan in this task in order to give the situation an international character.

Up to this the President has not spoken. The situation is a delicate one. He has to steer a safe course between seeming to fail in his protestations of readiness to give Russia every aid in his power and allowing the Germans a free hand. Unofficial reports state that both England and France are in favor of Japan taking action in the matter; and the same apparently is true of the United States, although as yet no pronouncements from official sources warrant a positive statement to that effect. From present indications, however, it would seem probable that Japan, and Japan alone, will act. Japan has been asked to furnish guarantees that her purpose in occupying Russian territory is to safeguard the interests of the Allies, including Russia, and that as soon as that object is accomplished she will withdraw from Russian territory.

The New York Evening Post published on March 2 six important documents taken from the secret files in Petrograd. The first is the text of a secret treaty between Japan and Russia, signed by Viscount Montono, Minister of Foreign Affairs for Japan, and by M. Sasonoff, Minister of Foreign Affairs for Russia. The agreement was concluded in June, 1916, and has just been revealed by the Trotzky-Lenine Government. By it the two countries bind themselves to unite in safeguarding China "from the political domination of any third Power whatsoever having hostile designs against Russia or Japan"; and to afford mutual aid on the basis of this agreement in case a declaration of war should be made against either of the contracting parties.

Russo-Japanese Secret Treaty

Three other documents have also been published, in the form of dispatches from M. Krupensky, the Russian Ambassador at Tokio, which set forth Japan's territorial aims, and state that Japan is desirous of succeeding to all the rights and privileges hitherto possessed by Germany in the Shantung province and of acquiring the islands to the north of the equator at that time (February 8, 1917) occupied by Japan. Krupensky urged his Government to promise to support these desires of Japan. He also stated that public opinion and press comment in Tokio was on the whole favorable to the revolution in Russia. A fifth document contains information of proposals made by Germany to Japan for the conclusion of a separate peace between Germany, Russia and Japan. M. Sasonoff states that Russia would be ready to listen to such proposals provided they were made simultaneously to Russia, France, England and Japan. This document bears the date of May 11, 1916. A sixth document contains the text of the Russo-German agreement of 1909 respecting the solution of various questions in the Balkans and in Persia.

Speaking in the Reichstag on February 25 concerning the foreign situation and Germany's attitude towards it, Count von Hertling, the Imperial German Chancellor, spoke as follows on the Belgian question:

The German Chancellor's Speech

> It has been repeatedly said that we do not contemplate retaining Belgium, but that we must be safeguarded from the danger of a country with which we desire after the war to live in peace and friendship, becoming the object of the jumping-off ground of enemy machinations. If, therefore, a proposal came from the opposing side, for example from the Government in Havre, we should not adopt an antagonistic attitude, even though the discussion at first might only be unbinding.

Taking up President Wilson's message to Congress of February 11, he declared that he was in agreement on its four fundamental principles, namely, that each part of the final settlement should be based upon the essential justice of each particular case; that peoples and provinces should not be bartered about like pawns, even with a view to maintaining the discredited balance of power; that territorial settlements should be made in the interests of the peoples concerned; and that national aspirations should be given the utmost satisfaction. The President's speech, said the Chancellor, "represents, perhaps, a small step towards a rapprochement," and "a general peace on such a basis can be discussed."

He made, however, the reservation that these principles must not be proposed by the President of the United States alone, but by all States and nations. The League of Nations, erected upon justice and mutual unselfish appreciation, was an aim devoutly to be desired, but far from being reached. He declined to rest his case on the court of the world to which the President appealed, because it was prejudiced, although be would gladly cooperate if an impartial court of arbitration existed. The President's state of mind, he declared, was not shared by the leading powers of the Entente, and he singled out England as being still imperialistic in her war aims and of desiring to impose a peace according to its pleasure on the world. In her application of self-determination, England, he said, had no intention of including Ireland, Egypt and India.

The rest of the speech was devoted to setting forth Germany's desires and efforts for the self-determination of Courland, Livonia, Ukraine and Poland, the object and progress of the peace negotiations with Russia and Rumania, the intentions of the Entente, as the Chancellor conceives them, and expressions of astonishment that Germany should seriously be represented as "a disturber of peace."

The Chancellor's speech has met with a cold response. French and English newspapers put little credit in the Chancellor's words and insist that the real purpose of Germany is to be judged by her deeds. Mr. Arthur Balfour in the House of Commons, characterized the speech of the Chancellor as lip-service to President Wilson's four propositions, and spoke at length to show how little Count von Hertling's profession was substantiated by German military acts. President Wilson, it is said, will soon reply to the Chancellor's speech, but in the meantime there has been no official expression of opinion at Washington. Editorial comment in America, on the whole, has been very much inclined to take the French and English views.

The Railroad Control bill passed the House on February 28 by a vote of 337 to 6, in substantially the same form as that given it by the Administration and passed the week previous by the Senate. The House bill differs from the Senate bill in that it gives the President supreme authority in the matter of fixing rates; it permits the President to utilize the personnel and facilities of the Interstate Commerce Commission, but deprives that body of the ultimate decision as to rates for which the Senate provided. The other point of difference between the House and Senate bills is found in the date on which the railroads shall be returned to their owners. The Senate set eighteen months after peace has been declared as the time when the Government should relinquish control; the House extended this time to two years, leaving it, however, to the discretion of the President to do so earlier, should he find it feasible.

The Railroad Bill

The bill confers on the Government control of the railroads for the period of the war, without the restrictions imposed on their operation by private owners, by Federal and State enactments. It authorizes the President to buy and sell in behalf of the Government, at a price not exceeding par, any securities issued by the railways to meet maturing obligations or for other necessary expenditures. Each railway taken over by the Government is to be paid a sum equivalent to that railway's average operating-income during the three years preceding the entrance of the United States into the war. It allows payment of dividends, though not in excess of a company's rate during that same period. It appropriates $500,000,000 for maintenance and improvement, but each railroad is to be charged with principal and interest on such advances. The bill has been sent to conference, and it is expected that the differences will be adjusted without difficulty and that the final draft will be submitted to the President without delay for his signature.

Ireland.—The late news about Irish affairs is quite contradictory, that sent direct from Ireland telling one story, that dispatched from London relating another.

Present Conditions

The South Armagh elections resulted in a defeat for Sinn Fein, the votes standing as follows: Donnelly (Irish Party) 2,324, McCartan (Sinn Fein) 1,305, Richardson (Unionist) 40. The Irish Party and the Unionists are elated over the victory. Sinn Fein contents itself with saying that such an outcome was to be expected in a constituency like South Armagh. Mr. George Russell, the "Æ" of poetical fame, has followed the example of Mr. Lysaght and resigned from the Convention. Apropos of this the Manchester Guardian says: "He was one of the most important figures in the debates at the Resident House, and his views, as shown in his pamphlet, 'Thoughts on a Convention,' favored the fullest measure of Home Rule." The London Morning Post remarks:

> Mr. Russell's resignation does not look promising for the eventual success of the Convention, coming as it does immediately after the withdrawal of Mr. Lysaght. Like the latter, "Æ" is among the Intellectuals whose activities were a prelude to the militant movement of Sinn Fein. Mr. Russell is a close friend of Sir H. Plunkett, and has earned the particular dislike of the Nationalists.

On reading Mr. Lysaght's letter of withdrawal Bishop Fogarty of Killaloe addresses this note to him:

> I have just read your letter on Irish government in this day's paper, taken with your resignation from the Convention. It has already caused the gravest anxiety in many minds. Can it be possible that they are contemplating, above the heads of the people, another tragedy for Ireland in the shape of sham Home Rule? Any form of Irish government short of the authority sketched in your letter will not satisfy Ireland, or bring peace to this country, and would only intensify our present confusion. A country without control of its own trade would be like the Irish farmer in the past, who could not get his daughter married without permission of his landlord. If the great advocate of "self-determination" for all the nationalities of the world has nothing for Ireland but feudal slavery of that kind, then he had better leave the Irish deputation at home. The country is sick of all this huxtering, where the path of national interests is so clear to every honest mind.

Meantime the Irish have been awaiting the result of the conference, held in London, between the War Cabinet and sixteen members of the Convention. The purpose of this conference was to discuss "differences which arose in regard to the proposed scheme of Irish settlement." While this is going on, Carson is touring Ulster, making fiery speeches and promising support to the "Imperial Province" to the last ditch. The poor people, according to the February Irish Rosary, are in dire need.

> Among the very poor in the towns starvation has begun in Ireland. Debility from under-feeding is easy to read in the faces of the women and children clustering outside closed shops in Dublin to wait their turn for admission. It is no secret that in the poorer quarters many deaths have occurred through sheer innutrition. Women and children are the most numerous victims. Food and warmth are unprocurable by this unprotected class, thanks to the prolonged orgies in which modern civilization is indulging. But such an unbearable state of hunger for the helpless must not be permitted to go on.

In Dublin, as in London, it has not gone unremarked that those who have to stand for hours in the cold on the severest winter days, in the hope of buying an ounce of tea and two ounces of margarine, are never the rich and well-dressed. Supplies are evidently not short for the persons who can afford to pay a fine price for them. Starvation is the penalty of poverty.

Though the Irish papers do not hint at early results from the Convention, yet the attitude of the jingo American papers seems to portend an early decision unfavorable to Irish aspirations. Early in the week there was an attack on the Irish in Canada, this was followed by the publication of a supposed incriminating letter, found in 1916, of a prominent New York Sinn Feiner, later for three days in succession dispatches from London told of the spread of "anarchy in Ireland." On Wednesday the law was ignored in Clare, Sligo, Roscommon and Mayo. Cattle-drivers were active, telegraph wires had been cut, felled trees blocked the progress of troops and the police, farms were seized in the name of the Republic of Ireland, Dublin was alarmed and the state of the country was so serious that the people were wholly distracted and had forgotten the very existence of the Irish Convention. Indeed even "if a national government were granted on the morrow it would be compelled to begin its functions with a system of coercion." On Thursday bandits appeared on the scene, some of them in Sinn Fein uniforms, and there was more cattle driving. A later dispatch, however, announced that there was no cause for alarm. On Friday and Saturday the cable from London was quiet, on Sunday it announced that the Irish had been subdued by troops, and that Field Marshal French had arrived in Dublin. The first part of a curious campaign is apparently at an end; the second part is reserved for Parliament.

Rome.—The growth of the work, undertaken originally by Pope Benedict XV with the purpose of effecting the exchange of prisoners of war, has assumed such large proportions that the Holy See has found it necessary to issue a set of regulations for those who invoke the aid of the Vatican. All letters are to be addressed directly to the Provisional Office for the Prisoners of War, Secretariate of State, the Vatican, Rome. On the envelope is to be inscribed clearly the object desired, whether it be the return of the prisoners to their native lands, or their internment in Switzerland, or information concerning the missing. The Holy Father begs that requests for assistance contain the following points:

The Pope and War-Victims

They should indicate very precisely: (a) The reasons that may be urged in support of the request; (b) the surnames and proper names, age, address, street and number, if there is question of return to their native land, camp and number, if there is question of a prisoner; and also the surname, proper name and address of those in behalf of whom the request is made and also of those who actually write to the Holy See. Frequently one or other of these details is wanting, an omission which entails useless correspondence and occasions long delays.

The instructions of the Vatican insist that care should be taken to make the writing legible, that a change of address should be forwarded to Rome, and that the Provisional Office should be notified as soon as a prisoner has been transferred to Switzerland, or his repatriation effected. It is also noted that it hinders rather than helps the success of the request to send a number of letters on the same subject through different channels, and that a separate sheet should be used in the case of each separate person in whom the Holy See is asked to interest itself. It is needless to recall that the Holy Father, in issuing these regulations, has nothing else at heart than to render to the prisoners themselves and to their families every assistance in his power, and that his instructions have as their object to facilitate his efforts in their behalf.

Spain.—The recent elections in Spain, which took place on February 24, resulted in the winning of places in Parliament as follows: Liberal Democrats, 93; Conservatives of the Dato group, 86; Romanones Liberals, 35, and Republicans, 33. As was expected, the Cabinet found it advisable to resign in the face of this expression of popular desires. Another reason for their retirement was their inability to arrive at a decision as to the adoption of a course of benevolent, as opposed to absolute neutrality towards the Allies, for which there is a good deal of public agitation. The passivity of the Government under the German disregard of Spanish rights at sea and the sinking of Spanish ships by German submarines was another cause of dissatisfaction. The question of constitutional reforms led to the sudden withdrawal from the Cabinet of Señor Ventosa, Minister of Finance, and Señor Rodes, Minister of Public Instruction. After they had handed in their resignations, the Premier presented a collective resignation of the entire Cabinet. The King at once requested the retiring Premier to form a new Ministry, in which it is said many of the former Ministers will be retained. This will be the third Cabinet formed by the Marquis de Alhucemas within a year.

Elections and New Cabinet

Negotiations are under way for a trade agreement between Spain and France and Spain and the United States. Ambassador Willard is conducting the preliminaries in Madrid and is striving to induce the Spanish Government to furnish General Pershing's forces with mules, tents, blankets and other supplies; the United States on its side would agree to send oil, cotton and other products to Spain, and in particular a large quantity of railroad supplies which are needed for the rehabilitation of Spanish railroads. The obvious advantage of the agreement would be the saving of tonnage. At the same time Washington is proposing to Spain that Spanish ships should be put at the disposal of the American Government on terms similar to those obtained from Northern neutral countries.

Proposed Trade Agreement

Religious Liberty and the Oklahoma Law

BENEDICT ELDER

THE decision of Judge Clark sustaining the Oklahoma "bone-dry" law, which makes it impossible lawfully to secure Mass wine in that State, is of supreme interest not to Catholics only, but to all the people. The implications of the law seem much more important than is commonly thought, perhaps more important than the Court thought. Something more than religious liberty, precious as that is, is involved. Can the State of Oklahoma, as a member of the Union, nullify the requirements exacted of her, and to which she agreed, when she became a State? Can she change or ignore the provisions of her Constitution, incorporated at the express demand of Congress, and as a condition precedent to her admission to statehcod? Can her form of government lawfully be other than republican? In fine, can she rescind the compact of statehood?

Are these questions involved in Judge Clark's decision? They seem to be, and, in fact, are. Oklahoma was admitted to the Union in 1907, by virtue of an Act of Congress known as the "Oklahoma Enabling Act," which, as the title indicates, is the law that enabled the Territory, or the Territories, since Indian Territory and Oklahoma Territory were admitted as one, to become a State. This Act is entirely distinct from the "Oklahoma Organic Act," by virtue of which the Territory of Oklahoma was organized in 1899. The "Organic Act" of course, was superseded, but the "Enabling Act," so far from being superseded, was confirmed anew by the adoption of the State Constitution embodying its provisions. If, therefore, the Oklahoma statute on prohibition violates a provision of the Oklahoma Constitution, made in compliance with a requirement of the Oklahoma Enabling Act, it presents not only a State, but also a Federal question, and the United States Supreme Court, in a case properly presented, will certainly hold such a statute invalid. Whether as a matter of comity, the Supreme Court would require the case to be presented to the State Court first, rather than have it come up from an inferior Federal Court, need not be considered here. The only question here is, can the Federal Government, in a proper case, require the State of Oklahoma to live up to the compact, made with the Union to secure, among other things, the religious liberty of her people?

The point is, that this compact, in the case of Oklahoma, as of other States admitted since the War between the States, enlarges upon the Federal powers set out in the Federal Constitution. The religious liberty guaranty of the Federal Constitution is not imposed upon the States; it binds Congress only. But in the case of Oklahoma, Congress imposed this guaranty as a condition of statehood, requiring her to accept and place it in her Constitution, before she could be admitted into the sisterhood of States. And Oklahoma did accept, and put into her Constitution, that guaranty, and by virtue thereof was admitted to statehood, thus confirming the extension of the Federal power in this and the other particulars agreed on, and constituting the United States Supreme Court the tribunal of last resort in matters affecting the religious liberty of her people. If this is not true, the Oklahoma Enabling Act seems a bit of impudence and the Oklahoma Constitution so carefully incorporating its required provisions, is the original piece of camouflage.

I quote from the language of the Enabling Act, where, in section three, it specifies what the Oklahoma Constitution shall provide:

> The Constitution shall be republican in form and make no distinction in civil or political rights on account of race or color, and shall not be repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, or to the principles of the Declaration of Independence. And said Constitution shall provide
> First, That perfect toleration of religious sentiment shall be secured and that no inhabitant of said State shall ever be molested in person or property on account of his religious worship, and polygamy or plural marriages are forever prohibited.
> Second, That the manufacture, sale, barter, giving away or otherwise furnishing, except as hereinafter provided, of intoxicating liquors within (the old Indian Territory and Reservations) is prohibited for twenty-one years and thereafter until the people shall otherwise provide by amendment of said constitution.
> Third, (That disclaimer of certain lands shall be made).
> Fourth, (That the State assume the debts of Oklahoma Territory).
> Fifth, (Relates to the establishment of public schools).
> Sixth, That the State shall never enact any law restricting or abridging the right of suffrage on account of race, color, etc.

It is very clear that, although only the last-mentioned is contained in the Federal Constitution, all six of these requirements relate to matters of common interest to all the people of the United States, and that Congress intended Oklahoma's sovereignty in respect to them, to be subject to that common interest. Moreover her admission to statehood was conditioned upon her compliance with this principle by accepting the conditions specified. The next section of the Enabling Act, after providing for submitting the constitutional draft to the people for approval, reads as follows:

> And if the Constitution and Government of said proposed State are republican in form, and if the provisions of this act have been complied with, it shall be the duty of the President of the United States to issue his proclamation announcing the result, and thereupon the proposed State of Oklahoma shall be deemed admitted by Congress into the Union, under and by virtue of this act, on equal footing with the original States.

Now if Oklahoma had refused to comply with these requirements of Congress, or had ignored them even, but had been admitted to statehood notwithstanding, the matter would be different. In that event, the Federal jurisdiction would be confined strictly to the powers expressed in the Federal Constitution. Since that document inhibits Congress, and not the States, from making laws limiting religious liberty, Oklahoma's statute would not present a Federal question, unless perhaps the Fourteenth Amendment, the last refuge of constitutional lawyers, can be made to apply. This, however, is by no means certain.

But Oklahoma did not refuse to comply with the conditions that Congress imposed, nor did she ignore them. She agreed to them. She accepted them expressly, and literally. The very first Article of her Constitution, after declaring "the State of Oklahoma an inseparable part of the Federal Union and the Constitution of the United States the supreme law of the land," provides:

> Perfect toleration of religious sentiment shall be secured and no inhabitant of the State shall ever be molested in person or property on account of his religious worship, and polygamy or plural marriages are forever prohibited.

Each of the other six requirements was likewise accepted in equally express and literal terms. Now the Federal Constitution makes no reference at all to polygamy, or to prohibition among the Indians, or to any other of the six requirements except the last. Therefore, there is no ground whatever for thinking that the power of the Federal Government to prevent polygamy in Oklahoma, or to prevent liquor traffic on Indian Reservations there, is any more certain, fixed or adequate than its power to secure religious liberty to the people of the State. Indeed, the Federal power to hold Oklahoma bound by her declaration of inseparable union with the States, seems no more definitive than the power to hold her bound by her guaranty of religious liberty, her provision against polygamy, and so on throughout the five conditions accepted by her. The source of all five is the same; they originated with the Enabling Act requiring them to be incorporated in the Constitution of Oklahoma. The reason for them is the same; they seemed to Congress necessary provisions to protect the common interests of the people of the United States. The intention of them is the same; they were meant to reserve to the Federal power the ultimate sovereignty on the questions involved.

If the intervention of statehood defeats the intention in one case, it does so in all five, and the people of Oklahoma, if they can deny to Catholics the right to procure Mass wine, in spite of the Federal authority, can declare for plural wives in spite of it, and do any other thing that on coming into the Union they agreed not to do.

Let us "carry the war into Africa" for a moment, and see what the advocates of this "bone-dry" law would think if the legislature of Oklahoma attempted to make it lawful to open saloons in that part of the State designated by Congress to be dry, except as provided, until the expiration of twenty-one years, and until the people amend the Constitution. Will they say that the Federal courts would have no jurisdiction in such a case? Could Oklahoma in this way annul the confirmed policy of the American people, now of so many years standing, to keep all Indian Reservations free from the baneful influence of liquor, and that, too, when she had expressly agreed to carry out that policy for at least twenty-one years? I venture to think there is not a friend of the "bone-dry" law anywhere, who is willing to admit, much less to claim, that Oklahoma can repudiate, annul, modify or ignore that part of the Enabling Act and Constitution of the State set out in the second clause quoted above, without coming into conflict with the Federal power.

How can they contend, then, that the first clause must be regarded differently? Really, are they true to their own cause in trying to make a distinction so unwarranted? But be that as it may, we have every reason to be assured that the Federal power will not abdicate in their favor. The old refuge of States rights is not the shelter it once was, and our laws are not so crippled, nor our courts so helpless, as to allow the State of Oklahoma to breach its covenants with the United States. Our regard for the sanctity of a compact between States has not weakened in these latter days. When, with half the civilized world, the people of America are in arms to vindicate the inviolable nature of foreign treaties and agreements, the United States Supreme Court, the last reliance of a just and noble country, will hardly look with favor upon the claims of Oklahoma, as made by the "bone-dry" advocates, that her solemn covenant with her sister States, to secure perfect toleration of religious sentiment to her people forever, is a mere scrap of paper.

The Ghost of a Dead Heresy

W. H. GRAHAM, S.J.

JUST what event in the past, if any one event, has made a ghost of the last great heresy may be a point of dispute, but about the fact of its demise, as of Marley's, there can be no doubt. For one thing, the fact is duly and unmistakably recorded in the blank, white pages of its own church register, and there is no one to gainsay this witness. Unless we are prepared to close our eyes to an obvious reality, it is plain that the day has come when some such book as, "The Heresy of the Reformers, Its Rise, Progress and Decay," need not be a misnomer. To any one not content to be bowled over by the realization of an after event, it is clear that Protestantism is as dead as the Dutch Republic. Into what it is developing during the transition, whether into a pagan State-religion, or into a communistic skepticism, or haply, into the unity of traditional Christianity, is a question entirely confined to the realm of conjecture. But there is no one with half an eye on the times, who can fail to see that as a distinct and doctrinal heresy against the Church, it is as much an historical fact of the past as Arianism.

At best it was a dissolving process, but its attenuated state at present has reached that stage of dissolution where you can no longer point to it and say it is a living thing. Its spirit, like John Brown's and others', still goes marching on, but its body has disintegrated into the primal elements. In fact to understand how completely this surviving spirit pervades the empty space which was the body, you have only to attack it. You find that you are striking a thing as invulnerable as the air. It is here. It is here. Like Hamlet's ghost, it is gone. Ask any one of the few remaining sincere and orthodox Protestants who still cling to this ethereal fancy, the question of the rich young man: What shall I do to be saved? "Believe," he will tell you. "Believe what?" you ask. Then comes the voice of the departed: "Believe. It matters not that you believe this or that. The body of doctrine is dead, but the soul of faith still lives." In other words, there is nothing left to believe, but we are supposed to believe it. Here you have justification by faith alone, disembodied, the vivifying principle of the old heresy, bereft of matter, the wandering and surviving ghost of Protestantism.

Now original Protestantism, with its body of more or less definite Christian teaching, was not a ghost, though like all things human, it was mortal and only awaited time to make it a ghost. But apart from the fact that in origin it was human and not Divine, the germ of its dissolution, strange to say, lay in its being inhuman in its fundamental doctrine. The whole theology of this heresy was based on an attack against human nature. According to it, man's nature was utterly corrupted by the fall. This sentence is the beginning, the bottom, though sandy rock of the entire structure. Not to understand this is not to understand the system of thought called Protestantism. To understand this is to understand the whole collapse. From this dogma there necessarily flow two conclusions which, of themselves, are sufficient to account for the ultimate overthrow of any religious system intended for reasonable human beings. Yet the early Reformers were not afraid to draw them. First followed the absolute impossibility of man to help save himself; and secondly the absolute determination of God not to save some; in other words, the denial of free-will and the assertion of unconditioned predestination. From these two, as from an evil union, sprang the soul of Protestantism, justification by faith alone. It was a logical step from the premises but in the process man had to cede two things that count in man, his freedom in things of moment, and his ability to reason to a reasonable God. Hence arose the breach between faith and reason, for such a faith could not stand the test of reason. Hence arose Kant, the philosopher of Protestantism, who, in attempting to shut "pure reason" out from the things of faith, shut it in from everything else and put a sort of censorship on the human mind which allowed it to roam at will within the limits of physical science and mathematics, where it might employ itself in making steam engines and aëroplanes and such things, but beyond, into the realm of metaphysics, it was not to pass. Here it would meet with the ideas of freedom and of God, and these the human mind, the pure reason of Kant, was totally incapable of comprehending, or even of arriving at their existence. But as a matter of fact, to use a colloquialism, the human mind would not stay put. It did insist upon wandering into the realms of metaphysics. It was just these ideas of God and freedom which mattered, even more than machines and explosives. As a consequence, many practical and objective minds arrived at this simple and logical result: if there is no other God than Calvin's, then there is no such being as God. And it was about this time that men began looking around for the ancestral ape.

To ask a body of rational human beings to acquiesce calmly in a doctrine which destroys every vestige of freedom, on their part, to save themselves, and to endeavor to force mankind into the dehumanized position of acknowledging as God a being who had already predetermined to condemn some of them, is to explain how a creed which, for four centuries, had been masquerading under the guise of Christianity, has eventually ceased to be a creed, and is also to account, in large part, for the dechristianized state of modern society. If, unfortunately, they mistook this for Christianity, it is not surprising that reasoning men, quietly or otherwise, withdrew their allegiance from such Christianity. Absolute and unconditional predestination to hell will drive the thinking mind either to despair or to indifference, and, in the end, if it thinks long enough, to open infidelity. That only goes to prove that Protestants are superior to their protestations, and that man is better than a man-made religion.

But, by the very nature of things, one way of escape from this morbidity was perforce left open by the men who conceived it. Private judgment was apparently a liberal concession, but, in truth, it was nothing more than a prison—freedom allowed under the stress of unavoidable circumstances. The Reformation was, primarily, a revolt against Papal and church authority. But, with these authorities gone, there was no one left to give an authentic interpretation of the Scriptures. Luther might have inaugurated a Papacy of his own. He did, in fact, try to be Pope, and did insist upon his private interpretation being a very general interpretation, and this even to the extermination of those who preferred their own. But he had not the hardihood to appoint his successor or even to recommend the practice. Of necessity then, each individual was left to be his own Pope and Council and each was accorded the faculty of interpreting Scripture after his own personal lights. Here then was the axe with which each individual was to hew his own religion out of the Scriptures, and, incidentally, to hew the Scriptures out of the foundation of Protestantism. Private judgment was the wedge of disruption, and, after the fashion of heresies, Protestantism soon began to disrupt. If the test of life is self-reformation, and the sign of death, unarrested decay, then this heresy, like other mortals, began to die as soon as it began to live. The system of thought which builds on the utter destruction of human nature, will find that it has built on something less destructible than itself. A philosophy reared on unreason will begin to topple with the first stir of reason. But most of all, a body of doctrine left to the free and miscellaneous interpretation of individuals very human and very prone to think variously, must, in the end, dwindle to a ghost of itself and leave private interpretation nothing but itself to interpret. Hence the disconsolate spirit which wants to believe, will find nothing left but belief, a condition strangely reminiscent of the grin of the cat, without the cat behind it.

The Art of Titubation

F. J. McNiff, S.J.

ONE of the paintings in the Congressional Library at Washington represents religion thus: A youth and maiden kneel in awful adoration before a blazing altar made of two stones, one set upon the other. What are they worshiping? The fire, or are they offering incense to the sun, or burning a victim to Jupiter, or to the true and only God? It might be any of these. It is distinctively none of them. A form of worship is presented which no one feels bound to practise; which, nevertheless appeals to many as artistic, pleasing to look at, elevating, but hardly imitable, except from afar off, and in a dim, indeterminate way.

The picture characterizes a religious sentiment common in the world today. Definiteness in religious belief is shunned, because definiteness imports dogma; and dogma is frowned upon; forsooth, it narrows the purview that ought to exist between reasoning creatures and the invisible world.

A definite religious creed is one of the commonest of bogeys. Never was ghost more zealously exorcised. The persuasion seems to be that the only facts and the only truths that must not be admitted to the light of clearness and certainty, are religious facts and religious truths. But that which is indefinite, or, as people term it, "broad," and breaks away from a fixed moral law, so that it be not impolite, and gives freedom to imagination and mere feeling; to private opinion and speculation, is readily taken as acceptable, and even necessary, in matters of religion.

Yet, in the commercial world, the man who does not follow a definite policy is a failure. Wall Street and the professions have their dogmas, rules held to be as clear and fast as the necessity for making money. To question them would be economic heresy; to disregard them, financial ruin. Here, at least, it is admitted that we cannot do without dogma any more than we can do without experience. For, after all, a dogma is only a truth made known by competent authority. Once competent authority has spoken, to hesitate is wasted energy. Truth, in whatever sphere, cannot be changed by personal limitations, by prejudices, likes or dislikes. One may deny a fact, but all the denials uttered by the contentious and the ill-informed from the beginning, cannot do away with a tittle of the least truth ever proclaimed. Knowledge and experience will ride roughshod over your stoutest doubter, and publish to the world the truth they have learned, as a dogma which only the senseless may reject.

Strange, that the necessity for a dogmatic rule of life is questioned only in matters of religion. Stranger that, whereas in other departments of human activity, knowledge and experience are required to make an opinion worth the hearing, so many think that almost any one may dogmatize about the mysteries of God, the subtle workings of the soul, and the meaning of life. Little is accounted for by saying that one must live, and so come to a sufficient knowledge of what life and its implications impart. All must deal in money. Very many may be said to understand finance sufficiently well. But only a few can qualify as doctors in the Temple of Exchange; and it is from the few, not from the many, that we take our great business truths and fiscal dogmas.

This vagueness and indefiniteness in belief is the forerunner and fellow of religious indifference, and may be traced to various causes. For instance, men are oftentimes fearful lest their religion should become obtrusive; lest their belief in God and His Church become a fact too well known and remarked upon, and their business, social or political standing be affected in some way. Thus, the fear of what men may say or think or do overrides their fear of God. Carelessness comes next, and there follow a weakening of faith, doubts, wavering in belief, and, in the end, indifference; as if it were of no moment whether God be honored at all, or worshiped according to forms which give the lie one to the other.

Most of all must this vagueness and indifference be classed as "a sign of the times." Ours are days of speculation and experiment and change. Inventions, the newspapers, magazines, the theater have so whetted the people's desire for novelty, that men grow impatient if something be not forthcoming continually. The persuasion seems to have gone abroad that what is not new is useless in proportion to its age. This tendency to cast out what is old and to crave after variety, has given rise to so many movements in society, to so many theories, to so much writing and giving of advice, to so much that is vague and so little that is definite, that it is small wonder that they who listen to it all are bewildered. The bewilderment comes from the lack of a sure guiding principle or rule of life, clearly apprehended and lived up to dutifully.

How many do we see who, in questions of religion, may be said to live a vague, indefinite life, uncertain about our real purpose in life, about the true meaning of religion, about the end we are destined at last to reach. Is it a sluggishness of some kind that tries to excuse itself by adopting a rule of indefiniteness and living accordingly? At any rate, sluggishness or something akin to it, offers an explanation of the case. For in an age professing to be scientific before all else, it is remarkable that so unscientific a method should find favor. There never was a time when science attained to such greatness as at present. And if we consider the world at large, there never was a time when the minds of men were so active, so scrutinizing, so restless, so given over to what is material, and withal so unsatisfied. Was there ever a time when the craving for peace of soul was, if one may be allowed the expression, so ravenous, and yet found so scant a store whereon to feed?

What is the cause of the famine? It will help us to an answer, if we consider the method of investigation followed, on the one hand, by men given to science, and, on the other, the manner of search adopted by the multitude who are looking for some form of religion that will satisfy their souls. There is in science much that is uncertain, much that is conjecture, much that is unknown. And although there is, on the part of scientists, unceasing effort to make what is uncertain sure, and to find out what still remains secret, there is nevertheless none of that feverish, unsettled, fickle inquiry which we see when there is question of people determining their religious views. Science is investigated after a fashion that is calm, calculating, and altogether sensible. Its problems are faced manfully. As far as may be, its principles are followed to the end logically. When one man fails, there will be another to correct him; and, in the end, the saner view prevails. Its difficulties are frankly acknowledged; but no difficulty or set of difficulties is allowed to disturb men's belief in the truth, the necessity and real worth of science. Its facts are put down mathematically. Its problems are definitely enunciated. We might almost say that what science cannot come at, it formulates in such a manner that the scientist can declare what he knows and what he does not. Consequently, we notice that there is in the heat and enthusiasm of scientific investigation, and in the excitement of new discoveries, a certain restfulness and satisfaction; a spirit of triumph coming from the knowledge of work well done; a sense, not indeed of the fulness of victory, but, at any rate, the persuasion that much has been won both of honor for the discoverer, of benefit for his fellow-men, and finally, that the way to greater possibilities has been cleared somewhat more.

Now, we hear a great deal in these times of the doubts people have as to what their religious beliefs ought to be, and of the methods they use to do away with their scruples. Man may deny that part of him is an undying spirit, he may scout the idea of eternity, boast of his atheism, and of his unbelief in the existence of any power, saving only man and death. Yet none knows better than such a one that his doctrine is only a brag; and none more keenly realizes that man cannot fly from the voice of his own soul, and the presence of Almighty God. "Man," writes Disraeli, "is made to adore and to obey; but if you will not command him, if you give him nothing to worship, he will fashion his own divinities, and find a chieftain in his own passions." The scoffer's position is illogical from the beginning, and this most men now understand, as did the pagans before them. But it is just here, in this most important of searches, that this scientific age ceases to be scientific, and falls into a way which is so far from true method that it merits no better name than religious dilettanteism. It happens only too generally that they who are dissatisfied with the religion they hold, do not begin a further inquiry with a resolve to find out the whole truth; but when difficulties are met, either logic is cast aside, or there is lacking courage to turn from one's prejudices or social or political leanings, and honestly, that is, scientifically, follow leadings which are clearly worthy of much more serious and persevering thought than is given them.

Hence, it comes about that, not being able to still the voice which urges them to make for some place of refuge, they adopt the principle of "any port in a storm." What is definitely fixed implies certain unchanging duties. This will not do because it is so often inconvenient. The guesses of the latest "serious" novel, the findings of the newest experimenter in Spiritism, the last of the Wellsian vagaries, offer crumbs enough to take the edge off their cravings, and they stay away from the feast of religion itself. They would take their religion as they take so much of their music, from a machine. In the business of money-making they are alert to a high degree of astuteness. In the business of their souls, a makeshift will do; a ready-made commodity, as it were, not too close-fitting, and vague enough in style never to be ruled out of fashion by the world of doubters, the fashion-mongers of truth. They are past masters in adaptability. They adjust themselves to every stirring of opinion like a see-saw rocked by a variable wind. They have never learned to chew upon the pabulum offered them. They have so habituated themselves to gulp things down that, what with trailing in the wake of fashion, their intellects seem to have lost the power of mastication, so to speak, and to crave nothing hardier than sillibub. They have acquired the knack of building a house of cards on shifting sands. As far as may be, they have reduced titubation to an art.

The Voice of Belgium

BERNARD J. MCNAMARA

A LONG time ago a man in a Roman prison wrote a letter to some friends residing on the coast of Asia Minor. The tenor of this epistle would not lead one to suspect that it came from a lonely, cheerless prison cell, except for one or two passages. One of these runs as follows: "Pray for me that speech may be given to me, that I may open my mouth with confidence to make known the mystery of the Gospel for which I am an ambassador in a chain." St. Paul thus talks to his old friends, the Ephesians, among whom he had labored for two years. Prison life has strengthened his iron will and he hesitates not to tell the truth to his converts, exhorting them to peace and charity.

The great Apostle of the Gentiles lives in his successors. The world-war has brought out a worthy successor and imitator of the great Paul; one in whose heart beat the same distinguishing qualities that characterized the zealous and courageous convert, Saul of Tarsus.

Cardinal Mercier of Belgium is the new Paul. The "Lion of Malines," as an English writer has justly called him, speaks to his people through the medium of his wonderful letters in the same way that the Paul of old spoke to his brethren through his magnificent epistles. Many have been the titles that have been bestowed on him because of his war utterances and his wonderful activity in defense of his suffering Belgian children. But it remained for a recent compiler, who collected all his splendid letters into one volume, to give him his most appropriate title, the "Voice of Belgium." For in very truth, the great Belgian Cardinal is the voice, the mouthpiece, solitary and alone, of the brave little nation that dared to choose honor and principle, and spurned dishonor and injustice. Without a King, without a government, the poor Belgians looked about for a leader, for someone to direct them, for a voice to defend them, for a spokesman who would dare to stand up before the enemy and tell him the truth about his ruthless and unjust treatment of an innocent nation. They looked for all these things and they found them in one man who was to be henceforth a temporal leader for them and was to take the place of exiled King and government. They looked for a leader, for a director, for a voice potent and strong, for a spokesman courageous and unafraid and they found the wonderful combination that they sought in one man, Cardinal Mercier. But they found in him something more: they found him a great spiritual, as well as a powerful temporal leader. They soon recognized the fact that, while he was trying to help them all to bear the terrible temporal hardships that had come upon them, he was also endeavoring to raise them spiritually. The whole collection of his letters to his stricken people shows that desire, to gain spiritual benefits for them out of the calamities of war.

Like those of the Paul of the first days of the Church, so the pastoral letters of the new Paul of the twentieth century have not only been the consolation of his Belgian children, but have also brought solace and instruction to countless multitudes all over the world within the Church and also outside its pale. There is a majesty and loftiness in them that far transcends the ordinary literature that this world-war has called into being. Even when they seem to be purely dogmatic and catechetical there is a patriotic lesson attached that is indeed most instructive. They will take their place with the literature of all time. And the beauty of these letters lies in the fact that they are applicable to our own and other countries. Certainly our own beloved United States falls under the applications made by Cardinal Mercier to his beloved Belgium.

Even at this late date, since our entrance into the war, we realize with a great deal of truth that the sad thought expressed by the Cardinal in his letter "Patriotism and Endurance" is unfortunately applicable to too many Americans! "Let us acknowledge that we needed a lesson in patriotism. There were Belgians, and many such, who wasted their time and talents in futile quarrels of class with class, of race with race, of passion with personal passion."

The Belgians took the lesson and received it well on August 2 when, in the face of a mighty and unjust foe, the whole Belgian nation became as one individual and said to the invader, "Thou shalt not go through." Wonderful, magnificent, unselfish unity of a whole nation! If the rest of the Allies, if our own United States could show such unity, the war would not and could not last very long. Memorable and glorious second of August, never to be forgotten! A cruel lesson learned, an awful sacrifice endured, are only part of the memory. A nation resurrected and conscious of its greater moral power and greater spiritual prosperity is the better part of the memory.

At once, instantly, we were conscious of our own patriotism, writes his Eminence. Far down within us all is something deeper than personal interests, than personal kinships, than party feeling and that is the need, the will to devote ourselves to that more general interest which Rome termed the public thing, "Res publica." And this profound will within us is patriotism.

What a wonderful nation would ours be if each individual in it measured up to that standard of patriotism. But many do not. Selfish interests too often cloud the ideal of patriotism, an ideal clearly delineated by Belgium's iron Cardinal.

Family interests, class interests, party interests and the material good of the individual take their place, in the scale of values, below the ideal of patriotism, for that ideal is right, which is absolute. Furthermore, that ideal is the public recognition of right in national matters and of national honor. Now there is no absolute except God. And to affirm the absolute necessity of the subordination of all things to right, justice and truth is implicitly to affirm God. When humble soldiers say, "We only did our duty," they express the religious character of their patriotism. Which of us does not feel that patriotism is a sacred thing and that a violation of national dignity is in a manner a profanation and a sacrilege?

Can we wonder now, with such an ideal before them, that the Belgians did the great things which history records to their credit? Glorious, golden words are these and we only regret that the ideal expressed by them has not permeated through every avenue of our American life. It would make the war shorter and we would be a greater nation. So much for the patriotism of Belgium as expounded by the one most competent to talk.

Letter after letter has followed this great epistle from the pen of this providential churchman. In one, devotion to the Holy See is inculcated; in another, more devotion to Christ and the Blessed Mother is strongly urged; in still another, the doctrine of the Communion of Saints is driven home through the practical necessity before them of praying for the dead. There is a beautiful letter calling in clarion tones upon the Belgian nation to get down on its knees and pray to the God of justice, right and true patriotism to help them. Happy day indeed when the American nation, as a nation, gets on its knees and joins prayer to the Supreme Giver of all good things to the list of preparations for the successful issue of the great war!

One other letter recounts the road through suffering that must be trodden before the victory can be gained, while another begs them to have patience and trust in God. Another letter is the famous "Courage My Brethren" epistle, in which he tells his fellow-citizens of the wonderful moral and Christian greatness that now is the possession of their nation. His beautiful letter to his clergy overflows with practical words on their duties. Most pathetic indeed is the letter of protest against the deportation of Belgians, sent to Von Bissing, the man who had dared to exile the unfortunate people after he had told the people of stricken Belgium: "I have come to Belgium with the mission of stanching your country's wounds."

If one letter can be said to be greater than another, it must be the "Appeal to Truth" letter. Great in majesty, brilliant with lofty sentiments, powerful in truth and sincerity, strong with the honesty of righteousness, courageous with the knowledge of justice, it is the letter of a brave man of God, in union with his fellow-bishops of Belgium, appealing to truth and urging his brother-bishops of the enemy to make an honest and impartial investigation of the calumnies spread by the same unjust and ruthless enemy that had made poor Belgium a smoking and sorrow-stricken ruin.

Germany cannot now restore to us the blood which she has shed, the innocent lives which her arms have destroyed; but it is in her power to restore to the Belgian people its honor which she has violated or permitted to be violated. We ask this restitution from you, you who stand first among the representatives of Christ in the Church of Germany. Do your duty, come what may! We bishops at this moment have a moral duty and therefore a religious one, which takes precedence of all others, that of searching out and proclaiming the truth.

There has been no restitution, there has been no answer from the German Bishops to this heart-breaking appeal. But no one wonders and no one believes today the calumnies of the first days of the war.

Such is the aspect of the great Cardinal of Belgium, rising to the crisis of war, as seen through his letters. His actions are recorded elsewhere. History in years to come will pay proper tribute to this man of God, who has become the leader of his people bereft of their rightful temporal rulers. He is indeed a providential man for poor little Belgium in her hour of trial and trouble. He is indeed a credit to the Catholic Church and to his princely rank. Piux X showed his wonderful power of discernment when he chose Cardinal Mercier as one worthy to wear the red insignia of his princely household. May the "Voice of Belgium" be for a long time potent, the Voice which so beautifully expresses the ideal of patriotism that, please God, will soon actuate every American unto the victory of perpetual peace.

The Central Shrine of the Irish

AUSTIN O'MALLEY, M.D.

A NOTE in a recent issue of AMERICA on the origin of the Irish legend concerning the expulsion of serpents from Ireland deals interestingly with the central shrine of the Irish people at home and abroad, the little chapel on Croaghpatrick in Mayo. When Saint Patrick escaped from slavery he left Ireland from Clew Bay, at the foot of Croaghpatrick, for Gaul, and years afterward he endured his famous fast on that mountain, and established the first Christian church in Connacht thereon.

Croaghpatrick (Cruac Patraic, Patrick's Rick) is an isolated conical mountain, 2,497 feet in height, on the shore of Clew Bay in Mayo, and a noted place in the authentic life of St Patrick. Nennius ("Historia Britonum") called it Cruachan Aichle, Mac Firbis had it Cruachan Oigli, but the ordinary old form of its name was Cruachan Aigli, the Rick (hayrick) of Aicill. A common name for Croaghpatrick is the Reek, a variant or corruption of rick, from the shape of the mountain: the MacGillicuddy Reeks in Munster are also sugarloaf mountains. The mountain is in the lands of the Clan Mhailli, Owle-Mailly in English; and this district was anciently called the Kingdom of Aicill and Umhall (Highland and Lowland). O'Donovan interpreted Aigli as meaning eagle, Mons Aquilae. Aicill or Eccuil was in use as late as the middle of the thirteenth century, and it survives now in the name of the Island of Achill. Under the northeast base of Croaghpatrick was another Cruachan Aigli, the Dun of the chiefs of Umhall, an extremely ancient fort, which was in existence from before the Christian era down to the middle of the eighteenth century. Prehistoric saga-fights at this Dun have been set on the mountain confusedly. There are several interesting questions relating to the aboriginal Irish and the Brythonic and Gaelic Celts in this district.

The Bollandists say that St. Patrick imitated on Croaghpatrick, during the Lent of 453, Our Lord's fast of forty days, but the Saint probably endured this fast in 441. While he was on the mountain he heard of the election of St. Leo the Great to the Papacy, which happened in 440, and St. Patrick sent from Croaghpatrick, Munis, a disciple, to Rome to offer homage to the Pope, to report on the work done, and to beg a blessing on the Irish Church. Munis brought back from Rome relics which were used in the altars of the newly established churches.

From this mountain St. Patrick, according to a legend first reported in the twelfth century by Jocelyn, drove all serpents out of Ireland. At the end of his fast he was tormented by swarms of demons who appeared as black carrion birds, and he drove these from him. Out of that grew the snake legend. There is a depression on the north side of the mountain called Lugdaemon, the Demons' Hollow, and into this he gathered demons and serpents before he drove them into Clew Bay. Some of the people on the southern side of Croaghpatrick insist he drove them into Loch Nacorra. Solinus, about A. D. 238, mentioned the absence of serpents from Ireland, and Bede and Camden also noticed that fact. There is also a very old legend to the effect that Aaron, the brother of Moses, cured Gaedhal, the progenitor of the Gaels, in Egypt of a serpent's bite, and as a consequence "No serpent nor vile venomed thing can live on Gaelic soil." The Celts were in Egypt in Aaron's time according to a tradition handed down to Keating, who wrote his History of Ireland in the seventeenth century, and they were finally defeated by "a Pharoah of the Tower." An inscription written in the reign of Rameses III tells of the rout of "tall fair men from the north who were finally defeated at sea off Syria, and Rameses saw the battle, standing on a tower." This stone was found about 1840, I think. The Celts certainly were in Greece and Asia Minor before Homer's time. The identity of the Homeric sagas and the Gaelic sagas alone suffices to prove this conclusively.

The annual pilgrimage, Thuras Phadruig, to Croaghpatrick on July 31 is one of the oldest in Christian history. It was an established custom in 824, when the Archbishop of Armagh demanded tribute for the St. Patrick's chapel on the mountain from the Archbishop of Tuam. Pope Honorius III in 1216 ("Cal. Papal Registers," vol. i) decided that the chapel belonged to Tuam. In 1432 Pope Eugenius granted an indulgence to the pilgrims who would ascend the mountain on the last Sunday of July, and give an alms for the repair of the chapel ("Cal. Pap. Reg.," vol. iv). In 1428 the Abbey of Murrisk at the foot of Croaghpatrick was founded for Augustinian Hermits by Dermot O'Malley, and there seems to be a connection between the founding of this abbey and the granting of the indulgence. Quite recently a new chapel was built on the Reek and the material for this building was carried up the steep mountain in the arms of pilgrims. The Friday nearest the fifteenth of August, called Garlic Friday, and in Irish Aoine Chroimh Duibh (Crom Dubh's Friday), the day on which St. Patrick overthrew the famous idol of Crom Dubh, was the special time for making the stations on Croaghpatrick. In the Middle Ages a pilgrim's road went from the eastern coast of Ireland to Croaghpatrick, and this was used by traders to Westport (Cahir na Mart, Fort of the Beeves) and Burrishoole (Burgheis Umhaill, Umhall Borough). That part of the road from Ballinrobe to the Reek was called Tochar Phadruig (Patrick's Causeway). The road went out a few miles beyond the mountain to the Atlantic where it dips under the sea as if leading to Cahir Island (The Holy City). The road under the sea is the Via Sanctorum, and St. Patrick and St. Brigid walked out to Cahir Island by this road. "Sure, what need had they, the Blessed Saints, for boats?"

After his fast on Croaghpatrick, St. Patrick founded the church at Aghagower near the mountain, and set Saint Senach MacDara, the Mild, called also the Lamb of God, over it as bishop. St. Patrick's charioteer Bionnan died at Aghagower, and the Saint himself was very fond of this place; he wished he could live there always, but his work forced him away. There are over 300 small islands in the bay there, and the scene is exquisitely beautiful. Thackeray grows eloquent over it in his "Irish Sketch Book."

There were several saints who lived near Croaghpatrick at various times and the greatest of these was Colman of Inishbofin. There are ninety-five Sts. Colman in the Donegal Martyrology, but this St. Colman is the most important. He was born in Connacht about 605; he became Bishop of Lindisfarne, near Berwick in Northumberland, in 661, but the dispute about the time of celebrating Easter led to his resignation, and in 667 he retired to Inishbofin in Owle-Mailly. Thirty Saxon monks followed him to Inishbofin, and St. Gerald, a Saxon, was among these. Even then the Irish and the Saxons could not get along together, and St. Colman removed the Saxon monks with St. Gerald to the town of Mayo, where he founded the celebrated monastery of Magheo na Saxan, which became a noted institution of learning. Alfred the Great of England studied there. The date of Colman's death is uncertain: the Four Masters make it 667, but there is a conflict of authorities. His feast is on August 8.

The Norsemen came into Clew Bay under the shadow of Croaghpatrick in 812. The "Annals of the Four Masters" say: "A. D. 812 a slaughter was made of the foreigners, the Norsemen, by the Men of Umhall." Eghinard, a secretary to Charlemagne, in the "Annals of the Achievements of Carolus Magnus," gives the following account under the year 812: "A fleet of the Norsemen attacked Hibernia, the island of the Scots, and in a battle with the Scots a large number of the Norsemen were killed: the fleet shamefully retreated and went home." Three other continental chronicles mention this battle—Egolismensis, Rhegino, and Hermannus Contractus. Joyce, in his "Short History of Ireland," has an entirely incorrect account of the battle. The next year the Norsemen returned with reinforcements and defeated the men of Umhall: the Norsemen were probably attracted by the reputation of the shrine on Croaghpatrick. In 835 they plundered all Connacht.

The Scandinavian raids into Ireland were extraordinarily destructive; all Irish missionary work which had Christianized most of northern Europe ceased, and religion and learning decayed. There was a short revival of religion after the Battle of Clontarf in 1014, but civil wars checked it. Brian Borumha usurped the archkingship of Ireland in 1002, and this started a state of chronic warfare among the provinces of Ulster, Connacht and Munster, which lasted almost without intermission for a century and a half. In 1079 Turlough, son of Brian Borumha, invaded Connacht and sacked the shrine on Croaghpatrick. He was an interesting ruffian. The year after he became king of Munster he was sitting one day holding in his hands the gory head of an ancient enemy, Conor O'Melaghlin of Meath. A mouse had crept into the gaping mouth of the head, and while King Turlough was gloating over it the mouse jumped out into the hairy breast of the man. The shock nearly killed him: one chronicle says it did kill him, but he was not so easily quieted.

Down through the Middle Ages there is little mention of Croaghpatrick, but the pilgrimages continued. In 1109 O'Longain, the secular lord in charge of Ardpatrick in Limerick, was killed by lightning on Croaghpatrick, and curiously, four years later thirty persons were killed by lightning on the mountain in one storm. Prince Aedh O'Conor, son of King Cathal of the Red Hand, sometime during his father's reign (1224-1228) cut off the hands and feet of a robber who had attacked a pilgrim to the shrine.

In 1235 the De Burgos, later called the Burkes, came into Owle-Mailly, and the history of Connacht from that time until the end of Elizabeth's reign is little more than a history of this remarkable family. The coming of the De Burgos was the beginning of the downfall of the O'Conors, who had reigned in Connacht for six centuries. The battle of Athenry in 1316 ended their power. William de Burgo was the first of the family to go to Ireland. His son Richard, who was killed in 1270, had three sons, and the youngest of these, William of Athnachip, invaded the district about Croaghpatrick in 1235. His grandson Gibbon de Burgo was the ancestor of the Clan Gibbons to which Cardinal Gibbons belongs.

Slopping Over

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I do not ask if it pays to be patriotic. Patriotism for pay is no patriotism: it lacks the motive that makes it a virtue, and Catholics who so promptly and generously respond to the call of patriotism should know, if they do not, that when the urgent need has passed they will get more kicks than caresses for the sacrifices they have made. In the highest sense it pays, as all nobility and generosity pay: in the lowest sense it does not; but, thank God, those on whom the burden falls do not care.

What I ask is: Does it pay to slop over? While we are doing our share uncomplainingly and without hope of reward, some of us are slopping over in oratorical outbursts, in protestations of loyalty, in "dedication" of all our resources to the Cause, in consenting to deprive our people of Mass on Sunday, in some localities, so as to save coal for our allies, and, worst of all, in accusing some of our fellow-Catholics of disloyalty and near-treason. And the motive? Because, we are told, that is the best way to refute the old-standing suspicion, the best way to disarm prejudice, the best way to maintain and preserve our rights as Catholics in the land. Does it pay? In my opinion it does not. The man who accuses his fellow-Catholics of near-treason is quoted in the Menace to "prove" that we are all traitors, and the rest of the sloppers-over have their trouble for their pains, or are contemptuously put back in their place by a reference to the inference that is warranted when one protests "too much." Do such protestations induce our Government to rebuke those of its allies who, insulting the Pope, insulted us all, in the celebrated secret treaty with Italy? Do they stay the legislative bodies who, in their zeal for prohibition, mean finally to abolish the Mass? In my opinion they do not. Slopping-over does not pay.

Let us make the sacrifice demanded of us, willingly, wholeheartedly, uncomplainingly. But, let us quit slopping-over. It does not pay, it never will pay. All the slopping-over in the world will not induce a Protestant majority to yield to a Catholic minority any rights except those that it is forced to yield. This is the lesson of history.

Some Irish, Old and New

To the Editor of AMERICA:

As you seem to be more than generous with your space in these columns, I trust that you will accord me, an Irish-American, the same consideration as L. J., who wrote under the above title in AMERICA for February 9. As our worthy friend saw fit to dissect the Irish race, inch by inch, and then proceeded to parboil it, I feel that some one among us, unfortunate people, whom our worthy friend terms "trucklers of a very vicious species," should extend to him, on behalf of millions of Irish and Irish-Americans, our heartiest thanks for his consideration and foresight in informing the readers of AMERICA that he is not an Irishman, just a friend, for fear that some of these "floaters" might become excited and imagine that the defects of their race were even greater than our friend would have us believe. It must, indeed, be a nightmare to this gentleman to see and to know that the spiritual welfare of the Catholics of this country is under the guiding hand of three cardinals with such unpolished Irish names as Farley, Gibbons and O'Connell.

Our friend says, "How few will help an Irishman to power and fame." Did he ever stop to think how few ask or require help? I have always noticed that the Irish get along in this great United States of ours quite as well as the men who are fortunate enough to be of other nationalities. An Irishman or any other man that requires a brass band and a corps of friends to push him along in the world never gets very far, and if he does he generally, sooner or later, finds his level. He continues: "The Irish in America are a disorganized crowd, without leaders, without plans, just floaters drifting from day to day, boasting of what was, rather than what is." We would infer from this that he would have the Irish keep mobilized at all times, and whenever there is an opening in civil or social life make a rush and put their man in and hold him there by brute force.

He speaks of a rush of young Irishmen to America when the war is over, and asks, "What Irishman or Irish society has given this a thought or care?" We assume from this that he would have a bodyguard meet each and every one of these poor, half-baked immigrants at the pier and escort them to some safety vault lest they should stray from the dock and be found flirting with the Goddess of Liberty, or should fall into the clutches of some unscrupulous hotel runner that would rent them a thirteen-room suite in the Waldorf-Astoria. It must grieve this worthy gentleman to see a race of millions of "floaters" drifting from bad to worse, simply because the good Creator saw fit to make him other than Irish. If this gentleman can associate with a race of people such as he describes and still class himself as a "Friend" I would suggest that he make a trip to our Northwest and get acquainted with some of our prominent I. W. W. leaders, as he would probably find in them something to warrant praise.

Homestead, Ore. EMMET F. GALLIGAN.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In G. O'N.'s letter in your issue of February 9, I was unprepared for the following: "The Irish have accomplished no work worthy of the world's admiration but apostolic work." In this statement the writer evidently admits that there can be work worthy of the world's admiration that is not apostolic. In other words, he is not using apostolic to denote any and every good work, but work of a directly missionary spirit. This statement being general and entirely unqualified, any one instance to the contrary would serve to disprove it.

In an article in the columns of AMERICA in the issue of May 5, 1917, it was proved by documentary evidence, that probably fifty per cent of the American Revolutionary troops were Irish. One is struck by the number of Irish names on the monuments to the Civil War dead, North and South. We may conclude that some with such names were among the living veterans who proved a great factor in building the West and transcontinental railways. Let me here enclose a quotation, with the facts of which G. O'N. must be familiar: "Let him then cross to the Alleghanies and observe the traces of Irish genius in the stupendous works which annihilated mountains, invented by Dougherty, and from thence to New Orleans, to admire the most beautiful architectural pile upon the face of the New World, erected by Gallagher." (Mooney, "History of Ireland.")

The names, together with a host of others, of Andrew Jackson, our seventh President, son of an Irishman, and MacMahon, President of France, start us questioning about Irish names in secular statesmanship. In the field of education, John Scotus, the re-establisher of Oxford University, and the two men, Clement and John, whom we should call the first presidents of the Universities of Paris and Pavia, were Irishmen. For music the violin is of Irish origin, Stradivarius perfecting the rudimentary Irish fiddle. To turn to architecture the roof of Westminster Abbey is Irish. Sir Hans Sloane, founder of the British Museum, was an Irishman. The Royal Academy of Arts in London was founded by Irishmen, Barrett and Barry, of whose historical paintings Sir Thomas Campbell declared that they were equal to Michael Angelo's. The Houses of Parliament at Westminster were built by Barry, its frescoes being by McClise, another Irishman.

As a result of such statements as that of the writer (G. O'N.) some say that in worldly ways the Irish should imitate the English. I have heard it stated that Irishmen should ape the English attribute, denominated by non-Frenchmen as savoir-faire. This expression has a connotation of cosmopolitanism, but by many globe-trotters, some of whom had lived in England, I have been told that the people they met most lacking cosmopolitanism, the most insular, were the English middle class and many of the "upper classes." Though something of an Anglo-phile myself, I would hardly set this standard as an example for imitation to a people who have assimilated, and been assimilated into, every nationality under the sun.

An Irish Embassy

To the Editor of AMERICA:

On the evening of February 20, at the Central Opera House, a meeting of the Irish Progressive League was held, to demand for Ireland the freedom that the other small oppressed nations of the world are asking for. Many well-known Irish men and women were in attendance, among the speakers being Mrs. Sheehy-Skeeffington, whose husband was killed during Easter Week, 1916, Dr. McCartan, the official Irish Republican Ambassador to the United States; Mr. Peter Golden, the Secretary of the League, and many others.

During the course of the evening it was proposed that a start be made for the establishment of an Irish Embassy at Washington. The proposal met with great success financially, many thousands of dollars being collected for that purpose. Donations ranged from 150 dollars to one dollar, and a monthly contribution was pledged, mostly to insure up-keep, ranging from five dollars per month to one dollar per month. Among the pledges was one from an American sailor of two dollars per month. So now the Irish the world over may look with a keen eye for the opening of this Embassy. Many cheers were given for the Irish Embassy. Among the curious donations was a gift given by a friend of twenty-five dollars with one additional dollar for every ten-dollar bill.

The speakers expressed the hope that the United States would see to it that Ireland was treated according to the aim of the war, namely, the freedom of small nations. The audience was also asked to write about the Irish question to the Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs and their New York representative on that committee. It was also announced that anyone wishing to give to the cause of the Irish Embassy should send their contributions to Mrs. Hickey, treasurer, 2177 Bedford Avenue, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Newman's Correspondence

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The following information touching the query of Mr. Marshall and the letter of Mr. McConville seems to throw further light on the subject of Newman's correspondence with Scott, Ward and Faber before the year 1838. Taking Scott first, I find on page 314 in the table of letters appended to the second volume of the "Memoirs of James Hope-Scott," that the first letter of Newman to Scott is dated October, 1838. This letter is found as a "note" on page 129 of volume I. Further proof of this appears in Newman's sermon, "In the World, but not of the World," on page 265 of the volume containing "Sermons Preached on Various Occasions," where Newman says: "I knew him (Scott) first, I suppose, in 1837 or 1838, etc." As regards Ward, there is enough material scattered throughout the volume, "W. G. Ward and the Oxford Movement," but particularly on pages 81 and 82, to warrant one in believing that the latter part of the year 1838 marked the beginning of Ward's real following of Newman. As they could converse together at that time, there may have been no reason for corresponding.

Newman seems to have met Faber in the early part of 1837, when the translation of St. Optatus was assigned to the latter by the compilers of the "Library of the Fathers." Chapter IV of "The Life and Letters of Frederick W. Faber" substantiates this assertion. On page 210 of this same volume is mentioned the first letter of Faber to Newman. On page 227 of the second volume of the correspondence edited by Anne Mozley, I find Newman writing to J. W. Bowden: "I have had very pleasant and kind letters from Mr. Hornby and Mr. Faber on the subject of my lectures, which I sent to both." This letter is dated Easter Day, April 15, 1838. This information is offered as only a probable solution of the silence that seemed to puzzle Mr. Marshall.

Books for Catholic Readers

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The Catholic Mind's list of books that Catholics may feel safe in reading is a good one and Father Reville's short notes are excellent. I would suggest, however, that in order to have the list effect the good intended, it should be printed all in one opusculum and hung with the family almanac in each house. Being scattered through many numbers of the Catholic Mind, it will never be consulted on going to the public library, as it should be

I would also suggest that asterisks be placed before the best Catholic books in each department of literature, books about which we could safely say that it is criminal for library boards to neglect having them on the shelves of the public libraries. In the foreword to the list, Catholics should be instructed to ask and ask again that such books be furnished, so that, with the poison of non-Catholic books, the antidote of Catholic teaching may be given. The list should be used as a memorandum, an X marking the books read and calling attention to the asterisked volumes that the library lacks.

Such a list compiled from even a score of small cities would be interesting and would furnish data for an article on public libraries in America, that would perhaps make library boards take notice. In most places I think the apathy of Catholics is principally to blame for the lack of Catholic books in public libraries. We have in such places a whole shelf full of books by Mrs. Eddy et al., but not the works of Father Searle, or anything orthodox; another shelf of books on South America, all written with the non-Catholic or anti-Catholic bias, but none of Father Zahm's works.

[Father Reville's list of books for Catholic readers, now being published in every other number of the Catholic Mind, will eventually appear as a pamphlet.—Ed. AMERICA.]

Catholic Defense League

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The articles appearing in the daily papers detrimental to Catholicism are very numerous. I cannot understand the apathy with which they are tolerated. The way to combat these has been demonstrated by other religious bodies. Locally I have "scotched" all such attempts by answering every article as it appeared in the press. But the "big dailies" simply ignore an individual protest. To make such protests effectual an authorized bureau should take hold of the matter. Trained men, both clerical and lay, should constitute such a body. To defray the expenses of such an organization would be a simple matter if our Bishops would take hold of it. The amount assessed against every parish for the cathedraticum could be doubled and this new half applied for expenses. Then you would have the great body of the Church interested in it, the Bishops, the rulers of God's Church, and the "Bureau," the authorized mouthpiece of the Church.

Prohibition and the Mass

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Federal and State officers, if they are well informed, should know, that altar wine or wine for sacramental purposes, is needful for the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass, the highest act of Divine worship in the Catholic Church. Furthermore, these same officials should know, that freedom of worship, according to the dictates of conscience is a fundamental guarantee of the Constitution of the United States of America. It would seem, however, that our officials are inclined to overlook supinely these facts under the pressure of the bone-dry prohibition movement which is sweeping the country in these latter days.

The Catholic Church has always been and will always be the ardent advocate of the virtue of temperance, which means moderation in all things, drink not excepted. Even a bone-dry law is immaterial to the Church, if the majority actually desires such legislation, provided legislators in the wording of the law make explicit exemption for the manufacture, sale, transportation, retention and use of wine for sacramental purposes. If, however, legislators, Federal or State, fail to consider impartially and to secure legally the rights of Catholics in this important matter of altar wines, Catholics as a body will be forced to unite solidly for self-protection in opposition to the cause of prohibition. As Catholics, they are and must be prepared to fight to the last ditch for the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass and they are and must be ready to die in defense of the Altar of God.

As Catholics, they have ever stood and they will ever stand firmly and steadfastly by the Government of the United States. Their loyalty has never been questioned in the past nor will it be questioned in the future by honest, fair-minded men. In this hour of strife our Catholic citizens have generously contributed both men and means to the success of the cause. But why should Catholics be expected to send their beloved sons into the very jaws of death in defense of a Government that would deprive them by law of their right to serve their God as they see fit? Why should Catholics give freely of their hard-earned wealth in support of the Government in time of war, if that same Government supinely ignores their most sacred demands of conscience? Why should the Knights of Columbus, an organization of Catholic gentlemen, spend their millions to aid their country in the hour of trial, if the Government and people of that same country have no respect for the consciences of Catholics or the legitimate practice of their religion?

We understand that about forty per cent of the army and navy are Catholics. Now why should these Catholic soldiers and sailors, the flower of Catholic manhood, sacrifice their noble young lives in defense of their beloved country, if that same country disregards their right to the legal use of wine for sacramental purposes? Why should these Catholic men, the strength of the nation, be expected to love and defend with their very lives a country which would deny them a legal right to serve their God according to the dictates of their conscience? Why should Catholics be forced to face death on the bloody field of battle without the consolations of their holy religion, since these very consolations are possible only through a recognition of their right to use wine for sacramental purposes?

As Catholics, however, they fully realize, that this is not the work of the Government, Federal or State, but the effect of concerted action on the part of a well-organized, fanatical minority, terrorizing unworthy self-seeking vote-getting politicians into submission to their tyranical wills and fanatical opinions.

The present prohibition movement, if pushed without restraint to the extreme, will be fraught with many and serious evils and dangers for the welfare of our beloved country. Conditions today in the State of Oklahoma are causing grave apprehensions in the minds of thoughtful Catholics and others throughout the length and breadth of this fair land.

It is, therefore, high time for men at the helm of State to bethink themselves seriously of the solemn duty they have to perform in regard to the religious rights of every citizen of these glorious United States. Where there is a will, there is a way, if men want to be just to all who have the honor and privilege of living under the folds of the Stars and Stripes, the symbol of liberty, civil and religious.

Beating the Air?

To the Editor of AMERICA:

An illumined reader, a cure-the-root-of-the-evil Catholic, sends in a communication anent the Young Men's Problem, and asks whether we are not "shooting in the air." His query evoked a long train of thought. In my mind's eye I saw a public library where the Catholic Bible is taboo; I saw trenches where priests are plodding in the mud, while their parishes are left unattended; I saw a newspaper office issuing filth that is being circulated with Catholic money; I saw a country persecuting the Church and assisted in this task by American gold; I saw war orphans robbed of the Faith of their fathers; and in the wake of all a mob of loudly-protesting cure-the-root-of-the-evil Catholics, who carefully desisted from any action, because the man is yet to be born who is to point out the cause of all this evil.

Does J. L., who writes in AMERICA for February 9, dwell in some African desert, vegetating on ideals that never were, and never will be objectively real? Or does he live in our vaunted matter-of-fact age with eyes that see not and ears that are immune to sound? Possibly it has never occurred to him that half a loaf is better than no bread; and that an evil kept in check, and perhaps gradually diminished, is less harmful than an evil that holds unmitigated sway. Under existing conditions clubs for young men are a necessary supplement to the home. If no clubs with a Catholic atmosphere are provided, amusement will be sought in irreligious or anti-Catholic clubs, in pool-rooms and saloons. In Catholic clubs the director will find many opportunities to instil into his young men Catholic principles, and to give them sound instruction regarding the many pitfalls on their path. Surely, the home is the proper place for such instruction; but just as surely many homes fail to impart it. In Catholic clubs the members can be safeguarded against evil companions, since the undesirables are easily weeded out. The promiscuous company, met with in pool-rooms and saloons, has been the cause of the downfall of many a young Catholic who was weak in both faith and morals.

By all means let us have Catholic young men's clubs which will be instrumental in tiding many a lad over the danger period till he finds his balance for good. And let us have these clubs without delay. While our cure-the-root-of-the-evil Catholics are deliberating, and pondering in their inmost hearts what may be the most efficient remedy for so radical an evil, our young men are daily drifting farther away from the Church, many so far that they forget the way back.

Magazines for Camps

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In my experience as a Knights of Columbus camp secretary I find it possible to get from the camp post-office an unlimited number of magazines of fairly recent date, contributed by the public. But there are very few Catholic magazines among them; in fact, six great bags, sorted one day recently, failed to produce a single Catholic periodical. The only Catholic magazines sent to our camps, except by the publishers, are always weeks and even months old, and they are not read. Catholic magazines and papers are eagerly read if they are new, but old Catholic periodicals cannot compete with a secular magazine of current date.

From the Pope to the Priests

"YOUR grandsire notoriously loved mutton, argal, you stole the sheep" is weak logic, but it appears to be the only logic at the disposal of a certain clique, bent on fastening the blame for the Italian reverses upon the Catholic Church. A magazine of national circulation was among the first to adopt it, by ascribing to the influence of Benedict XV the ultimate causes of the losses in Northern Italy, and this publication was followed by the Red Cross Magazine, which in the February number, allowed Mr. Rudyard Kipling to class the Holy Father with "stall-fed Stockholmites," "swithering Neutrals," the "Kaiser" and "the devil." As protests directed to that publication have met no response, the conclusion may be drawn that the editor is so heartily ashamed of Mr. Kipling's foul attack upon the Pope, that he wishes to bury his shame in silence.

But the most recent critic of the Italian clergy is a quondam war correspondent, Mr. Will Irwin, who by courtesy of the New York Tribune for February 28, graciously absolves "the Vatican" from the crime of working "to disintegrate the morale of the Italian people." "I am sure," testifies Mr. Irwin, "that the Vatican had nothing to do with it." But for all that, some stigma must be placed upon the Catholic name, and Mr. Irwin completes his task in this fashion:

> But to the parish priests, the Socialists are personal devils, and to get even with them, or to surpass them, they took up the same propaganda which was having such a marked effect on the men, the women, and the children. While the women wept on the necks of the men who were home from the front on leave, these priests went among the soldiers and asked, "Why are you fighting? Don't you know the Holy Father wants peace?"

This is stern logic with a vengeance. Nevertheless, it is not clear enough to explain why the parish priests, who considered the Socialists as personal devils, and therefore, beings to be thwarted on all possible occasions, should have endeavored "to get even" with these devils by aiding and abetting them in their favorite schemes. Working on the same principle, every American, keenly desirous of winning the war, will at once do all that is possible to strengthen the Germans, and our War Department will forthwith ship all its men and munitions to Berlin, to be used at the good pleasure of the Kaiser. Possibly these parish priests were lunatics, but Mr. Irwin neglects to state that fact. If they were, it is difficult to understand how lunatics could have exerted a power so potent and extended as to cause a breakdown in the greatest army that Italy has ever marshaled.

Very probably Mr. Irwin does not realize how he himself is adopting the policy which he ascribes to the parish priests, in making speeches which will aid and comfort the Germans, by leading them to believe that in the allied countries, and by inference, in the United States, Catholics and in particular Catholic priests, are traitors. Mr. Irwin has made a definite charge against the Italian parish priests, but at the same time has carefully refrained from giving the name of even one clergyman thus arraigned for treason. To ask Mr. Irwin for names, dates, places, and the definite acts of which he complains, is only a fair challenge. The challenge has been made often; it has never been answered. The Cardinal Secretary of State, for instance, has asked these data from the calumniators of the Italian clergy, but he has asked in vain. Perhaps Mr. Irwin can satisfy the Cardinal's just demands, or failing this most reasonable request, withdraw his accusation against the Italian "parish priests," an accusation which even the Italian Parliament considered absurd.

Archbishop Prendergast

WHEN Archbishop Prendergast celebrated the golden jubilee of his priesthood some fifteen months ago his mind was so vigorous and his body, in spite of infirmity, was bearing the weight of almost three-quarters of a century so bravely, that the end appeared to be far distant, and among the golden blessings which his friends invoked upon his silvered brows, not the least likely of fulfilment was an indefinite length of fruitful service. It was hoped, and the hope seemed to be well-founded, that he would long continue to grace the see with which his name had been so felicitously connected. But the end was nearer than was thought. God was kinder than his other friends, and seeing that he had reaped his harvest, and that the measure of his work was pressed down and running over, called him home in the seventy-fifth year of his age.

Born in Clonmel, Ireland, May 5, 1843, he came to the United States in 1859, and was raised to the priesthood in 1865. After thirty-two years of priestly labor in the diocese and city of Philadelphia, he was consecrated titular Bishop of Scillio, and appointed Auxiliary to the late Archbishop Ryan. Fourteen years later, in May, 1911, he succeeded his saintly and eloquent predecessor, and became the third Archbishop of Philadelphia, being the seventh prelate to occupy that see since its establishment by Pope Pius VIII. Coming from a family, a race and a land of priests, he fulfilled his increasingly arduous duties in the spirit of the highest sacerdotal and episcopal traditions; his name is revered in St. Malachy's parish of which for many years he was pastor, in the city of Philadelphia, where his priestly life was spent, in the great archdiocese to which he gave the crowning fruits of his maturest prudence and zeal, and wherever his name is known.

His motto, Ut Sim Fidelis, "That I may be Faithful," which was inscribed on his coat of arms, aptly sums up the inspiration and achievement of his distinguished career. Hundreds of thousands of militant Catholics owe their Confirmation to his anointed hands, almost 1,000 Sisters received their religious habit from him, and a considerable proportion of the priests of the diocese remember with affection the day he ordained them. Schools, churches, convents, hospitals, erected in large numbers under his patronage, testify to his courage and initiative; and the memory of his apostolic words is enshrined in countless hearts. He was faithful in all things, to his duties, to his friends. A touching incident illustrates how well he remembered the latter. A poor woman, a servant, who had administered to him as a priest and who had collected money for his seminary, died not long ago. She was very humble in station, there were few to attend her funeral; many whom she had befriended in life, forgot her in death. Not so the Archbishop. At her Requiem, the aged prelate, attended by a bishop and twenty seminarians, did not fail to do her honor by his presence. And so it was in everything. He was faithful to all to the end. His days of trial are over, his good fight has been fought, he has met Christ face to face. May he rest in peace!

Do Women Wish the Vote?

THE topic of votes for women is not new in New York. A campaign always aggressive, frequently enlightening, and occasionally deplorable, had been carried on for years before November, 1917, when the suffrage was at last extended to women. The claim made by many who opposed this civic innovation, that women did not want the vote and would not use it if it were given them, was usually resented with far more heat than the subject seemed to warrant, or indignantly brushed aside as totally irrelevant. Yet the registration day for women in the city of New York, in the four congressional districts which held elections on March 5, seems to show that our new voters lack something of that burning and overwhelming desire to take part in the country's political life, ascribed them by the more impassioned advocates of "votes for women." For out of an electorate calculated at 135,000 women, only 37,623, or about thirty-six per cent displayed enough interest in the matter to register. Possibly four per cent were kept from the registration-booths by legitimate causes. If so, New York faces the fact that, out of every ten women who might have voted, only four cared to vote, and this on an occasion when the very novelty of the process might have held out a lure to feminine curiosity.

This situation is deplorable, and calls for a vigorous remedy. It cannot be said in excuse, that any effort was made to keep the women from the polls. The exact contrary is the truth. The endeavor of all the political parties, of many church organizations, and of a number of private societies interested in the public welfare, was to rouse the new voters to a full sense of the civic duties implied by the franchise. Throughout the city schools were opened to explain the technicalities of voting, and several of the newspapers published a series of excellent articles, stressing the importance, in a republican form of government, of an active and intelligent electorate. All this now appears to have been love's labor lost. Furthermore, this indifference marked the stronghold of votes for women, the City of New York. In the State at large, the measure was rejected, and became law only by the great majority secured in the metropolis. But when at least sixty per cent of our women take no interest whatever in the vote, the prospect for the future is not promising, unless its bleakness stimulates new efforts to arouse or create an interest which, at present, is dormant if not dead.

There was a time in American civic life when the "gang" entrenched itself in power simply because "the good people," with sublime futility, confined themselves to pointing out the shortcomings of the political plunderers, instead of adopting the fairly simple and admirably efficient policy of conducting them to the scaffold along a pathway of honest votes. Are the women bent on adopting the long discredited policy of looking upon the vote as "vulgar" or "common," thus delivering themselves, and their communities as well, into the hands of cranks and gangsters? The days are coming when we shall need, even more than at present, intelligent voters. This is not to hold that we shall create a new and innocent world by votes, but only that an intelligent vote may often prevent this world from growing older in open, flaunting iniquity. Our Catholic women, in New York and wherever by grace of the male electorate, they have been vested with the franchise, may profitably reflect on the truth that the vote is not a light privilege to be used or not, at whim, but a duty to be exercised regularly and with conscientious care.

Three Nations and the Pope

CATS have a most uncomfortable way of coming out of bags at the wrong time in the wrong manner, causing disturbance in proportion to their unrestrained power for working evil. Just recently an inconsiderate creature jumped from the diplomatic pouch of Russia, in the form of a secret treaty, signed at London, April 15, 1915, by Sir Edward Grey, M. Cambon, Marquis Imperial and Count Berckendorf. Article XV of the document reads: "France, England and Russia obligate themselves to support Italy in her desire for non-admittance of the Holy See to any kind of diplomatic steps for the purpose of the conclusion of peace or the regulation of questions arising from the present war." All this is now common knowledge but it is not so generally known that Lord Robert Cecil and Baron Sonnino either denied the existence of such a treaty or so phrased their statements that people concluded Trotzky was a skilful rogue bent on discrediting four innocent victims, by a change of a word. Since that day, however, new light has dawned in England and Italy, and Cecil and Sonnino are explaining their former statements in a pitiable and grotesque manner. But when all has been said, it remains true that England, France, Russia and Italy closed one avenue that might have led to a just and honorable peace, by an act performed in the dark, for the sake of a petty prejudice. The situation is unenviable, quite full of danger in fact, for the treaty has been followed by other strange and inexplicable deeds done against the Holy See, and while loyal people are deploring the stupidity of statesmen who either perpetrate or permit such infamies, the disloyal are rejoicing in their hearts that so much aid and comfort are given to the enemy, not by individuals but by the very Governments that are struggling for life in the battle with the Kaiser. Could not England, France and Italy be persuaded that victory depends on the preservation and increase of the morale of their people and troops? That accomplished, could not England, France and Italy be persuaded that morale is neither preserved nor increased by dark plots and foul calumnies against a holy man who has successfully exerted every effort to make this blood-drenched world a little brighter for countless victims of this cruel war?

Protecting the Seed-Corn

ONE of the wisest things ever said by the redoubtable Colonel Roosevelt was uttered in a remark which displayed an excellent genius for the obvious. "You can't improve a child until you've got the child." This is only another form of the prius esse quam tale esse of St. Thomas, the principle that existence must come before modification. But Mr. Roosevelt's remark was not obvious to the purblind generation for whose benefit it was intended. That is clear from the outcry which it aroused among our social tinkers, the professional reformers, who prate loudly of the need of a new and healthier generation, and to this end propose a policy of which the logical outcome is moral degradation and no children at all.

No sane and genuine interest in the welfare of the race of tomorrow can be indifferent, even in the cramped circumstances of war, to the welfare of the child today. The Children's Bureau at Washington was established to care for the general interest of the child, and to prove that a Government which views with tender solicitude a thousand flocks on a thousand hills may, with no derogation to its dignity, bend to listen to the cry of the child in the streets, the factory, and the slum. In a recent bulletin, the Bureau draws the attention of all citizens to the frightful prevalence of preventable mortality among children under five years of age, and scores the deplorably wasteful policy of taking children from the school or the home, to place them in alleged "gainful" occupations. The warning is good, the advice sound, and neither is in any sense superfluous. But a suspicion lingers that the well-meant supervision of the Bureau, excellent as far as it goes, fails sadly by defect. For if the Bureau, dedicated to the service of the whole people, has at any time conducted a survey, looking to the preservation of the nation by the eradication of a frightful vice which threatens the very existence of the race, the results of that survey have been laid away in the most secret of the official archives. Other Governments have been frank and brave enough to face the question. Only an ostrich can maintain that this evil is negligible in the United States, or that it is confined to a decadent class, for whose loss the country, speaking from a legal, social and biological standpoint, would be richer.

Half-measures are never worth while. The Bureau has done a good work in asking the conservation of the child by attention to the child's physical health, but there is no reason why it should not go a step farther, and find place in its bulletins for a few plain paragraphs in vigorous denunciation of all purposeful race-destruction. Nor is perfection attained by securing a generation of healthy animals, whose intellectual development has not been neglected. That race is stunted, cut off from a glorious field of achievement, which has no place for spiritual aspirations. Possibly it is no part of the Bureau's work at present, to shield the child from the baneful effects of such influences as improper plays, films and amusements. That task falls, first of all, within the circle of the parent's duty. But the home is often helpless, especially in the larger cities, before a lure which has so irresistible an appeal to awakening passion and immature judgment. A strong local censorship is today a practical necessity, and an honest Federal censorship would increase its strength tenfold. If the Government, under the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution, can find an effective method of protecting migratory fish against the violence of poachers, it would not seem to be an act unduly paternalistic were the same clause invoked to forbid the passage from State to State of players as well as films, whose sole purpose is the commercial exploitation of vice and crime. A child is worth more than a fish, or a whole school of fishes, even were they whales.

It is clear, of course, that the greatest child-caring agency in the world today is the Catholic Church, the only force which consistently and without fear, vindicates the right of the child to a home and a school in which God comes first. But public authority must do its part in making every community a better place physically, morally and mentally, for the child to live in. Law cannot do everything, but it can do much to prevent the existence of open incitements to wrong-doing, so disastrous to the young, and that much it must be compelled to do.

Carranza's Gain and Our Loss

FRIENDSHIP with the Kaiser, the ruthless enemy of the United States, should mean forfeiture of friendship with this country. That such is far from the case, however, is apparent from these significant items of news:

Carranza to the Kaiser:

To your Majesty, who celebrates his anniversary today with just cause for rejoicing. I have the honor to send your Majesty my most cordial congratulations and am pleased to express to you my best wishes for your personal happiness and that of your august family, as well as for the prosperity of your great friendly nation.

The Kaiser to Carranza:

Greetings from the Prussian Diet. The intimate union of the Crown and the people, which I received as a sacred heritage from my fathers, dates from the hard times by which Prussia was trained for its world historic mission.

May these hard years of strenuousness, which I feel more deeply in consequence of the responsibility placed upon me by God, strengthen and deepen this intimate relationship, so that it may stand the test in the battles which still lie before us, and in the great tasks which, after a victorious peace, we shall have to fulfill in an altered world.

Carranza for the Kaiser:

President Carranza, it is authoritatively stated, is about to issue a decree requiring foreign ship captains to unload cargoes destined for firms in Mexico on the enemy trading list.

Refusal to comply with this order will entail detention of the vessel. This action is due to the refusal of foreign ship masters to violate the trading with the enemy act.

The United States for Carranza:

A shipment of $100,000 worth of gold for Mexico left the Sub-Treasury in this city yesterday. This was the first of the shipments in accordance with the agreement reached by the United States and Mexican Governments. (New York Sun, February 19.)

This is a bit disheartening to Americans whose patriotism is costing them many a hard sacrifice; however, it is more than ever a duty to be thankful for small mercies and to rejoice that only one pro-German is profiting by his conduct, at our expense.

Literature

PHASE AND PHRASE IN ST. PAUL

IN one of his "Essays in Criticism," Matthew Arnold speaks of a sentence of Bossuet, that fairly possessed his youthful fancy, and obsessed those he wearied with its recitation. The sentence, in the French of Bossuet, has a wonderful cadence. It reads in English: "He will go forth,—this man, ignorant of the art of eloquence; he will go forth even to polished Greece, the mother of philosophers; and he will there establish more churches than Plato won disciples by an eloquence that men deemed divine." The Eagle of Meaux soared a little beyond the clouds, when he rated St. Paul so; he failed rightly to visualize facts as they were.

Plato taught in the groves of Academe; his disciples were literary and refined; his style represented centuries of Attic culture; the expression of his noble thought was chiseled, simple, symmetrical, graceful, elegant, and yet chaste, severe and Dorian—even as the noble Parthenon, in whose shadow the flame of Plato's eloquence glittered and glowed. To whom? To a very select few at Athens. To the many, the light of Plato was darkness. His doctrines were caviare to the general. Plato was not an orator; he had not that eloquence which could grip, hold, and swing an audience.

St. Paul was an orator. He had a message to give his audience; he believed fully in that message, and in his authority to give it; he presented his matter in such appropriate phrase and phase as to hold the attention of the audience, to grip the hearers unto his own magnetic personality, and to swing and sway them the way of his own emotions and will. To do that is the chief element of oratory.

Only once did St. Paul egregiously fail in eloquence. That was at Athens. Where Plato had had an enthusiastic following of disciples, Paul won only Dionysius, a member of the City Council that was called the Areopagus, together with a woman named Damaris and a few others. Though the phase of his doctrine, and phrase of its setting were apt enough, yet St. Paul met no success in that part of polished Greece, in which Plato had been supreme. Paul established no church at Athens. He abode there only a brief spell; and left, never to return. Bossuet's comparison between Paul and Plato fails to account for facts as they were; fails to do justice to the ability of St. Paul as an orator.

Why did St. Paul fail at Athens? Because his message and his style were not Attic. The phase of the treatment was apt; but the doctrine itself was most repulsive to a self-sufficient people. The choice of phrase was fitting; it did not warrant Bossuet's rating of cet ignorant dans l'art de bien dire; but it lacked the Attic flavor. The message of Paul, at Athens, as everywhere, was that of the Resurrection of Jesus, through whom is salvation. The Athenians rejected that message. They would not believe in the supernatural order. Culture had made them self-sufficient. The transcendence of the Deity, they allowed; the deification of sticks and stones, they tolerated. They were so sufficient unto themselves, that the immanence of the Deity in them was not acceptable; and such Divine immanence as would account for the Resurrection of a God-Man from the dead—that was unspeakable. They laughed the message of St. Paul to scorn.

The style of St. Paul's message lacked Attic flavor. The Athenians scoffed at him as a lounger on the agora, a prater of the public square. The City Council, the Areopagus, demanded a specimen of his style. Paul followed the simple rules of rhetoric. He conciliated the staid Solons at the outset: "Men of Athens, on every hand I see signs that ye are very religious." In the rest of the speech, his phrasing was literary. He even quoted Aratus on Zeus; and interpreted the words to mean the immanence of God in us, "For His very race are we." Vain was Paul's rhetoric. His style lacked the elegance of form, the grace of expression, the delicacy, the je ne sais quoi, of Attic art. He was not steeped in Hellenism. Hence his failure to get permission of the Council to preach to the self-sufficient Athenians.

So St. Paul crossed the Saronic Gulf, and went to Corinth. The Corinthians were cultured, though not so esthetic as the Athenians. In the ruins of ancient Corinth, the unfurrowed Penthelic tiles of the agora, and the graceful Parian marbles of the Fountain Peirene, bespeak a high culture. Yet the cosmopolitan dwellers at Corinth were given to lust. Perhaps that is why they were not self-sufficient. Culture inclines one to be satisfied with one's self. Not so lust. Impurity makes one ashamed of one's self. At any rate, St. Paul won the Corinthians to the Gospel, and abode with them a year and a half.

The Corinthians were an athletic people. Hardby was Isthmos, where were held the world-famed Isthmian games. To the Corinthians the Gospel was preached in athletic phase and phrase. Read the excellent translation of St. Paul's Epistles, given in the Westminster Version, published by Longmans. It is direct from the Hellenistic of the great Apostle, and often brings out an athletic phrase which our Douai Version has completely lost. Let us translate one such phase of Pauline athletic piety as an instance of pregnant meaning:

> I so box as not to hit the air. I give the knockout blow to my flesh; I lead it around the arena as my slave; lest, while I play the herald unto others, I myself be heralded as vanquished. (1 Corinthians, ix: 26-27.)

Compare our edition of the Douai Version. It contains substantially the thought; but the style of St. Paul is hopelessly lost. We must go back to the language of the Apostle himself, in order to taste the literary flavor of his style. Else we will never reach the fulness of meaning involved in his athletic phrase.

St. Paul is in the ring of Isthmos. He is "all to all, to save all,"—a philosopher to the Athenians, an athlete to the Corinthians. No choice is left. He must preach the Gospel. "If I preach the doctrines of the Christ, that is nothing of which I may boast. A force presses me on. It is wo to me, if I preach not the doctrines of the Christ." And to gain all men to those doctrines, Paul uses whatsoever natural means may be used by a supernatural man. "With the Jews, I am as a Jew, to win the Jews." With the Corinthians he descends in fancy into the ring of Isthmos. Standing in the agora of ruined Corinth, the traveler marvels at the marble-tiled streets, the well-preserved shops and dwellings, the acanthus-leaved capitals and fluted columns of Peirene nearby; and recalls the voice of Paul that had resonantly rung through those lovely colonnades nineteen centuries ago. How the Corinthians gave heed! What close attention they paid! Why? Because he preached to them an athletic piety. He preached to them Christ Jesus; but in the language of the agora of Corinth, and not in the language of the groves of Academe. He gave them the ring-phase of his message, and that in the ring-phrase of the renowned Isthmos. He became in fancy a boxer. "I so box as not to hit the air." With whom does he box? With his flesh. The old fight is on between spirit and flesh.

In the theology of St. Paul, spirit is the sum and all of the higher faculties of the soul, natural and supernatural,—it is the right reason grace-illumined, and the strong will grace-impelled; whereas flesh is the sum and all of the lower faculties of the soul, disordered by concupiscence. By Adam's sin, our emotions, our likes and dislikes, our senses internal and external, are cankered by the gangrene of concupiscence, they are in disorder, wayward from God, in revolt against the dictate of right reason, of reason Godward. But "where sin hath abounded, grace hath more than abounded" in its effects upon the soul. The reason is constantly illumined by actual graces, flashes of light from on high; the will is constantly impelled by actual graces, "tractions of Christ," as St. Augustine calls them. Besides this, the soul, that is not in sin, is raised by sanctifying grace to a habitual state that is far above that of nature. That is why the boxing bout between spirit and flesh is so uneven a match; the dynamic of the spirit far outclasses that of the flesh. That is why St. Paul says, "I never hit the air."

Yes, St. Paul is a good boxer. He knows the universal and international rules of the game. He keeps his enemy well within arm's reach. He does not hit at random. "I never hit the air." He has his eyes wide open. He is alert, agile, swift. He chooses the spot for every blow; and lands every blow on the spot chosen. The enemy may be a skilful dodger. St. Paul is a more artful hitter. "I so box, as not to hit the air." At last, he gives the knockout blow. The enemy falls. Another round is fought, and another; in the end, the knockout blow is effective. The flesh is prostrate, vanquished by the spirit of St. Paul. "I give the knockout blow to my flesh."

What is this knockout blow? An analysis of the Hellenistic verb tells us. It occurs only twice in the Bible—here, and when St. Luke makes Our Lord tell the story of the widow, who gave the knockout blow to the unjust judge by talking him down. The verb means, if we analyze it, "to hit hard and often the little spot just under the eye," to give a black eye. In those unscientific days, that was the ne plus ultra of scientific delivery in the ring. Modern science has discovered more effective blows. St. Paul uses the language of the times at Corinth. "I give the knockout blow to my flesh."

After the games, the victors led the vanquished about the stadium of Isthmos as their slaves. The victors strutted with head on high, crowned with laurel wreaths. The vanquished jogged along after, and strove to hide their skulking, hangdog look of shame. Meanwhile heralds proclaimed unto glory the names of the victors, and unto infamy the names of the vanquished. St. Paul was never among the vanquished, never ashamed of his spirit, ever the victor over his flesh. "I lead it around the arena as my slave; lest, while I play the herald unto others, I myself be heralded as vanquished." The Hellenistic verb "to herald" had its athletic meaning, and a derived Gospel-meaning, "to preach." The preacher was a herald. And a fearless herald was St. Paul, not only of the clear message of Jesus Christ, but also of the names of the victors and the vanquished. In his open excommunication of an incestuous Corinthian Christian, he evinced the intrepidity of the fearless herald he was. Around the whole Empire of Rome, he did that duty of the herald of Christ; and never once was he himself "heralded as vanquished" in the boxing bout between spirit and flesh.

The Pauline boxing match between spirit and flesh is on today in every soul. And in many a Christian, the flesh is the victor. Right reason is superannuated. Strong will is retired on a pension. The emotions are supreme. Reason is blinded by the feelings; and blinded reason fails to direct the will Godward; and a Godward will fails to hinder the emotions in their pell-mell, onward rush away from God. Legislation against white slavers does some good. The hounding of grafters now and then results in their reform. But the only effective reform of the State is the reform of each individual by his own God-aided efforts. The knockout blow must be given by spirit to flesh. Self-conquest and self-restraint must be practised to such an extent as will make reason and will supreme over the likes and the dislikes. Then and then only will grace-power be supreme in the individual; then and then only will the dynamic of Jesus Christ flow unimpeded through the Christian State.

Dreams and Images, an Anthology of Catholic Poets. Edited by JOYCE KILMER. New York: The America Press. $1.60.

In his introduction to this judicious selection of poems, Mr. Kilmer explains that he has endeavored to bring together the poems he likes best which were written in English "by Catholics since the beginning of the nineteenth century," and he expresses his regret that the limitations of space have made him exclude many poems dear to him, "many poems that are part of the world's literary heritage. There should be many Catholic anthologies." Most readers of "Dreams and Images" will no doubt agree that Mr. Kilmer has accomplished his undertaking exceedingly well. Eighty-six English, Irish and American poets are represented by some 200 selections which, with very few exceptions, really deserve to be called poems and not merely verses. The danger menacing every Catholic anthology is that of including pieces that are pious rather than poetical, and this peril Mr. Kilmer has succeeded pretty well in shunning, though a little more rigor might have been profitably exercised in the matter.

At the beginning of the book, readers will be glad to find Hilaire Belloc's ringing lines to the men of Balliol:

Balliol made me, Balliol fed me,
Whatever I had she gave me again;
And the best of Balliol loved me and led me,
God be with you, Balliol men.

His fine stanzas on "Courtesy," in which he discerns "the grace of God," are also reproduced, and not long after comes Wilfrid Scawen Blunt's noble sonnet, "How Shall I Build?"

How shall I build my temple to the Lord,
Unworthy I, who am thus foul of heart?
How shall I worship who no traitor word
Know but of love to play a suppliant's part?
How shall I pray, whose soul is but a mart,
For thoughts unclean, whose tongue is as a sword
Even for those it loves to wound and smart?
Behold how little I can help Thee, Lord.

The temple I would build should be all white,
Each stone the record of a blameless day;
The souls that entered there should walk in light,
Clothed in high chastity and wisely gay.
Lord, here is darkness. Yet this heart unwise,
Bruised in Thy service, take in sacrifice.

Mr. T. A. Daly's "To a Thrush," certainly represents him at his best; four of Mrs. Eden's beautiful poems can be found, though we missed some of her lines on Bettykins. Maurice Francis Egan has written nothing better than his sonnet on "Maurice De Guerin," which will here be read again; many will look in vain for Louise Imogen Guiney's "Christmas Carol," which begins, "Still as blowing rose, sudden as a sword," but will perhaps be content with her "Tryste Noel" instead; Gerard Hopkins gets in three selections, and Lionel Johnson, very deservedly, eight; Theodore Maynard is adequately represented, and so is Alice Meynell with such exquisite lyrics as "The Shepherdess," "Christ in the Universe," and "To a Daisy"; Father O'Donnell's "The Dead Musician" is here entire, and Shaemas O. Sheel's melodious poem which ends:

He whom a dream hath possessed treads the impalpable marshes,
From the dust of the day's long road he leaps to a laughing star,
And the ruins of worlds that fall he views from eternal arches,
And rides God's battle-field in a flashing and golden car.

Joseph Mary Plunkett's "I See His Blood Upon the Rose" is justly included in a book of Catholic "Dreams and Images." "My Maryland" leads off James Ryder Randall's contributions, and Father Ryan's "Conquered Banner" fittingly follows. Father Tabb hardly seems to enjoy the space he deserves. Katherine Tynan, some will think, does not always appear at her best, and room should have been found for one or two of Father Donnelly's poems. But as representative selections from eighty-six poets had to be printed, without condensations, within the space of 286 pages, readers who miss their favorite poems will doubtless readily forgive Mr. Kilmer and start forthwith a supplementary anthology of their own. That the modest compiler of "Dreams and Images" should not see his way to putting into the volume a single poem by Mr. Joyce Kilmer, who marched off to the war last summer with the old Sixty-ninth, is perhaps to be expected, but by the heroic exercise of the higher detachment could he not have inserted for us at least one of Mrs. Aline Kilmer's exquisite little lyrics?

Now that this excellent anthology has been prepared and published, Catholics should certainly take care that it is not left, like so many worthy Catholic achievements, for those not of our faith to "discover," appreciate and praise. The book should be in every class-library in our Catholic schools; it can be profitably conned by both teachers and pupils, and particularly by those invertebrate Catholics who never find books by their "coreligionists" "worth reading," and every Catholic lover of good poetry ought to buy a copy of "Dreams and Images" and place it within easy reach on a shelf beside Palgrave's "Golden Treasury," Mrs. Meynell's "Flower of the Mind," and the anthologies Sir Robert Bridges and Sir Arthur Quiller-Couch have compiled.

Immortality. An Essay in Discovery, by B. H. STREETER and OTHERS. New York: Macmillan Co. $2.25.

The introduction of this volume states that the authors have endeavored to bring to their subject the ascertained results of different branches of scientific, philosophical, critical and historical study. The body of the work contains 373 pages of argument in support of immortality and of speculation on the nature of the future life, taken from the sources indicated in the introduction. But no one of the proofs advanced amounts to a demonstration. The nearest approach to a convincing proof is in the interesting essay of J. A. Hadfield, M.A., M.B., Surgeon, Royal Navy. He has some new indications from surgical experience in the present war and especially from recent therapeutic applications of hypnotism, that mind is superior to matter.

The remaining essays, by clergymen of the Anglican Church, afford many striking examples of the a priori historical methods of the higher criticism. Beginning an historical investigation with a formed philosophical theory, they laboriously explain away or lightly reject all evidence that opposes their theory. Dr. Hadfield writes of a phenomenon that might be paralleled in the pathology of higher criticism as here illustrated. An eye perfect organically will refuse to reflex to light, its normal irritant, under hypnotic suggestion. The critical faculties of these authors, perfectly capable in other respects, do not react to the clearest evidence, when it is not in conformity with their theories. The very passages adduced to prove that there is no Scriptural authority for the existence of hell, would convince an unprejudiced mind of the existence in abundance of such authority, as surely as Harnack's works converted von Ruville. B. H. Streeter has some interesting paragraphs on the Aristotelian entelechy, and Lily Dougall an adequate refutation of Theosophy. All five essayists might read with profit the life of Gemma Galgani, especially the scholarly chapters in which her confessor proves that the ecstasies of Christian mystics cannot be explained by the phenomena of hypnotism, Spiritism or hysteria.

A Roumanian Diary, 1915, 1916, 1917. By LADY KENNARD. With Illustrations. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co. $1.25.

The author of this book was a member of a party that left England in September, 1915, and found herself comfortably quartered in Bucharest a month later, waiting to see what would happen next. The city was full of Germans, but a strong pro-Ally sentiment kept growing among the people. The country's political situation, however, made it hard to begin any effective preparations for war. Lady Kennard, who hoped to be useful as a nurse, attests that the hospitals of Bucharest, with the shining exception of the one managed by the French Catholic nuns, were badly organized, provisioned and staffed. By August, 1916, the author felt convinced that war was "really coming," and the following month she vividly describes a busy day she passed attending to the numerous victims of bombs thrown from German Taubes. Later she recorded that, "Three men were blown to bits in another [hospital] pavilion. I think that the Red Cross flags should be taken down; it is obvious that the Germans try for them."

In November all were ordered to leave Bucharest and flee to Jassy, and the change was made amid indescribable tumult and suffering. The hospitals were so overcrowded with wounded that comparatively few of the soldiers could be attended to by the overworked staffs, and a train loaded with refugees was derailed and hundreds of people were killed. The author called the scene of the wreck "a concentrated battle-field which lacked the royalty of cannon and individual heroism." There is another good description of how the Roumanians destroyed vast quantities of oil and wheat to keep them from falling into German hands. As Russia did little to help and the other Allies moved, as usual, too late, the Germans soon overran the country and Roumania finally lay prostrate at their feet. When the true history of the war is written, it will be interesting to learn who was responsible for the useless sacrifice of Roumania. W. D.

The Gospel According to St. Luke, With Introduction, Text and Notes. By ROBERT EATON. London: Catholic Truth Society.

Father Eaton, of the Birmingham Oratory, is well known to Catholics because of his commentaries on the Psalms. Equally welcome is the present work on the Gospel of St. Luke. Nothing very scientific is attempted by the editor, since he writes for schools. The introduction is brief, contains the main features of traditional teaching about "the beloved physician," and omits everything cumbrous and deterrent to the uninitiated. They who wish Harnack's study of the "we-sections" of Acts, and an analysis of the medical terms of the Third Gospel, know where to go for such information. The translation of Luke from the original Hellenistic will be forthcoming to Catholics in the "Westminster Version," edited by Fathers Keating and Lattey, S.J. Father Eaton interprets the version that the Catholic student has to hand, that is, Challoner's revision of the Rheims translation of the Vulgate.

These interpretations are brief, illuminating, and sufficient for the readers to whom they are directed. Oftentimes the Hellenistic of St. Luke is referred to; generally the exegete's meaning is set down without argument. Quotations from various authors are thrown in here and there, but without any reference by which to gage their worth. While we recommend this Gospel commentary most highly, its utter failure to refer to the Fathers of the Church is sincerely deprecated. For instance, "daily bread" (11:3) is referred by many Fathers and by Pius X to the Eucharist; this possible interpretation should not have been omitted. Moreover, how does the editor know that Luke excludes Matthew and Mark from the "many" (1:1) who had written Gospels before him? Why make stones . . . children (3:8) a play upon the Hebrew words abanim . . . banim? There may have been here a play upon the Aramaic abanin . . . benin. Hebrew was not commonly spoken in Palestine during the time of the Baptist, unless the phantastic theory of Naville be true.

The Profession of Teaching. By O. I. WOODLEY and M. VIRGINIA WOODLEY. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Co. $1.40.

The opening chapter of this work aims at proving that the claims of teaching to be ranked as a profession are as reasonable as those of law or medicine. The question of school ethics is then taken up, and stress is justly laid on the serious obligations which devolve upon the teacher in consequence of his new relations towards the children, the community, the board of education, the superintendent, and his fellow-teachers; nor is it forgotten that the teacher in turn has certain rights which the parents and particularly the school authorities are bound to respect. After a discussion on the ultimate aim of education, many and widely different problems, arising out of the teaching profession, are clearly stated, and a solution, tentative or final, submitted for the reader's appraisal. Among these problems may be noted, by way of illustration, the relation of the school to the home and the State, the psychology of the learning and the teaching process, the function of the recitation, the subject-matter for the classes, and the present-day increasing insistence on vocational education.

This rapid survey of its contents will give some idea of the wide field covered by the subjects which the authors have undertaken to develop; and they are to be congratulated, if for no other reason, on having succeeded within the brief compass of a few hundred pages, in setting forth with sufficient clearness and fulness the essential features of the chief problems that are uppermost in the minds of educators today. Comparatively few writers, if any, have attempted a similar task and succeeded so well. That the authors, moreover, are fully conscious and appreciative of the ethical aspects of the teacher's work, the part he must play, whether for good or ill, in the formation of character, the instant need there is of strengthening the moral and the religious sense in the child along with the first development of the mental faculties: all this is quite in evidence throughout their studies; and for this too they deserve sincere congratulations.

To the Catholic reviewer, however, such a book as the present cannot be expected to carry a convincing appeal; and the reason is the work suffers from defects, common indeed to its kind, which must appear to him central and vital. For all his willingness to praise the noble motives and the high ideals that have clearly been the inspiration of the volume, he cannot close his eyes to the authors' omission of the element of the supernatural in their discussion on the ultimate aim of education; and yet to the Catholic—though surely not to the Catholic alone—this factor of the problem is beyond all doubt of the highest importance. Omit this aspect of the question, and your solution is inevitably only a partial and a very unsatisfactory answer. Closely linked with this consideration is the further fact, of equal significance to the Catholic, that a Divine revelation has been granted the human race by the Redeemer of mankind, and that the contents of His revelation have been expressed in a body of doctrines which no man is free to reject or modify. If we are bound to shape our lives in accordance with these teachings, then those who are entrusted with our spiritual guidance must see to it that these truths shall, so far as is possible, be present to our minds from the very dawn of reason. Prayer, too, must form an integral part of our daily life; so runs one of the main lessons of the greatest of all teachers. This is why, not to mention other reasons familiar enough to the practising Catholic, the Church clings and must cling to the position she has ever held on the school question. And this, too, is why the Catholic cannot be satisfied with the authors' solution of several of the questions they discuss. J. A. C.

The Dreamers and Other Poems. By THEODOSIA GARRISON. New York: George H. Doran Co. $1.25.

The admirers of Miss Garrison's poetry will find in this charming volume many new instances of that spontaneity of lyric utterance, simplicity of technique, gentle pathos, and haunting melody that we have learned to look for in her work. She is a lover of the "old ways" in poetry, free verse is wholly absent from the sixty sweet lyrics in the book and the perilous note of "modernity" which is now so fatal to many of our feminine versifiers' attempts at poetry is carefully shunned by Miss Garrison. The joy that the beauty of God's world gives the poor and lowly, the love of pure hearts, life's little sorrows, the humor and pathos of Irish courtings: these are the themes of "The Dreamers." All of love that "the young page" knows he sees "in eyes that never look at" him; "The great recurring miracle of dawn" is admirably described; the difference between gray days and gold is unerringly indicated; the factory girl's mental vision of "orchards in the spring-time" is powerfully contrasted with "the dirty wall beyond a big machine" which is actually before her eyes all day; the author's queries to the "Mothers of Men" are poignant; her thoughtful stanzas on "Shade" will remind the reader of Mr. Kilmer's "Trees"; "The Vagabond" and "Good-bye, Pierette," are love poems of feeling and delicacy and the following sonnet on "Beauty" shows what an unusual gift of discernment and expression Miss Garrison has:

Sometimes, slow moving through unlovely days,
The need to look on beauty falls on me
As on the blind the anguished wish to see,
As on the dumb the urge to rage or praise;
Beauty of marble where the eyes may gaze
Till soothed to peace by white serenity,
As canvas where one master hand sets free
Great colors that like angels blend and blaze.

O, there be many starved in this strange wise—
For this diviner food their days deny,
Knowing beyond their vision beauty stands
With pitying eyes—with tender, outstretched hands,
Eager to give to every passer-by
The loveliness that feeds a soul's demands.

Every Irish heart that reads "The Dreamers" will perhaps enjoy most the seven "Songs of Himself" which bring the volume to a melodious end. Miss Garrison sees the "Master of the House" going "With that old light step of his, across the Courts of Heaven, His hat a little sideways and his stick held so."

"The Fair" is a charming picture of a Celtic courtship and the following poem about "Sheila" is as full of truth as of music:

Katie had the grand eyes and Delia had a way with her,
And Mary had a Saint's face and Maggie's waist was neat,
But Sheila had the merry heart that traveled all the day with her,
That put the laughing on her lips and dancing in her feet.

I've met with martyrs in my time, and Faith! they make the best of it,
But 'tis the uncomplaining ones that wear a sorrow long,
'Twas Sheila had the better way and that's to make a jest of it,
To call her trouble out to dance and step it with a song.

Eh, but Sheila had the laugh the like of drink to weary ones,
(I've never heard the beat of it for all I've wandered wide.)
And out of all the girls I knew the tender ones—the dreary ones—
'Twas only Sheila of the laugh that broke her heart and died.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

Half the pages in the current Catholic Mind are filled with Father Reville's list of "Novels for Catholic Readers," a valuable compilation which has long been needed, and which is arousing wide interest. The other articles in the number are the Holy Father's latest utterances on peace, Archbishop Moeller's address on "The Catholic Layman's Duties" and Bishop Van de Ven's counsels on how to pass "Lent in War Time."

With the object of helping the Faithful to make permanent the results of missions preached in the parish, the Fathers of AMERICA's staff have written a series of practical instructions on the duties of the Catholic home. "Marriage and the Family" (America Press, $0.15) is a book of 124 pages containing fourteen well-written papers on such subjects as "Marriage," "Mixed Marriages," "Catholic Courtship," "Catholic Education," "The Home's Worst Enemy," "Catholic Mothers," "The Catholic Child," "Vocation," "The Catholic Safeguards," etc., and is packed with clear and workable counsels on how to make a success of married life, how to protect the Christian home from the perils that menace it nowadays, and how to keep the Catholic household as like as possible to Our Lady's home at Nazareth. "Marriage and the Family" is also an excellent book to give the graduates of our convent and parochial schools.

Little books for Lenten reading recently published by Kenedy are: "Jesus Crucified" ($1.00), a series of short meditations on "The Science of the Cross" which Father Grou, an eighteenth-century Jesuit, adapted and arranged from a work by Father Marie, S.J., who died in 1645; Lady Lovat has prepared from Father Nieremberg's well-known book on "The Glories of Divine Grace" sixteen meditations called "The Marvels of Divine Grace" ($0.90); Alice Dease has written ten edifying stories founded on incidents vouched for by workers "With the French Red Cross" ($0.60); and for little children an attractive series of "Stories from the New Testament" ($0.25) with good pictures in colors has been prepared.

"The Lost Naval Papers" (Dutton, $1.50), by Bennet Copplestone, will interest those who like detective stories. Around the personality of William Dawson, an ingenious Scotland Yard officer, are gathered a number of exciting adventures. The background of the book is the English Secret Service and the German spy system.——Helen Huntington's "Eastern Red" (Putnam, $1.50) is a cleverly written novel which leaves an unpleasant taste in the mouth. It is the story of two strikingly contrasted married women who rebel against conditions which old standards and long tradition have enforced. The solution each discovers for escaping from an intolerable kind of life is not one sanctioned by Christian ethics.——"The Finding of Norah" (Houghton Mifflin, $0.75) is the title of Eugenia Brooks Frothingham's little story of a Boston maiden who breaks off her engagement because her intended husband does not agree with her attitude toward the present war. The author actually believes that Mexico "is increasing order, eagerly educating her people, reclaiming her lands, organizing finance on a first-class basis," etc.!—— "The Major," "The Dwelling Place of Light," "Extricating Obadiah," "The U. P. Trail," "Christine," and "His Last Bow" were January's best sellers. "The U. P. Trail" is one of Zane Grey's lurid $1.50 dime-novels with the salacious sex-element added, and "His Last Bow" is a new Sherlock Holmes book by Conan Doyle. The others on the list have already been noticed in AMERICA.

Ernest Cobb's "Garden Steps" (Silver, Burdett, Boston, $0.60), which is described as a manual for the amateur in vegetable gardening, aims to encourage patriotic children to start a little truck garden this spring and raise things for the domestic table, thus leaving more of the country's food to send to the army. The author has had fifteen years of actual experience as a gardener, and in the book's twenty-five chapters he gives a wealth of clear and practical information about fertilizers, tools, ground preparation, etc., and then, beginning with asparagus and going down the alphabet to turnips, he tells the young gardeners how to raise successfully a score of vegetables. The book is full of pictures of smiling boys and girls working in gardens.

In his opening "Apology" for "Airs and Ballads" (Knopf, $1.00) John McClure calls himself a "poetaster" who would burn his "song-books This very day If singing didn't matter So little anyway." Most of his verses are in praise of fair ladies, but occasionally a deeper note is sounded. "The Lass of Galilee" however is so unpardonable a breach of good taste, to take no higher ground, that it is hardly atoned for by his "Carol Naïve," with stanzas in it like these:

I sing the Lady of all most fair,
Of all most dainty and debonair,
She to whose feet the angels come,—
Lady Mary of God's Kingdom!

I sing the Lady of all most good,
Immaculate Lady of Motherhood,
She that holdeth our hearts in fee,—
Lady Mary of God's City!

I sing the Lady of all most dear,
She that cherished us yesteryear,
She that will cherish when this world dies,—
Lady Mary of Paradise!

Prof. Henry Fairfield Osborne's "The Origin and Evolution of Life" (Scribner, $3.00) aims at establishing an energy-conception of evolution and of heredity. The main doctrine of the extreme evolutionists is assumed throughout. "The demonstration of evolution as a universal law of living nature is the great intellectual achievement of the nineteenth century. Evolution has outgrown the rank of a theory, for it has won a place beside Newton's law of gravitation," etc. This is startling enough, and disconcerting, too, when it is remembered that while many leading scientists believe in the doctrine, they are quite willing to admit that it has never been demonstrated. Again, speaking of the phenomena of adaptation, especially those manifested in the germ, we are told that "for these processes of development from within," Driesch has abandoned a natural explanation and assumed the existence of an entelechy, that is, an informal perfecting influence." Are we to hold, then, that Driesch's explanation cannot conceivably be a natural one, and must we forthwith, in this cavalierly manner, reject as a pure assumption his postulate of an entelechy? As for Professor Osborne's main object, to explain the origin and the development of living forms in terms of energy, his teaching bears a striking resemblance to the doctrine of energism. Matter, according to this doctrine, is only the union of several factors of energy. Energy, in short, is the only reality in the world. Professor Osborne's attempt to establish such a position is, it need hardly be added, foreordained to failure.

In view of the latest deplorable developments in Russia, Leon Trotzky's book on "The Bolsheviki and World Peace" (Boni & Liveright, $1.50), is melancholy reading. "The conditions upon which peace should be concluded," he writes, are, "No contributions. The right of every nation to self-determination. The United States of Europe—without monarchies, without standing armies, without ruling feudal castes, without secret diplomacy." But this visionary Socialist has now discovered that after his subversive doctrines ruined the morale of the Russian army, the Germans quietly marched in and made the Bolshevist terms ridiculous by scornfully violating every one of them.——Another book which shows a German and a Russian in quite another phase of their character is "The Willy-Nicky Correspondence" (Knopf, $1.00), which consists of sixty-five secret and intimate telegrams exchanged between the Kaiser and the Czar. Herman Bernstein, who edits the volume, assures the reader that these English dispatches, which were found in the archives at Tsarkoyo-Selo, are now faithfully reproduced. The telegrams were sent between the dates June 16, 1904, and August 2, 1907, are signed "Nicky" and "Willy," treat of family and diplomatic matters, and show what a strong influence the Kaiser exerted over the Czar.

Strange omissions follow the attempt to contain a continent's missionary history in "African Missionary Heroes and Heroines" (Macmillan, $1.25), by H. K. W. Kumm. The first seven centuries are confined to one chapter, eleven centuries intervening until "the days of modern Christian missions" receive no notice, while recent Protestant missionaries shape the substance of this "hero book." Africa knows countless heroes not mentioned by the author. Catholic missionaries there now can trace heroic fellow-workers in the Faith back through all the years without leaping eleven centuries. Readers who know the missionary as typified in St. Francis Xavier may wonder why "a modern missionary" was offered by the cannibals "a fine-looking woman as wife in exchange for a plump boatsman whom they wanted to eat." When another page announces that the missionary chose for his "second wife a West Indian and colored" pity may arise for the plump boatman, but appreciation increases for Catholic missionaries who are still pressing on in Africa armed with only a crucifix and quite unmindful of "hero books."

"An Elementary Course in Differential Equations" (Ginn, $0.72), by E. J. Maurus, of Notre Dame University, which is intended as an easy introduction, primarily for first- and second-year students of an engineering course, is an excellent book of its kind, well tried by previous use in the class-room before its introduction to the public. All the more important cases are briefly but very clearly explained, and each is followed by numerous problems, one or more of which are solved by way of illustration. ——R. Adelaide Witham has edited and annotated for use as a text-book Richard Doddridge Blackmore's famous Exmoor romance, "Lorna Doone" (Allyn & Bacon, $0.65), an excellent book to start young readers with. There is a well-written introduction containing interesting pages about "The Country of 'Lorna Doone,'" and "The 'Lorna Doone' Legend," a sketch of the author and some comments on the form and style of the story. At the end of the book are twenty-eight pages of critical and explanatory notes with numerous "suggestive questions." We wonder when the editors and publishers of text-books intended for general use will learn that Catholics object to being called "Romanists." According to Miss Witham, Blackmore's wife was a "Romanist."

EDUCATION

Missionary Work in the Schools

DOES it ever occur to our Catholic teachers in the grades what a fruitful missionary work they could perform in their geography classes, while locating Timbuctoo for their young charges, or dilating on the natural products of the Brazilian forests? One of the shining-bright and justly enviable achievements of the non-Catholic churches is their work for the foreign missions. They accomplish a great deal for the spread of their gospel in pagan lands, much more, comparatively, than do Catholics. It appears to be one of their specialties. They have a lively and an abiding interest in missionary work; they give unselfishly toward it; and they have the knack of engaging the minds of their little ones, with the result that much is accomplished for the good of their cause.

Interest the Children

HOW do they do it? One cannot say for sure just how they do it, without making an actual study of their methods; but on the face of it, the matter appears to be simple enough. All that they do, as far as an outsider can see, is to let the naturally romantic and picturesque appeal of the foreign missions work their own inevitable spell on youthful minds. That the story of far-away endeavors in strange lands and among pagan peoples, has both a romantic and a picturesque appeal cannot be denied. There is the flavor of adventure in it, of novelty and curiosity. When to these elements is added the urge of religious zeal, something is bound to result.

Why should we Catholics not attack the matter in the same manner, and awaken the interest of our youngsters in missionary work? And how better can this be done than through the medium of the schools? The surest way to get a family into sympathy with our foreign missions is to get the children of the family interested in them; and it is fairly safe to say that those children in whom a lively interest in the field afar is awakened today, will be the real supporters and backers of the missions of tomorrow. So, it would appear, the thing to do is to "catch the youngsters" of the present, and they will make the future secure.

The Heroes of Today

BUT where are we to catch the youngsters? Not in the pulpit, not at home. The schoolroom is the place; and the geography class presents itself as the place of all places! There we have the ear of the children, hearing the story of far-away countries and distant climes; and we have their eye on the map of heathen lands, the very mention of which stirs up thoughts of adventure and pirates, and all sorts and degrees of heroism and sacrifice. What richer moment than this could the teacher seize upon, to tell the deeds and martyrdom of those adventurers of the Cross, who have braved everything to carry the Faith to the savage and the benighted of jungle and island? Who, once knowing the dashing story of Francis Xavier and his high adventures, as he went buccaneering for Christ into the unknown Orient, can look at a map of China or Borneo, or any of the "kingdoms and dominions" of the Far East, without thought of him, and of his followers, who, to this very day, are facing danger, hunger, thirst, and death itself, in the same great cause?

How easy for the teacher with the pointer on Sitka or Archangel, to tell of Father Judge and the intrepid Jesuits and the equally brave Ursulines of Alaska, or, hearing the recitation of a lesson on the climate and products of Japan, to be reminded of the martyrs of that new Tyburn, where the seed of faith was planted and watered in blood, never to be wholly rooted up despite generations of persecution and hardship. And, these stories told, woven into the geography lesson of the day, what more simple than to illuminate them with an added word concerning the works of the missionary priests and Sisters of the present day, who, just as daringly and bravely as their predecessors, are working in those distant lands for the glory of our holy Faith? Away up in the Himalayas, there are nuns and convents and hospitals; on the coasts of Asia and in the heart of Africa; in the jungles of Mindinao, and in the hidden depths of China, beyond the boundaries that trade and commerce penetrate. Once we have thought of it, how can we ever pass over a map again without speaking some word for these unsung heroes and heroines?

Some Practical Work

IF our Catholic teachers in the grades would work a little foreign missionary flavor into their geography lessons, they would assuredly find the experiment fruitful of good. The children will be more interested than ever they were before, when they find that geography is a living thing of actual fact and real adventure, of living men and women, instead of mere dryasdust memorizing and recitation. The missionary spirit in the parish, radiating from the school, will be given a new stimulus. Moreover, there is another result that can be counted on: the fostering of vocations. "Where priests and Sisters have fostered this [missionary spirit] among children, vocations have multiplied in an unprecedented manner," says Father Donovan, in the St. Louis Western Watchman. "We have in mind," he writes, "a school in St. Louis where the children contribute liberally to the Holy Childhood Association to bring the Faith to the little ones afar off; during Lent they apply their spending money to baptismal offerings; they save enough stamps and tinfoil annually to pay the salary of a catechist; and what is more, they go to Communion in a body one Saturday a month for the conversion of the heathen, and individually almost every Saturday."

Father Donovan does not say whether the children of this particular school get any missionary lessons with their geography or not; but, if they do not, and that new incentive of interest in the work were added to their already eager spirit, it is easy wagering that they would soon surpass their own fine record in supporting the foreign missions. Any school, or any teacher, whose young charges are given this sort of geography, will quickly repay the effort.

The Charity Trust and the Institutions

THE famous "inquisition," to quote Justice Greenbaum, of the private charitable institutions receiving public moneys, is now a matter of history. At the time of these surreptitious and cursory examinations, few knew their meaning, comprehended their purpose, or realized the deep-laid plan they foreshadowed. Explanation, however, was made unnecessary when those in charge of the private homes were placed on trial, with John A. Kingsbury as chief prosecutor, aided and abetted by one Mr. Doherty. The guillotine had been set, the victim placed in the tumbril, the lord high executioner garbed himself in his official robes of death, and the stage was completely arranged, save for the almost unnecessary matter of the victim's trial. And that? Vulpes et agnus tells the story. But even a wolf may bite off too large a piece for proper mastication.

The "Investigation" and the Election

THE "trial" took place, but the ending of the story was not Aesopian. The real jury brought in its verdict on November 6, 1917. In the history of a municipality, there has never been so summary a vindication of truth and justice, nor so speedy and pronounced a punishment of unscrupulous falsifiers and detractors as that which followed the attempt of the reformers to gain control of our charitable institutions for the furtherance of their own purposes. The vote on Election Day was an overwhelming proof of what the people of New York thought of these people and of the means they used, despite the expenditure of a campaign fund of over $2,000,000 "to educate the people."

While the disgraceful proceedings were going on, it became apparent that the campaign was part of a great design whereby a certain group might obtain control of the institutions caring for dependent children. It would be giving too much credit to the then Commissioner of Charities, Mr. Kingsbury, and paying too great a compliment to his aid, Mr. Doherty, even to suppose that they were the prime movers in their "fight for better conditions." It was a master-move on the part of the Charity Trust to gain control of our institutions. The whole movement went deeper than a mere trial of one or two hospitals and homes. Its roots were nourished in the rich and poisoned soil of politics. It was an outward sign of the machinations that had been going on for the last five years to withdraw the institutions from our Sisters and Brothers and place them in the hands of "reformers," who have no use for anything God-like in the atmosphere of the children's lives.

The New Campaign

THERE are more ways of killing a bird than by calling it names, and having the neighbors do the unclean work. The Charity Trust realized this, and when its attempt to prejudice public opinion miscarried, it simply waited for a more opportune time, in which to employ other means. That time has come, they think, and the Trust again takes up its diligent work to accomplish that which it set out to do. Defeated in its attempt to control our charities by public assault and battery, it now tries other means, not quite so openly brutal, but far more effective. This time, the attempt is shorn of its spectacular features and is made quietly, and at a time when public attention is diverted to questions of war, and other matters not local. The wolf has left the unsympathetic city, and now prowls about the corridors of the State Capitol. The plan now adopted consists of two bills, prompted and introduced at the instance of the Charity Trust.

The first bill, Assembly No. 402, is a very simple measure, which would enact that "No payment shall be made by the city of New York to any charitable, eleemosynary or reformatory institution, wholly or partly under private control, for the care, support or maintenance of any child, except upon the certificate of the State Board of Charities that such child has been received and is retained by such institution, pursuant to the rules and regulations established by the Board." In other words, the present control that the City of New York exercises over those institutions, towards whose support it contributes, is eliminated and this great power is transferred to the State Board of Charities.

Mr. Strong's "Recommendations"

VERY simple and innocent, you say, but Bill No. 402 is followed by Assembly Bill No. 403. This is a bill that calls for special condemnation by every person who has the interests of our charitable institutions at heart, because by it is passed into the hands of the Charity Trust the last vestige of control over the institutions. If enacted, Catholic influence in the care and maintenance of dependent children will be eliminated. It provides that the State Board of Charities shall consist of nine members instead of twelve, as at present, and that of these nine one shall be designated president by the Governor, with a salary of $7,500 per annum. It is into his hands that the whole control of city and State charities is placed, and he is made an absolute autocrat, responsible to no one, except to the Governor. The Constitution of the State intended that the present Board be one of visitation and inspection. Under this bill, the Board would become largely administrative. Together with the bill that takes away from the Commissioner of Charities of New York City the payment of any money to charitable institutions, this legislation would centralize in one person control of the organization, maintenance and management of our institutions to such a degree that it would be in the powers of the State Board to dictate to the last detail what is to be done and taught in our institutions.

Danger to Our Institutions

THE Charity Trust attempted to do this very thing before by writing it into the proposed State Constitution, which failed of adoption so ignominiously a few years ago. The bill also provides for the placing out of dependent children, and foreshadows, if passed, the abolition of private institutions. Ultimately, the Board would refuse to certify to the placing of children in institutions and substitute the placing out of children in homes approved by them. It is very significant that Mr. Charles H. Strong, under whose direction the hearings in the famous "investigations" of the private institutions were held, in announcing the introduction of this legislation, hopes the attitude of the public mind has changed in the matter of reformation. But no Catholic who understands the purpose of the legislation, and the sinister design of those backing it, can remain inactive, thereby permitting the enactment of these bills. If a vigorous and well-waged fight is not conducted at once, to prevent this legislation, we shall wake up to find the charities that we love so well passed over into the hands of those who hate our Sisters, and the ideals for which they and the Catholic Church stand. We shall behold the spectacle of anti-Catholic and anti-religionists dictating what training our Catholic children shall have, and what our Sisters can and cannot do.

Mr. Strong, the Cato of the Charity Trust, is still singing his "Carthago delenda est." He seems to be in a fair way of having his ambition fulfilled, that is, if Catholics consent to play the part of Carthaginians.

NOTE AND COMMENT

Jewish Socialistic Zionism

"COMING events cast their shadows before," says the American Israelite, "and Jewry is being given a very broad hint as to what may be expected should Palestine be made a Jewish State." As an illustration it refers to the official organ of the Jewish Socialistic Workmen's Party, Paole Zion, Der Yiddisher Kaempfer. Its purpose is the foundation of a Jewish Socialist commonwealth in Palestine to be based upon principles very similar to those of the Bolsheviki. "Its attitude is precisely that of the extremist Russian radicals." Zionists who are not Socialists are decried by it as champions of a "capitalistic Zionism." All of which, the American Israelite observes, augurs very ill for the new Jewish commonwealth.

High Cost of Living and Wage Increases

ACCORDING to the first report of a committee of economics appointed by the Government to study the purchasing power of money in war times, wage increases of five, ten or twenty per cent are insignificant when compared with the increased cost of living. The committee says:

The living cost and the level of commodity prices in general are now, as we are all aware, extremely high. The average wholesale prices in the United States last month were 81 per cent above that of July, 1914; that is, the purchasing power of money over goods in the wholesale markets has been almost cut in half.

The rise in retail prices of foods in the same period has been 57 per cent. This means a reduction to less than two-thirds in the purchasing power of money over foods in the retail markets. Abroad the rise of prices has been even greater.

Between 1896 and 1914 wholesale prices in the United States were rising at the average rate of only one-fifth of 1 per cent per month; but even that small rate, long continued, was enough to make the "H. C. of L." a very painful fact.

The attention of citizens is called to the fact that the drawing of money from the banks to buy liberty loans tends to increase bank credits and so forces a still greater increase in commodity prices. This practice is therefore to be discouraged. Warnings to this effect had already been given by the Government.

Hotel-Church-Register Movement

THE CATHOLIC TRUTH SOCIETY of Canada has set itself the task of having a register of Catholic churches, indicating the hours of Mass, placed in the various hotels. "If the Gideons can induce hotel proprietors to put a Bible in every room, consistency requires consent for one or more registers." To secure the advantage of uniformity of design, so that the significance of the register can at once be understood by the traveler wherever he may find it, a special frame has been designed and is sold by the Society at a very moderate price.

Bishops and priests, whose attention has been called to this movement, very highly commend it for adoption, by each branch of every Catholic society. A further strong approval has been given by commercial travelers who have been consulted, and their experience is of a nature deserving consideration.

Catholic societies are asked to purchase and place one or more of these registers in each hotel within their district. In this way it is easily possible to have them inserted in the various hotels throughout the entire city.

The Writing Public

WE HAVE long been familiar with the "reading public." The latest discovery, made by an American essayist, is that as the result of our modern culture, however we may spell the word, there has now evolved a "writing public." While it did not call for a literary Columbus, says Lucian in the Rochester Post Express, to make this discovery, the phrase itself conveniently ear-marks a prevalent weakness of our day.

This is, it seems to me, one of the most astounding outgrowths of the nondescript culture of the twentieth century. Socialism is "in the air," and the demagogue, who spouts economic heresy at street corners, is confident that he can write a book in denunciation of capitalism. I have read a work by an atheistic laborer in which Christianity is violently attacked in execrable English. As for the novels produced by "young persons" some of them are so crude that one exclaims on stumbling across their ungrammatical sentences: "Ah would that the schoolmaster were abroad!"

Why, however, should I gibbet the godless workman who insists on having his godlessness incarnated in a book or the girl in her teens who depicts ungrammatically the amours of imaginary dukes or multimillionaires, and shop girls or servant-maids when among the popular novels of the day I see sad specimens of writing by authors who had never learned how to write? Why have Jack London's books sold by the thousands? Why is Marie Corelli a favorite with women? These writers did not in the true sense write. They either brutalized or idiotized the form of art which we call literature

We may add that the "brutalizing" and "idiotizing" of the readers themselves by corresponding standards of morality is the worst of all the outrages perpetrated in the new literature. Unfortunately, these evils are not restricted to the class of writers described. The violations of the canons of art are but a slight thing compared with the violations of the Commandments of God.

The Volunteer Press Censorship

IT IS the desire of the Government to correct a false impression in regard to press censorship. Certain specific requests are drawn up by it with respect to the concealment from the enemy of military policies, plans and movements. Yet there is no law behind these requests. "Their observance," explains the Committee on Public Information, "rests entirely upon honor and patriotism." It admits that there are violations, and that papers holding to the unwritten agreement have suffered injury from less careful or less honest publications, but on the whole the press has responded "in the same spirit of unselfish service that animates the firing line." When violations occur, papers that observe the agreement often demand that rebuke or penalty be inflicted. In answer to this the Committee calls attention to the express statement of the Government: "These requests go to the press without larger authority than the necessities of the war-making branches. Their enforcement is a matter for the press itself." The press therefore must enforce its own discipline. The Committee on Public Information, however, has little apprehension upon this score: "As it is realized that the requests of the Government are concerned with human lives and national hopes, as it is driven home that the passing satisfaction of a news item may endanger a transport or a troop train, the voluntary censorship grows in strength and certainty." Despite general opinion, the censorship of the press must therefore be largely of its own making and depends upon its own unselfish patriotism.

Capitalist Champions of Bolshevism

A SHORT time ago Mr. Schwab, president of the Bethlehem Steel Company, startled the entire country by a statement which was eagerly caught up and repeated with undisguised enthusiasm by the radical press of the land. The great steel magnate was reported as saying in an after-dinner speech delivered in New York:

The time is coming when the men of the working classes, the men without property, will control the destinies of this world of ours. It means that the Bolshevist sentiment must be taken into consideration, and in the very near future. We must look to the workers for a solution of the economic conditions now being considered.

What can be the meaning of this confusion of the legitimate labor movement with the bloodthirsty radicalism of the extreme Russian Socialists and their American kinsmen, the I. W. W.? Was Mr. Schwab so ill-informed that he could speak approvingly of the "Bolshevist sentiment" and confound it with the aspirations of American labor? To add to the mystery we find, according to the testimony of Mr. Ralph M. Easely, chairman of the executive committee of the National Civic Federation, a practical champion of Bolshevism appearing in the person of an equally prominent capitalist, Mr. William B. Thompson, one of the most astute business men of the country and president of the Inspiration Copper Company of Bisbee, Arizona. "Strange to say," adds Mr. Easely, "these two particular capitalists have been conspicuous and avowed enemies of the American Federation of Labor, the legitimate and sane organized labor movement of the United States . . . but by a dexterous somersault, they jump clear over and land in the midst of a crowd of anarchists and revolutionary Socialists." Then comparing the activities of Mr. Schwab with those of Mr. Thompson, he writes:

> The former contents himself with making after-dinner speeches in praise of the Bolshevist philosophy, while Mr. Thompson apparently has started in to assist Messrs. Lenine, Trotzky, Haywood, Berkman and Emma Goldman to "put over" Bolshevism throughout the world. Mr. Thompson is announced in the press as having contributed $1,000,000 towards helping the Lenine campaign in Russia. It has already been stated that he has contributed to the establishment of some 130 papers in that country.

It was in this manner he utilized the opportunities offered him as American Red Cross representative in Russia. What are we to think of it all?

The Maynooth Mission

FROM St. Columban's College, Shrule, in Galway, comes a new, bright, interesting mission journal, the Far East. It is the voice of the Maynooth mission to China, "the first purely Irish mission ever organized to heathen lands," linking the present with the great days of the past when Ireland "was really a torch to the peoples in darkness." In noble and memorable words the Most Rev. Dr. Cohalan, Bishop of Cork, introduces the new magazine and the great cause it represents, the conversion of a nation that includes one-fourth of mankind:

> The concept of an Irish mission to preach the Gospel in China, and the methodical and earnest preparation for the realization of the project, in the midst of a great war cataclysm, is an historical event of the first importance. And after all what is the conquest of a slice of territory, compared to the conquest of a nation to the Kingdom of Christ? What is the eradication of one political evil or another, be it called by its critics militarism, or navalism, or despotism, compared to the overthrow of paganism and the triumph of the Cross? We salute the soldiers of national freedom to whatever country they belong, but with greater reason should we salute the soldiers of the Cross, the band of young Irish priests who, imitating the example of the early Irish missionaries, are preparing to leave home and country in order to win the Chinese nation to the Kingdom of the Church.

China, as the editor rightly says, is stirring herself from her long sleep. She is opening her gates to the stranger and questioning the West for the knowledge it has to bring her. The pressing danger is that she too, like Japan, may be tempted to replace the old paganism for the new, "a more bitter lot even than when she knelt before her stupid gods of stone." Shall we let this nation be lost to Christianity at the present critical moment? There are excellent missionaries in the field today, but their numbers and their means need to be augmented. What then can be more hopeful than to hear the whole-hearted response: "Ireland is ready!" There are even now twenty priests, over twenty theological students from Maynooth, applications from 100 students, volunteers from the medical profession, "and of nuns, their name is legion." All these are eager for the great work, but most needed of all are the means to prepare the student volunteers. Priests and students have all been educated or are now being educated in Maynooth: There are "Young Irishmen," as the Bishop of Cork describes them, "who are sacrificing the most coveted positions or the brightest ecclesiastical prospects in Ireland to carry the light of faith to the Republic of China." Priests and people have already contributed £35,000 for the establishment of a missionary college. The subscription to the missionary magazine is one dollar a year.

"Who Started the Church of England?"

A BRIEF but very complete abstract of the entire history of the establishment of the Anglican Church is to be found in the Question Box of the St. Xavier Calendar. "Who started the Church of England?" asks a curious inquirer. To which the answer is very informally given: "Miss Anne Boleyn. It is quite certain that if that young lady had never lived, there would have been no Church of England." There is really nothing further to be said. Pope had merely phrased the same answer in another way when long ago he wrote of Henry that he first saw the gospel light in Anne Boleyn's eyes. Of Anthony's infatuation for Cleopatra Pascal remarked that had her nose been but a trifle longer the course of history would have been changed. So England might still be "Merry England" because Catholic England, had it not been for the attraction of Anne Boleyn and the passion of Henry.

Christ's Promise Regarding Prayer

IN HIS Lenten pastoral the Archbishop of Cincinnati offers a treatise on prayer which is particularly valuable at the present moment. He reminds the Faithful that Our Lord did not give an absolute, but a conditional promise in the words: "Amen, amen, I say to you, if you ask the Father anything in My name, He will give it you."

> When do we ask in His name, in the name of Jesus? In the first place when we ask for what is conducive to the end for which He came on earth. The very name of Jesus spells that purpose and end—freedom from sin and the opening again of the portals of Heaven. Hence the angel said to Joseph: "You shall call his name Jesus, for he shall save his people from their sins." Evidently Christ came to save us from eternal ruin. And we are asking in His name when we seek to obtain what will be conducive to our salvation. During the course of His public ministry He, on every available occasion, reminded His hearers of the object of His Divine mission embodied in the name of Jesus. "Seek first the kingdom of God." Again, "What does it profit a man, if he gain the whole world and suffer the loss of his soul?" From these and other passages of Sacred Scripture it is evident that we pray in the name of Jesus, when we ask for things that are conducive to our eternal welfare. When you prayed did you have this chiefly in view? Probably what you asked for was in reality a "stone," and your Heavenly Father, knowing this and desiring to give you "bread," refused your ill-advised request. It may be that what you longed for was in truth a "serpent," and God desiring to give you "fish," did not accede to your behest. In a word He did not give you what you desired, because that would have been detrimental to your salvation. Prayers of this nature are not sent up to Heaven in the name of Jesus.

From this we are not to infer that a prayer for temporal favors is not offered in the name of Jesus. Our Lord Himself conferred many temporal blessings. "Note, however, that He generally made these favors subservient to the spiritual welfare of the petitioners, thereby teaching us, that we may ask for earthly goods and temporal favors, provided they will be a means of promoting our salvation." Asking "in the name of Jesus" implies furthermore that we realize our own unworthiness to be heard and that our hope of obtaining our request rests solely on the merits of Our Saviour. Hence the invariable termination of the prayers of the Church: "Through Jesus Christ, Our Lord." It is particularly important to bear these thoughts in mind during the present stress of war. Whatever our prayers may or may not obtain in the temporal order, they will certainly achieve their main purpose—so far as its accomplishment depends on us—which is to bring the world nearer to God.

The War.—During the week the momentum of battle increased along the western front. In the Toul sector occupied by the American troops, where they hold about eight miles, the enemy raids were frequent and severe. In every case our troops behaved with a cool bravery which won the highest praise from the French officers and in several instances won for officers and men official rewards. Americans are also holding positions on the Lorraine and Alsace fronts, in Champagne, and on the Chemin des Dames. With men, material, and supplies moving forward to General Pershing in accordance with the prearranged schedule, the War Department has taken up the organization of our first field army. Until General Pershing has under command a complete field army, no further organization will be started. When completely organized this first American field army may be able to take over 100 miles of the French line. Censorship regulations prohibit the publication of the approximate date on which this event will occur. It is not probable that it will take place much before the end of the present year. Mr. Baker, Secretary of War, is on the American front on a tour of inspection.

Bulletin, Mar. 4, p.m.-Mar. 11, a.m.

The French and the British registered striking local successes against the enemy. The former made a heavy raid on the German trenches at Calonne east of the Meuse. In a surprise assault they drove into the enemy's line there to the depth of a third of a mile on a front of two-thirds of a mile and reached the German fourth line. They brought back 150 prisoners. British troops penetrated the German trenches north of Passchendaele, south of Hollebeke, east of Messines and near Warneton. What was probably one of the most stubborn fights of the week took place on the Ypres-Dixmude sector of the British front. A German attack on a front of over a mile compelled some of the British outposts to fall back on a front of about 500 yards. Marshal Haig reports, however, that the British regained the lost ground and pushed beyond the enemy's former positions. He reports also that at the same time the enemy's artillery showed considerable activity in the neighborhood of Flesquières, in the Givenchy, Neuve Chapelle and Armentières sections and east of Ypres. Bulletins from the Berlin War Office, from the front of Crown Prince Rupprecht announced the capture of some English and Belgian prisoners northeast of Festubert. According to General Allenby's dispatch British troops astride the Jerusalem-Nablus road in Palestine are making steady progress. Little opposition is encountered. On one day alone, March 7, the English advance was to a maximum depth of three miles on a frontage of eighteen miles. In Mesopotamia the British have occupied Hit, eighty miles west of Bagdad on the right bank of the Euphrates.

The question of the interference of Japan in Siberia has developed considerable differences of opinion between the United States and the various members of the Entente. The issue discloses a divergence of opinion between Mr. Wilson on the one hand, and Mr. Lloyd George and Mr. Clemenceau on the other. Military considerations urge the Allies to support the plan to defend Siberia and the supplies at Vladivostock and along the Trans-Siberian Railway against Germany. Political considerations impel Mr. Wilson to disapprove it. The Government of the United States is aware that intervention by any Power in Siberia would be looked upon by the Russian people as an infringement on their national integrity and liberties, and for that reason would be inadvisable. The Government has not formally assented to Japan's plan. Neither on the other hand has it formally dissented or protested. On the whole the Government is inclined to question the political wisdom and the military necessity of Japan entering Siberia without being invited by the Russians themselves. In government circles no open distrust of Japan has been officially manifested. It is rather the interests of Russia about which our officials are most concerned.

Siberia and Japan

In general, the opinion in the United States appears opposed to President Wilson's attitude which at present at least would leave Japan liberty of intervention, though the President would neither formally assent or dissent to the action. Among the papers which take this view are the Cleveland Plain Dealer, the Boston Transcript, the Baltimore American, the Indianapolis News, the New York Globe, the New York Times, the New York Tribune, the New York Herald, the Chicago Herald, the Chicago News, the St. Paul Pioneer Press, the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, the Portland Oregonian, the Providence Journal and the Atlanta Constitution. Arrayed against these are those papers which point to the "yellow peril" such as the New York American, the New York Journal; also the New York World, the Springfield Republican, and the New York Evening Post. The English press is divided on the advisability of Japanese action, the influential Manchester Guardian leading the opposition to the measure. In Paris the Petit Journal, the organ of the Foreign Minister, Mr. Pichon, is on the other hand one of the foremost advocates of Japanese intervention. The advocates of immediate intervention by Japan propound reasons of an almost purely military character. Aside from the matter of food stores and the safety of the Trans-Siberian Railway, Allied interests in general are said to need protection. French interests in China and British concern both over India and China are put forth as a pretext, together with Japan's own peculiar interests recently recognized by the United States in the Ishii treaty. Danger of German penetration in the East is another reason given. With regard to the latter danger, Lord Robert Cecil has made the following statement to the Associated Press:

> Look at what Germany has already done toward a scheme of world conquest! On the north she has taken rich Baltic provinces, over which she purposes to install a German prince. She has sent troops to Finland, and concluded an agreement which puts the whole foreign policy of Finland at her disposal. These steps in the north have practically cut off Russia from access to the sea.
> Looking further south we find that Germany is in the course of occupying Odessa, the greatest Black Sea port, and that she has insisted that Russia cede to Turkey all ports at the east end of the Black Sea. Her evident design is to substitute for the Berlin-to-Bagdad railroad a new avenue to the East by Transcaucasia and Northern Persia. In the execution of this design Germany, moreover, has had, consciously or unconsciously, the assistance and cooperation of the Bolsheviki.
> Look at the plight of Armenia! Both Great Britain and America have always taken a deep interest and sympathy in this unhappy people. Armenian refugees who fled into Transcaucasia are now, under the Russo-German treaty, to be handed back to the Turks.
> You have only to look at the map to see what a tremendous scheme of conquest Germany has undertaken. Having been thwarted in her plan to conquer France, this is the second string to her bow, and for the moment the whole German people seems to be backing the new imperialistic scheme.
> The military control of Germany is paramount and unshaken. German democracy is docile and servile. The Allies must adopt every means in their power to frustrate Germany's designs in the East.

It is also urged that a Japanese army in Siberia would compel Germany to maintain strong forces on the Eastern front, while Russia is now so far gone that Allied troops in her territories would help towards her reintegration after the war.

Those who approve President's Wilson's policy of "aloofness" base their reasons on Russia. They maintain that it is not the fate of the stores at Vladivostok or the grain of Siberia which is at issue but the credit of the cause and the whole moral position of the Allies. They ask their opponents with what consistency the Allies can lend themselves to an assault on one part of the Russian Empire at the time when the Germans are engaged in a similar assault on another part? A new international question has evidently developed from the Russo-Japanese situation. Many serious-minded statesmen both in the United States and abroad believe that if once Japan gets into Siberia, she will stay there and that her advance is likely to be another example "of the annexationist imperialism which many democrats hoped would be discouraged by the political results of the war."

The Russian Debacle

The Russian debacle expands the German dreams of conquest in the East beyond Germany's most sanguine hopes. With the advance of the German armies peace, food and unlimited supplies are brought within the grasp of the German people. Petrograd is cut off, German troops advance to Jamburg, to within sixty miles of the capital, Kiev falls, and the seat of government is moved to Moscow. In addition to the humiliating terms thrust upon the Bolshevist Government in accordance with which, besides the territories ceded to Germany, Turkey gets the region of Karabad, Kars and Batoum, bordering on Persia and the Black Sea, Germany on March 4 signed a treaty with Finland. By this treaty, Finland is placed under the material, political, and moral tutelage of Germany. The German policy is not of a nature to calm Sweden's uneasiness, especially in the face of a rumor that one of the Kaiser's sons was to be placed upon the throne of Finland, a rumor so far unconfirmed. The intervention in Finland, the occupation by German troops of the Aland Islands, the attitude taken towards Norway and Denmark, all seem to belong to a plan carefully worked out, to make the Baltic a German lake and to establish German domination over Scandinavia.

The humiliating collapse of Russia before the German arms and the German diplomacy led to what seems to portend grave events. By March 9 a serious movement to overthrow the Bolshevist Government and presumably to repudiate the peace agreement with the Central Powers, was reported in several dispatches reaching London. Almost simultaneously came the confirmation of an earlier rumor that Leon Trotzky, the Bolshevist Commissioner of Foreign Affairs, had resigned his post. According to dispatches from Irkutsk, in Siberia, printed in the Petrograd Pravda, organ of the Bolsheviki, Prince Lvoff, the ex-President of the Council of Ministers of Russia, had constituted in the Far East a new Russian Government with its temporary seat at Peking and was awaiting the landing of Japanese troops at Vladivostok to enter Siberian territory with them. Other dispatches suggest the recrudescence of the original idea of starting a counter-revolution in Southern Russia with the Don Cossacks as the basis of a great army. Rumania was forced to sign what she considera disastrous and dishonorably inflicted peace. By it she oses her seacoast and the Dobrudja as far as the Danube. She is also forced to permit the passage of German troops hrough her territory to Odessa.

Under date of March 9, the New York Evening Post ublished six secret diplomatic documents from the files of the Russian Foreign Office, revealed by the Bolshevist Government. The first three, the Post says in its foreword to the text of the documents, are dispatches from the Russian Ambassador at Tokio, Japan, October 16 and 22, and November 1, 1917, and are of especial nterest to the United States. The first deals with the question of the sale of Japanese arms to China. The next two, according to the summary of the New York paper, gives the Ambassador's understanding of the Japanese attitude towards the Lansing-Ishii agreement and relates a conversation with Viscount Motono, Minister of Foreign Affairs, explaining the Viscount's views as to the likelihood of any misunderstanding arising because of different interpretation by Japan and the United States of the meaning of the terms " special position " and " special interests " of Japan and China.

More Secret Treaties

The fourth document is a secret telegram from Terestchenko, Russian Minister of Foreign Affairs, to the Ambassadors in Paris, Washington, London, Tokio, and Stockholm, concerning the internal situation of Russia after the loss of Riga. It is important, adds the Post, because it emphasizes the intention of the Kerensky Government to continue the war at any cost and with every means available. The fifth document is a secret telegram to the Russian Ambassadors in European capitals, instructing them to refuse to deliver messages from the members of the Soldiers' and Workers' Soviet sent to Petrograd. In the last document, the Russian Government instructs the Ambassador at Madrid, in the event that the King of Spain offered intervention in the war, to decline the offer.

Belgium.—The efforts of General von Falkenhausen to separate Flanders from the rest of Belgium are meeting with strong opposition from the Belgian people. The arrest and deportation of the judges of the Court of Appeals, with the exception of Judge Jamar, who was arrested but released on account of illness, are officially announced in a dispatch to the Belgian legation. The Court of Appeals incurred the displeasure of the German authorities by instituting proceedings against the few Belgian activists who were working with the German Government for the separation of the Flemish and Walloon portions of Belgium. The Court of Cassation, which suspended its sittings as a protest against the arrest and deportation, has been warned by the German Military Governor that its action is regarded as hostile to the German Government. All judiciary activity has been voluntarily suspended. Protests are being sent to Havre by communal councils and influential citizens, but Germany is still acting with a strong hand. The Bishops have been prevented from meeting to discuss the situation but have protested individually. The Free University of Brussels, in a protest signed by all the members of the faculty, characterizes the situation as follows:

Belgians Resist German Intrigue

> The German authorities, overwhelmed by the patriotic outburst, have officially forbidden all deliberation or discussion in regard to questions of general policies such as the autonomy of Flanders, and have also forbidden discussion in regard to petitions of protest to the German authorities. Every one who disregards this new German order is menaced with severe punishment in accordance with martial law.

Cardinal Mercier, in a pastoral letter read in all the churches of his diocese, states that " the hearts of the Flemings beat in unison with his own in their desire to maintain Belgium as forever one and indivisible." and he begs his people " to put their trust in their Cardinal and Bishops until such time as they can meet to consider the best interests of the Flemish people, the mother country and the Church." All the Bishops have denounced the immoral action of the tools of Germany who are striving to divide the kingdom.

According to press dispatches, a meeting of the representatives of 110,000 Belgian workmen, members of the Free Christian Labor Union of Belgium, was held at Havre recently, during which expression was given to the workingmen's views, a thing impossible in Belgium.

Resolutions of Belgian Workmen

> Resolutions were adopted pronouncing the present war a war of nations rather than a war of classes and protesting against the assumption of diplomatic roles by Socialist groups and against any step or resolution calculated to trouble the minds of the Belgian workmen, and also reproving any idea of contact with labor organizations in enemy countries. The resolutions further declare that mediation by a neutral power, when the occasion arises, would be preferable to any initiative taken by unqualified persons. They suggest that when the proper time does come recourse to the mediation of the Holy See would be indicated as the best course.

The last suggestion has an added significance from the fact that H. Heyman of France, E. Van Queele of Holland, and J. Roscan of England, respectively President, Vice-President and Secretary of the International Christian Union, also participated in the meeting.

Ireland.—On Wednesday, March 6, Mr. John E. Redmond, leader of the Irish Nationalists in the House of Commons, died in London, of heart failure, following a recent operation for intestinal trouble. Born in 1851 in Ballytrent, Ireland, he was educated at Clongowes Wood and Trinity and was admitted as barrister at Gray's Inn in 1886, later, in 1887, becoming an Irish barrister. He was elected to Parliament to represent New Ross in 1881; from 1885 to 1891 he represented North Wexford; in the last-named year he was elected from Waterford. In 1891 he became the leader of the Parnellites and nine years later he brought about the union of the two leading Nationalist parties. Mr. Redmond visited the United States twice, once ten years ago and again two years later. His death called forth tributes from many prominent people, even from his bitterest political foes. Lloyd George declared that the House was profoundly shocked by the unexpected news of the death of one of the oldest, most respected and eminent members. Mr. Redmond, the Premier said, had been a member of the House for thirty-seven years and during that period, had grown in the esteem, admiration and affection of the members of all parties. Continuing Lloyd George declared:

That is a great thing to say of any member, but it is the greatest thing to say of a man who was engaged in one of the fiercest controversies of our time. There may be a difference of opinion as to the policy for which he stood and fought, but there is absolutely no difference of opinion as to the ability, judgment, dignity and honor which he devoted to that policy.

To this Mr. Asquith added:

We in this House, even those who differed most acutely and deeply from him, agree without reserve or qualification that he was a great parliamentarian and a true patriot. The House of Commons, Ireland, Great Britain, the whole Empire, is impoverished by his death.

Sir Edward Carson spoke as follows:

I have known Mr. Redmond for thirty-five years and I can say with absolute sincerity that during the whole of that time I cannot recollect that one bitter or personal word ever passed between John Redmond and myself. During the conferences on the Irish question at Buckingham Palace just before the outbreak of the war Mr. Redmond said to me: "For the sake of the old days on the Leinster circuit let's have a good handshake."

After the rebellion of 1916 I had several conversations with John Redmond. Indeed, we were not very far apart in our attempts at a settlement of the Irish question. I remember him saying to me: "Unless we can settle this interminable business you and I will be dead before anything is done to pacify Ireland." He was a great Irishman and an honorable opponent, and as such I mourn his loss.

Lt.-Colonel Sir James Craig, Carson's chief supporter in and out of Parliament, paid this tribute:

With profound sorrow I have learned of the death of Mr. Redmond. Throughout my parliamentary career he has been the leader of the Nationalists, and consequently I have always differed with him politically. But on rare occasions, when brought into closer touch with him, I was captivated by his charm of manner. I never shall forget the generous tributes he paid to the gallantry of the Ulster division or the cordial letter of sympathy he wrote me when my brother was wounded and taken prisoner.

He lived a strenuous life, always for Ireland, and what he believed to be her welfare. He probably had the most difficult task of any party leader in the House of Commons, especially during the last seven or eight years.

His death undoubtedly was hastened by the state of affairs in Ireland, and all we, his colleagues, can say is that a great Irishman has passed away. God rest his soul.

On hearing of Mr. Redmond's death the Convention adjourned for two hours and later passed this resolution:

Throughout the proceedings of the Convention, his wise counsel was an invaluable aid for our guidance. He regarded the work of the Convention and its outcome as fraught with the most vital interests of the Irish people and the whole Empire.

The London papers also were sympathetic in their remarks. The Westminster Gazette remarked:

There is peculiar irony in the stroke of fate which so often removes a political leader just when his life work is on the eve of accomplishment. He bears the burden and heat of the day, and others reap the reward. So we feel of Mr. John Redmond.

The Pall Mall Gazette regards the death of Mr. Redmond as a loss to the Empire and adds:

It should bring an admonition to all Irishmen of the part which rests upon themselves to play in shaping their country's welfare. Mr. Redmond brought the fulfilment of all its legitimate ambitions so near that only grave lack of responsible qualities of true democracy can betray the promise of success.

In their Lenten pastoral letters the Irish Bishops protest against the misrepresentations of the Pope, so common during these troublous days; they also object very strongly to the infamous clause XV in the secret treaty, by which his Holiness was to be excluded from all peace movements. Cardinal Logue points out that "the secret pact into which the Allied statesmen entered 'at the suggestion of wretched Italian politicans' was followed by retribution inasmuch as their own proposals for peace ran on the lines of the Pope's suggestions." The Rt. Rev. Dr. McKenna, Bishop of Clogher, writes:

The Bishops and the Pope

The champions of justice and liberty had . . . bound themselves by secret treaty to support Italy in opposing any and every diplomatic step on the part of the representatives of the Holy See for the conclusion of peace, or in regard to questions arising out of the present war.

Then the Pope's aim and motives were misrepresented, his impartiality was impugned, and worst of all, one of the signatories to the secret compact treated him with insult not so unlike that with which Our Divine Lord, whose Vicar on earth he is, was treated at the court of Herod. The English Government, with a profession of respect and friendship on its lips, was guilty of the outrage of mocking him by sending an ambassador to his Court, while all the time they were bound by secret treaty not to listen to his voice nor allow it to be heard in the counsels of Europe. Whatever flickering confidence in the sincerity of the lofty and autruistic professions of the Allies still lingered on in a not too credulous world, was suddenly extinguished by the revelation of this astounding duplicity.

Fortunately for the world Papal power and influence are not dependent on the goodwill of England or her Allies, and so notwithstanding secret compacts, misrepresentation and insult, the Holy Father's appeal for peace was listened to with profound reverence and respect in every land, and his faithful children everywhere are ready to work and pray for him for the realization of his nobler ideal, to bring back among men the power of the charity of Christ. It is the great need of the world today.

The Rt. Rev. Dr. McHugh, Bishop of Derry, reminds bitter assailants of his Holiness that attacks on him produce a feeling of disgust in the breasts of millions, while Bishop Browne of Cloyne declares that though the hope of saving the world is in God, yet the Pope's efforts to bring about peace have been received with scant courtesy by some of the most important of the warring nations.

The President and the Constitution

ARTHUR J. DE LORIMIER

THE expression, "the Constitution of the United States has become a scrap of paper," is somewhat common. The words are usually uttered, ot in resentment, nor as a criticism, but rather as the atement of a sad fact. The underlying sentiment is that ur Constitution, having proved itself inadequate under ress of extraordinary events, had to be, for the time be- g, pigeon-holed.

But is it true that the Constitution has become a scrap of paper"? There is no doubt that the balance of ower has shifted, so that the President has acquired a emendous, though indefinite, increase of power over hat he possessed in peace times, and that Congress is, practice, little better than an advisory assembly.

For a considerable period after the United States de- ared war against Germany, most Americans failed to ealize that we were no longer living under the free, easy-going," representative democracy that we had een used to in more happy days. Our failure to realize is fundamental change immediately, is probably at- ibutable to the fact that there was an apparent, inter- ening period of transition, although in strict reality, the hange was automatic and instantaneous.

On April 6, 1917, the existence of a state of war with ermany was declared. The consequent intense excite- ent kept us from appreciating that the initiative of the resident was daily gaining momentum. Internal war easures became frequent, and these war measures al- ays emanated, mediately or immediately, from the White ouse. Congress, in the abstract, began to resemble a ell-oiled machine, controlled directly by levers, situated the presidential mansion. In a short time, the participa- on of the United States in the war became an accepted eality in our lives, and we endeavored to settle down to the old grooves. Then came the feeling that things ere changed. We who were so little used to coming in ontact with the machinery of government, felt and saw ie strong arm of the State daily reaching out further in very direction. It was ever the arm of the President. Ve began to realize that the powers of government ormerly so nicely balanced, had shifted, so that the resident loomed up with, seemingly, all power, and Con- ress was reduced to something akin to an advisory body.

Was the spirit of freedom and democracy violently de- roned in our own land at the very instant when we udly extolled its merits? Was not the Constitution, the nbodiment of this generous spirit of freedom and emocracy, violated both in letter and spirit?

These questions, formulated in jealous fear and foreboding, forced the conclusion, in a calmer mood, that since the paramount consideration was the successful prosecution of the war, and since this depended in great part on unity and celerity of thought and action, great power must be centralized in the President, the Constitution to the contrary notwithstanding. Thus many jumped to the conclusion that the centralization of so much power in the President was inconsistent with the letter and spirit of the Constitution, and that therefore the Constitution had proved itself inadequate.

This conclusion is drawn from a misconception of the constitutional powers of the President. Article II, section 2 of the Constitution reads: "The President shall be commander-in-chief of the army and navy of the United States and of the militia of the several States, when called into actual service of the United States." Here we find that, by the words of the Constitution, the moment Congress has declared that a state of war exists between the United States and another nation, the President is invested with an immense increment of power. But is not the President commander-in-chief of the army and navy in peace as well as in war? Yes; but in peace times this power is in abeyance. It is simply a potential power which can become actual, only when the United States has declared that a state of war exists between herself and another country. Moreover, this potential power is checked by the fact that the President, of his own initiative, cannot transform it into actual power. That is only saying that the President has not the power to declare war. This power rests with Congress. Nor can the President take it upon himself to enter into disputes with other nations, and by this means lead the country to a point where Congress must, perforce, declare war. Neither can he decide whether or not a certain act of a foreign power is a casus belli, for this is a power vested in Congress. Therefore, in strict reality, the powers of commander-in-chief of the army and navy become actual powers the moment war is declared, and not before. Now if to the powers already inherent in the President as chief executive, the further powers of commander-in-chief of the army and navy be added, it is clear that a real, yet constitutional change, has taken place. The Constitution does not enumerate the powers of the commander-in-chief of the army and navy; but it is a fact, borne out by the testimony of history, that these are so extensive that it is practically impossible to say where the power of the executive begins and where it ends.

It is true that Congress still sits, and that Congress still goes through the form of initiating laws. But it is apparent that Congress, in all matters that pertain, even remotely, to the prosecution of the war, follows the dictation or direction of the President. It may be urged that this does not denote an increase of power in the President, but simply evidences a desire on the part of Congress to work in harmony with the chief executive. This may sometimes be the case, but I think it more rightly denotes acceptance and confirmation by Congress, of the proposition that the President, in all questions relating to the conduct of the war, is paramount. This will be clear, if we suppose that Congress should decline to pass the war measures which the President proposes, and attempt to legislate against his wishes. The President could, of course, use his veto power in the first instance, and if Congress persisted in an endeavor to legislate over his head, he could under the Constitution, refuse to execute the demands of Congress on the ground that its action, since it infringed on his prerogative as commander-in-chief, was null and void. Congress may clothe its ideas in the garb of law, but the President alone has the power to execute the laws, and make them more than empty words. Of course, there is a restriction on him, but we may say, in general terms, that the Constitution, in making him responsible for the conduct of the war, gives him the means and power to initiate and execute any measures, that may reasonably be said to have a direct tendency to promote the successful conclusion of the war.

We may be sure that the statesmen who created our Constitution foresaw the necessary result of thus creating the chief executive, commander-in-chief of the army and navy. We may be sure they realized that this action would result in the shifting and centralization of power and that they knew what benefits would be derived from this change, as well as the dangers which might follow. Living in an age of searching inquiry into the science of government, an age, also, of great internal and international discord and strife, they had studied deeply the various forms of government. They knew that the strongest form of government, in face of danger from without, was an autocracy; but they realized too that its inevitable tendencies were despotic and tyrannical. They knew that the form of government, weakest in the face of outside perils, was a pure democracy, by reason of its lack of unity. But they held that a pure democracy was the safest custodian of the liberty and happiness of the people.

The result of their deliberations was not exactly a Constitution constructed upon a compromise theory, but rather a Constitution comprising within itself two forms of government, unblended and distinct. It is just this peculiar combination in our great Constitution that is its glory. To this is due its strength to survive in this time of upheaval as proudly as in the days of international peace and tranquility. In times of peace, the Constitution prescribes a liberal representative form of government, with the powers distributed, nicely balanced and checked, thus insuring a maximum of internal, personal liberty and happiness. But in the hour of turmoil and national jeopardy, it daringly shifts these powers, and instantly transforms a representative democracy into a strong, temporary autocracy, with practically all power vested in the President.

The Mission of the Celt in America

EDWIN RYAN, D.D.

A SHORT time since the people of Limerick were celebrating the feast of St. Ita, with a special Mass and Office granted to the diocese by Pope Pius IX. It would be well if we of Irish blood in America could keep the day, too. Her life would be a valuable lesson to us, for even among Irish saints she is conspicuous as an expression of what we may call that seer-like quality in the national temperament, a trait which is one of the most striking and most valuable characteristics of the Irish soul. A born contemplative and mystic, she exhibits that facility of apprehension in respect to spiritual things which led the Irish not merely to absorb Christianity but to absorb it so thoroughly as to turn nearly the whole island into a monastery. Sad would it be were her American cousins to forfeit this, as the price of worldly prosperity. We are hearing much at the present time about the rights of small nations; let us not forget the duties of small nations. And if we were to ask the lovely Patroness of Limerick what is the duty of that particular small nation to which she and we belong, I feel she would tell us that in a materialistic age and country we are set up by God to be above others witnesses to the unseen.

For, whatever the "purely scientific" historian may think about it, the Catholic can never get away from the providential view of history. To the eye of faith there is a good and gracious purpose working in all things, and while this purpose may be now obscure, now thwarted, it is in the long run clearly perceptible. St. Paul recognizing the Divinely-appointed function of Greece as laying the intellectual and the esthetic foundation for the Gospel, St. Augustine sweeping the horizon of the "Civitas Dei" in Rome's declining days and tracing the hand f God in the vicissitudes of man, Bossuet in his "Dis-ourse on Universal History," have committed them-elves and us to the conception of a celestial plan per-neating the record of human activity. Without the In-arnation as its central fact the wondrous tale is naught ut "the labor of ants in the gleam of a million million f suns": the Verbum Caro Factum gathers up the hreads of history and of them weaves the vesture of God.

To trace this plan is no mere academic exercise or ious luxury. A people has its vocation as an individual as. And it can easily happen that the individual soul ails to achieve completely its own destiny through losing ight of the larger rôle of the race. When the Greek no onger seeks after knowledge he not only impedes the Divine plan in general but jeopardizes his personal salva-ion as well. When the Roman weakens his grasp on law nd organization and discipline he will not easily find nother sphere in which to develop his energies. Nor-nally, the separation of the personal from the corporate estiny can work only harm; and if the Irish in America ave not fulfilled all their promise as a race of true dealists, if they must plead guilty in any measure to the ndictment Dr. O'Malley brought against them in the ages of AMERICA last year, it can only be because they ave suffered the glamor of material success to blind their yes to the finer and more delicate glory that is sure to e theirs if they but remain true to themselves.

Perhaps a moment's reflection on the unique character nd circumstances of St. Patrick's mission will help us o see all implied in this. Before his day there had been o instance in Western Europe of the extension of Chris-anity to a people not previously Romanized. Newman's appy dictum that "the Graeco-Roman civilization was he soil in which Christianity grew up" must, in the case f Ireland, admit of an exception which seems provi-ential. The nearest parallel to it is the conversion of he fourth-century Goths; but the Goths became Arians, nd their true conversion was delayed until they had allen under the still potent influence of imperial Rome. n Ireland Christianity was superimposed immediately on he native civilization without the usually intermediate ayer of Roman organization. Ireland's conversion was fusion of two elements, not of three, as was the con-ersion of other Western peoples up to that time. Conse-uently the type of Catholicism, if we may use the phrase, as different, the native genius expressing itself far ore strongly than among other non-Roman races. The ot and the significance of the difference between Celtic hristianity and the Christianity of Saxon Britain and he Continent, a difference so over-worked by a certain chool of Anglican historians, are to be sought in the imple fact that Ireland had never been brought under he military sway of Rome. Her religion was from the Eternal City, her culture was from herself.

Now it calls for no particularly deep or lengthy ac-uaintance with that culture to perceive that one of its most striking elements is an unusual, some would say un-canny, faculty for realizing the unseen. Fairy tale, legend and myth are, of course, not the exclusive property of any one race, but some races appear to possess a pen-chant for this sort of thing, and none more so than the Celts. Their attitude toward the invisible world is almost startling in its matter-of-fact realism; Christianity has but changed its objective. In place of the Banshee, the Leprechaun and the "Good People" the converted Irish-man put Our Lord and the Blessed Virgin and the Saints. We may go so far as to say that he has really only added these to his already extensive list of spiritual ac-quaintances, many a story told today on the "Old Sod" being in reality a sort of baptized version of a folk-tale that was ancient before St. Patrick was born. But whatever of latent paganism lingers in the stories of present-day Kerry or Donegal is but a witness, innocent enough, to that tenacity with which the Celtic mind, having once grasped the preternatural or the supernatural, will never let it go.

It is this tenacity, sanctified by grace, that has given to Ireland the unique and transcendent honor of being the only nation in Northern Europe that held out at the Reformation. Everything possible was done to make her Protestant, but the attempt has failed because it rested ultimately on the offer of material advantage in exchange for Heaven, the bartering of the eternal and unseen for the glory that passeth away. The Celt spurned the bar-gain and never for a moment doubted that even from a purely practical and common-sense point of view he was right. To him the next world is not a mere theory or speculation on which he might be willing to run a risk: it is a fact. He did not only imagine Christ and His Mother: he knew Them, he had a personal acquaintance with Them. And the thought of displeasing them and thereby not enjoying their company in the life beyond was as abhorrent to him as to be separated from his wife and children. Nay, it was more abhorrent, for when necessary he could and did part with all he loved on earth for the sake of a higher love, his inborn faculty for en-tering into and realizing the truths that transcend reason having fitted him to accept in its full application the Divine lesson "What doth it profit a man to gain the whole world and lose his soul?"

Has this power been weakened by contact with Ameri-can life? Is the transplanted Celt less alive to the invisible than his forefathers? If so it would be one of the su-preme tragedies of human history. For never has there been so great a need in our land today as that of a wit-ness to the unseen, and dreadful in sooth would it be if at the very time and place in which he could most ef-fectively fill this rôle the Celt should fail. The whole trend of American life is away from that region in which the mystic Celt is most at home. I am not referring now to the pursuit of luxury and material greatness. That is not a characteristically American weakness, but a trait of human nature the world over, only America happens to have more temptations that way. What lies at the root of the evils parading themselves among us is that so-called "practical" attitude, a sort of neo-Pelagianism, that exalts human reason and natural powers above the grace of God. Our non-religious schools, our naturalistic ethics, our hyper-reverence for natural virtue, what are these but an attempt to obtain the results of religion without going to the trouble of being religious? If a child misbehaves in school we are told not that he ought to have better home training or a more religious environment, but that he must be sent to the doctor and have an operation for adenoids! Put everything on a natural basis, say nothing about God and the next life or free-will or moral obligation, but ascribe evil exclusively to physical causes, treat crime as a disease, abolish all thought of sin, and if there be a God seek him in man. Analyze this and you will find it is only the old error condemned by Rome fifteen centuries ago, that taught the possibility of salvation without the grace of God. Now it is a striking fact, not at all sufficiently insisted on, that the entrance of Ireland on the stage of Christian history was in protest against that very thing. Palladius, the precursor of Patrick, was sent to Ireland, not to convert pagans to Christianity, but to bring back heretics to orthodoxy. "Ad Scotos in Christo credentes" was his commission. It would seem that at the very outset there was an attempt of Satan to divert to naturalism the very race that God emphatically destined to be the champion of supernaturalism. We know little about these pre-Patrician Irish Christians, but we know a great deal about their descendants, and on every page of their history is written the noble record of how through centuries of horrible persecution they abundantly atoned for the momentary lapse in the early fifth century that brought Papal missioners hurrying to their shores. Amid the murk of selfishness they have kept burning the flame of idealism, and should we, their children in America, suffer the torch to go out we shall be renegade to as sacred a trust as was ever given to a Christian people.

God keep us faithful! As long as men are liable to the bewitchery of trifles, so long will God need loyal souls to stand boldly before the world and point out the folly of attempting to build on any other foundation than Christ. He needs them here and now. Our work as brethren of St. Ita lies ready to hand, for no country requires more the lesson of the supernatural than our own. She possesses an abundant supply of representatives of that race which is of all races the best fitted to impart it. Are they imparting it? What would be St. Ita's judgment on those Irish Catholics who foolishly ape the manners and echo the sentiments of a pagan society into which they yearn for an entrée? If wealth and high station are going to weaken Irish idealism it would be better for all, Irish and non-Irish, that we should jettison every material advantage that immigration has brought us. For if the prophet lose the vision who will declare it to the people?

A Plea for the Contemplative Life

THE ABBOT OF CALDEY

IT is very difficult for most people, and even for some educated Catholics, to believe that the contemplative life has any real or necessary place in the ministry and organization of the Church. Those who are working amid the feverish activity of modern life, sometimes cannot see the wood for the trees; and show themselves to be totally unfamiliar with the causes that govern the existence of such vocations as those of the Carthusian, Cistercian and Benedictine Orders.

In these days the vocation to the purely contemplative life fails to attract and convince, at a time when it is more than ever needed, just because the true aspect of it has been lost in the progress and bustle of workaday life. If men think of it at all, it is rather as the refuge of the melancholy and incompetent who, failing to find a place in the strenuous life of the world, drift into the cloister to make sure at least of personal sanctification. Cloistered contemplation is regarded as selfish luxury worthy of blame rather than praise, in the face of all that has to be done when evils of every kind are ranged against the Church, demanding all the living force of Catholicism to meet and defeat them. It is this habit of setting action against contemplation that is wrong to start with. As a matter of fact, the contemplative life is truly one of action; but it is activity towards God rather than as directly exercised for the good of men: and it is necessary to insist that the contemplative life is essentially a part of the normal life of the Church, not an idle and isolated existence of religious eccentrics.

The Catholic Church is the Mystical Body of Christ; and in her ministry and organization she reproduces all the aspects of His mortal life, in order that He who is with us in His Church "all days, even to the consummation of the world" may continue to show forth the example of His holiness, and the miraculous power of His love.

In His human life Our Blessed Lord devoted thirty years to silence, prayer and hidden work; and at most three years were consecrated to public ministrations. Even during this short period we read that He often went apart from His disciples to be alone and pray. In His sacramental life in the Holy Eucharist, upon our altars, He is with us as the Great Contemplative, hidden, silent yet full of activity, bringing God to man with the strong energy of His love, and kindling in man the desire and determination to reach out to God.

It is thus in the following of Christ that the contemplative Orders have the sure and only reasons for their existence. They do not belong to the Hierarchy of the Church, but they are an integral part of her constitution and essence, for they help to show forth the complete life of Christ to the world, and the will of her Founder has assigned to them an incontestable mission.

In the first ages of the great persecutions in the Church, the lives of the contemplatives were hidden in the conflicts of the Martyrs; and effaced by the visible representation of the Sacrifice of Calvary, in the suffering of the individual members of Christ's Mystical Body. But when the days of persecution were over a new kind of martyr arose who offered his life, not in the bloody conflict of the arena, but in the lauras of Egypt and Palestine, in the monasteries of Greece, and later, in those of Western Europe. He offered his life not only to fulfil the Passion and the Sacrifice of Christ on Golgotha, but also to live over again the silent, solitary years at Nazareth. For many centuries all exterior work was forbidden to the monk. It was realized that nothing was needed to supplement the value of his penance, and the power of his prayers. Even a superficial study of monasticism shows one that, as a general rule, any departure from the first fervor of observance was usually the result of devotion to external work and the consequent neglect of cloister and interior life. Roughly speaking, from the sixth to the eleventh centuries, by far the greatest part of evangelical, missionary and educational work was done by the monks; and it is well known that all modern learning and civilization originated in the large and capable communities of devoted servants of God. But while Martha was busy, Mary's witness was not lacking; and there never was a time when the contemplative vocation —the sitting at His feet—found no place in the life of the Church. Time after time great reformers arose to build again the cloister walls, and to drive back from the sanctuary the incursions of the world. There is a long list of mighty witnesses to the paramount need of prayer and penance. Benedict, Columban, Bernard, Romuald and Bruno were followed by a host of disciples and spiritual children, who peopled anew the wilderness and the solitary places of the earth, and fled from the face of men to dwell alone with God. Thus always the great need of the Church and of our human and spiritual nature has been met; and the contemplative Orders find their subjects at all times and in all places of Christian life. Here one man, a leader, there a handful of like-minded men and women, rise up out of the mass and give their message, and light the torch to be handed on till the flame burns low and it is kindled again.

Each contemplative is born at Bethlehem; effaces himself and his origin in the Nazareth of the cloister with its silence, enclosure and voluntary penance; is crucified at Calvary by the cross laid upon him by his rule and observances, and finally unites himself with the Eucharistic life of His Master and Brother by his prayer, which ascends seven times a day before the altar, the official supplication and homage offered to God in his person and life "filling up those things which are wanting of the sufferings of Christ."

Surely this action of the contemplative in prayer, and penance, and silence is a great and true action; an activity more efficacious and fruitful because of its source in God, and more far-reaching than many external works, on account of its freedom from the limitations of time and space. It is the work of Him who "always liveth to make intercession for us." Looking at God, obeying God, loving God, and from God drawing, as from a fountain, the healing waters of mercy and peace for the weary toil-stained children of men. The prayer of the contemplative is our Lord's Own Prayer that His will may be done on earth as it is in heaven.

A visitor called one day at a Carthusian monastery and asked to be allowed to see one of the monks, an old friend of his, who had been an energetic priest in the mission field. He passed through the long quiet cloisters, saw his friend in his hermitage, and asked him what he did all day long:

"I am still doing mission work," he replied. "My activity in bygone days was limited to a single region; but now the whole world is open to my zeal, and by my prayer and life I can touch the heart of the most distant savage in Africa and the Islands of the Southern Seas."

The activity of contemplation may be likened to the dynamos and storage batteries of some vast power-station, generating a force which can encircle the world, a force bounded by no physical obstacles, beside which the latest discoveries of wireless telegraphy, x-rays and radium sink into insignificance. Here are some words of Mgr. Turinaz in answer to the question, "What do contemplatives do?"

> They are above our great cities where vice displays itself openly. One may compare them to a lightning conductor which wards off the threatened danger in a storm. They expiate for you. They ransom your souls held prisoners by pleasures, enslaved in sensuality, mastered by selfishness. Tomorrow if their prayers ceased, if their uplifted hands fell discouraged to the ground, if they forsook the ways of penitence, the world, like a whisp of straw, would be swept away by the fury of the tempest of God's vengeance.

It is very easy to lose a sense of proportion, especially if one is absorbed by external works; but all who have any real experience of life know how little can be done by human means alone. There will always be the many to live and work in the world, and it must not be grudged to the few to go apart from the world, to be in it, yet not of it. The life of the Church is a whole, a beautiful and proportionate growth, not an ugly one-sided mis-shapen development. Let those who can, and who are called, strive in prayer on the mountain top for those who struggle and fight in the valley below.

The strong plea for the contemplative Orders today is that they can and do provide the necessary balance in the struggle and rush of work and strife. Even spiritual activity tends to become weakened and dissipated, and just as Martha and Mary were each loved by Our Lord and had each her work and place, so the active and contemplative Orders help support and complement each other, presenting to the world the mystical life of Christ as a whole in its hidden and missionary aspects. The active religious has multiple duties claiming his best efforts in the confessional, the pulpit, the school, the hospital, and the press. The contemplative, no less occupied, his activity more limited by the confines of his monastery, is free to concentrate his energies in the practice of prayer and penance. The active goes out to seek; the contemplative is sought. The active raises the fallen in the street; the contemplative extends the welcome of peace and help to those who knock at his door. The one is the purveyor of spiritual goods; the other is the storehouse from which supplies may be drawn. The arm of the flesh and the sword of the spirit, the preaching of the Word and the prayer of adoration, the visible and the sacramental, the active and the contemplative, each in God's way doing God's will ministering to His glory and the salvation of souls.

Donozo Cortes wrote in 1849:

I believe that those who pray do more for the world than those who fight; and if the world goes from bad to worse, it is because there are more battles than prayers. If we could penetrate into the mind of God, and into the secret that lies behind all history, I am sure that we should be utterly astonished at the disproportionate value of prayer, even in merely ordinary every-day human affairs. In order that mankind may be at peace, it is necessary that there should be a certain balance which God alone can understand, between prayer and action, between the contemplative and the active life. I am completely convinced that if the moment were to come when prayer had utterly ceased, when no voice, no aspiration of the soul were raised to God, that moment would be the end of the world.

In this Donozo Cortes presents a supreme justification for contemplative Orders.

The State and Property

JOSEPH HUSSLEIN, S.J.

THE question of ownership is obviously the most fundamental of our economic problems. Directly or indirectly it affects every human being. Hence the far-reaching consequences of false popular theories in this regard. The definition itself of ownership is sufficiently clear. It implies the full right of disposing of an object, in so far as the law permits. The right of property is described by Blackstone as "The free use, enjoyment and disposal of all acquisitions, without any control or diminution, save only by the laws of the land." When justice and charity have been considered, as religion demands, there is but one other factor that can limit a man's free use and disposal of his own possessions, and that is the power of the State.

Yet this fact does not imply any rights of ownership on the part of the State over the private property of individuals, families, organizations or societies. The false doctrine that all ownership is due to the law of the State, and therefore can be annulled or changed at the pleasure of the State, or by a majority of voters at the ballot box, became a favorite principle of Socialism.

Hence, too, the consequence drawn by Socialists, that not merely the confiscation of the productive property of citizens, but likewise the offering or refusal of any payment in compensation for it, are purely matters of expediency to be determined at the will and whim of a victorious proletariat. This would logically follow if the right of ownership were conferred by the State and held at its good pleasure only. As the law alone had created this right by an arbitrary edict, so the law could take away the property of citizens, confiscate it without any "by your leave," without offering a penny in compensation. Such are the intensely practical consequences, sufficient to overturn all civilization, that flow from a single philosophical error touching upon this important question. The weal or wo of the world is determined far more than men realize by the theorist and the philosopher.

In justice it should be said that the false principles of radicalism are usually derived from rationalistic capitalism. The new economic liberalism which sprang from the Reformation little realized that in casting aside the social teachings of the Church, together with her Divinely-given authority, and substituting its own standards of greed, it was playing with a two-edged sword. It utilized the power of the State to sweep away the rights of the masses and impose upon them a yoke "little better than slavery." The same power is now conveniently invoked by the new radicalism in an effort to impose upon capital and labor alike a political tyranny which would prove as galling and bitter as capitalism had ever been in its worst excesses.

The doctrine that private property owes its existence to the laws of the State was propounded by Hobbes in his "Leviathan." All other rights of citizens were derived by him from the same source. From England the false theory passed into France and Germany. Destructive of practically all natural rights, it became an excellent justification for the aberrations of Socialists and communists. Nothing but the law now stood between the property-holder and his possessions. Change the law and you change the owner. Such is the Socialist doctrine today. Churches and private schools, as well as land and factories, can on the morrow be arbitrarily taken by the State and applied to its own uses or distributed among new owners. No injustice is done and no complaint can be made. It all follows from the one false principle. Atheistic capitalists hardly dared to act up to the full possibilities of their own principles, but men of the Bolshevist and Socialist type are not to be deterred from pushing their theories to their logical consequences.

Catholic doctrine, on the contrary, teaches that as the individual and the family precede the State, so their rights, including that of ownership, are prior to the State. They cannot, therefore, be derived from it. Men do not exist for the State; but the State exists for the individuals and families within its care. Its function is to guard their individual rights and to harmonize them with the general welfare. The State neither creates nor confers them. Private owners, therefore, may use and dispose of their property, freely and without any interference on the part of the State, except only in so far as the social order and the public good are affected. Just here for the first time the power of the State enters, not however by virtue of any rights of ownership which the State is presumed to possess, but solely by virtue of its power of jurisdiction. This distinction must be carefully noted, since it underlies all that can be said upon this important subject.

The significance of this principle is plain at once. Since the State has no rights of ownership over any private possessions, held individually or corporately by its citizens, it follows that the State cannot dispose of one foot of private land or one penny of private wealth according to its own arbitrary will and pleasure, even should that will and pleasure be expressed through the ballot box, by a majority of Socialist voters. They, no more than czar and emperor, can claim the right of ownership over the private possessions of citizens. It matters not whether these possessions consist of a boy's whipping-top or of the latest factory built by Ford. The principle is absolute and there is no exception.

Yet though the State has no rights of ownership over private property, it has rights of jurisdiction. It cannot dispose at its pleasure or for its own interests of any private possessions, for this would imply ownership, but it can and must exercise its power so far as the general welfare requires, and no further. For this the State has been instituted, that it may consult and safeguard the common good.

"The temporal goods which God commits to a man are his indeed in regard to property," says St. Thomas, "but in regard to use they are not his alone, but others also who can be sustained by what is superfluous for him." If the individual owner neglects his social responsibilities, it is the duty of the State to enforce their observance. But often it may be difficult for the individual correctly to perceive these obligations. In general, too, many of these obligations cannot be wisely carried out except by subordination to some governing authority which regulates them. Hence the rightfulness of the imposition of special income taxes, of the assumption of public ownership in certain particular fields, and of all similar measures enacted in conformity with the general welfare. In none of these instances is the State usurping the rights of ownership, provided it is guided solely by the common good. Its laws, however, must take into account the well-being of all classes. No more than the just burdens should be placed upon the shoulders of property-owners, and Socialistic confiscation is always unjust.

The correct relation of the individual and of the State to the possession of private property can be briefly stated. The right of acquiring private property belongs by nature to every man. Because man alone of all animate creation is gifted with reason, he must have the right to provide for the future as well as for the present moment. This he does by the acquisition of stable and permanent possessions. "Hence man can possess not only the fruits of the earth, but also the earth itself; for of the products of the earth he can make provision for the future." This right, as Pope Leo XIII adds, is not given him by the State, but is prior to the State:

> Man is older than the State, and he holds the right of providing for the life of his body prior to the formation of any State. And to say that God has given the earth to the use and enjoyment of the whole human race is not to deny that there can be private property. For God has granted the earth to mankind in general; not in the sense that all without distinction can do with it as they please, but rather that no part of it has been assigned to any one in particular, and that the limits of private possession have been left to be fixed by man's own industry and the laws of individual peoples.—(The Condition of Labor.)

While therefore the right of acquiring property is derived from nature and not from the State, the actual acquisition of private property is not determined by nature, but depends upon external facts, such as mere occupancy in the beginning. Moreover the jurisdictional power of the State is lawfully invoked to limit and regulate the rights of ownership that they may be made to harmonize with the general welfare. Such action became particularly necessary when all the land had already passed into private and public possession. Those, however, who held no private title to the land had likewise by nature a right to live from the fruits of the land. It was the duty of the State to see that all were provided from this common storehouse. Hence again the duty of the State to regulate the privileges of private ownership, so that no one, who duly performs his allotted task in life, may be excluded from the reasonable use and enjoyment of what God has made for all mankind.

> Moreover, the earth, though divided among private owners, ceases not therefore to minister to the needs of all, for there is no one who does not live on what the land brings forth. Those who do not possess the soil contribute by their labor; so that it may be truly said that all human subsistence is derived either from labor on one's own land, or from some laborious industry which is paid for either in the produce of the land itself or in that which is exchanged for what the land brings forth.—(The Condition of Labor.)

The State therefore, to resume the argument, has no rights of ownership over private property, whether this consists of land or of the industries which convert into manufactured products the raw materials drawn from the earth. But it has both the right and the duty of exercising jurisdictional power over every form of private ownership the moment the latter affects the general welfare. Yet the extent of all State action in this regard must be strictly limited by the demands of the common good. While public ownership in certain public service utilities may be desirable, according to national or local conditions, the main tendency of legislation should be to enable as many as possible to become private owners of productive property in land or shares. Hence all true legislation will be equally opposed to Socialism, which would withdraw ownership from individuals to confer it on the commonwealth; and to rationalistic capitalism, which would concentrate it in the hands of a few. Such, in brief, is the Christian ideal as expressed in the teachings of the Holy See.

John E. Redmond

J. C. WALSH

IT has always seemed to me that, if we feel we have the right to pass judgment upon the acts of an Irish statesman, we ought to consider, as he has to consider, the two phases of his work, for there are two. He has to carry on a struggle against England in England's capacity as a foreign power ruling Ireland in England's interest and against Ireland's interest; and he has to convince the Irish people that every move he makes is the right move. The conditions in which his work has to be done are constant only in the constancy of change, of change in men to be dealt with, of change in circumstances of which advantage may be taken, of change in the tactics to be adopted to the end that there may be always gain. No man can command all events to his liking, and by temperament Mr. Redmond was the last man to complain if, when he had acted according to the best of his judgment, events caused his calculations to miscarry. In the last four years, in which he must have suffered keenly and constantly, bitter words escaped him but twice, once when he believed the fruits of patient statesmanship had been thrown away by the act of the young men in Dublin, and once when he told the rulers of England that when he sought to bring Ireland honorably to their aid in their great trial he had been by them "let down and betrayed." For the first and only time he had lost his game in London and had lost his game in Dublin. Like the good player he was, he went calmly on to the next game. We shall learn, when the report of the Convention comes in, whether he won or lost, or whether the reaper took him before the game was played out. But whether he won or whether he lost, this much is certain: Whoever succeeds him as leader of the Irish people will have to take up the game where he left it, and play it through with varying fortunes just as he did, for his death does nothing to change the basic problems of leadership, which take rise on the maturing of new generations of Irish men and women righteously intolerant of foreign rule and of the persistence of England's inherent and seemingly ineradicable tendency to treat Ireland as an alien and essentially a hostile country, whose people are to be maintained in a real, if disguised, subjection. That was the problem of Grattan, of O'Connell, of Parnell and of Redmond, as it will be the problem of Dillon, Devlin, De Valera or whoever may be the man of the new day and the new generation. However lightly the rest of us may ignore the elements of the situation, no leader of Ireland can escape them. The new leader perforce accepts the position as the earlier leader left it.

In an earlier and more auspicious hour, Mr. Redmond was a beneficiary of this element of permanence and continuity, for it is the Land Act, by whose agency the Irish people got back their land and laid the foundations of economic strength, that will be linked with his name in history, and it was the work of Davitt and Parnell, long before, which had made the Land Act possible. The generation which has grown to manhood since 1903 knows nothing, at least it knows nothing by experience, of the helplessness of the people in 1878, nor can it realize how fantastic and impracticable appeared the demand that Davitt made when Davitt made it. The critical battles in that great warfare were fought by men who were in the depths of destitution, who had all the odds against them, who had been treated as serfs all their lives as their fathers were before them, and who had between themselves and destruction only the intrepid spirits of Parnell and Davitt and the sustaining generosity of the Irish in America. There came a day when Mr. Redmond felt he could say to one of his lieutenants that if there was a strong agitation that winter he believed the land could be won for the people. There was an agitation; the lieutenant spent much of the winter in jail, that favored rostrum of Irish right; and the land was won for the people. That was John Redmond's great hour. He had what seemed to be another on that afternoon in May, 1914, when the Home Rule Act, now safe at last from the enmity of the Lords, was carried across to them from the Commons through corridors crowded by young Irishmen singing "A Nation Once Again." It looked as though he was to complete the program of Parnell as well as the program of Davitt. The cup was at the lip. Now it will be for some other leader to complete the work of Redmond. There is nothing in the future more certain than that it will be done. The event only awaits the determining occasion.

One other achievement of the impossible stands to his credit. Mr. Balfour, in office, admitting the complete justice of the case for an Irish university into which Catholics might enter without sacrifice either of faith or of self-respect, pronounced the institution of such a university impossible in the presence of bigotry's antagonism. Mr. Redmond waited, and in time he got the university from Mr. Birrell.

For a long time, probably, people will continue to judge Mr. Redmond by his action during the war. There can be no proper objection to that, and he would be the last to complain even of disapproval. What perhaps is worth while is an honest effort to understand his action. After Parnell's death, he had fought his way to the front, and the fighting was bitter, in support of the principle that Ireland could not place her dependence upon the good will of English statesmen. During many years he had made gain after gain for Ireland by playing off one English statesman, or group of statesmen, against another. In the final stages of the Home Rule contest, gusts of treachery were forever blowing up from some new corner. He knew how Loveburn, apparently a tried friend, had broken the solidarity of the Liberals. He knew how Lloyd George, with Asquith's approval, had sprung upon him the trap of partition. He knew how Asquith had handled the mutiny of officers at the Curragh. And he knew how the law had closed its eyes to Carson's gun running. He knew he was surrounded with deception, and yet he elected, when the war came, to trust England and to assent to the postponement of Home Rule. It seems to me he must have done it with his eyes open, that he had studied the ground, which none knew better, that he made his election in the belief that he was choosing aright for Ireland, and that the risks he took were as patent to him as they have since been to the severest of his critics. If he guessed wrong, so did Joffre when he threw his armies into Alsace, so did the British Cabinet, when it counted on a victory in three months, so did Sazonof when he headed the Russian steam roller for Berlin. Probably we shall learn some time that the miscalculations were all one and the same. The firmest friends of the Irish cause in the British Cabinet were convinced of victory in a few months. The wonder would have been if Redmond had reached any different conclusion. Only Kitchener did, and he spoke not in the first days of August, but in the last days of September. To the extent that Redmond erred he paid, and, as time goes on, it is the other phase of the error that will increase in significance. It was the same Redmond who, during the Boer War, had refused to associate Ireland with England's war The world was told then that if Ireland had acted otherwise Ireland could have anything from a grateful England. This time Redmond took Ireland into England's war, into a life and death struggle, and England's answer was to deceive and humiliate Redmond, to insult and dragoon Ireland, to foment a rebellion and to repress a people over-eager to be friendly and helpful. Mr. Redmond bore without complaining the odium of his error. Mr. Asquith's idea of bearing England's share of blame for the failure of the great experiment was to taunt Mr. Redmond with the resulting loss of prestige in Ireland. In the calmer times ahead all this will come up for mature and reasoned appreciation. All that need be said now is that the lines are more clearly marked for the guidance of whoever is next to lead the Irish fight for government with the consent of the governed.

That phase Mr. Redmond was fated not to see. Like the leader of Israel, he saw it only from the mountain near by the promised land, how near we are not yet to know. What we are free to suspect is that, knowing himself stricken, he deferred for many months to seize his chance for a restoration of health lest by his absence the one chance there seemed to be to carry Ireland a long step on her way might be impaired. I confess I cannot find it in my heart to grieve when one who with heart and head has played his part to the last hour goes to join his fathers with his knight's harness on. The new generation, which he had to ask to wait and which could not wait for him, must fill his place. Let us hope their choice may measure up to his stature, for what remains to be done is still a great and difficult work, calling for the highest there is of character and courage in Ireland's service.

White Slavery: A Reply

To the Editor of AMERICA:

"Furthermore, I submit that to hold that we may not cooperate with non-Catholic citizens towards the common good in matters of morals for fear of scandal is rank bigotry and not holiness": With this ponderously pompous and forensic thud the gage of J. S. L., of Buffalo, descended on the field of combat, in AMERICA for February 2, thereby adding to the already considerable cloud of dust which for more than a column's space he had been assiduously engaged in raising. Whereupon, without deigning to argue the point at all, under the kindly shelter of his three initials, he abruptly retired from the lists, leaving the combatants on either side sorely perplexed as to which of them he intended to befriend. His thesis favored one side, his arguments the other; he proved the crying need of cooperating with non-Catholic agencies by showing how Catholic resources, if properly utilized, were more than sufficient to accomplish all important social work that Catholics have time or money or zeal to do. Our friend, C. Connolly, must have been as well satisfied with J. S. L's invaluable support as Balak was with the prophecies of Balaam.

To avoid further confusion, it may be well to restate the question at issue. Mr. C. Connolly's original contention was that, by neglecting to adopt the programs of non-Catholic reform agencies and by failing to support, financially and otherwise, their movements for social uplift, the Catholic clergy and laity were gravely derelict to duty. By implication Mr. Connolly condemned the Catholic social program, pronounced Catholic measures and methods inefficient, called into question the wisdom of the Church's attitude towards modern problems, and virtually denied that she was properly fulfilling, at least here in America, her mission to society as the true and only guardian by Divine appointment of morals as well as faith. He may say in reply that he criticized Catholics and not the Church. To this I answer that, by contrasting Catholics with non-Catholics, he criticized the Catholic clergy and laity in that sense in which they are identified with the Church. Now so to criticize the Church, especially when the matter borders closely on morality, and when the critic has nothing but admiration for the specious efficiency of non-Catholics in the same field, constitutes to my mind a breach of loyalty. In morals as in faith, the wisdom of the Church is supreme both as to the standards of conduct and the methods of teaching them to men. To proceed in such matters without her approval is rash; to go outside for light and guidance is not merely folly, it is sheer lack of loyalty, which invites certain failure of the enterprise and even shipwreck of faith itself.

But, as Father Blakely pointed out, such criticism is due even more to ignorance than to disloyalty. Ignorance of Catholic things among non-Catholics is simply appalling, but some Catholics seem to be almost in the same predicament. They do not appear to know, for instance, that the Catholic Church has a definite social program, approved and furthered by her entire hierarchy, with certain agencies organized to carry out its several parts. Unfortunately, however, these agencies suffer from malnutrition of membership. The Catholics who wish to cooperate with non-Catholic agencies would apparently rather die than join them, much less work enthusiastically for them, I speak of the Catholic Federation, the St. Vincent de Paul Society, etc., etc. These societies they prefer to criticize, those they cease not to admire. Yet, meanwhile, the fields are white for the harvest, and the laborers in the Catholic organizations are few; and the upshot of it all is that a social and moral program more perfect, efficacious and sublime than any non-Catholic organization ever dreamed of, remains nothing more than a program. Why? Is it because the Bishops and priests fail to exhort the Faithful to join, or actively and financially support, these movements and organizations? No, but mainly because of the canker of worldliness which eats into the very vitals of faith, kills the zeal of the lay Catholic, makes him ashamed of things distinctively Catholic, a critic of his Church, and a worshiper at other shrines.

This social program of the Church is embodied in that of the Catholic Federation, which calls upon the Catholic laymen in every city of any size in this country to assist its campaign for securing, among other things, three very practical and essential objects: (1) The purging of theatricals, literature, films, etc., from moral filth; (2) a living wage for workers, both men and women; (3) higher education for Catholic young men. At first sight, and to the superficial mind, these measures may not seem to constitute an issue at all comparable with that of a vice crusade. To the thoughtful, however, who seek for remedies that go to the very roots of evil and do not merely salve the surface, it soon becomes apparent that the former aims are worthy of the most devoted service, while the crusade against cadets and white-slavers is, on the whole—that is, as long as nothing is done to eliminate the causes and conditions which make possible such hideous immorality—a waste of valuable time. English and French officers from the western front inform us that owing to the number of wounded and the consequent congestion of hospitals in Europe, it becomes necessary to discriminate among the wounded; those who have received wounds from bullets or shrapnel are taken to the hospital, but those who have received a bayonet-wound are given "first aid" and then passed over, because it is futile to waste on such the attention that will save life elsewhere. Similarly, modern society presents the appearance of a battle-ground littered with the victims of sin. So stupendous is the task of rescue that, if anything is to be accomplished, there must be more specialization and less sentimentality. When vice has reached the white-slavery stage, it is almost too late to talk of remedies. We must begin our efforts at the other end of the process, by destroying the causes. I do not for a moment approve of that attitude which allows vice and its promoters to go unpunished; indeed, no one is a good Catholic, or even a good citizen, who does not use his influence to have the laws against vice enforced, but to rely on mere punishment as an efficient means of reform is an expedient as pitiable as the attempt to cure a cancer by the application of ointment.

The measures set forth in the Catholic social program are, on the contrary, real and not makeshift remedies. Fill our legislatures, executive boards, professions, etc., with educated Catholics, and Catholic moral standards will prevail. But as long as Catholics neglect, as they do, the exhortations of their pastors to send their boys to Catholic high schools and colleges, so long, in spite of numbers, shall we remain social nonentities, so long will the destinies of the nation be exclusively in the hands of men who lack correct moral principles. Engaged in the work of purifying the theater, films and literature of the nation we see only the Catholic Federation unassisted by any "evangelical" crusaders. There is nothing sensational about this work, the press does not commend it, it lacks the "band wagon" and the "tom-tom," there is, above all, no compensation in it for indigent "social experts," and so the Catholics, so far as they have zeal to utilize it, naturally have the field to themselves. Yet the pollution of the imagination and the mind has its necessary corollary, the pollution of the body. Not merely moralists, but infidel psychologists will tell you this. Lastly, to deny our workingmen and girls the compensation justly due them for their services to society by refusing them a living wage, is to turn their homes into cheerless hovels, to drive men to drink and degraded amusement and to tempt women to the bartering of their virtue.

My aversion to all "evangelical" methods of reform is due not to "rank bigotry" but to common-sense and experience. There is no common ground for cooperation with non-Catholic organizations of an ethical or religious nature, though Catholics may and should cooperate with civic organizations and with non-Catholics as individuals. Our eternal and unchanging standards of right and wrong must not be subordinated to their shifting and fanatical fads. When we join hands with them to cleanse the theater, it is usual to find that we have been inveigled into a movement to suppress Sunday baseball or some other piece of tom-foolery, which makes the whole affair ridiculous. On the other hand, they see no harm in the things we condemn, as I experienced, on one occasion, when I attempted in vain to secure the cooperation of the ministers in a certain town of Ohio, to have the Mayor issue an order for the removal of some vile posters from the boards of the principal streets. One of them made a joke of the affair, and all of them seemed to think me quite competent to take care of the matter without their assistance. At all events, no one except myself made any protest to the Mayor. Hence it would seem that where standards based on faith or morals are concerned, cooperation is impossible for the difference of viewpoint goes back to first principles.

Some Irish, Old and New

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Why slur the names of Americans of Dutch or Gaelic blood who "ape the English" in those things in which the last named are worthy of imitation? "L. J." in AMERICA for February 9, should not let old prejudices blind him. Perhaps he dislikes the English-cut clothes, which are the style even in New Hampshire. We Irish could learn some profitable lessons from English self-restraint, perseverance and devotedness to a cause. More English savoir faire would help the Gaels socially.

A few examples will illustrate my former letter urging the educated Irish-Americans to guide the uneducated Irish-Americans to apostolic achievements. Old English families, no matter what their failings, generally have a tradition. Frequently that tradition bequeaths the self-imposed obligation of doing something worth while for "humanity," especially English humanity. Now, I realize that they have followed bad philosophies; that they have ignored the Irish. The point, however, is that the Irish-American families, who until recently have been totally engrossed in money-making. should look up the traditions of their fathers in the Faith, who possessed a good, sound philosophy, and who loved the Irish. Then they, as leading Catholic families, might go and do likewise, not working for a vague "humanity," but for the temporal and eternal welfare of their fellow-men and for a moral America.

The old English aristocrats were often highly educated. Many of them in every generation have tried to improve the condition of the poorly educated English. They failed more for want of Catholic Sacraments and ethics than from insincerity. Irish-Americans, who try to scintillate socially, are often poorly educated. Their ignorance is especially pathetic, where religion and philosophy are discussed. Moreover, they do not try to reach and elevate their less opulent kindred, because they themselves are looking up. They try to climb into social circles, where they are not wanted. They forget, rather they do not know, that in their religion, its literature and art, they have greater cultural opportunities than their neighbors. Every fundamental principle that America is now fighting for, Irish Catholics have fought for since the battle of the Yellow Ford.

We can and should make enthusiastic speeches on the stage and off it, about our Catholic heritage. Such boasting is not self-praise, but the glorification of Christian principles. Well-to-do Irish Catholic men and women should be satisfied with their own society. They would be very happy enjoying their own company, and their Catholic inheritance in art and philosophy. They would gain the respect of the rest of America by instructing it in Catholic glories.

Florence Nightingale's Opinion of Orange Ulster

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In Shane Leslie's "Forgotten Passages in the Life of Florence Nightingale," contributed to the October, 1917, Dublin Review, there is further and very conclusive evidence that Miss Nightingale was indebted to Catholic influence, example and training for the foundations of her career as the patron of the modern humanitarian nursing cult. There is also a curious, and, just at present, most interesting, outline of the impression Orange Ulster made on her. Writing on August 20, 1852, she says:

> Of all places that the eye of me would not have visited, I think Belfast is the one. Imagine a new, commercial Orange Presbyterian town, a cross between Geneva and Manchester, inhabited by that anomalous animal, an Irish Protestant, with infirmaries, poorhouses, etc., all on the model of London. I have had moments of intense discouragement in my life, but never anything like this.

And in another letter written on September 7, 1852:

> I have seen everything in this place and Lisburn and the towns about. And never did I see nursing, education, and all the works of love practised as a trade to such an extent before. London is comparatively a little child. To see the craft carried to its perfection you must come here.

More than sixty years have passed since this was written, but, judging from the social situation in Ulster today, in spite of all the progress the world has made elsewhere, Florence Nightingale would have to repeat her avowal of disgust could she revisit this benighted sector of the Green Isle.

An Irish Lad

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Reading recent communications in AMERICA, I have been reminded forcibly of an incident which took place in an Irish country-school in Ballivor, Co. Meath, in the year 1837. The teacher was at the same time the sexton in the Anglican church, which was situated near by. Schools were rare in Ireland in those days, and of Catholic common-schools there were none. But the love of the Irish for learning impelled them to send their children, in spite of scruples, to the Protestant schools. One day a plump, little eight-year-old boy, rambling in from a small farm a mile away, took his place among the scholars. His family was of the class of small farmers or cottiers who constituted the chief element in the population of Meath, which was almost entirely Catholic. At that time Whately, Archbishop of Dublin, known for the rhetoric which bears his name, was intent on perverting the children of Catholic parents; so he ordered that all the pupils should say the Protestant prayers with the teacher at the opening and closing of the school sessions.

The teacher began the Lord's Prayer, which the little peasant recited after him until he came to the addition, inserted at the end: "For Thine is the kingdom, the power and the glory." At this point the boy stuck his fingers into his ears and would neither say nor listen to the false addition, now recognized as such by the more enlightened Church of England. The teacher saw the boy's action and called him up and publicly whipped him on the palms of both hands with a leather strap. The boy shed no tears, and he persisted in refusing to say the prayers. When the little fellow went home, his mother took him to the parish priest, who blessed him for his courage and faith. Once more he went to the same school, and once again refused to say the false prayers; he was again beaten for his loyalty and his faith. He never went back to that school. Soon his whole family, the boy with them, emigrated to the United States, where they all succeeded and stanchly held to the creed of their ancestors. Of the entire family, which was a large one, only that boy is alive today. He is an old man, now as ever a loyal Catholic.

A Catholic Daily Paper

To the Editor of AMERICA:

When the subject of a Catholic daily paper was being discussed in the columns of your paper about a year ago, the writer, a sixty-dollar-a-month clerk, talked about it with men in the same line of work. Nearly all these men are anxious to see such a paper started in Chicago, and here are just a few of their reasons:

We believe Dr. Walsh could edit a health department better than any doctor now writing for any Chicago paper. We want besides a man who can fill a column without telling us that Mr. Arthur Balfour is a man of perhaps the greatest intellect since Newton, and that the latest peace effort, referring to the Pope's peace proposal, has "an odor of limburger." The columnist who writes this trash is the greatest individual molder of public opinion in Chicago. He has convinced more than one Catholic of my acquaintance that Gibbon is an infallible historian.

We want a musical critic, who will refrain from placing John McCormack in the twenty-five-cent-vaudeville class. The most quoted musical critic in Chicago will never forgive the Irish Catholics for not taking the "Play Boy of the Western World" to their hearts. We want a "Guidepost Column" conducted by some one of the type of Mr. Michael Williams, who understands the Catholic position on economic questions and who is in sympathy with the common people. We like the way the Herald handles religious questions, but it is too much to expect the feature writers on the big dailies to know anything about Catholic principles. We would rather have John Talbot Smith's opinion of the New York stage than Burns Mantel's. We appreciate the fact that the local dramatic critics are, as a rule, fair with Catholics, but they have different moral standards and they commend plays that a Catholic critic could not commend. We want some one to write on science who will not insist that the world is billions of years old and that man has evolved from a tadpole. We want some one to answer Arthur Brisbane when he makes fun of Christians.

We want more from the pen of Mary Synon, Spearman, Bazin, Conrad, Ascough, Connolly, Joyce and Aline Kilmer, O'Malley, Walsh, Pallen, Ryan, Belloc, Chesterton, Leslie and others like them, and less of Shaw, Wells, Galsworthy, New Republic experts, and best-sellers.

Why does not some man of means, who is interested in this subject, have one of the large cities solicited for both stock and subscriptions for a Catholic daily, to be started in case enough people are found to be interested. It would not cost a fortune and I believe it would prove beyond a doubt that the Catholic people want a daily and will support it.

The "Saturday Evening Post"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

As you know, I called your attention to an article on the Red Cross in Italy, by Elizabeth Frazer, in the Saturday Evening Post of February 9. To this you responded with a magnificent editorial in your issue of February 23. On February 22 I wrote the editor of the Saturday Evening Post as follows:

To the Editor of "Saturday Evening Post":

I read with disgust and indignation an article called "The Red Cross in Italy," by Miss Elizabeth Frazer, in your issue of February 9, 1918. Hoping he would call your attention to these deliberate lies that have been officially denied by Italian Government representatives, concerning the Pope, the Italian Catholic clergy and the Catholic Church, I wrote the editor of AMERICA, an able weekly, published in New York City. Should the editor of AMERICA not have called your attention to this calumny, I trust you will procure a copy of that paper, dated February 23, which contains an editorial on this subject. When in error even a newspaper can have the manliness to tender a prompt and complete apology; in this case, not only to the Holy Father but to the Catholics of Italy and of the world.

Yours truly,
E. P. BARRY.

On February 27 I received the following answer:

Editorial Rooms,
"Saturday Evening Post,"
The Curtis Publishing Company.
George Horace Lorimer, Editor.
Philadelphia, February 25, 1918.

Dear Sir: You have apparently read something into Miss Frazer's article which she did not say or intend to intimate. As we read the passage, she simply suggests that the Austrians were misquoting the Pope in an effort to influence the Italians by a poisonous propaganda.

You can rest assured that in publishing this article the Saturday Evening Post was not actuated by any religious bias or prejudice, nor, in fact, did we suppose that it would be construed, even remotely, as an attack on any religion or religious organization.

Very truly yours,
THE EDITOR.

Mr. E. P. Barry.
L—H.

When I read this effusion I could hardly believe my own eyes. That the editor of a paper of such high literary standing should make deliberately such a statement does not speak very highly for his knowledge of the English language. I do not think this matter should be allowed to rest with any such stuff. If these people are sincere they will repudiate the Frazer statement.

Baltimore. E. P. BARRY.

Dogma and Some Clerics

FEW phenomena so afflict the soul with weariness as clergymen who "preach" on anything and everything except the Gospel. As a glance at the Saturday newspapers will show, New York is full of these gentlemen, and they have imitators in every American city. One of these men, a stern critic of the untruthful and wily Jesuits, discoursed to an admiring congregation lately on "Airplanes and Angels," while others have been known to expatiate on subjects varying from the price of winter wheat to a defense of such "Christians" as deny the Divinity of Jesus Christ. These clerics have nothing new to say. The point of importance, therefore, is to give to their banalities an environment as noisy as a boiler factory, as glaring as the band wagon at the head of a circus parade.

Several of these clerical showmen chose the second Sunday in Lent to present in public the frayed and venerable pronouncement that deed, not creed, is important, and that if a man leads a good life it matters not what he believes. That the pronouncement was itself a "creed" did not occur to these gentlemen, who, in truth, have little power of self-criticism. A dogma, in a general sense, is a truth properly enunciated, and a religious dogma is a truth proposed for acceptance by competent religious authority. It is obvious that no honest, no intelligent man can be indifferent to the truth. The intellect is so constituted that its goal is the attainment of the truth, and it is a disordered or a dishonest mind that accepts with equal readiness truth or falsehood. Furthermore, every man, acting intelligently, initiates, guides and completes his actions according to certain principles which he firmly believes to be true. That is, his "deed" is ruled by his "creed," his acts are based on "dogma."

Inevitable as dogma is, from the standpoint of psychology, even a brief acquaintance with the Gospels must show its necessary place in the life of every Christian. If one thing is clear from the study of these sacred records, it is that Our Blessed Lord taught a definite "creed," which He imposed upon all who wished to be His disciples. He announced in brief and unmistakable terms that unless men were willing to accept the truths which He came to preach they could not enter the Kingdom of God. So important was the dogma which He proposed that without its full and unreserved acceptance men would be damned. Nor did this mission cease when the visible presence of the Master was withdrawn. He founded a self-perpetuating body of men, whom He commissioned to go forth into the whole world teaching all men and requiring them to believe, on peril of their eternal salvation, whatsoever things He had taught them.

Today, no maxim is more widespread among those who cannot bear the yoke of the Gospel than that proposed by the New York clergy on the second Sunday of Lent. But none is more absurd in the light of psychology, none more disastrous when tested by the life of Jesus. Unless a man has a "creed" of some sort, false in itself, perhaps, but apprehended by a fallible intellect as true, he cannot act rationally, and unless he is willing to admit the teachings of Jesus Christ, invincible ignorance alone stands between him and an eternal hell.

The Professors See a Light

AFTER a protracted investigation the Committee of the American Association of University Professors has published its conclusions on "Academic Freedom in War Time." Nearly three years ago, this committee issued a report on the same subject, the general tenor of which was that, in spite of dean, president, Church and State, "academic freedom" amply justified a professor in proposing to the callow youth of his classes whatever appeared to him to be the truth. That, by the common persuasion of mankind, this alleged truth might be deemed an arrant falsehood or a palpable error did not alter the case. The matter was purely subjective: that was true and useful which to the professor seemed true and useful. Any differences of opinion were ultimately passed upon by the supreme court, the professor himself. If on investigation, sober and sincere, he felt himself impelled to teach that, since to hold property is immoral, the students should forthwith constitute themselves a committee of pickers and stealers to remove all the property of the University and give it to the Socialists, it was sheer bigotry and oppression to transfer him from his chair to a comfortable cell in the county jail.

Beyond the signers, and a few kindred spirits, no one took the 1915 declaration of independence seriously. College students are notorious jokers, but harmless, as a rule, and the general public was content to believe that the professors were simply taking a lesson from their pupils. But with the entrance of the United States into the world-war, a world of realities, the utter sham of the whole report speedily became apparent, even to the signers. The current report of the association yields to the pressure of the times, and betrays without regret the high principles so courageously announced three years ago. The old and absurd position that anything which seemed true might and should be proclaimed, without regard for the requirements of prudence, courtesy or common sense, has been abandoned. Out of the mist of words, the professors now rise to the conclusions, cautious if not courageous, that violators of the law "may legitimately suffer deprivation of academic tenure"; and they even unbend so far as to admit that a professor who advocates resistance to the draft-law may be scholastically decapitated. No doubt the entire country, beginning with the Supreme Court of the United States, breathes more freely since the publication of the maganimous admission that an American university professor is not above the law of the land.

No less a force than a world-war was required to jolt these dwellers in academic and intellectual shadows from their Nirvana of sublimated nonsense into an attitude in which the elements of common sense are not entirely rejected. Having vindicated the majesty of the civil law, will our intellectual leaders now proceed to a higher level? "Academic freedom" no longer justifies the preaching of rebellion against the State in our universities. But what of the law of God? Perhaps the saner atmosphere which war, in spite of its horrors, always brings, may yet teach even our university professors that no rebellion against the law of God, or against that law of his nature known to man independently of revelation, can be justified on the plea of "academic freedom." But as yet that edict has not been promulgated by the American Association of University Professors.

Superstition in the War

ONE of the curious things about the war is the impetus it has given to the practice of superstition. Only the ignorant, it was to have been expected, would be so weak-minded as to have recourse to such absurdity; this however has not been the case, and a not inconsiderable literature has grown up since the outbreak of hostilities, devoted to setting forth the manifold forms in which this world-old folly has been revived. None of the nations has been exempt. Even some Catholics, who through the constant insistence of the Church on the malice of superstition certainly should have known better, have laid themselves open to the danger of contamination. Hence the Church has found it necessary to expose in unequivocal language the folly and the wickedness of this survival of paganism, and to warn its children to have no part in it.

At first sight it would appear incredible that men of the twentieth century should attribute to mere pieces of wood and metal and to set forms of words the power to insure them protection in battle and immunity from disease; but the records of history show that in times of great danger this has been a marked tendency of ill-instructed minds. Barbarous peoples have not been the only ones who have had recourse to foolish measures to ward off physical evils; those addicted to astrology naturally did the same; and even the intelligent Greeks and the hard-headed Romans were not above such practices. That those present-day soldiers who are without a sure moral and religious anchorage should have fallen into superstition is not altogether surprising. The wonder is that any Catholics should have been tempted to be guilty of it.

Superstition, as it appears on the war-fronts, manifests itself mainly in attributing to the use of charms and to the repetition of set formulas of prayer an infallible efficacy to ward off wounds and to prevent sickness and death. The Church would be the last to discountenance the saying of prayers with the view of invoking Divine protection, provided they were said with reliance on God's providence, with abandonment to His will, and with the realization that no set form of words has an unfailing power to obtain temporal favors. God has never promised any such certain and absolute efficacy. Yet this is precisely the efficacy attributed to the formularies in use, as if compulsion were put on God by this means to grant such requests, whether He wills to do so or not. The use of such prayers in such a spirit, even when they are not in themselves heterodox, is superstitious and sinful.

True, the Church approves the wearing of images and medals, blessed for a set purpose, provided they be recognized to have in themselves no supernatural efficacy. If they be used as a mark of devotion to the Saints or Our Lady or Christ Himself, as an indication of interior love or an outward mark of loyalty, as reminders to live the life consonant with the wearing of such things, as a sort of silent invocation for the intercession of those dear to God, and as freighted with the impetratory power of the Church; their use is not blameworthy but laudable. Superstition creeps in, when to the mere wearing of a piece of metal or cloth is attributed infallible protection against physical evil. Such power does not reside in these things by their nature, it is not communicated to them by God. Strangely enough, people realize this. From whom then do they expect protection—from the devil? Perhaps. But be this as it may, the practice is entirely wrong and silly.

A Methodist Bishop in Camp

THE Methodist Bishop, Charles Bayard Mitchell, according to his own account in the Northwestern Christian Advocate, has recently spent a month in three of our camps in the Southeast, preaching in the Y. M. C. A. huts to Protestants, Catholics and Jews, and bringing Christianity for the first time to the Catholic soldier-boys. This is a delightful revelation. Some nights, he tells us, he addressed as many "Roman" Catholics as Protestants, and then adds the enlightening information:

> The Catholics gather in the Young Men's Christian Association buildings, receive the khaki-bound copy of the New Testament, and rejoice for the first time in the possession of a portion of the Word of God. They are hearing for the first time, many of them, the preaching of the Gospel, and are deeply interested in the strange, new preaching which insists that there must be a vital relation between creed and conduct. They are learning the inconsistency of coming away from Mass, where their knees knelt before the sacred symbol, and at once returning to their gambling and their profanity.

What a wonderful discovery! Catholics who have never heard the Gospel! Yet it is read and preached on every Sunday, in every Catholic church throughout the land, perhaps from six to eight times or oftener at the successive Masses. More wonderful still, it was left for the apostolic Bishop, during his campaign of proselyting in our American camps, to discover that many of the children of the Faith "for the first time" heard from his lips the "strange, new preaching" of an actual relation between creed and conduct. Catholics, it appears, are wont to rise from their superstitious worship of a "symbol" to go out straightway and indulge to their heart's delight in "gambling and profanity." Yet the most serious difficulty that many find in embracing the Catholic religion is the stern insistence of the Church upon the absolute conformity of their lives with her teaching. As for the distribution of copies of portions of the Sacred Scriptures, Bishop Mitchell has apparently never heard of the khaki-bound Catholic version of the New Testament, which the Church is doing her best to distribute among her Catholic soldiers.

The time has come when in the name of patriotism, if not in the name of truth and religion, an end should be put to such offensive and insulting language. Neither Christianity nor the war can profit from a campaign of slander, carried on in the midst of the greatest cataclysm of history. For the honor of Methodism, or denominationalism of whatever kind, such un-American and unchristian methods should be discontinued. It is ridiculous to represent the great Catholic Church, whose history dates back to the days of Christ and whose teaching is drawn exclusively from the authentic Gospels and the Apostolic traditions, as a pagan superstition, whose worshipers kneel before a symbol, whose doctrine has no relation to morality, and whose teaching abhors the Gospel as the owlet the light of day. Why will Protestant editors continue to print in their journals such offensive, absurd and insulting slanders, whether due to mere ignorance or prompted by a false and brutal bigotry?

But there is a practical lesson for Catholics. Protestant proselytism in our camps is presented as an avowed fact. It was under the auspices of the National War Council of the Young Men's Christian Association that this man was introduced to our soldiers. We are glad to recognize the many courtesies received from the Y. M. C. A., without which Catholic chaplains would often have found themselves in sore distress, but apparently there are serious dangers to be guarded against, such, for instance, as those disclosed by the ranting Bishop. Hence the great need of providing Catholic chaplains, of promoting the efforts of the Knights of Columbus, and of stationing Catholic representatives everywhere among our Catholic soldiers, that they may not be deprived of their highest inheritance at the very time they are preparing to offer for their country the supreme sacrifices that war may demand of them.

"The Overzeal of Latin Catholics"

THE Boston Evening Transcript's highly vagarious "Churchman Afield" has lately been rambling even more deviously than usual, for he tells us that "Leaders in the Church of England and in the Episcopal Church in the United States are taking steps to bring about a reduction of the days, forty [of Lent] not counting Sundays, to fourteen, including Sundays." The introduction of our exceedingly inconvenient forty-day Lent was due, it seems, "to the overzeal of Latin Catholics in an attempt to make the whole year full of holy days." "When will those trouble-making Latin Catholics," we can hear the Transcript's wandering Churchman complain, "ever learn to practise moderation! They are incessantly carrying things too far. They pray too long, they eat too little, they believe too much. It is perfectly clear that fourteen days of Lent are quite sufficient for any one who wishes to keep his health and spirits, but those overzealous Latins perversely protract the doleful period to forty days, because they think they have a high precedent for the practice in the recorded forty-day fasts of Moses, Elias and Christ Himself.

"Those Latin Catholics are certainly an overzealous set. Without question they carry things too far. Why they actually retain in their creed such antiquated doctrines as the necessity of Baptism, the Divinity of Christ, and the eternity of hell, dogmas which we Episcopalians can reject if we please, and still be 'stanch Churchmen'! Worse yet, those overzealous Latins stubbornly refuse to allow a man to have more than one wife at a time, whereas Episcopalianism, inheriting its royal founder's high scorn of Popish narrowness in this trifling matter, graciously permits the 'innocent party' in a divorce case to find another mate. But worst of all those overzealous Latins are hopelessly vulgar and ill-bred. Indeed they are quite impossible. You cannot be 'nice' and be a Romanist too. For among those overzealous Latins there are far too many poor, humble and uneducated folk to make it safe for a person of wealth, birth and breeding to join the Catholic Church. In truth, so lamentably wanting in delicacy and refinement are those overzealous Latins that they actually boast that theirs is above all others the Church of the Poor! How thankful we Episcopalians should be," perhaps the "Churchman Afield" concluded, "that we are so sane and moderate in every respect that we have the saving grace to avoid all excesses in doctrines and devotions, and we are so charmingly comprehensive that all men and women of wealth, family and position, no matter what their belief may be, naturally gravitate to our communion, and find there a chosen company of kindred spirits as unlike as possible to those vulgar, immoderate, overzealous Latins!"

THE CRITICISM OF POETRY

IMPRESSIONIST criticism, though falling into disrepute, has undoubtedly its interest and its value. If sincere and sane, it may open up new points of view, discover or emphasize disregarded attributes of a poet, and in this way may break the ground or perhaps furnish material for stable criticism. At the very least it may serve to enlighten the present and succeeding generations as to the attitude of our own critics towards poetry and the poets, and give a basis on which to estimate the literary instincts of the age.

The historical criticism of poetry has many sides and on every side merits the study lavished upon it. What, for instance, could seem more attractive to a generation like our own that has faith in its own potentialities than to trace the growth of poetry stage by stage, as it progressed towards perfection in the past? To a self-conscious generation like our own what is more fascinating than to diagnose the influence of artist upon succeeding artist—or to a practical and political generation than to connect the poet with the practical and political aspect of his times? This is the ambition of the historical critic. So also to discover the true character of the poet, often disguised rather than revealed in his verses, to unravel allusions deliberately concealed, and in general to reach beneath the actual content of the poem to a meaning and a value that are discoverable only by extrinsic research. Such historical criticism of Spenser occupies a large part of Mr. Herbert Ellsworth Cory's "Spenser, a Critical Study" (University of California Press), and we wish to make it plain that we have nothing but admiration for so scholarly a contribution to the knowledge of the great Elizabethan.

But it does seem to the writer to be important to draw a distinction between such historical criticism as this and the criticism of absolute poetry itself, which is an entirely different matter. It is one thing to study the poet and another thing to study his poetry. It is one thing to determine a poet's indebtedness to preceding and his effect upon succeeding poets, and another thing entirely to evaluate his work as a contribution to the world's literature. It is one thing, again, to bring to the surface what lay hidden in the inner consciousness of the poet when he wrote this or that satire or panegyric, and another to interpret what the poet actually expresses in his composition. Both are legitimate fields of study, but the latter alone is the proper criticism of objective poetry. Thus, it implies an insight into the mind of Robert Browning to know that he was thinking of Wordsworth when he wrote "The Lost Leader," or that he was girding at Cardinal Wiseman in "Bishop Blougram's Apology," but neither fact is inherent in the poetry itself. Such interest is quite external to the noble satire of the one and the acute analysis of the other. In the same way, to identify, with whatever circumstantial and extrinsic evidence, the characters of "The Shepherds' Calendar," or to demonstrate that Spenser, instead of being a flatterer, jeopardized his own position by running foul of Elizabeth's plans, as Mr. Cory does, is to make a contribution to the history of Spenser's character and sympathies, but cannot properly be said to increase or diminish the glory of Spenser's poetry. Any work of art depends for its value on what it expresses of itself, and not on anything gathered from without, just as it does not affect the poetic worth of Hamlet or Macbeth to prove that they were written by Bacon instead of Shakespeare. Mr. Cory himself remarks in one place that a sincere lover may write insincere love-poetry, and the reverse, though more unusual, is also possible. But in either case the strict poetical question is not whether the poet himself was sincere or insincere, but whether his poetry was one or the other. This is the only vital question when we set out to criticize poetry as an objective art-production.

A kindred consideration is this. Spenser himself in the preface to "The Fairie Queene" expounds in outline the meaning of his allegory; and the author of the "Critical Study" adds to the exposition the further idea that in its composition Spenser was haunted by a vision of an ideal England which he hoped to bring to partial realization. Now such interpretation, we claim, depends for its validity upon one question, viz., whether the reader recognizes in the poem itself the accomplishment of these intentions of the poet. If he does not, but if he must needs constantly refer to the preface in order to remind himself that Arthur symbolizes "Magnificance" and the rest, or if even in spite of himself he is so preoccupied with the glittering pageantry that he must pause from the text and make a conscious effort to recall the interpretation thereof, then the interpretation, however authentic or however supported by data, is not a criticism of the poem, but of the poet and his aims. But these aims, not being adequately expressed, are as irrelevant to the poetry as the title affixed to a futuristic painting. It is not what the poet aims at, but what he achieves that concerns the critic of poetry.

Furthermore, it is not what he says to his own contemporaries but his message to the universal heart of mankind. Many historical critics of our day insist so vehemently upon the poet being representative of his age that we are prone to assume it to be an essential ingredient of greatness. Indeed we have heard the principle asserted unblushingly. The contrary would be a truer canon. It would be safer to say that the greater the poet is, the less he represents his age. The greatness of Homer lies not in his portrayal of the customs and thoughts of Homeric civilization, but rather in the fact that, rising above the local and the temporary, he strikes chord after chord of emotion that have found an echo in the heart of every generation for three thousand years. And the interest we find in Spenser's poetry is not that he idolizes Elizabeth, nor that he fears Catholicism and abominates Puritanism, or indulges in any other fanaticism peculiar to his day. These things claim the attention of the historian. The lover of poetry sees rather that the poet expressed more sincerely or more gloriously than others have done loyalty, patriotism and whatever other ideals the whole world can sympathize with. The lover of poetry asks whether he has realized with truth and vividness the identity between Elizabeth and the Fairie Queene, and whether he has made this identity visible in his representation. These and similar considerations, and not the historical aspects of the poet, are what determine the rank of Spenser among the poets of the world.

And so it is that we do not care in the least that the poem suited the tastes of its own day, nor yet that it suits the tastes of ours. Mr. Cory pardons the incoherence of Spenser because of the immensity of his conception; Dryden might well have blamed the immensity of the conception because it marred the unity of the poem. Both blame and pardon are irrelevant until we can reach some satisfactory theory of relative values. The critical facts are that the design was broad—and the author interprets this design with skill—and, secondly, that the great design was not well grasped or executed. The business of the critic is to set a reasoned value upon these two facts if he can, or else to realize both facts vividly and in full measure, as indeed the author has done, and not to justify the defect nor to minimize the merit in the spirit of an advocate or partisan, the first of which the author has not always succeeded in escaping.

Like the most of modern critics, Mr. Cory is skeptical to the point of timidity of general canons of criticism. Yet it is only by being cautiously bold in formulating at least tentative principles that we can make a substantial addition to the study of art. The author of this work is well equipped by the range of his information to indulge in a little such audacity. He has brought together an array of critical opinions concerning Spenser ranging from the poet's day to our own. If, instead of adding to these his own judgment, he had correlated the verdict of the centuries and had made an attempt to generalize on the rather safe principle "Quod semper et ubique et ab omnibus," we think that his labor would have been still better spent and his work made more valuable for all time.

From what we have said, it will be gathered, we trust, that, even as it stands the "Critical Study" of Spenser is a valuable treatise for the student of the poet. As a matter of fact, in a volume of nearly 500 pages, the author analyzes and interprets all of the poems in minute detail. In the course of this interpretation he quotes generously from a large number of modern critics, either to substantiate his own point of view or to reprobate theirs. In the very entertaining concluding chapter, which covers more than one hundred pages, he discusses all the important utterances both in prose and verse concerning his subject down to modern times; and finally, after frankly acknowledging himself to be an ardent votary of his poet even from childhood days, he summarizes conveniently his own conclusions which have been dispersed and expanded throughout the volume. This should prove the book to be desirable in any library of literary criticism.

We must add in conclusion that we regret we cannot say as much as this for Mr. Cory as a moralist. His ethical ideas are often vague to the last degree, and seem singularly fluid and fluctuating, and, when we have had the patience to extricate his meaning, they have sometimes proved simply untenable.

REVIEWS

Hearts of Controversy. By ALICE MEYNELL. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.75.

The six essays in this book are characterized by that rare critical discernment and high distinction of style that always mark Mrs. Meynell's prose. In the opening paper, "Some Thoughts of a Reader of Tennyson," she well says that he certainly worked at his verses but that "He makes somewhat too much show of the hiding of his art," and that "He has more imagination than imagery." After separating what was of passing value in Tennyson from what is permanent, Mrs. Meynell reaches the conclusion that

> He is one of the few fountain-head poets of the world. . . . The lovely unbeloved is . . . the matter of his poetry and not its inspiration. . . . He is fresh with the things that others have outworn. . . . His was a new appreciation of nature. . . . He showed the perpetually transfigured landscape in transfiguring words. He is the captain of our dreams. Others have lighted a candle in England, he lit a sun.

In "Dickens as a Man of Letters," this Catholic essayist points out that that great Victorian novelist, though he imagined a larger number of evil people than did Thackeray, had a more eager faith in good ones than his renowned contemporary possessed. In answer to the familiar objection that Dickens did not know how to draw either a gentleman or a lady, Mrs. Meynell instances Cousin Feenix and Esther Summerson as proofs of the contrary, and singles out for special praise his unusual gift of always being able to tell just "what happened," and she then cites numerous apt passages from Dickens' works to show how infallibly he does it. Finally she maintains that pages penned by the author of "Nicholas Nickleby," notwithstanding frequent assertions to the contrary, can "be parsed as strictly as any man's" and that "His grammar is not only good but strong." In her paper on "Swinburne's Lyrical Poetry" the author convicts that singer, who laid himself out "to delight and seduce," of having "a perfervid fancy rather than an imagination," of being "a poet with puny passions, a poet with no more than the momentary and impulsive sincerity of an infirm soul, a poet with small intellect." The essay on "Charlotte and Emily Brontë" calls the reader's attention to those writers' remarkable genius for selecting the exact word that was required to express their thought perfectly, and to the striking vividness of the images they could call up, as when Charlotte wrote: "I looked at my love; it shivered in my heart like a suffering child in a cold cradle." The two concluding papers in the volume, "Charmian" and "The Century of Moderation," will make the admirer of Mrs. Meynell's prose regret keenly that they are so short. W. D.

The Expansion of Europe. By RAMSAY MUIR. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Co. $1.00.

This book is the second in a series of three, in which the author, who is Professor of Modern History in the University of Manchester, has made an interesting effort to interpret and unify the theoretical principles of political philosophy which must govern the world after the war. From a wide study of the colonization by which Western civilization has spread since 1492, he comes to the conclusion that the world has now at last really been made one by that civilization and that no theory is tenable that does not take in the whole world as one society, a striking return by induction to the position that three centuries ago Suarez enunciated a priori. ("De Leg." II, ch. 19, s. 9). Thus he defines the true imperialism as one that preserves ancient civilizations intact until they have become sufficiently modified to receive self-government; that gives its subject backward peoples the reign of law; that gives its settlers of European tradition, the fullest self-government, and a complete encouragement to national unity. These principles are gained by a study of the oldest and most experienced colonizing nations, France and England, who followed them, not as a theory and an ideal, and not without failures now and again, but as a fact and a practice.

To this doctrine that the function of a ruling power is that of a trustee on behalf of its subjects and on behalf of civilization, is opposed the doctrine of power, "the doctrine that the highest duty of every State is to aim at the extension of its own power, and before this duty every other consideration must give way." This latter is illustrated by the practice of Germany in her African colonies, especially among the Hereros. Thus from what in the past has been a successful and beneficial colonial policy the author erects a political theory for the world to be governed by in the future. It is, on the whole, a valuable and acceptable one, and yet at bottom it is after all a sort of higher utilitarianism. St. Thomas long ago supplied for such a theory the only reasonable and permanent foundation, the eternal and natural law. ("Summa," 1 2, qq. XC-XCV).

Again the book would also gain by a wider and deeper study of Latin America, whose present state, where it is disappointing, is not due, as is here implied, to the failure of Spain and Portugal, which really held a higher form of the trustee-theory, (Francisco Vittoria, "De Indis Prior," Tom. I, p. 358, ed. Lyons, 1557), but to the short-sighted and selfish machinations of Freemasonry. A perusal of the actual Bull "Inter Cœtera" will convince Mr. Muir that Alexander VI did not in the interests of Spain and Portugal close the seas against all other nations, but merely gave an arbitral decision imposing no obligation beyond those two alone. Besides it was merely a diplomatic document, with no reference to orthodoxy, as the author implies. The book has several good maps. J. W. P.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

The spring number of the Catholic Convert begins with a ood paper by Dr. James J. Walsh on "American Physician Converts," in which he cites the case of Dr. Thomas Dwight, Dr. Thomas Addis Emmet and Dr. Horatio Storer, all leaders n their profession, to prove that stanch Catholicism and minence in medicine and surgery are by no means incompatible. R. J. Walker, M. A., writes that the British Empire with its 3,000,000 Catholics may now claim to rank in a certain sense s a Catholic Power, for "Wherever the British flag flies, the Roman Catholic Church enjoys at least that minor degree of egal establishment which consists in complete recognition by he State, the right to hold property, the right to unhampered liberty of worship, and the right to proselytize without let or indrance." Miss Eva Dorsey Carr continues her interesting ccount of the way she became a Catholic, Mr. Harry Wilson ells "The Story of Mary of the Cafeteria and How She Was Brought into the Church," and Father Scott has a convincing aper on "The Hand of God in the Church."

The March Catholic World offers its readers an attractive able of contents. Theodore Maynard opens the number with paper on "The Guild Idea." George Nauman Shuster follows with an article on "The Ancient Vision and the Newer Needs," which is an examination of Emerson's philosophy, Joseph V. McKee has a strong exposition of the perils of Woman and Child Labor Under War Conditions," calls attention to the grave mistakes in this matter the European nations now see they have made and shows that we are guilty of similar follies over here. Brother Leo writes about "Jane Austen and the Comic Spirit," Katherine Brégy about "Aspects of Recent Drama in English," paying special attention to Stephen Phillips' plays. Moorhouse I. X. Millar, S.J., has a thoughtful article on "Carlyle and the Nineteenth Century," Mary G. Segar finds "Echoes of the Canticle of Canticles in Medieval Literature," Edmund T. Shanahan, S.T.D., examines "St. Matthew and the Parousia," Charles F. Aiken, S.T.D., writes on "The Myth of Soulless Woman," Joseph Francis Wickham on "The Glory of Padua" and Francis P. Donnelly, S.J., and Caroline Giltinan each contribute a poem to the number.

"Marching on Tanga" (Dutton, $1.50), by F. Brett Young, s an unusual war-book. First of all, the scenes it portrays are located in East Africa; and then, although a twice-torpedoed book, written by its author during his convalescence from serious wounds, it bears none of the marks of disconnectedness that characterize so many of the war-chronicles which are turned out every month, but is a well-written book. However that very fact gives the work an impression of unreality. For it is incredible that anyone, while struggling across the pest-ridden swamps, or crawling through the tangled bush, of southern Africa, could have indulged in the poetical musings which fill every page. If he had such thoughts he could not remember them so accurately after long weeks of the resulting exhaustion and fever.——"The Great Crime and Its Moral" (Hodder & Stoughton, London, 6/), by J. S. Wildmore, is a summary of the indictment against Germany and the Central Powers. It has confined in brief all the important evidence which goes to convict these nations of guilt in the inception, precipitation and brutal conduct of the war. The harrowing recital of the atrocities perpetrated by the invading armies in their occupation of Belgium, France and the East reads like a chapter from the life of Genghis Khan, and by comparison makes Attila somewhat of a philanthropist. The moral is evident.

EDUCATION

Not German, but Germanism

THE most drastic action of its kind yet taken by any American commonwealth is set forth in the sweeping resolution just made by the North Dakota State Board of Education ruling that the teaching of the German language shall be discontinued in all public schools of that State after July 1, 1918. Many city boards in other States have, as a result of the war, already given orders that the compulsory study of German be discontinued, and in some localities the teaching of that language has been informally abandoned, by choice, but this is the first instance in which a State Board actually removed German from the curriculum.

Is the action of the North Dakota Board wise and foresighted? Of the motive, there can be no question. In the final resolution the question must be granted to be local: there may be conditions in North Dakota which demand such legislation. But generally speaking, are we not in danger of going to harmful extremes in matters of this kind?

The Value of the Language

THE point we must keep in sight is this: that it is not German, that is, the teaching of the German language, to which we as a people object, and which we have a certain reason to fear, but the teaching of Germanism in our schools. As far as the language itself is concerned, it has and will have its intrinsic value. No matter how completely the German military power is beaten in this war, and no matter how severely it is made to suffer for its crimes, the German tongue will continue to be spoken, and will continue to be the key to one of the world's great literatures. In view of that, we will be only biting off our nose to spite our face in altogether dropping it. Of course, no one argues that German will ever become an international medium, such as French. The experiences of American travelers in Europe have demonstrated that; for we who have had our German in high school or college, and have gone abroad, have found ourselves able to use that German in Germany only. Had we been given French instead, we could not only have gone with ease through the Latin countries of the Continent, but even in Germany it would have served us almost as well as did our halting school-book command of Deutsch. As far as utility is concerned, it would indeed be better for us to teach French and Spanish in our schools. But this does not invalidate the literary value of German. Scholars will continue to be interested in the language, however it may fall short of other foreign tongues as an international and commercial medium of exchange.

Why the Outcry?

WHY then the outcry against the teaching of German in our schools? Is it pure jingoism? Is it a case of losing our heads? Have we permitted the passions of war to lead us to extremes that we shall yet regret?

It is not altogether jingoism, nor perfervid patriotism. There is a basis for the alarm against the teaching of German in American schools; and it is this basis that we must discover in order to discuss the question with clear heads. The true reason for the opposition against German in the schools, whether that opposition expresses itself merely in a personal dropping of the study or in such drastic action as that just taken in North Dakota, is simple. The teaching of the German language has been, and is being, utilized as a medium of propaganda by those who rank Teutonic ideals above the ideals of America. German in our schools has become too often "Germanism," the inculcating of a kultur alien and antagonistic to American principles. This is true of our public schools, as investigation has plainly shown.

In regard to these schools, the investigations of the Public Safety Commission of Minnesota, for an example, recently revealed these facts: Two hundred schools in that State are at present using German, in whole or in part, as a medium of instruction. Ten thousand children in the Commonwealth of Minnesota are being brought up practically as aliens, with more familiarity with the language of Germany than the language of their own country. This does not mean that the children in these schools are merely "learning German." It means that they are being taught in German, that they are being shaped and molded into German, and not American, citizens.

Disquieting Facts

THIS is the record of but one State, and a State bordering closely enough on North Dakota to throw some light, perhaps, on the action of the Board of Education of the latter place. And what of the rest of the country? A survey of the question, made recently by the Bureau of Education at Washington, and relating particularly to studies below the seventh grade, reveals the fact that in nineteen cities having a population of 25,000 or more the teaching of foreign languages prevails; and of these nineteen, twelve are wholly given over to German. In a few cities, Cincinnati among the number, German is taught in all the grades of the elementary schools, and this has been done for over forty years.

Is there anything in these figures to cause us alarm? There would not be, did all this mean merely the study of a foreign language, as an accomplishment, but the facts show that it means far more. The facts that the war has disclosed are disquieting. They are plainly these: that in communities where German is in common use, and not only taught, but utilized as the medium of instruction in all branches of study in the schools, the development of patriotic sentiment and loyal support of the American government has been retarded to a degree that can no longer be countenanced.

An Insidious Danger

BUT does the teaching of German necessarily, and inevitably, connote the teaching of Germanism? We need not dwell on the problem of the German press in America to answer that question, although, in passing, it is impossible for us to blink the fact that the true source of the power of that press, which has done so much already to blind and deceive our fellow-citizens of German blood, has been the so-called German-American school. A glance, rather, at some of the text-books used in those schools will better serve to clear the question. There is one book, for instance, still in use in many of our schools: Im Vaterland, a supplementary reader, even the cover of which carries its message to youthful minds, and the frontispiece of which is a portrait of the Kaiser. This book is a genuine implement of the propaganda of Germanism, instead of a mere innocent help in the study of the language of Germany, as it purports to be. Here are some of the doctrines—for they are nothing short of that—insidiously woven into the story it presents of a tour of the Fatherland, the burden of this story being a glorification of every Teutonic institution, custom and principle that can possibly be enumerated:

Germany must have a great army, because it is surrounded by enemies.

Germany is great because of Bismarck's formula of blood and iron.

None of Germany's children love her as much as those who have come to America.

Germans who have left the Fatherland must never forget the German tongue, but must cherish it as the dearest of all gifts; or woe betide them.

O, Germany, of all your children none love you as dearly as we Germans, far from you, across the sea!

This is the sort of thing that is being taught to American children in our schools, and this is but a sample.

Objectionable Texts

ANOTHER is the well-known tale Höher als Die Kirche which is German propaganda pure and simple, touching on the question of Alsace-Lorraine, altogether, of course, from the German side. Still others are Manley's Ein Sommer in Deutschland, Gronow's Geschichte und Sage, Niese's Aus Danischer Zeit, Werner's Heimathlang, and Prokosch's Lern und Lesebuch. These books, and many others like them, contain the propaganda of Germanism to which Americans object.

There may be no question of the loyalty of our schools. But there is a question concerning the teaching of Germanism to our children. The sooner the question is settled the better. The thing cannot be countenanced and must be done away with however our boards of education may manage it.

The Children's Year

APRIL 6, the anniversary of the entrance of the United States into the world war, marks the beginning of the Children's Year, which is to close on April 6, 1919. During this period the lives of 100,000 of the nation's little ones are to be saved in the welfare drive now inaugurated by the Federal Children's Bureau. Each State has been assigned its definite quota of lives to be fostered in the course of the year. State councils of defense and State women's committees are called upon to assume responsibility for the State quotas which have been officially assigned. They are as follows:

The saving of these 100,000 lives is only part of the complete ogram which includes the welfare of the 30,000,000 children der fifteen years in the United States.

Defect in the Apportionment

The apportionment, it may be noticed, has been made on the sis of the population under five according to the 1910 census, thout taking into account the varying death rates in the dif- ent States. The period under five years is regarded as particu- ly hazardous, and hence the efforts of the campaign are ected mainly to the salvage of children at this stage of life. nce the registration both of deaths and births of infants has en seriously deficient in a large number of the States, it fol- vs that a high mark may be set for some States which have eady a low death rate, and a very moderate mark for other ctions of the country where the death rate has been excessively gh. But this inequality is unavoidable. "If the registration of ths and deaths were complete in all the States," says the ildren's Bureau, "an apportionment of quotas of the 100,000 es to be preserved by the various States could be made upon different basis."

Why 100,000?

It is the common conviction of public health authorities that e-half the deaths of infants in our country are easily preventa- . At present 300,000 children under five years of age die each ar. Not only could the lives of the 150,000 children thus lost ring the past year have been saved, if babies were well born d well cared for, but medical authorities furthermore assure that the death of most of the 150,000 mothers who died during e course of that same year could equally well have been pre- nted. It is clear, moreover, that in saving the lives of the ildren the mothers will likewise be better provided for and ore carefully protected. In view of these figures the Children's reau believes that it is not asking too much in demanding the scue of 100,000 infants during the coming year, in spite of the thdrawal of a large proportion of doctors and nurses for war rvice.

Not only is it the purpose of the Bureau to prevent the un- cessary deaths of so many thousands of our little ones, but it ould also preserve them in better health. It is well known that e examinations of the conscripts have resulted in a consider- le number of rejections because of physical defects. Many of ese, the Bureau believes, could have been remedied in infancy in early childhood, had they then been recognized.

Example of England and New Zealand

Very interesting facts in regard to possibilities of preserving ild life are revealed in the report of the Chief Medical Officer the Local Government Board for England and Wales, pub- hed in 1917. It enables us to compare the number of infants each district who died during the years 1916 and 1917. While e general confusion of the first year of the war resulted in a rge increase in infant mortality, there was an actual lowering in e death rate during the second year of the war, far below that hich had obtained previous to war itself. This result was due the financial aid granted to the various sanitary districts and the policy of securing health visitors for every mother and by, establishing health centers for consultation and providing spital care for sick mothers and babies.

The strongest argument, however, is drawn from the New aland statistics, which show that the rate of infant mortality s steadily decreased in spite of the war and is now almost actly half the rate for the registration area of the United ates. This implies that one baby in twenty dies in New Zealand hereas one baby in ten dies in the United States.

Methods Proposed

The methods by which it is proposed to save the lives of the children are thus briefly summarized by the Children's Bureau:

(1) The registration of births so that there may be an immediate record of every child born; and nursing and medical skill may be provided wherever family income does not permit its being secured independently.

(2) For every mother prenatal care, necessary care of doctor and public nurse at confinement, and after care.

(3) Children's conferences where well babies can be taken periodically to be weighed and examined, and clinics where sick children may be given medical advice.

(4) The organization of State and city divisions or bureaus of child hygiene.

(5) The guarding of the milk supply, that every child may have his quota of clean, pure milk.

(6) An income making possible decent living standards.

The Children's Year is to be inaugurated by a nation-wide weighing and measuring of babies and children of pre-school age, to be concluded within the first sixty days. It is maintained that weight and height constitute in general a fair standard of development. The records will all be gathered and tabulated by the Bureau.

The Moral Aspect

An aspect which the Children's Bureau overlooks, and which is the most vital of all, is that which concerns the religious influences which alone can restrain the vices and self-indulgence of countless mothers. Aside from the pagan refusal on the part of many women to bear the burdens of motherhood, and the vicious doctrines of birth control, which are likely to be urged with a particular insistence during a campaign like the present, there is the further fact that the purity and religious habits of mothers constitute a physical safeguard for their children. If the child is to be truly well born it should be born of a mother in whom the observance of the law of God has created a sweet harmony between the faculties of soul and body, where sense is subject to reason, and reason bows to faith. In this and in no other way shall we secure for our children their full heritage, physically and intellectually no less than morally. Yet religion, though the most important, is evidently not the only consideration. It presumes that all purely natural precautions are likewise taken. But the perfection of physical well-being can exist only in a chaste and God-fearing generation.

Our Duty as Catholics

The object of the present article is merely to offer a general statement of the facts connected with the present campaign, its purpose, reason and methods, without attempting any discussion. Whatever the results may be, it is well for Catholics to learn the lesson of the needless loss of so many lives of both mothers and children. Every effort should be made within each parish to prevent this wastage and detriment to Church and nation. As Catholics we shall need in the future all the strength of our young manhood and womanhood for the promotion of the great interests of God. It is no slight contribution to the Catholic apostolate to aid in multiplying the possible workers in the vineyard of the Lord, and it is high time that we assume a far more serious attitude towards our apostolic mission in the world. As citizens and patriots we know that we can render no better service to the land of our birth or adoption than to give to it the greatest number possible of true Catholic citizens. Their loyalty to God will be the surest pledge of their intense loyalty to the Stars and the Stripes, wherever they may wave.

NOTE AND COMMENT

Navy and Militia Chaplains

A COMPLETE list of chaplains in the navy, showing their rank, denomination and present duty, including the acting chaplains and those in the naval militia and the naval reserve, is printed in a recent number of the Official Bulletin issued weekly by the Committee on Public Information. There are twenty-two navy chaplains, the majority of them ranking as captains. Four are Catholics, of whom two rank as captains and two as lieutenants, junior grade. The acting chaplains of the navy number seventy-nine, the rank in every instance being that of lieutenant, junior grade. Twenty of these are Catholics. The naval militia chaplains are ten in all, eight of them belonging to the Protestant Episcopal Church. There is no Catholic priest on this list. Of the eleven naval reserve chaplains one is a Catholic priest with the rank of lieutenant, junior grade. The grand total in all branches is 122, including twenty-five Catholics.

New York Catholic War Fund

THE Knights of Columbus drive in the archdiocese of New York aims at collecting between $2,000,000 and $3,000,000 during the week beginning March 17. Outlining the purpose of the fund Cardinal Farley says:

> We are asking the people of the Archdiocese of New York, Protestant, Jew and Catholic, for this money. We are asking it to finance extensive religious and social work in our army and navy stations. We shall not for one moment conceal the fact that we seek this money as Catholics, and that our first aim is to protect the faith and morals of our Catholic soldiers and sailors. The material comforts, the social and recreational facilities which we supply will be at the service of every man in the army and navy, but our chief concern in undertaking this work is the spiritual welfare of the sons of Holy Church.
> Gentlemen, we have a right and a just claim to public support in this movement. Our right and our claim are based upon the fact that the great Church which we represent is the strongest and most enduring defender of this Government. We represent one-third of the population of this great city, and we confidently assert that in every contribution of service to the nation from New York, one-third at least has been Catholic.

To assure to the Knights of Columbus the entire sum desired from the archdiocese for their magnificent work each parish is asked to collect a stipulated amount. The Knights of Columbus war budget up to December 1 of the present year calls for an expenditure of $7,500,000. Of this sum approximately $4,500,000 is to be provided for overseas activities, $1,000,000 for construction, equipment and maintenance of buildings in camps, and $1,000,000 for the support of chaplains and for stationery and incidentals. More than eighty buildings have already been constructed in camps and cantonments in this country.

Righteous Patriotism

FOR some time past the editor of a frowsy Methodist journal, the Christian Advocate, a paper that has more respect for turgid rhetoric than historical truth, has been yapping vociferously at the Pope because forsooth His Holiness is pro-German. And the humor of it is that the Advocate's last yelp had scarcely died away when, according to the New York Times, under date of March 8, "the leaders of the New Jersey Methodist Conference" declared "that the courses of study laid down by the commission which maps out the teachings for new ministers of the faith are 'nothing more than another form of German propaganda teachings that have their organization in Germany.'" If Methodists are to be believed the Advocate should sell its bark and buy a shovel for the stable at home. This advice becomes all the more necessary in view of these words, spoken recently in the Senate by Senator Gallinger of New Hampshire.

> If there was any soldier on the Union side during the Civil War who was not a good soldier, who has not received a pension, I do not know who he is. He can always find men of his own type, equally poor soldiers, who would swear that they knew that he had been in the hospital at a certain time, whether he was or not—the records did not show it, but they knew it was so—and who would also swear that they knew he had received a shock which affected his hearing during a certain battle, or that something else happened to him; and so all those pension claims, many of which are utterly worthless, have been allowed by the Government, because they were "proved." . . . Why, look at the so-called Methodist Book Concern claim! Just give a moment's thought to that, Senators who were here when that bill was passed. The Methodist Book Concern—I think of Nashville, Tenn.—came in here with a claim of seventy-odd thousand dollars, as I remember, for the occupation of the building that they employed as a publishing house; and it was sworn before the Court of Claims that they were loyal men, every one of them devoted to the Union cause, that there was not a Confederate among them. It was further testified upon the authority of a very distinguished man that that claim was so honest that they had not employed any attorney to prosecute it; and upon those representations the claim was passed. But it developed shortly afterwards that in that concern they were printing Hardie's "Military Tactics" for the Confederate Army, and that they were actually making munitions of war also for the Confederate cause; and it further developed that, in place of there being no attorney employed, almost one-half of the amount of that claim went to an attorney, the matter becoming so notorious that the Methodist Church demanded that that money should be returned to the United States, but it was not returned.

In case the Advocate cannot find a shovel sufficiently lar and durable for this midden heap, it might be persuaded to co tinue to yap, but not at the Pope.

"Great Secret Orde Opens Attack

AN open manifestation of anti-Catholic propaganda recen occurred before the Maryland Legislature during t House Committee's hearing of two bills aimed at the destru tion of Catholic institutions. They had been introduced Delegate Benjamin Haughey, of Baltimore, at the instance George Waldron, editor of an anti-Catholic paper and natio organizer of the "Great Secret Order of America." Waldr himself spoke before a gallery packed with his followers w vociferously applauded at the signal or desire of their lead The following is in part a description of his address as r ported in the Baltimore Sun:

> Waldron began his address with the statement that he intended to make no attack on any religion. Yet, although he spoke nearly an hour the two bills which he was supposed to speak for were scarcely mentioned, except during the last 10 minutes. The rest of the speech was devoted entirely to Catholics at the head of Government bureaus and in other Government positions; Catholics as soldiers in the United States army, fighting abroad or preparing to fight; a Catholic priest at the head of the American Red Cross in Italy so highly praised by the Italian Government; Catholics on the draft boards throughout the country who, Waldron said "were reaching in and grabbing out of the minority such a large number of Catholic soldiers." He was referring to the fact that, while the Catholics comprise only about 15 per cent of the entire population of the country, records show they have at least 35 per cent and probably a greater percentage of the membership of the United States army. This fact seemed to gall Waldron more than anything else, and he drew sinister inferences from it. Although he used it then as a basis for his argument, later in his speech he referred to it as not true.

It is interesting to notice how the very patriotism of Ca olics is already being used against us as a weapon for our u doing. Direct attacks were made upon Cardinal Gibbons, t Vincent de Paul Society and St. Mary's Industrial School. T purpose of the lobbyists was to withdraw all State aid fr Catholic institutions. "The Roman Catholic government," w the insane charge of the anti-Catholic clique, "is the great graft in the State of Maryland." On the previous day anoth bill had been hotly debated which was described even by an ind nant Masonic Delegate as "Only one of a series of bills whi have been introduced here aiming blows at the Catholics."

Chronicle

The War.—In the sectors northwest of Toul and east of Lunéville the American troops successfully raided the enemy trenches, on two occasions reaching the German second and third line. They also destroyed a large supply of gas projectors which had been discovered by their aeroplanes. All through the week the enemy kept up a series of powerful attacks on the British lines in the Ypres sector around Armentières, while his artillery was active south of St. Quentin, north of the Scarpe, and along the British front between Hill 70, north of Lens and Festubert, southeast and east of Messines, east and northeast of Ypres, and in the neighborhood of Vierstraat south of Ypres. A large German raiding party attacking positions of the Portuguese troops near Laventie was caught on the front and flanks by machine fire and suffered heavy casualties. In the Champagne region west of Mont Carnillet, the French regained the trenches which the Germans had won from them on March 1. At the same time French detachments penetrated the enemy lines at Mont Blond and returned with some prisoners. Almost at the same hour French infantry were driving off German attack on their positions at Massiges. General Pétain's forces advanced half a mile on a wide front at Malancourt, in the Verdun sector on the west bank of the Meuse. According to Berlin dispatches reporting movements from the front of the German Crown Prince, an extremely violent fire was directed against the German positions north and northeast of Prosnes, while a strong French party advanced on a wide front but succeeded only in obtaining a footing in the foremost German trenches west of the Thuizy-Naury road. In Palestine, attacking over an eleven-mile front on the coastal section, British troops, on March 13, advanced to an average depth of three miles, taking several villages on either side of the Wadi Abuledja and Wadi Deir Ballut. North and east of the Jerusalem-Nablus road the British are still making steady advance.

Bulletin, Mar. 11, p.m.-Mar. 18, a.m.

On March 11, the President addressed a message of sympathy to the Russian people through the all-Russian Congress of Soviets, which was to meet on March 12 in Moscow, to indorse or reject the treaty made with the Central Powers by the Russian delegates to the recent peace conference at Brest-Litovsk. The text of the President's message is as follows:

The President and Russia

> May I not take advantage of the meeting of the Congress of the Soviets to express the sincere sympathy which the people of the United States feel for the Russian people at this moment when the German power has been thrust in to interrupt and turn back the whole struggle for freedom and substitute the wishes of Germany for the purpose of the people of Russia?
> Although the Government of the United States is, unhappily, not now in a position to render the direct and effective aid it would wish to render, I beg to assure the people of Russia through the Congress that it will avail itself of every opportunity to secure for Russia once more complete sovereignty and independence in her own affairs and full restoration to her great role in the life of Europe and the modern world.
> The whole heart of the people of the United States is with the people of Russia in the attempt to free themselves forever from autocratic government and become the masters of their own life.

The message was telegraphed to the American Consul at Moscow for delivery to the congress.

The appeal of the message was warmly received by the American press. "It expressed," says the New York Tribune, "... the heart feeling of one free people for another." The New York World asks: "Can history produce a greater example of patience shown by one nation toward another?" The New York Evening Post says: "Certainly President Wilson never showed more clearly his trust in moral force." As to the interpretation to be given to the message there is a wide divergence of opinion. The New York Times looks upon it as a step taken by the President to counteract any feeling that might have been aroused in Russia against the Allies. The New York Sun thinks that it virtually pledges the United States to "rescue Russian sovereignty from German clutches before ending the world war." The New York Herald says that the message makes it clear that the

The Press and the Message

President does not share the view of the Entente Powers that the Russian people are incapable of administering the affairs of their own country. The New York Tribune says that if the words of the message mean anything, they mean "that this government would like to offer military support to Russia." According to the New York American, "The President's message to the Russian Soviets is a practical recognition of the Bolsheviki Government." The more common view among influential papers in the American press seems to be that the message is addressed not so much to the Bolshevist Government as to the Russian people. The Congress of Soviets expressed its appreciation of the Presidential message in the following resolution:

> The all-Russian Congress of Soviets expresses its appreciation to the American people and, first of all, the laboring and exploited classes in the United States for the message sent by President Wilson to the Congress of Soviets, in this time when the Russian Socialist Soviet Republic is living through most difficult trials.
> The Russian Republic uses the occasion of the message from President Wilson to express to all peoples who are dying and suffering from the horrors of this imperialistic war its warm sympathy and firm conviction that the happy time is near when the laboring masses in all bourgeois countries will throw off the capitalist yoke and establish a Socialist state of society, which is the only one capable of assuring a permanent and just peace as well as the culture and well-being of all who toil.

Two days after the message of the President to the Soviets, German troops entered Odessa. When the Central Powers signed the treaty of peace with the Ukraine Rada on February 9 they purposely left the southern boundary of the new State indefinite. The Ukrainians, or Ruthenians, themselves have always claimed the Black Sea littoral, whose chief city is Odessa, one of the great commercial ports of the world. Nearly a month later, March 9, the preliminary peace treaty forced upon Rumania contained a clause binding Rumania to allow the transport of German troops through Moldavia and Bessarabia to Odessa. A few days later, the German press announced that Germany had acquired a direct route by way of Russia to Persia and Afghanistan. For across the Black Sea, 600 miles southeast of Odessa is Trebizond, wrested from the Turks by the Russian Caucasus army in the spring of 1916, but recovered from the Russians a few weeks ago by the Turks. Trebizond is one of the starting points of the great caravan routes leading into Persia and through Persia via Teheran, Yezd and Irman into Afghanistan, the western bulwark of India. Before the war the annual exports of Odessa were more than $50,000,000, sixty-five per cent of it being grain. Odessa has a population of about half a million. Since the capture of Odessa the Germans have occupied Nikolayev.

Germany and Russia

On March 14, the day after the Germans entered Odessa, the All-Russian Congress of Soviets, meeting at Moscow, by a vote of 453 to 30, decided to ratify the Brest-Litovsk treaty with the Central Powers. In view of the repeated violations by both the Germans and the Russians of the line of demarcation fixed for the Pskov front, the Germans demanded the establishment of a new line ten versts east of the present Russian position. Germany claimed that the change was necessary to strengthen her strategic position. The Caucasus Government issued a statement in which it refused to indorse the Brest-Litovsk treaty, which cedes Kars, Batoum and Ardahan to Turkey, and declared that peace with Turkey can only be signed by the Caucasus Government, which has sent its own delegation to Trebizond to discuss its terms. The opening of peace negotiations at Kiev between Russia and the Ukraine was reported in a Vienna dispatch to the Vossische Zeitung at Berlin. According to the dispatch, the Ukrainian Rada will soon meet to ratify the peace treaty with the Central Powers.

So far no very definite action has been taken by Japan with regard to the occupation of Siberia. A strong conservative element in Japan, led by such men as Baron Shibusawa, President of the American-Japanese Association, and Yukio Ozaki, leader of the Constitutionalist party, advocates extreme caution. Other supporters of the Japanese Administration point out that the hour of action has not struck. They say that first it is necessary for Russia and the rest of the world to understand that Japan is engaged in no chauvinistic or selfish adventure and desires nothing more than to safeguard the East, assist the Allies, and, if possible, save Russia from German domination, which, according to them, means the mailed fist in the Far East. The Chinese attitude is one of the most serious features. It is recognized that this is China's great opportunity, and Japan is urging the leaders in the north and in the south to settle their differences, form a capable national government at Peking and join Japan and the Allies in guarding the frontiers and helping Russia.

Russia and Japan

Ireland.—On March 13 a striking example of America's interest in Ireland was furnished by the Legislative Committee on Federal Resolutions of the Massachusetts General Assembly, which voted unanimously to report favorably a resolution calling upon Congress to "pass such measures as may be necessary to provide that the right of Ireland to be a free and independent country shall be considered at any peace conference which may be held at the termination of the present war." A few days after Mrs. Sheehy-Skeffington, acting in the name of Sinn Fein and Irish-American organizations with a membership of 750,000, filed with Representative Flood, chairman of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, an open letter asking that a date be set for a public hearing on the numerous resolutions now pending in Congress on the Irish question. The document read in part as follows:

America and Ireland

t least eight members of the House of Representatives have oduced resolutions on Ireland's claims at the peace confer-e. Almost every issue of the Congressional Record contains norials and petitions from Americans of Irish descent urging gress to take up the consideration of the Irish question at time. reat Britain, as the President has frequently reminded us, ot our ally but merely our co-belligerent. As he has shown is position on the proposed invasion of Siberia by Japan, attitude toward our co-belligerents is to be defined not by a ne regard for their selfish interests but by eternal principles right and wrong. Upon those principles Ireland's case is ed. Among the "voices of humanity" which are "in the " surely none is more poignant and persistent than the voice hat unhappy island whose fifteen million exiles are among the t devoted sons and daughters of this Republic. On their alf we respectfully ask an early opportunity to be heard.

Among the resolutions pending are those introduced by resentatives McCormick, Gallagher and Mason of nois, McLaughlin and Morin of Pennsylvania, Ken-y of Rhode Island, Cary of Wisconsin and Rankin of ntana.

Proceeding, the author points that the new leaders' "essential policy is so to lead Irish people that they will give neither excuse nor vocation for military intervention."

Italy.—Two dispatches sent from Rome by the Associated Press call attention to certain alleged scandals which have taken place in the Italian War Mission. According to the dispatch of March 3:

The Italian War Mission

In a speech on March 2, Senator Marconi urged the Italian Government to adopt energetic measures concerning reported irregularities in purchases made in the United States by the Italian Mission.

The second dispatch has to do with the reports which have been current for several months that pressure was being brought on Marconi to succeed Count Macchi di Cellere as Ambassador and High Commissioner to the United States. Apparently he is reluctant to take the post for reasons which he does not disguise.

Senator Guglielmo Marconi has not yet decided whether he will accept the leadership of the Italian Mission to the United States. The Senator says he is not willing to shoulder certain financial scandals which have arisen.

The members of the Italian War Commission are considerably exercised over these statements.

Belated news is now throwing more light on the famous Article XV. of the secret treaty between England, France, Italy and Russia. The text of the article as published by the Isvestia, a Russian newspaper, is as follows:

Article XV

France, Great Britain and Russia bind themselves to support Italy in not allowing representatives of the Holy See to undertake diplomatic action relating to the conclusion of peace or to the settlement of questions connected with the war.

When the article was published last December in Russia by the Bolsheviki, and later made its appearance in the press of England and the United States, Italian censorship refused to allow it to be printed in Italian newspapers. Lord Cecil's admission in the House of Commons that the article in question existed and his interpretation of it in the sense that the Pope was to be excluded because peace conditions should be discussed only by belligerents was also suppressed in the Italian press. When Baron Sonnino was questioned about the matter in the Italian Parliament he is reported to have made the following statement:

No secret clause exists in the agreements between Italy and the Allies affirming that France, England and Russia would support Italy's opposition against any step on the part of the diplomatic representatives of the Holy See relating to the conclusion of peace or to the solution of questions connected with the war.

On February 13 M. Bevione read the convention, as published by the Bolsheviki, in the Italian Chamber, and Baron Sonnino took occasion to give the following explanation of his denial:

I cannot by reason of the secret agreement with our Allies, restore the text, no matter how it may have been changed. If in the case of Article XV, published by the Bolsheviki, I made great haste to oppose an immediate denial to a false version of it, my reason for doing so was, that such a version might wound the feelings of a considerable portion of the nation in its devotion and respect for the Holy See, a group which has performed and is performing in a noble way its duty to the country; and because the version of the Bolsheviki tended to create the belief that there was some connection between the attitude taken by the Powers of the Entente on the occasion of the last Papal peace note and the agreement of London. . . . In the publication of Article XV by the Isvestia the purpose is clear: to provoke distrust and hostility towards the Government in connection with the note of the Pope. The Allied Powers came to the common decision, spontaneously and not by reason of any bond arising from previous agreements or in virtue of any statement on our part, that it was inopportune to make any answer to the Pope's note after President Wilson had published his reply.

Bound as I am by the agreement, I do not consider myself authorized to add even a word, apart from the repudiation I make of a falsification executed with a manifest purpose. I do not intend in any way to prejudice the right of the Italian Government to take its own stand on the admission or non-admission of representatives either of the Holy See or of non-belligerent States to the eventual general conference which shall in any way treat of the conclusion of peace.

Taking up Baron Sonnino's explanations, and especially his statement that the Italian Government reserved to itself the right to declare its attitude on the admission or non-admission of the Holy See or non-belligerent States to the eventual peace conference, the Osservatore Romano remarked in an authorized article published February 18 that it was in entire accord with the Italian Government in the matter of his right, but that this did not remove the insult done to the Holy See:

Let us avoid all equivocation. No one denies this right to the Italian Government; and if Article XV had concerned all the non-belligerent States, as the Honorable Sonnino says, and not the Holy See only, no one would have a word to say. It is not the affirmation of this general right but its restriction to the Holy See which constitutes an injury and gives offense.

The Osservatore Romano had already declared on February 16 that the explanations given by Lord Cecil had softened but not removed the injury to the Holy See:

If the article in question had determined that no non-belligerent State should be admitted to the peace conference without the consent of the four Powers which signed the convention, there would be nothing to say; but the exclusion of the Holy See alone, which was to be left to the decision of the Italian Government, is offensive, and it is against this that we protest.

In its issue of March 17, the New York Sun published an article sent from Rome, bearing the date of February 28, in which the present misunderstanding between the Vatican and the Italian Government concerning the exclusion of the Holy See from any participation in the settlement of the terms of peace is attributed partly to Austro-German efforts to create some such complication. The writer claims that even before the secret treaty was signed on April 26, 1915, the news concerning the article excluding the Pope had leaked out, and that the Vatican was made aware, probably by information conveyed by Germany or Austria, not only of the existence of the article in question but also of the text of the entire treaty. Germany and Austria, he says, at once started an active propaganda, both in Italy and neutral countries, for the inclusion of the Pope in the peace conference. The "Roman Question" or the restoration of the temporal power to the Pope, according to the same writer, was also launched by Austria and Germany, with a view of p venting Italy's participation in the war. The Pope, ho ever, he declares, repeatedly disavowed any intention renewing the claim of temporal power.

Japan.—According to the New York Evening Po special "Japan Number" issued on March 16 Japan's f eign commerce during the year 1917 surpassed all t

Great Commercial Prosperity

Empire's previous records. The va of her exports was $799,000,000 a her imports for the first time in J an's history passed the $500,000,000 mark. These figu indicate a gain in exports of 42 per cent and in imports 37 per cent over the year 1916, her exports exceed her imports by $291,000,000. This remarkable incre in commercial prosperity is chiefly due to the fact t Japan has secured a great deal of Germany's and E land's former trade with the United States and Orient; and to the export of war munitions to Japa European allies, particularly Russia. Moreover Jap has lent to her allies $650,000,000, the British Gove ment taking $140,000,000. The following figures ill trate Japan's expansion as a commercial nation:

Exports from Japan.		Imports into Japan.

It is worthy of note that the total Japanese populati of continental United States on June 30, 1916, was 94,3 the consular districts of Seattle, Portland, San Francis and Los Angeles containing all but 5,176 of the sum-to of the Japanese in this country.

Russia.—March 12, the first anniversary of the Ru sian revolution, marked the transfer of the countr capital from Petrograd to Moscow, and was celebrat as a national holiday. The exod from Petrograd before the advanci Germans seems to have begun early the month, when trains overcrowded with soldiers a civilians left the capital for the south and east. Tho who could find no room on the trains fled on sledges or foot for the depths of Russia. The evacuation of t city took place without noise or disorder, provisio enough being found to feed the population. On Mar 12 Premier Lenine and practically all of the gover mental commissaries arrived at Moscow and officia opened the various ministries. Many of the buildings the ancient Kremlin, the leading hotels, etc., were quisitioned for the housing of the various officials. The Priest in the Trenches

J. HARDING FISHER, S.J.

THOSE who have had the pleasure of reading such books as "Impressions de Guerre de Prêtres Soldats," first published by Léonce de Grandaison, S.J., in the Etudes, and later collected in two lumes under the same title, "Le Prêtre sur le Champ Bataille," by Joseph-Papin Archambault, S.J., and ner similar studies of the heroic part taken by the fightg French priests have doubtless felt a thrill of satisfacn and admiration at the lessons of patriotism and courge given by these calumniated and persecuted victims anti-clericalism. A conservative estimate has put it on cord that out of the 30,000 priests called to service in e French armies more than 3,000 have been killed, an tremely large proportion in itself, but the more remarkle from the fact that many of the enlisted priests, being o old or ill for service on the fighting line have not me within the range of fire at all. Out of the 750 ench members of the Society of Jesus fighting for ance more than fifteen per cent have lost their lives, d of those still alive ninety-three per cent have been corated. It is the same with the other religious and e secular clergy. These facts should be remembered r future refutation of stock calumnies concerning the nstantly exploited double allegiance of Catholics.

In every phase of military service the French priests ve signalized themselves: as chaplains, as officers, as ivates, in the air, at the guns, in the trenches, as retcher-bearers, and attendants in hospitals. Incapacited by wounds for further service in one branch of e army they have passed to another, so indomitable s been their passion of self-sacrifice for the welfare d honor of their country. Speaking of an article in recent number of Etudes, called "L Idée de Patrie," e editor makes the following comment:

> The Etudes has already published, in its issue of December 1915, an excellent article under the same title, written anonysly by Lieutenant J. Rullier, who was at that time convalescing om two severe wounds received in the war. Father Rullier und himself debarred from further service in the artillery; cordingly he entered the flying corps, and it was as a lieutenant the aviation department that he met his glorious death for ance on March 23, 1917.

is notes like the above that sadden but glorify the ges of the literature of the war.

The priests have fallen in greater proportion to their mbers, perhaps, than any other class in France, and e reason is not far to seek. They have been eager to ke on themselves the posts and the work most fraught ith danger. A little incident told without embellishent by Père Antonin Eymieu, S.J., in his brochure, En Face de la Douleur," is an apt and forceful illustraon: "The captain said: 'Eight men are needed for a ry perilous mission.' Eight men stepped out of the ranks. 'All priests!' was the comment of their comrades." The spirit of self-sacrifice, of never counting the cost of duty, long since a habit, the desire to make reparation for the sins of their country, and a love of France not dampened but rather intensified by expatriation and persecution, nerved their priestly hearts, where others blanched with fear. So it has been with the clergy as a whole. The record of their deeds of valor is written in gold.

No one will deny that the example of their heroism, devotedness and purity of life has made them a spectacle to angels and to men. Their military service was a thing that should never have been forced on them, and yet God has known how to draw good out of evil. Through the merciful workings of Divine Providence they have exercised a powerful influence on their countrymen by the very fact that they left smoking guns to offer the Sacrifice of the Mass, and laid aside dripping bayonets to lift their hand in absolution. It was their soldier-garb and their soldier-deeds which first disarmed suspicion and gave the lie to calumny, and enabled them to win their way to soldier-hearts.

Anticlerical hatred, which expressed itself so bitterly in the law of 1889 and was completed in the law of 1905, and which trusted to prevent or at least to spoil vocations to the priesthood by drafting ecclesiastics into the army, has proved, as a writer in the Civiltà Catolica remarks, a veritable vendetta. Contrary to sectarian expectations, religious oppression has diminished neither the number nor the zeal of the priests; rather it has filled the ranks of the French army with unsuspected chaplains, who have been recognized, officially and otherwise, as the highest type of military valor and patriotism. Thus it has come to pass that the very means chosen by the French Government to wreck Christianity in the land which at heart is so thoroughly Catholic, has become one of the most potent instruments for that country's religious resurrection. This fact is testified to by a military chaplain quoted in the Dublin Review for October, 1915:

> How Providence loves to baffle all human calculations! The politicians never guessed that by the law of the curés sac au dos they were going to give to the ministry of the priests a new field of action and means hitherto unknown by which they might reach men's souls. And yet it is this which has happened; and the religious life now manifest in the French army is one of our firmest reasons for hoping that God will give us the victory and bring back the whole of France once more to the Christian traditions of its Catholic past.

The French priests are everywhere, and as a consequence incidents like the following, taken from the Dublin Review, and told by the Abbé B., a sergeant in an Alpine regiment, often take place:

> We have just spent five days in the trenches. Well, the first evening my men said to me: "Listen, you who are a curé, or nearly so, you must say the prayers for us." You may imagine with what joy I consented. So every evening I said the prayers aloud and everybody answered.

Another incident, related in the same number of the Dublin Review, gives an example of a still more sacerdotal form of ministry:

The regiment [the 29th infantry] was in the trenches and under heavy fire. Suddenly a priest from the Basque country, a corporal, leaped up on the bank, exposed to all the enemy's fire. They cried to him to come down, but he commanded silence with a gesture. "Many of you," he said, "will never come back. I am going to give you absolution." He knelt down, his whole body exposed to the enemy. Every head in the whole trench was uncovered. With a voice that trembled a little, he said the Confiteor. A bullet whistled by his ear, he faltered a little, but soon recovered himself, and finished steadily. Then he gave the absolution, and added: "For your penance you will say with me three Our Fathers." Calmly and with joined hands, he went through the prayers, still kneeling there, while the others repeated them with him. Then he dropped back into the trench, quickly enough this time, and the danger once over, began to laugh. Among his hearers there were several who felt more inclined to cry.

Such incidents could be multiplied indefinitely. One of the remarkable things about them is the ease with which the soldier assumes the dignity of his priesthood and uses his God-given authority to preach and rebuke, even his superior officers, and the reverence which is shown him in the exercise of his priestly functions. Once these are over he lapses back into a trusted and popular comrade-in-arms. Such a state of affairs, impossible under normal conditions and brought to pass by the iniquitous law which forces priests into the trenches and puts rifles into their anointed hands, is having a large share in the moral and religious regeneration of France.

But when all this is said and recognized, and due allowance made for the undoubted fact, it still remains true that the fighting priest is an anomaly in the Church. The shedding of human blood is utterly alien to the sacerdotal character; it has never been permitted to priests, except in the case of justifiable self-defense or as an act of military duty, in a just war, when the law of the land requires of the priests service in the army. As is clear from the century-old discipline of the Church, the instruments of war have no rightful place in the hands of those destined or ordained to the ministry of souls. The priest's mission, like Christ's, is to lay down his own life for his flock, not to take the lives of others.

Nor is this a matter of mere fitness or sentiment; it is accurately provided for in the legislation of the Church. All those who have killed or mutilated another or have mutilated or attempted to kill themselves incur irregularity, which means that they are permanently debarred, unless the Church lifts the irregularity, from the reception of Holy Orders; from promotion to higher Orders; that is, from the priesthood if they be deacons, and from the episcopate if they be priests; and from the exercise of the functions conferred on them in ordination. This irregularity the new Code of Canon Law has been careful to retain, for we read in Canon 985 that irregularity is incurred by all those "who have committed voluntary homicide . . . have mutilated themselves or others or have attempted to take their own lives."

At first sight it would appear that the French priests who are taking part in actual fighting, fall under the canon. A moment's reflection, however, shows that such actions of theirs as result in the taking of human life are not wholly voluntary; on the contrary, they are done under compulsion. The matter is clear from the established practice and teaching of the Church; but it has been made doubly clear by a recent decision of the Sacred Penitentiary, one of the three tribunals, which together with the Sacred Congregations, make up the Curia.

Knowing the mind of the Church, but desirous to set at rest the anxieties of many priests subject to military service in his diocese, the Bishop of Verdun asked some years ago for an explicit answer to the question whether the priests, forced by the French law to take part in actual warfare, incurred irregularity. In a decree, approved by Pope Pius X and dated May 18, 1912, the Sacred Penitentiary referred the Bishop to the teaching of approved authors; and Father J. B. Ferreres, S. J., the noted Spanish canonist, commenting on this answer in the Razón y Fe for the same year, gives it as his opinion that, according to the teaching of approved authors, the French priests did not incur the irregularity. The Sacred Penitentiary, however, to set all doubts at rest, was not content with referring to the teaching of approved authors, but went on to say that, should it happen that the priests did actually incur irregularity, they have, notwithstanding, the permission of the Holy See to receive and administer the Sacraments. The decision is new evidence of the reasonableness of the Church; the point to be insisted on is the fact that, although the Church tolerates, under certain conditions, active participation in war on the part of her priests, she regards such participation as wholly at variance with the sacerdotal character.

That priests should be on the firing line as combatants is universally regretted; and even those French writers who do homage to the excellent apostolic work done by priests in the field, for example, A. Michel in the Revue Pratique d' Apologétique, for November, 1916, nevertheless maintain that the same priests, except in certain extraordinary cases, could have done splendid work, more work with greater effectiveness, had they retained their soutanes as regular chaplains and been free to devote all their energies to their sacred calling, instead of being obliged to snatch odd moments and chance opportunities for its exercise. How true this is appears from the single example of Cardinal Mercier, who has done more for the cause of Belgium and the Allies than either he or countless others could have accomplished had they been forced to apply their efforts to the actual military defense of their country.

The State and Labor

JOSEPH HUSSLEIN, S.J.

BEFORE the advent of the Church the duty of the State towards labor was almost entirely ignored. Even among the Jews the conditions of labor were far from ideal, although the hardships of the bought or hired servant were greatly reduced by the Divinely-given legislation. Religion has ever been the main defense of the workingman. Paganism in its most complete material development despised labor under every form. The history of labor in the ancient pagan world is mainly the history of slavery, and slaves were the merest chattel in the eyes of the pagan State. According to the wording of the Roman law, they were to be regarded: "Pro nullis, pro mortuis, pro quadrupedibus"; "As nothing, as dead things, as four-footed beasts." That, in brief, was their legal status. They could not even contract a marriage which the law would recognize.

The same conditions returned when Christianity was swept away by the barbarian hordes before the new dawn of the Ages of Faith. The slave was the master's property. Even with returning civilization his testimony could not be received in court except under torture. Such were the rights of labor in the eyes of the State, except where Christianity had been able to bring relief. After the lapse of centuries, the Church succeeded in impressing upon the public administration a new concept of the rights and dignity of the laborer, which the State was bound to safeguard under the Christian dispensation. By her doctrine of brotherly love and the example of the God-man, she brought about the abolition of slavery and gradually ameliorated the lot of the serf, until the day of his complete emancipation dawned. But long before that period she had been active in inspiring and directing social legislation in favor of the workingman.

The laborer, as viewed by the Church, is an integral part of the living organism of society. He has therefore social rights that must be protected and defended by the State. Numerically, he represents by far the greatest element within the commonwealth. Industrially, the prosperity of the entire community is inseparably connected with his daily toil. "It may be truly said that it is only by the labor of the workingman that States grow rich," wrote Pope Leo XIII. Hence the public administration is under an obligation, not merely of charity, but of strict justice, to provide for the welfare of its laboring classes, and it is the duty of every government to see that "They who contribute so largely to the advantage of the community may share in the benefits they create." ("The Condition of Labor.")

But the obligation of the State is based upon even higher considerations. Transcending the purely material order, this duty of safeguarding all the just interests of the working population is founded upon the end of society itself, which, in the words of the Holy Father, is "to make men better." Economic conditions, as we need hardly repeat here, can exercise the most vital and far-reaching influence upon the moral and religious life of the people.

"In all well-constituted States," says the great Pope of the workingmen, "it is a matter of no slight importance to provide those bodily and external commodities the use of which is necessary to virtuous action." It is possible, indeed, for men to save their souls under the most distressing economic conditions, but in general such circumstances will constitute a serious obstacle to morality and religion. Hence their removal is practically "necessary" if virtue is to thrive in any community. So the duty of the State to protect the rights of the working classes and to provide for their material well-being is lifted into the higher sphere of true, noble and virtuous living.

From this, as an important corollary, follow the right and the duty of the Church to insist that the State shall faithfully discharge its duties towards the laboring man and the poor. Catholics may not be indifferent to the social question, nor may priests and bishops ignore it. The Supreme Pontiffs have here set the noble example which all are to imitate according to their ability. From whatever aspect or angle we may view the social question, it will always remain a religious as well as an economic, political, and legislative problem. Such it was in the days of Isaias, when he exhorted the Jews: "Learn to do well: seek judgment, relieve the oppressed, judge for the fatherless, defend the widow." Such it is today. It is through the State, as a last resort, that we seek judgment, bring relief to the oppressed and secure justice for the fatherless and the widow, as witness the Workmen's Compensation act and the Mothers' Pension law.

No defense can be offered for the post-Reformation principle of laissez faire, or non-interference on the part of the State. Under this policy collective bargaining was forbidden to the laborer and only the fulfilment of contracts was safeguarded by the public authorities. It was the theory under which the demoralizing form of uncontrolled capitalism came into existence and grew into a menace to civilization. Yet it was universally upheld by the Protestant economic schools of the day and accepted as a practical working principle of the new Protestant statecraft. The inevitable reaction against it gave birth to anarchism, Socialism and all the various forms of modern radicalism. The principle of individual bargaining, based upon it, was the economic source of an endless train of evils, as the principle of the individual interpretation of the Bible had been their religious origin.

The laissez-faire policy could obviously have no other effect than the destruction of the economically weaker party and his complete oppression, without any hope of redress or assistance from the State. To imagine that the rights of capital and of labor would balance themselves, without any superior control, was no less palpable a deception than to fancy that man's nature could develop most perfectly by granting full license to all its senses and faculties. Yet this logical transference of the principle of laissez faire, from the economic to the moral order, has actually been made in our modern plays and novels, and in the philosophical and educational literature of the day.

When the need of State interference in economic life was finally admitted, the fatal superstition still lingered on that the first object to be safeguarded at all hazards by the State was the industrial prosperity of the country, meaning the interests of large fortunes, rather than the economic welfare of the masses. Catholic State action in favor of the people is even today confused with Socialism, to the great gain of the latter, whose borrowed plumage hides its real nature. Socialism is not identical with a reasonable State protection, but with State tyranny and State absolutism. Whatever popularity Socialism may possess is entirely attributable to its camouflage Catholicism.

The principle of State interference can thus be briefly summarized: The State is called upon to act wherever the general welfare of the community or the just interest of any particular class is imperiled. State interference is a last resort, to be invoked when private means are inadequate. Under every form of society such action will at times be necessary to secure the rights of the weaker party. But the principle of turning over all power and initiative to the State is a fatal delusion upon which Socialism is founded. It finds no authorization in Catholic teaching. We shall briefly indicate here four aspects under which the welfare of the laborer may be guarded by intelligent legislation. It should be noted that we are concerned here merely with the rights and not with the obligations of labor, which must similarly be enforced by the State where the public welfare requires it.

Religiously it is the first duty of the State to secure for the laborer his Sunday rest. This implies a cessation of work consecrated by religion. The Sunday rest was instituted that it might preserve the human dignity of man made to the image and likeness of God, enable him freely to lift up his thoughts in worship to his Almighty Creator and afford him the necessary leisure for the outward practices of religion.

Morally it is the duty of the State to alter conditions of labor which threaten to prove detrimental to virtue. Thus the employment of children by night and as messengers sent into questionable surroundings, the temptations to which women are frequently exposed under certain conditions, and the various circumstances that lead to vice among the laborers in factories and elsewhere, are instances which call for prompt and strict legislation wherever due provisions are not made by the employers.

Physically there arise the problems of sanitation, of the prevention of industrial accidents and of all the many regulations that can secure for the worker such surroundings and conditions of labor as are consonant with his human dignity. "Women," as Pope Leo XIII warns us, "are not suited for certain occupations; by nature they are fitted for home work." It is the duty of the State to prevent their employment in occupations detrimental either to their physical or their moral well-being. The good of society requires this. In the same manner children may not be placed in workshops and factories "until their bodies and minds are sufficiently mature," nor may they be exposed to conditions that "would blight the young promise of a child's faculties and make any real education impossible." So, too, the hours of labor must not be excessive: "As a general principle, it may be laid down, that a workman ought to have leisure and rest in proportion to the wear and tear of his strength; for the waste of strength must be repaired by the cessation of work." ("The Condition of Labor.") We are furthermore told that it is the duty of the State to remove the causes from which labor troubles are bred.

Socially the State must remember that normally a family depends upon the wages of the workingman. Hence it is not only necessary that his wages be adequate to support a home in Christian decency, but also that provision be made for the possibilities of unemployment, sickness, accidents and other circumstances, including death itself which may remove the bread-winner from his daily task while the family at home is deprived of his support. Hence the many insurance provisions, the workmen's compensation laws, the old-age and the mothers' pensions and similar enactments. Here again the general principle must be laid down that self-help rather than State-help should be aimed at in such legislation. Where it can equitably be done it is better that insurance laws should not be based upon State support. This, however, supposes an adequate wage, a question which calls for special discussion.

As a final argument and as a summary of all that has here been said, we quote the words of Pope Leo XIII:

> If by a strike, or other combination of workmen, there should be imminent danger of disturbance of the public peace; or if circumstances were such that among the laboring population the ties of family life were relaxed; if religion were found to suffer through the workmen not having time and opportunity to practice it; if in workshops and factories there were danger to morals through the mixing of the sexes or from any occasion of evil; or if the employers laid burdens upon the workmen which were unjust, or degraded them with conditions that were repugnant to their dignity as human beings; finally if health were endangered by excessive labor, or by work unsuited to sex or age—in these cases there can be no question that, within certain limits, it would be right to call in the help and authority of the law. ("The Condition of Labor.")

The limits referred to here are defined by the extent of the evil itself or of the danger that is to be removed. So far, and no further, should the State intervene in the conditions of labor.

Lenten Scenes in an Army Camp

CHAPLAIN GERALD TREACY, S.J., U. S. A.

THEY crowded into the K. C. hut, those long lines of khaki. A stone's throw away, at a Y building, a moving-picture show was in progress. I do not know whether there was an entertainment going on at the K. C. hall that night. The crowded lines were after something different. They were formed by Catholic soldiers waiting to receive the ashes that marked the beginning of the great season of penance. It was very much the same as Ash Wednesday a year ago, or a thousand years ago, with the Faithful lovingly gathering around the sanctuary rail and listening to the "Memento Homo." Only this was a plain wooden building with book-racks and paper-files, benches and writing-tables and the Lord of All looking down on the scene from His rude rough throne in a simple jewelless tabernacle, the best we can give Him in an army camp. A very attentive congregation it was, too, that listened to the chaplain explain the meaning of the ceremony of Ash Wednesday. A mile away, at a Y building, the same scene took place, only there was no tabernacle to distinguish the building from any other amusement hall. In a K. C. building the folding doors are closed at the end of Mass or devotions. When the doors are open the Catholic soldier is in church. The solemn quiet tells you so, if you do not happen to know why several hundred soldiers will become suddenly silent at the opening of two folding doors. It is a very striking thing to experience on Friday and Sunday evenings when devotions are about to begin. The hush of reverence seems like a breath of the supernatural that hovers over Catholic worship, whether in the mighty cathedral or the humble hut in an army camp.

In the Base Hospital at the extreme end of Camp Greene regular Lenten devotions are held. Here the audience is not all in khaki. The nurse's uniform and the convalescent's robe add a touch of color to that earth-like uniform that is calculated to render troops in modern warfare less visible. Now the Base Hospital has no resident chaplain. The regimental and K. C. chaplains visit the sick, but no one is officially appointed to look after the medical detachment or the nurses' unit stationed there. One of the regimental chaplains, however, seeing the need, has been saying Mass and having Lenten devotions at the Base. The night I was there I recalled Kipling's "Fultah Fisher's House," where "There were men from every port, from Mississip' to Clyde"; a group of nurses from California, a medical detachment recruited from all over the country and convalescing soldiers that hailed from everywhere. The spirit of Lent reached them all and the power of the great Catholic Church brought them all together for a prayer-period, when the day's labor was done. The congregation at the Base Hospital deserves more than a passing meed of praise. To go to Mass or evening devotions is much harder for a member of a medical detachment or a nurses' unit than it is for a soldier. The soldier's Sunday and all his evenings are his own, unless he is on guard or "K. P." In many instances in this camp he is in easier reach of Mass or church service than he would be at home. This is not so, however, of those who are doing their bit at the Base. Living up to Catholic practice means much more of a sacrifice than it does for the soldier in his regiment. Sunday is not free for the nurse that is on duty, nor is it an easy thing to go to Mass or devotions after many hours in the ward. The fine thing about the Base Hospital congregation is that it has initiative. As soon as it was assured of having Catholic services an organ was purchased and a choir formed. I know of only one regiment in camp that has cooperated as well with its chaplain as have the members of the Base Hospital congregation. That regiment is the old First New Hampshire Infantry, now the First Army Headquarters Regiment.

These soldiers, about 2,300 of whom are Catholics, began Lent with a general Communion. Their chaplain called on all the camp chaplains to assist in hearing Confessions. We began at one o'clock in the afternoon and were kept going till nightfall. The tents on Officers' Row were used as confessionals and men and officers were lined up outside in the mud and rain awaiting their turn. It was one line of khaki where rank did not count. At the close of the afternoon the captain of Company D, whose tent I had been occupying, asked me to go down to the end of his company street to hear the Confession of one of his men who was confined to quarters on account of a slight illness. As we came splashing back through the rich red mud of North Carolina and had come alongside the company mess-hall, a very pronounced murmur was audible. "Do you know what that is, Father?" Of course, I did not. "The Catholic boys in my company assemble in the mess-hall every evening after retreat to say the rosary. That is a custom in this company." How simple I thought would be the work of the Fosdick Commission, or any other commission that has the real moral welfare of soldiers at heart, if the weapon of prayer was theirs to wield as it was wielded in this company of the First Army Headquarters Regiment. Every energy is used by the different camp agencies to uplift the men and make of our army a clean body of troops. Yet it is a very common experience with chaplains who are dealing with members of every sect to find how few have any idea of the need and power of prayer. At the Base Hospital one day I came across a case that is typical. A nurse asked me to talk to a boy who had only a few hours to live. Neither the nurse nor the patient was a Catholic. "He has not a relative living, and it will make his dying easier if you say a word to him," was the nurse's plea.

The soldier's story was brief. He had followed the religious belief of his mother. When she died he stopped going to church, and as far as he could remember had never said a prayer from the day he left his village Sunday-school, a lad of twelve. Had he seen a minister of his sect? No, if one came around he would not object to talking to him. But there was no need. "What can a minister do for me now? There is something different with the Catholic soldier and the priest. I don't know what it is. But they understand each other." The next day when I visited the ward that hospital cot was empty.

You find a world of contrasts in the ordinary army camp today which is a good picture of the manhood of young America, men of all shades of religious belief and of no belief at all, Catholics both good and poor. The outstanding fact in all the camps in or out of the Lenten season is that Y halls and K. C. halls are filled at the Sunday Masses, and wherever there is a nearby town with a Catholic Church there is always a good sprinkling of khaki at the services no matter how many services may be held in camp. This in face of the truth that the Catholic soldier is given no bait to attract him to Sunday Mass. In two cities nearby the camps where my regiment has been stationed, I have noted the number and variety of inducements held out to the soldier by the churches of the different sects. Over the Catholic church stands the Cross only, pointing heavenward. And there they crowd under its saving shadow, those men in khaki!

Much has been written in book and magazine articles about the effect of the war on religion. The most contrary opinions are expressed. This much is certain about the effect of mobilizing large numbers of troops in Southern camps. It is an educational benefit to those communities, which are for the most part non-Catholic. For the large percentage of Catholic soldiers give an object-lesson in Catholic patriotism that is worth a hundred written arguments. In the present national crisis khaki speaks louder than words.

The Literature of Leisure

BLANCHE M. KELLY

HE has aged considerably within the year which is the duration of my acquaintance with him, an acquaintance grounded on observation only; his eyes are dimmer and he shuffles in his walk. He has also grown somewhat shabbier; his nondescript garments are a whit more nondescript; he is a degree more slovenly. But it is difficult to reach the reading-room of the public library earlier than he or to leave it later. No hour dismays him and he is daunted by no kind of weather. As a general thing he pursues a solitary and silent way, but occasionally one may hear him address a remark tentatively facetious and tinctured with culture, to one of the attendants, from whose air of supercilious forbearance it is plain that he is regarded as a dotard meriting but scant consideration.

Night takes him to who shall say what garret, what sordid wretchedness? Who knows on what sorrows he sups or amid what cold comforts he lays his head? But the longest and the coldest night—save one only—has an end, and when the library doors swing open in the morning he is on the threshold, and he enters as one coming into his own place. He does not come as most folk do, with a definite purpose written in a determined air, having on hand a disputed point to be cleared up, a magazine article to be written, a subject to be studied. He comes to read. He would browse, if that were possible, if the library were not so huge and so impersonal. As it is, he does not approach the open shelves at all, but waits for the good wine he has selected to be sent up to him by the cellarer, unhurriedly chooses his seat, and his day has begun.

For he is a bookworm, one of a fast disappearing species, and an unusually rare phenomenon in a public library. And the literature he chooses is the literature of leisure. It is old wine, therefore, wine with the flavor of the tun about it and the class which consumes it grows as rare as the class which produced it. Now of the consumers, connoisseurs in their line, this sorry derelict is one. Not that he is a tramp, mind you. The day is still far off when these doors may be closed to him as the doors of another library were closed to Francis Thompson—as though by some strange irony its winged guardian were shut from Paradise and the way barred with his own shining sword.

How this bookworm came by his leisure I cannot say, whether it be well- or ill-gotten. It may be that his is enforced idleness and that the weapon he selected to kill time with—"as if," as a sage has said, "we could kill time without injuring eternity"—has turned to a wand of beneficence in his hand. Or it may be of his deliberate choice that he goes poorly shod and thinly clad, preferring the undubious luxury of leisure to the less obvious benefits of shoes and coat. It is not the austerity of the scholar which impels him; he has not merely postponed possessing until it shall be warranted by achievement and recognition, for as I have said, age is coming upon him and the day of achievement is past for him, if it ever dawned.

He may, of course, have his immortal hopes; somehow I think he has. For he chooses to consort with immortals, and when he opens his book and yields his soul to converse with his peers he is a pleasant sight. He reads the poets and the philosophers, he reads Plato his "Dialogues," and Augustine his "City of God"; he reads

Herodotus and Mandeville—smiling the while, as who would say in the Ettrick Shepherd's phrase: "It's a gey Sefu'-like story"—he reads Sir Thomas Browne and the "Compleat Angler" and Pindar's "Lives" and Lang's Homer. In the street the newsboys are shouting of a terrible engagement in France, but he is looking on "the face that sank a thousand ships" and watching a battle rage under the walls of Troy. The world roars past outside; the city comes and clatters at the windows and he does not hear. Closer and more real to him is the scent of Helladian violets and the taste of the heather-honey on Hymettus-hill.

Do not judge him too severely nor blame overmuch that must seem his criminal inactivity in these days of world concern and stir. Not of this world is he a citizen. He is not of those who read the newspapers and the best-sellers. He does not even belong to the category known as the reading public. Indeed it is part of his tragedy that his only library is a public library. For he is one of that small group of which Thomas à Kempis confessed himself to be another, who love "little books in little books," little in the sense in which Crashaw wrote, "Lo here a little volume but great book."

The reading public, on the other hand, is driven by a goading sense of duty from problem-novel to problem-play, from war-book to war-book, always with an increasing sense of the futility of attempting to "keep up." And those who write these books go scurrying about the world in motor-cars or railway-trains, pounding out their works between train-connections or while waiting for change. How many, even of those whose energies never take them past a doorstep on which the wolf crouches, would welcome as Gissing did release from the literary grind and the large leisure that came to his scarred soul, too late to heal it of all its bitterness, but not too late to give the world one of the late fruits of leisure. For who produces nowadays the literature of leisure? What catalogues contain beckoning titles about a man's armchair or his fireside or his study window? Who gives us the thoughts of his idleness? Who buttonholes us with his first paragraph and decants for us a mellow wine, a wine that needs no bush, a wine that is not to be gulped, but sipped and tasted and rolled on the tongue? Who holds us in our seats with the witchery of his table-talk and persuades us that the night is young and it is over-early for good friends to part? And when finally, after ambrosian hours, we tear ourselves away, who lingers pleasantly in our memory as one in whose company "We have heard the chimes at midnight"?

No, there is a certain breathlessness even about Mr. Chesterton's very brilliancy. Men write in a hurry for a hastening multitude who want to read as they run and object to having their course impeded and made a kind of obstacle-race by citation and allusion and unwonted word, even though it be the inevitable one. They are swift of foot as Atalanta, but they will not pause for all the golden apples in the world.

It sometimes seems as though those simple folk were not wholly wrong who attributed the first multiplication of books to the power of Beelzebub. And yet we know that it was in the spirit of heavenly achievement that Guttenburg contrived his invention and William Caxton "emprised to print." The die-cutters who wrought the old black-letter type worked with as meticulous a care as the monastic scriveners who adorned their script with gold and cramoisie, and they who wrote the books that were so lovingly perpetuated did so in a like spirit of consecration, as witness the conclusion of Thomas Malory, Knight: "I pray you all, gentlemen and gentlewomen that readeth this book of Arthur and his Knights from the beginning to the ending, pray for me while I am on live, that God send me good deliverance, and when I am dead I pray you all pray for my soul." These are the words of a man to whom the writing of his book was as knightly a deed as might be undertaken by prince or paladin and who from the grave's brink could look back upon it, without self-conceit or complacency and yet with the serene assurance that for a life's work this were enough and so take it with him to the judgment. For a book is not merely a matter of signature and covers; these are its body. But books that live have souls; into an immortal book its maker has infused a spark of his own immortal element. It is made to the image and likeness of his spiritual part as his soul in turn is made to the image of his Creator and so in some sense is a reflection of Divinity. How then is the making of a book a task to be done hastily, to supply a demand as a man raises vegetables for the market, or to provide for the needs of the body or to catch the post?

And if so much sacred deliberation go into the making of a book surely the reading of it demands the tribute of reverence. So, at least, thought St. Benedict when he provided for the duties of the weekly reader. "After Mass and Communion," is his counsel, "let him ask all to pray for him, that God may keep him from the spirit of pride. . . . And so, having received the blessing, let him enter upon his reading." Libraries, of course, are all very well in their way, even public libraries. But no man ever wrote a book in order that it might be preserved in a library. Not thus do books live, and that is why it is sometimes hard to recognize in a book-collector a book-lover. Let our books be well cared for, by all means, and decently and variously bound—and not with orphan-like uniformity—but not so daintily that they may not be read and read often. For spirit must hold converse with spirit and unless the soul of a book meet the soul of a man it were better that it should perish utterly. It were better that its leaves should be torn out and scattered to the four winds and so the predestinate word meet the foredestined eye rather than that the book should be preserved inviolate forever. That is why I would crave your patience for my bookworm, for this old man who continues to see visions although the young men have ceased to dream dreams.

Irish Not Catholic

THOMAS F. MEEHAN

WHEN in the course of human events it becomes necessary, especially on Washington's Birthday and March 17, for a large number of distinguished orators and popular writers to point with pride to the record which their Catholic brethren have made in the annals of this Republic, few can resist the temptation to become enthusiastic over the "Friendly Sons of St. Patrick," originally of Philadelphia. In spite of the fact that this was neither a society of Catholics nor a Catholic society, piety and patriotism are blended in an iridescent dream or rather a historical nightmare.

Soon after 1720 there was a numerous influx of immigrants from Ireland to Pennsylvania. This continued into the nineteenth century, but it was mainly from the northern counties. These people were largely non-Catholics and they were proud to be Irish without prefixes or suffixes. It was only when several generations later the Catholic Irish from the south and west began to come over in thousands that narrow bigots invented the term "Scotch-Irish" to cover the difference in faith between the two. As Campbell, in his "History of the Friendly Sons of St. Patrick," says: "The St. Andrew's Society of Philadelphia was organized twenty-two years before the Friendly Sons of St. Patrick, and yet the 'Scotch-Irish' members of the latter society organized a distinctively Irish organization to keep alive the memories of old Ireland."

This Society of the Friendly Sons was founded on St. Patrick's Day, 1771, with twenty-four regular and six honorary members. Stephen Moylan was elected president. He had only two Catholic associates, Thomas Fitzsimmons and George Meade, among the thirty founders. At the meeting of the Society on December 18, 1781, General Washington was "unanimously adopted" a member of the organization. When later he was formally notified of this fact and presented with "a gold medal, the ensign of this fraternal Society," Washington wrote: "I accept with singular pleasure the Ensign of so worthy a Fraternity as that of the Sons of St. Patrick in this city—a Society distinguished for the firm Adherence of its Members to the glorious cause in which we are embarked."

We are told in the Society's official history that the period from 1781 to 1790 was the most prosperous in its career, and the gatherings at which Washington was present are often adverted to by patriotic writers and orators. There were only two of these occasions, an extra meeting at the City Tavern on January 1, 1782, and the anniversary dinner for St. Patrick's Day, 1782. At the January meeting of the thirty-five members present only three were Catholics: Thomas Fitzsimmons, Morgan M. O'Brien and Jasper Moylan; at the St. Patrick's Day dinner the only Catholics were Thomas Fitzsimmons, Morgan M. O'Brien, the three Moylans, Stephen, Jasper and John, and George Meade. There were sixty-six members then in the Society.

The Society of the Friendly Sons of St. Patrick in New York was founded in 1784, and its founder, Daniel McCormick, for forty years its president, was not a Catholic. He was for years the Grand High Treasurer of the New York Masons. In the list of early members no Catholic names appear other than Dominic Lynch, 1793; Cornelius Heeney, 1804; John Sullivan and Andrew Morris, 1805, and Dr. William James Macneven, 1815. The Irish merchants and professional men who made up the membership for the first two or three decades were North of Ireland Protestants.

The oldest Irish society in the United States is the Charitable Irish Society of Boston, founded on St. Patrick's Day, 1737, by "several gentlemen, merchants and others, of the Irish nation residing in Boston, in New England, from an affectionate and compassionate concern for their countrymen from these parts who may be reduced by sickness, shipwrack, Old Age and other Infirmities and unforeseen accidents." The rules limited its membership to "Natives of Ireland or natives of any other part of the British dominion of Irish extraction being Protestants and inhabitants of Boston."

Time and the marvelous increase of the Faithful all over the country have radically changed the character of all these and similar societies, but the records of their former status cannot be impeached, and it is unwise to make claims about them that are not well founded and that necessitate embarrassing explanations. Our Catholic contribution to the founding of the Republic can rest without fear on the testimony of Washington himself. "I presume," he wrote, on March 12, 1790, to the four representatives of the Catholics of the United States, "that your fellow citizens will not forget the patriotic part which you took in the accomplishment of their Revolution and the establishment of their Government."

The moral of all this is the need of a wider and more practical study of American Catholic history. History is an exact science nowadays and for our own repute we can no longer afford a toleration of the loose, inaccurate methods of the past.

A digression by way of illustration will not be out of place. While this is being written I find in a Western Catholic weekly a report of a Washington's Birthday celebration at which an esteemed ecclesiastic is quoted as saying:

> As an American Catholic I refer with pride to the patriotic part my co-religionists took in the war for the freedom of our country. The history of the revolution cannot be truly written without recording the patriotic deeds of the Catholics who participated in it. . . . General Sullivan, another American Catholic, whose father came from Limerick, Ireland, struck the first blow on land.

If the orator had gone to the proper source for his information he would have discovered that there was no more blatant anti-Catholic bigot at that time than this same General, in spite of his Limerick schoolmaster father and his sturdy "redemptioner" mother.

In another paper usually well edited and most interesting is this editorial paragraph:

> A priest was sent to prison by the judge of a court of law in New York years ago because he would not violate the seal of the confessional to betray a criminal who had made a disclosure to him in the confidence of the Sacrament of Penance. The priest was named Kuhlman. After a while the priest was liberated, and the legislature passed a law that such communications were confidential.

This refers to one of the most famous incidents in our local history, but it must be amended by the statement that the priest was never arrested; that his name was not "Kuhlman," and that he did not languish in jail. From such slips a lesson can be drawn: This time the lesson is that Catholics should rid themselves of their indifference to Catholic history and learn what their ancestors in the Faith did actually accomplish in life.

The "Saturday Evening Post"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

It is gratifying to see that so many readers of AMERICA take the time and the trouble to invade the editorial sanctums of secular magazines with letters of complaint, whenever they find that certain writers have attacked our Faith or have made light of things which we hold in the highest estimation. In his letter contained in AMERICA for March 2, Mr. Michael Williams, who also voiced his complaint to the editor of the Saturday Evening

Post in regard to Miss Frazer's article, goes on to say that he fears that unorganized writers can do little in this matter of bettering conditions. However, I think that they can do a great deal of good, for these complaints will help to make both the editors and the writers more careful in the future.

Some time ago, for example, I sent a letter to Katherine Mayo in which I protested against her description of the priest in her article, "The Honor of the Force." In her answer she states that there is no religious bias in what she has written. I also wrote to the editor of the Saturday Evening Post regarding that article of Miss Frazer, in which she writes about the Italian debâcle and the causes which brought about that disastrous retreat. In order to make my protest all the stronger, I sent along with it the trenchant editorial in AMERICA which takes the editor of the Post to task for having published such a calumny when the true facts in the case had already been made known. I also sent along the article containing Mr. Walcott's retractation, in which he honestly took back a former statement attributing to the Pope a measure of responsibility for the Italian disaster. I received a dignified answer from the editor of the Post, in which he states that in his opinion, something has been read into that article which cannot be found therein. However, he also stated that he had brought the matter to the attention of Miss Frazer and that she would give her version of the case in one of her forthcoming articles. Meanwhile I am anxiously awaiting her version of the case.

Now, without knowing more about them, I would not accuse these writers of bigotry or unfairness. I really think that their unfair attacks are due to that lack of logical thought which we meet so often in our "popular" literature, hear from the lecture platforms and also see printed in our papers and magazines. Statements are made with little or no thought as to their consequences or to the harm which may result from them and then when the speaker's or the writer's attention is called to the matter, he either denies that he made or wrote the statement or else he says that he is misunderstood; in fact, he seeks to get out of the difficulty as gracefully as possible. However, as a rule, these writers' attention is not called to their objectionable statements and they are thus led to repeat the offense. But at any rate, let us keep at them and make them show their true colors. Americans take pride in the fact that they give all persons a "square deal"; let us see that we get ours.

Prohibition and the Mass

To the Editor of AMERICA:

If Father Blakely's articles on "Prohibition and the Mass" present the issue in its true light, many pertinent questions suggest themselves. Among others these: (1) Are there in our written law any guarantees at all, which will safeguard a citizen in the exercise of his inalienable right to worship God according to the dictates of his conscience? Will these guarantees be effective, when a religious act is performed, not criminal or illegal, but which now some new statute indirectly makes illegal? The act in question, using sacramental wine, cannot be compared with the acts of blasphemers, fortune-tellers, and others, referred to in AMERICA. Such acts were criminal, and were considered so long before any statute was made. (2) Do State or Federal authorities claim for themselves inquisitorial or juridical powers, by which they are to determine, what external acts are essential to the exercise of a religious right, or non-essential? (3) Will the Government, State or Federal, accept the authoritative statement from a religious denomination, that a certain service, done in a traditional way, is essential to its practice of religion? (4) Will free American citizens accept as candidates for legislatures, men who hold it as a principle, that freedom in the exercise of religious worship must regularly yield to what they deem necessary in the way of prohibitive legislation? (5) In practical detail, what does the Constitution secure to a citizen of a State in these United States, when there is question of the outward public exercise of religion?

Explained, as Father Blakely explains it, and, apparently, as the Supreme Court applies our fundamental law, the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution, too, are nothing but "a scrap of paper," when actual use and enjoyment of freedom of worship are concerned. I say apparently, because it is not altogether conclusive, that the cases cited necessarily apply to the religious use of sacramental wine. We should not surrender any line of defense until forced to do so. However, it is clear, as AMERICA contends, that an exception in favor of wine for sacramental purposes must be inserted in every prohibition measure.

Many said complacently a few years ago that the situation now actually facing certain American citizens in Oklahoma and elsewhere would never come about. Will a similar situation face us all, because of similar Federal legislation? True it is, that the contemplated amendment to the Constitution is concerned with alcoholic liquors, used as a beverage only. But is there not danger of a development in the proposed Federal Amendment, just as there has been development in State prohibition laws? The development in Oklahoma has reached a point where a free citizen is no longer protected in the traditional, reasonable, holy rites of his forefathers, but instead, is deemed a criminal in the eyes of the law, when he makes use of these same rites. "Now is the acceptable time" for preventive agitation.

Some Irish Old and New

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Being a schoolteacher on Cape Cod I am often half amused and half-grieved when I see such pupils as the Kellys, the Murphys, the Collins's and the O'Briens who are certainly of Irish extraction attending the Baptist church. It seems a great pity that Mother Church is unable to build churches here on the Cape and thus safeguard the Faith of her young children. Churches of the Catholic denomination on Cape Cod are very much scattered and we are paying the penalty bitterly by having our youth, the flower of the land, snatched from our grasp under our very eyes. If this be what the term "new" Irish signifies, is it not time to rise up and restore these "new" Irish to their proper position among the "old" Irish so dear to the hearts of us all?

Bolshevism in America

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Your reference in the issue of March 9 to Wm. B. Thompson of New York and Bisbee, Arizona, and his exuberant praise of Bolshevism prompts me to ask what may have led Senator Calder of New York to have Thompson's lucubration printed in the Congressional Record, and to have reprints sent broadcast over the country at the expense of the tax-payers? As well fight fire with fuel oil as to countenance the spread of Bolshevism as an antidote to the excesses of autocracy. Of all the "piffle" about freedom and democracy that we are treated to nowadays, Thompson's brand is the very worst. If it is not, let our staid senators who approve of it—Calder, Stone and Owen—step out and surrender their seats to representatives of the I. W. W. and let Mr. Thompson turn over to them his vast financial and mining interests. They will undoubtedly give us a taste of that Russian democracy that has "mud on its boots, hair on its face and the love of freedom in its heart." They can decide afterwards how well they like it in practice.

Only the Cross

"TODAY, in the general devastation of war, the only thing left standing upright is the Cross," attests Lieutenant Antoine Redier in his recent book, "Comrades in Courage." He then describes as follows a wayside crucifix which the shells have wonderfully spared:

> Above that rise of the ground, which hid it until now, stands the thin silhouette of a cross. It is of iron and the Christ is dolorously bending his head. About its base are four stumps cut off almost level with the ground. They are all that remain of the beautiful trees which once sheltered this pastoral shrine. It stands alone amongst a labyrinth of boyaux. . . . Our trenches, in this region, curve forward in a salient. It is as if the enemy had been obliged to draw a respectful half-circle round the image of Christ. . . . Resting on the pierced feet is a bunch of withered flowers. . . . At the change of guard we pass beneath the extended arms of this Christ, on the way into the front line. I don't know whether many of us say a prayer to Him when we cross His gaunt shadow in the moonlight, but God will remember the one, be he ever so humble, who once put down his flowers and called on Him there. He has commanded that His image be not destroyed and that it remain here on our horizon. With head gently bowed and wide-open arms, He watches over the dead of the plain and blesses the living, devout or otherwise, who covered with dust, their backs bent under the weight of their knapsacks—go in long silent columns to take their fighting post.

That crucifix, standing upright, unharmed by shell-fire, and with a passing soldier's little offering at its feet, strikingly symbolizes the revival of religion in France. This reawakening had actually begun some years before the war broke out; for the brilliant sons of skeptics and unbelievers were seen going to Mass and Communion, valiantly defending the Church with voice and pen, and in their daily life reducing Catholic principles to practice. But since the present conflict began the religious revival has been more remarkable still. The war has made most Frenchmen pause and "think of their destiny, and, willingly or not, they turn to the God whom they learned to know and pray to at their mother's knee," and those who in civil life took care to hide the little faith they had, now, at the front, fearlessly profess their belief in Catholicism and practise their religion even ostentatiously.

The remarkable spectacle presented by the renewal of Catholicism in France can also be observed in other countries. The recent attacks made on the Holy Father by anti-Catholic statesmen and journalists have called forth from the clergy and laity of America, Ireland and England such loyal and indignant protests that the Pope-baiters quickly subsided. Numerous converts to the true Church, moreover, are constantly being made in the Allied armies, for the Protestant and unbelieving soldiers in our training camps and at the front have begun to realize that, though other religions may perhaps be quite desirable to live in, Catholicism is the only safe one to die in. Without question, amid the carnage and devastation of the present conflict "the only thing left standing upright is the Cross," and the one institution that is sure to emerge from the war with her holiness and beauty and spiritual power increased is the Catholic Church, which is always the invincible defender and the only unerring interpreter of the Cross.

The Defiant Corporations

THE president of an American railway system has recently filed with the Federal authorities a document arranged in the form of an affidavit. Interesting from many points of view, this affidavit is particularly interesting as evidence of the fact that, if the Government is patient, kind, and above all, persevering, it may after a lapse of some years, succeed in obtaining information which it needs at once. The document submitted by the president contains the answers to a series of questions put by the Interstate Commerce Commission in May 1916. In reply, the courteous, long-suffering president twirled his glasses uneasily, and cast a look of mingled pain and reproach upon his inquisitors. What use his railroad made of its funds, or of the funds of its stockholders, could be of no possible interest to the Federal Government. He explained his position in the quiet gentle tone which one uses in teaching a stupid but willing child. He could give no information. For him the case was closed, and he took refuge in his "constitutional rights."

The Commissioners, however, raised the issue, and for once an indulgent Government became as flint. After a legal battle which lasted nearly two years, and ended with an order from the Supreme Court of the United States the president agreed to submit his answers in writing. The document discloses in ample detail, more than one reason why the president chose to emulate the Sphinx until his jaws were pried open by the Supreme Court. The railroad in question had spent thousands of dollars in "influencing public opinion," and in solidifying the somewhat fluid "opinion" of legislators whose vote was of importance to what the railroad deemed the protection of its rights. Nor were the newspapers, stern and austere guardians of morality, forgotten. So adamant were these bulwarks of our liberties, that it was necessary to hurl tens of thousands of solid silver dollars against them, before the colors fluttered down.

The ordinary citizen, unacquainted with the technicalis which hedge our courts and clog our legal machinery ll rightly ask why the Federal Government which, even fore the war, enjoyed the unquestioned right of a gen-al supervision over interstate carriers, was obliged to ait until February, 1918, for information which it eded in May, 1916. The reply seems to be that, while e Government's power is unquestioned, the channels rough which that power must be exercised, are choked ith the debris of legal minutiae, and, perhaps, of whole-le perjury. A Federal investigation of labor conditions the Chicago packing-houses, recently adjourned, prob-ly found its adjournment hastened by the fact that any of the packers swore that they were utterly ignorant matters vitally affecting their own industry. They new to the ultimate penny just what wages should be oled out to the workers but of the huge salaries paid the officers of certain companies, even confidential legal dvisers and general managers knew absolutely nothing.
Too many American corporations are ruled by the orst spirit of "capitalism," a spirit as cruel as it is norant and as stupid as it is greedy. Government wnership is the last of all remedies for economic evils, ut either that or a bloody revolution seems inevitable, if e policy which guides the trusts and corporations of is country continues in its present mad career. We em rapidly approaching a social condition in which any rporation with money enough to engage the services of corps of clever and unscrupulous "legal experts" can ay what wages it wishes to its employees, scorn the pub-c and defy the law. The mills of retribution grind owly, but the stones now preparing in this country are to grind the tyrannical exploiters of the laborer into e most impalpable of useless powders.

Lunar Christianity

"LUNAR Christianity" is a particularly felicitous phrase invented by the British Weekly. It decribes the popular form of modern religion which con-sts in a creedless morality. The prophets of the new ult apparently fail to understand that whatever is good nd true and noble in their ethical ideals is only the re-ection of that Christianity which they ignore. They ould blot out the sun and yet retain its splendor. The eak, reflected, lunar light by which they live will daily row more dim and illusive, until at last it leaves them holly lost in their night of doubt and unbelief.
Lunar Christianity is the popular religion of modern ovels, plays and works of sociology. Neither is it a tranger to the non-Catholic pulpit, where it is frequently eard to discourse in roseate language on brotherly love.
t gathers up stray and broken fragments from the Ser-non on the Mount and sets them into its new and strange nosaic, but denies the Divinity of Him who uttered them.
t daintily selects for imitation ill-understood traits from he lives of the great Christian heroes of the past, but re-ects the Christianity which gave them their greatness. It parades a new socialized religion, but disregards the source from which all lasting order and harmony in social life, all true charity and justice upon earth must flow. It seeks to obtain the effect without the cause, the light without the sun. Yet nothing but the faint reflection of Christianity that still comes to them can prevent its votaries even now from sinking into a night of pagan abomination sevenfold worse than any Egyptian darkness of the past.

Protestantism, too, although it may be gaining in membership, is constantly losing in definiteness of doctrine. Many of its ministers are preaching a mere form of lunar Christianity, an uncertain code of Christian ethics without any certain Christian creed. In denying the authority of the Church built by Christ upon Peter, in failing to distinguish between the frailty of some of her members and the infallible doctrine of that Church to which Christ had promised His unfailing presence, Luther cast the first cloud of darkness over the light of truth. When in the course of time even the Divinity of Christ and the inspiration of the Scriptures were denied by many, there remained for them nothing but the delusive light of a lunar Christianity over which the shadow of total eclipse is fast and visibly encroaching. There is but one hope, for whose fulfilment we labor and pray: that all lunar Christians may soon be brought to see the beauty and brightness of the one Spouse of Christ, the Catholic Church.

Censorship in Chicago

BY its own confession, blazoned day by day in somewhat broken type, a journal published in Chicago is "The World's Greatest Newspaper." Tastes differ, and even honest judgments have been known to be at variance. One need not suspect the editors of the tendency which made Ananias famous. Perhaps they are merely deficient in good taste or mental poise, and in imitation of the late Mr. Barnum, act on the creed that the best agent for the defense of any proposition is a billboard well plastered with superlatives.

For some years that modest journal has viewed the Chicago practice of censoring, and occasionally, of rejecting, lurid, vulgar or immoral theatrical exhibitions, with increasing alarm and disdain. Its position has been, that since the great heart of the common people is in the right place, the great common people may, by consequence, be permitted to decide for themselves what theatrical and film exhibitions promote or hinder a healthful morality in Chicago. Repression through censorship is un-American, and that is enough to damn it. Although all State Street might be lined with places of amusement, of a character by no means doubtful, Americans could be trusted to pass them by, saved by the power of their uncloistered virtue.

All this sounds very well. Everyone likes to be told that he is his own master, capable of directing himself in whatever contingency life may present, a person to whom advice is really something superfluous, and restraint an insult. But "The World's Greatest Newspaper" believes naught of this flattering philosophy. For some years, it has not trusted the great common people to choose the pawn-shops, money-lenders, dentists, physicians, and hotels, which many of them undoubtedly favored. On the contracy, it conducted a vigorous campaign against loan-sharks and pawn-shop thieves. It made relentless war upon willing but incompetent dentists, and unspeakable physicians. It most laudably aided the public authorities in the closing of certain "hotels," used by a class of people for what they deemed "amusement." From time to time it even uttered one or more platitudes on pure food and pure advertising. Only in the theater, it would seem, does "The World's Greatest Newspaper" object to purity. Its policy is to let a theatrical manager stage what performances best appeals to the box-office, leaving the decision upon their moral character to the great common people. But as to the pawn-shops, and other similar evils, none of which advertise, the great common people are unable to decide without the aid of "The World's Greatest Newspaper" and the law.

"It is the common tendency of censorship to censor for the weakest minds of the community," remarks the editor. Of course it is, and the tendency springs from the sane principle that it is the duty of the State to care for the citizen in those things in which he cannot care for himself. If that tendency is an argument against the censorship of the stage, it is an argument against all law. Law does not of itself make men virtuous, but it can, by removing incentives, prevent some men from becoming vicious. The action of the State in setting a premium upon virtue and exacting a penalty from vice, is not often a dominant motive in the lives of men whose minds are firmly set upon the things that are good and true. But experience has shown that it is almost a necessity for the weak, whose further deterioration would constitute a menace to society. It cannot be denied that, in practice, censorship is sometimes weak or absurd, but the principle upon which it is based is sound and necessary. Whatever measures make virtue easier and vice more difficult cannot be rated as tyranny. They are merely the natural outcome of the proper functioning of the law.

The "Red Cross Magazine" and the Pope

NOT long since the Red Cross Magazine published a poem that did grave injustice to one of the great heroes of the war, our Holy Father, the Pope. Naturally enough Catholics took offense at the insult, and protested vigorously against it. The result is entirely satisfactory. With a manly honesty that does credit to its sincerity of purpose, the Red Cross has already acknowledged its mistake by the following wire sent to all its division managers:

> In the February issue of Red Cross Magazine there appeared a poem by Rudyard Kipling. In that poem there is an unfortunate reference to the head of the Catholic Church. T poem was inserted in Red Cross Magazine at the last min by the editors without having been submitted to Washing It was regarded purely as a contribution from Kipling and editors did not sense the reflection on the Catholic Church wh it contained. It is a matter of greatest concern to the War Co cil of American Red Cross that this should have happen and they regard it as a serious error. While the American Cross is non-sectarian, everyone knows the splendid help a cooperation it has had from Catholics everywhere, both in c tributions and in active service in its official ranks, and in vi of this spirit, it is to be hoped Catholics everywhere will derstand that the appearance of this poem was the result of ov sight and error. Will you immediately communicate this m sage to all Red Cross chapters in your division with sugg tion they place it conspicuously within their chapter rooms, a will you in addition call upon leading Catholic prelate in y city, showing him this message and explaining that the n issue of the Red Cross Magazine will contain an editorial of s cere regret for the error that has been made?

This is splendid, but the Red Cross has gone furth and has prepared this statement for its magazine:

> In the February issue of the Red Cross Magazine there peared an original poem by Rudyard Kipling entitled "T Holy War." The poem has given offense to some of the ma zine readers, and the Red Cross has received letters inquir whether the Red Cross questions the good faith of the Pope the Catholic Church in the war.
> The poem was published simply as the most recent c tribution from Kipling, and in reviewing it for publication was not realized that it might constitute a reflection on Pope or the Catholic religion. The fact that the poem allow of such an unfortunate interpretation makes us feel that it a serious mistake to publish it. It should be needless to that we deeply appreciate the great part that the members of Catholic Church are playing in this war, not alone in the ar and navy, but through their splendid organization, the Knig of Columbus, and in the Red Cross itself. It is hoped t Catholics everywhere will understand that the appearance this poem was the result of oversight and error.

With this the incident is happily closed; never, trust, to be reopened. The Red Cross has done the rig thing, and Catholics, who are second to none in apprec tion of the great work that that Society is accomplishi will forget the offensive poem, and labor as before to a the Red Cross in its noble mission of mercy.

Education and the Art of Life

IN the current issue of the Atlantic Monthly, Mr. A thur E. March has an article entitled: "Educatio The Mastery of the Arts of Life." With some at least the conclusions of Mr. March, every Catholic educat must agree. Like him they are only too anxious broaden and vitalize education, to render it interesting f the pupil and to make it a training ground where the b and the girl of the present generation may prepare the selves for the responsibilities, the duties and the strugg of the future. But though the Catholic educator kno that it would be criminal to send out his pupils into t arena of life unprepared for the contest, he realizes th the purpose of education is not so much to train for t "arts of life," as to train for life itself. Education ca ot impart mastery of the arts of life in their fulness. hese are too many and too varied. Most of them can ly be learnt by long and painful experience. They are ten the work and the reward of the specialist and the ofessional man, and come to them at times only after any trials and failures. The school that tries to be protean" in its activities, to use Mr. March's expres-on, the school that overflows into the farm, the home, e factory, the store, the office, usurps a position and ities that take it out of its proper sphere. In its special-ing tendencies it may become detrimental to the general tellectual welfare of the pupil and confuse and arrest s mental growth.

Special schools must of course prepare by a specialized ourse of studies, a special and highly individualized aining. But the purpose of the general school is to lay a oundation of life. That foundation must above all ings be solid, so deeply laid that the edifice reared upon may be able to withstand the stress of the storm which ooner or later must test its strength. The mastery of e arts of life, were that possible within the limits of the ears of training given to the child; is of course highly desirable. But, under present conditions, under our complex and bustling civilization that seems to be an impossibility. The years given to the education of the young are too short and too few to accomplish that end. The Catholic educator deems it wiser, that the "protean" activities of the school should give way to a simpler system where there is a concentration of effort on a few broad intellectual and moral principles, which to the pupil will become anchors of safety to hold him to his duties, beacon lights to mark out his course, unfailing principles whereby his life will be directed, principles so broad and so wide-embracing that they cover his whole life and correspond to all his needs.

It is best therefore to look upon education not as "the mastery of the arts of life," but rather as the training ground, the arena where under the sanest intellectual principles and the most ennobling moral and religious standards the pupil is taught that while the arts of life must be studied and prized, the highest art and the one most worthy of a man is the art of living nobly and well. No educational system that teaches that truth can be said to fail.

THOMAS DE QUINCEY

"IT was not for the purpose of creating pleasure," says De Quincey in his "Confessions," "but of mitigating pain in e severest degree that I first began to use opium as an article daily diet"; and in these words we have just a single aspect a profound, an important and yet inadequately treated prob-m, namely, the quite special and peculiar dangers and tempta-ons to which the imaginative worker is subject. An exquisite d quivering sensibility, shrinking—with more than ordinary prehensiveness—alike from physical pain and mental distress humiliation; a strong and often tyrannous imagination build-g with clouds and casting up before the eye in shadowy outline r-off and exaggerated shapes of harm—what a deal of misery d torment and disaster have these not caused! Coleridge, Poe, ossetti, Lafcadio Hearn, Mangan, Francis Thompson, and here our own day and country, O. Henry, are but a few of that mmortal company of sorrow who in one way or another paced the places infamous to tell," and for whom the abyss was in tual fact "cloven with deeper menace than for other men." f that company not the least either in suffering or genius was homas De Quincey.

"The English Opium Eater" is for De Quincey his distinctive le, for, though there have been other English writers, notably oleridge, addicted to "the just, subtile and mighty opium," one has so completely turned his experiences and visions there-om to the enduring account of literature. "The Confessions f an English Opium Eater," the most famous of De Quincey's orks with its sequel, "Suspiria de Profundis," on the whole e highest reach of his genius, relates the author's adventures his dealings with the drug both in the world of everyday fact s well as that of its proper domain—dreams.

The "story" of the "Confessions" has been told once for l by De Quincey himself. How at the age of seventeen, slip-ng away from school early one morning with a small sum of oney and with a volume of a favorite English poet in one ocket and of Euripides in the other, he wandered for months in North Wales, subsisting for long periods on the blackberries, hips and haws of the wayside; of his journey to London, where for sixteen weeks he endured hunger in various degrees of intensity, and for two months was houseless and seldom slept under a roof; and finally of his eventual reclamation by his family: all this is one of the most familiar tales of literature. His sufferings and privations during this time were indeed of the severest character; so that long years after, despite his mild and almost boyish face and shy and gentle demeanor, Carlyle saw that in his countenance which made him exclaim, "Eccovi! look at him: this child has been in hell."

When we come to examine De Quincey's style we find that it is extraordinarily easy and simple, sentence flowing into sentence in effortless sequence, and rising almost imperceptibly into those stately and elaborate pageants of the historic past, those moving and impassioned apostrophes of strange eloquence and splendor, and those gorgeous descriptions of swelling and dissolving dream-scenery, for which he is so notable. And withal there is that vast and rolling movement of sound, that solemn and mighty orchestration of prolonged harmony, which, bearing up the whole, sweeps on in broad and billowy progress to its magnificent and thunderous finale.

Francis Thompson wrote of him that if ever poet dealt in prose that man was De Quincey; and the reason is clear to see; for De Quincey beside the specific poetic faculty of imagination, of constructive dreaming, which he possessed in an eminent degree, had in full power two of the most characteristic qualities of the poet's equipment—a sensitive and most delicate ear for the sound of words, and the ability to achieve marvelous verbal effects by means perfectly simple. One instance out of many may be given, the phrase describing the eyes of "Our Lady of Sighs"—"filled with perishing dreams, and with the wrecks of forgotten delirium." Only a poet can write so.

De Quincey of course is not the only English prose writer who has attempted the effects of poetry and who gives us sentences of long-drawn-out music and resplendent coloring. From Sir Thomas Browne to Ruskin he has numerous and worthy rivals, and it would be a fascinating study to compare and contrast them. Taking but a hasty glimpse of a large subject, however, it may be said that as against the first he is not so uniformly stately and somber—he is much more light and various and versatile; and as against the second he has nothing whatever of Ruskin's didactic or reformatory bias, and moreover, while ornate, he is never merely ornamental. In addition he has what neither of these writers seems much possessed of—a deep sense of humor, ranging from broad fun to sly and elusive whimsey. In this particular he bears resemblance to Lamb, than whom, however, he is less of a wit; he has none of Lamb's "quaintness," and is a stricter logician and a sounder scholar.

There is a word to say of De Quincey's position as a critic. He has been acclaimed as facile princeps of all the English literary critics of his generation; and when it is recalled that this was the day of Coleridge, Wordsworth, Lamb, Hazlitt, Shelley, Leigh Hunt, "Christopher North," Carlyle, Macaulay—the list is almost unlimited—it may be questioned whether he is not the absolute chief of English critics without reserve. Indeed his critical papers both in their keen and profound analysis and in their power of exposition are all but incomparable.

One main criticism has been leveled against De Quincey as a writer—that he too often wanders away from the matter in hand; and there is truth in the charge. It is easy, however, to see how this came about. It is really a defect of his merit, his abounding and apparently inexhaustible store of mental wealth; and moreover, besides a teeming memory, he had, as he tells us, "an electric aptitude for seizing analogies," or, more fully, "a logical instinct for feeling in a moment the secret analogies or parallelisms that connect things else apparently remote." He has then his frequent digressions, but it is to be noted that these digressions always circle back to the main subject, and with an added load of illustration and instance that makes his "point" all the clearer and more firm. The digressions, too, in themselves are so full of interesting observation that it is far from a strain to follow his alluring lead.

In character De Quincey was one of the gentlest and most considerate of mortals. A story is related of him that once at his home in Edinburgh when he had a party of guests to dinner and the subject of religion came up, he requested as a particular favor to himself that if anyone had anything hard to say of the Scottish religion he would reserve it till the waiting-girl who was Scotch was out of the room. And his absent-mindedness might be set up as the classical type of abstracted scholarship; it was a rare evening when he did not fire his hair at the candles.

As is the case with the majority of old and established authors there has gathered about De Quincey's work a certain abstruse and learned atmosphere which serves to frighten away by mere report many an otherwise devoted reader. It is the fact indeed that De Quincey more than most English authors belongs to that patrician band who make their proper appeal to a discriminative circle and that the quality of his writing is such as to be fully apprehended only by one acquainted with the classics, alert to catch wide-ranging allusions, and with an ear awake to the magnificent music of which English prose is capable. But even so, the average reader will find in him much, very much, to enlighten, to entertain, and to delight him; while for the reader who comes to him with broad sympathy and an understanding mind, it is true of De Quincey as it is true of Lamb, that to read him once is to be sealed of his tribe forever.

THE VIRGIN OF THE BATTLE-FIELD

Ah! In that turmoil of revengeful flame
  I see them fall! I see their startled eyes
  Go wandering to the blue, unshaken skies,
And hear their quivering lips repeat—a Name:
"Mother!" in every mortal tongue the same.
  The first they learned to lisp, the last to rise
  From their parched throats. They yearn in childish wis
For sheltering arms, remembering whence they came.

Their mothers are afar. But Thou, I know,
  Most wistfully, who mother art to all,
Forever through the battles' rage dost go
  To soothe thy piteous sons wheree'er they fall.
When their poor plaintive tones for mother cry,
Thou hear'st—and swift their heavenly Mother's nigh.

REVIEWS

Reality and Truth. By JOHN G. VANCE, M.A. (Canta Ph.D. (Lov.). New York: Longmans, Green & Co. $2.50.

Scholastic philosophy is not poor in the number of its pres day exponents; nor are their works on the whole without t special merits. The angle of vision chosen by one is not viewpoint taken by another; one illumines what another fa to clarify. And yet however widely their avenues of appro may lie apart, the student cannot fail to observe that th writers arrive at the same conclusions in their solutions of tral problems, and by their convincing exposition make it q clear that the philosophy of the plain man, so far from b discredited by sober reason, is in its essentials logically jus able. In view of the excellent results, then, that have been complished within the past fifty years, in the field of e temology as well as in the other branches of philosophy might seem that little remains to be done. Nevertheless ther still room for a work that shall determine exactly—to indi but one problem—what is really demonstrated, and how m may and must, reasonably of course, be assumed. It was in hope of finding a definite answer to this and similar quest that the reviewer turned eagerly to Dr. Vance's book on " ality and Truth."

The preface was reassuring. "For many years," we read, has been my great desire to give to my fellow-countrymen, if might be, to the English-speaking world, a critical but defi treatment of the foundations of knowledge, truth and certain The author's solution of the problems he proposes to dis "depends upon no name, no tradition, no authority, no assu tion, no postulate. It stands or falls by its own intrinsic a ments, and by the plain facts which tell their own tale." "In general, it will be found that the conclusions of our st are both precise and satisfying." These are high promises; pity is they fall so short of fulfilment. The book is disappo ing; and for several reasons.

The author is justly dissatisfied with skepticism; it is impossible system. But what of dogmatism—an objection term, by the way, used as a synonym for scholasticism? too much like the realism of plain men; hence it must be r out of court. Dr. Vance's "plain realist," it may be observe passing, will seem to many readers a mere puppet, stran unlike the realist as he is found in actual life; and undoubt the author has failed to grasp the meaning of the schola when they say that three primitive truths are contained affirmed implicitly in every judgment formed by the m Again, the loose thinking displayed by the writer in his tr ment of the principle of contradiction and of the principl causality is startling enough; it is the more amazing when recall that Dr. Vance can hardly be unacquainted with the osophy he has chosen to abandon. One need not be a riva Aquinas in his grasp of scholasticism to realize, for insta that the principle of causality is by no means an immed inference drawn from the principle of contradiction.

There are two points, however, to which special atten should be directed. The first has to do with the critical me adopted by the author in his search for truth. He will retain the method of Descartes. "The essence of that method, we take it, lies in a state of mind which, in its philosophic search, queries the certainty of every fundamental judgment, until it finally arrives at some certitude in presence of which further questioning is useless and doubt impossible" (p. 78). He is determined "to make a real and pertinacious effort to cast suspicion" on the three principles of identity, contradiction and excluded middle. It is unnecessary to show in detail how futile is this method. Here again the tyro in scholasticism is convinced on reasonable grounds that Descartes' method is fundamentally wrong, i. e., unsound in its essence; nor has Dr. Vance succeeded in vindicating that method from the charges brought against it; he has scarcely even attempted to do so.

The second point to which we refer is of equal, if not greater, importance; it concerns the author's discussion of what he rightly considers one of the most insistent problems of all philosophy. "Is there a reality, whether it be one or many, which is not existentially identical with my conscious states, and which, though it may be apprehended by the phenomena of consciousness, is yet independent of my consciousness for its existence?" (p. 116). Dr. Vance's solution starts with the assumption, which he nowhere justifies, that we can know directly only our conscious states. However, though we cannot claim for the senses any direct, immediate knowledge of reality we may by the application of the principle of causality readily argue from our states of consciousness to the existence of extramental persons and things. Such in brief is the solution which we are asked to accept instead of the traditional doctrine of scholasticism. That it is only a thinly veiled form of idealism will be clear to any one who is acquainted with the arguments advanced by the scholastics in defense of their position on the genesis of knowledge. Even were we to grant—which we do not—that the principle of causality enabled us to infer legitimately the existence of something other than our conscious states, how should we be justified in pronouncing judgment on the nature of that cause; whether, for instance, it be one or many, material or spiritual? "Reality and Truth" bears no imprimatur, though the author discusses in the volume such questions as the immortality of the soul and God's existence.

Comrades in Courage (Méditations dans la Tranchée). By Lieutenant ANTOINE REDIER. Translated by Mrs. PHILIP DUNCAN WILSON. Garden City, N. Y.: Doubleday, Page & Co. $1.40.

Trench Pictures from France. By Major WILLIAM REDMOND, M.P. Killed in Action, June, 1917. With a Biographical Introduction by E. M. SMITH-DAMPIER. New York: George H. Doran Co. $0.50.

These are very readable books of reflections and observations which two Catholic officers made while engaged in trench-warfare. Lieutenant Redier's fourteen chapters describe the virtues of his comrades, tell how the war has brought back France to her better self, and bear testimony to the awakening of faith in the hearts of the poilus. He writes:

> Enemies of God do not exist at the front. They are found only behind it. Anti-clericalism begins timidly back toward the kitchens. It is a little bolder around the supply depots, and I learn by letters from the rear that it is loudest in the cafés in the provinces. From the Lys to the Vosges it is unknown.

The author tells many anecdotes to illustrate how widespread and frequent practices of piety are in the trenches; how a gutter-snipe from Lille, for example, chose a medal of Our Lady as a present rather than some tempting tobacco; how two officers, "far, far above" Lieutenant Redier in rank, walk at twilight in a solitary boyau telling their beads; and how on Sunday in the rear of the lines, the churches are full. There are excellent pages in the book on duty, honor, and glory, those watchwords of the gallant French soldier, a keen analysis of the German mind, and many a profound or humorous observation which throws light on the national character of the author's companions in arms. If the men of France, after the war, are to be like Lieutenant Redier, we need have no misgivings about the future of that country. The translation seems a good one, but the missal, not "the prayer book," is, of course, used by a priest at the altar.

The late Major "Willie" Redmond's book is made up of a dozen papers he sent from the trenches to the Daily Chronicle, which are preceded by a good biographical sketch of the author from the pen of Miss Smith-Dampier. Major Redmond also bears testimony to the revival of religious practices at the front. "Day and night, before a battalion goes to the trenches," he writes, "the chaplains are busy in the churches, for the men throng to confession." The Catholic soldier never loses possession of his rosary. If he falls, it is placed around his neck before he is wrapped in his blanket for burial. Major Redmond's conviction, based on what he observed in France, was that "the Faith has taken refuge more and more in the hearts of the people with the result that . . . religion has been perhaps the one thing in all the world, so far, strengthened and built up afresh amidst the horrible ravages of war." BOOKS AND AUTHORS

The March 22 number of the Catholic Mind contains an admirable paper on "The Pope and the War," by the Most Reverend Neil McNeil, D.D., Archbishop of Toronto. His Grace reviews the Holy Father's attitude toward the Allies, refutes by documentary evidence the charges that Pope Benedict has manifested a German bias, and shows what remarkable success his Holiness has had since the war began in proving himself the Father of all the Faithful. The Bishop of Northampton then tells England how ashamed it should be of having bound itself to exclude the Pope from the peace conference after the war, and the number ends with a short paper on "France and the Holy See."

The spread of anarchy in the world nowadays makes timely a republication of G. K. Chesterton's fantastic story of "The Man Who Was Thursday" (Boni & Liveright, $0.60). It is a riot of Chestertonian parodoxes and absurdities, but abounds withal in those striking truths which the discerning reader can always find in this author.——A recent number of Everyman's Library (Dutton, $0.60) is made up of six stories by Nikolaiv Gogol, the Russian novelist, and a good introduction by John Cournos. "Taras Bulba," the first and longest of the tales, vividly describes the wild life of the Cossacks and gives an account of how they besieged a Polish town. "The Cloak" is a clever character-study and "How Two Ivans Quarreled" and "The Calash" are humorous stories.——"The Enlisting Wife" (Doubleday, $0.50), by Grace S. Richmond, is a short story about a pious Episcopalian bride who bravely saw her soldier-husband off to France.

"Four Lectures on the Handling of Historical Material" (Longmans), by L. F. Rushbrook Williams, Professor of Modern Indian History in the University of Allahabad, is a little book of some eighty or ninety pages, but into it the author has managed to condense an excellent treatise on the purpose and method of historical research and composition that will benefit and entertain not only the student but the general reader. The table of contents is apparently a dry one, but the writer by an abundance of apt and interesting illustrations and by great lucidity of expression, has made eminently readable what might have been a dry-as-dust disquisition on documents, oral, written, and mixed; official and unofficial; public and private; formal and informal, together with all the other classifications, divisions and sub-divisions known to the delver in historic lore. As the author is a professor in British India, and is addressing primarily an audience of his students, his illustrations are naturally drawn to some extent from things Indian, and consequently are less familiar to the American reader, but the matter they are intended to illustrate is always clearly and interestingly put.

William Butler Yeats's warmest admirers will no doubt be quite at a loss to make out what he wants to say in "Per Amica Silentia Lunae" (Macmillan, $1.50), a hundred pages of prose, poetically phrased oftentimes, which seem to describe his bootless quest for his subconscious self, or the anima mundi, or whatever it is he seeks. The book is full of Freudean and Spiritistic vagaries, and shadowy descriptions of the way the author receives his inspirations. He is of the opinion that the artist finds another self, "an anti-self," who comes to those whose "passion is reality," whereas the "sentimentalists are practical men who believe in money, in position, in a marriage bell." At the end of his reflections Mr. Yeats tell how deeply he is affected by the writings of Catholic poets like Claudel and Jammes, who submit "everything to the Pope" and who see "the world with the eyes of vine-dressers and charcoal burners." "Have not my thoughts," he then asks, "run through a like round, though I have not found my tradition in the Catholic Church, which was not the church of my childhood, but where the tradition is, as I believe, more universal and more ancient?" Does the author mean paganism? That may be "more universal and more ancient" than Catholicism, but how much truth is there in it?

As "The Catholic's Pocket Prayer Book" (Peter Reilly, Philadelphia, $0.25) is bound in khaki-brown and though only three inches long, two wide and a quarter of an inch thick, contains in its 192 little pages all the prayers that the average soldier or sailor has time for, the tiny volume will doubtless enjoy a wide vogue.——"Le Purgatoire" (Tequi, Paris, 3 fr. 50), by Louis Rouzic, is a devotional treatise in popular form on a subject especially dear to all Catholics in the present day of countless and oftentimes unprepared deaths. And yet, as the author expressly states, the work is not so much an exhaustive theological treatise on purgatory as a proposal of some of the most suitable means of giving assistance to those in distress there. Quoting from the noted preacher, Père Bourdaloue, l'Abbé Rouzic maintains that the devotion to the Holy Souls is in a sense of even greater excellence than the conversion of the infidel, as it glorifies God by bringing to Him souls exceedingly dear to Him. The book's value is enhanced by numerous quotations and extracts drawn from the sacred orators, from theological and ascetical writings, and from the literature bearing on the subject.

The "second series" of "Atlantic Classics" (Atlantic Monthly Press, $1.25) is not equal to the first. There is little of permanent value in Henry C. Merwin's sentimental pages contrasting dogs' "virtues" with men's vices. Jane Addams' absurd "Devil Baby at Hull House" belongs in a book of fiction and several other essays in the book run pretty thin. Samuel McChord Crothers' paper on "Every Man's Desire to be Somebody Else," however, is cleverly done, and John Jay Chapman's essay on "The Greek Genius" is full of good things.——In "National Strength and International Duty" (Princeton Univ. Press), ex-President Roosevelt lays down the admirable principle that the rule of conduct for individuals and nations is essentially the same. Thence, arguing that nations must strive for the achievement of a worthy ideal, with adequate means of protecting their rights, and with due regard for the rights of others, he criticizes the Administration for what he declar has been inefficient military preparation, and gives a merite excoriation to pacifists, pro-Germans and those who would sa rifice this country to their hatred of England.

Father Charles L. O'Donnell, C.S.C., contributed to a rece number of the Ave Maria these happy lines on St. Felicitas:

Lady Saint Felicity,
Blessing on thy name and thee!
Happy wentest thou to heaven,
Martyred with thy martyred seven.
What a stripping was that day
Of the palm trees by the way,
Branches for thy marching band
Gloryward to bear in hand.
Where the Lamb's white-vested throng
Gave ye secret of the song
They alone of all souls sing
Over death come triumphing.
Now I know by what sweet right
Thou dost bear thy name, Delight,—
Saint whose heart was strong in joy
Seven deaths might not destroy,—
Seven sons that went to die,
Thou, their mother, standing by;
Seven sons that met their doom,
Sang ere birth within thy womb
This the song that should arise
From their lips in Paradise.
Glory unto God in heaven,—
Happy mother, happy seven!

EDUCATION

Teaching "Pronunciation"

THEORY is today a drug, plentiful in a market which the war has not affected. In all lines of activity, there is an unlimited supply of "hows," and perhaps even a larger supply of "whys" to explain the "hows." It is rather puzzling, and inclines one to the utterly untenable position that all theories are bad. Theory in some quantity and in some quality, all who are teachers, have absorbed, but those of the profession who are busily engaged in the classroom, are, when asked their views, likely to be conscious of expressing only what they know by practice and experience, even when that practice and experience are founded on theory. It has been my own peculiar fate to teach all the classes that range from the sixth grade in the grammar school to the senior year in college. My views, therefore, will naturally be affected by that experience. I know what the college and the high school expects from the grammar school, and I have some appreciation of what the grammar school can, and—perhaps this is more important—of what the grammar school cannot reasonably be asked to accomplish.

What is the Standard?

FOR some years the problem of teaching our pupils how to speak their own language correctly has interested me greatly. Theory there is in plenty, much of it good and helpful, and as much, perhaps, decidedly harmful. Correct oral English begins with correct pronunciation, and before we begin to teach English pronunciation, it is necessary to determine a standard. It seems to go without question that our standard should be purely American. The pronunciation which obtains abroad is certainly different from our own. To affect this foreign pronunciation is mere priggishness. We, Americans, are large enough, educated enough, old enough to form a standard for ourselves. But even among ourselves there are differences of pronunciation which make it necessary to determine standard. The standard is not hard to fix. It is use, not all, or every use, but good use.

Yet even in the matter of good use, there are divergencies among us. The pronunciation of a in such words as after, dance, half, differs even among educated people in different parts of the country. The flat a is common in the middle and farther West. The Italian a, I think, is common in the East. There are, to be sure, people in the West who follow the lead of the East, and no doubt, there are people in the East, who use the flat a, especially where this variety has the weight of dictionary authority. In a difference such as this, where educated use is pitted against educated use, it seems to me that teachers will follow the standards of sense and of taste, when they conform to the part of the country in which their work is cast. In the East a flat a may in certain sections stamp one as uneducated; in the West the Italian a is generally considered an affectation. To accept a pronunciation which is considered ignorant, is certainly against both sense and taste, and it is as much against sense and taste to accept a pronunciation which is considered affected.

Use and Preference

AS in this and like questions teachers may be guided by local circumstances, so in other questions, when there is choice between various pronunciation all of which are sanctioned by good use, teachers may be guided by personal preference. There are, however, pronunciations to which teachers cannot be indifferent. Pronunciations which are authorized only by bad use should not be tolerated. The bad use may be fairly general in certain localities. It is not for that reason to be permitted. In a city of the West very many of the inhabitants never go to a ball park. They always go to a ball pork. If you visit another city in the West, you may discover that you are a "catlick," which may be some relation to a "cowlick," but which does not seem to be a relation to a Catholic. If you have ever lived in certain regions of the Northwest, you will have discovered that all persons united in matrimony are "merried," though you might think that they had only been married, which, as Kipling would say, is another story. If you work among children of foreign birth, you know that "b's," and "p's," "t's" and "d's," and others of the consonants are so hopelessly mixed, that you "rite" in the street-cars, and that you "ride" on paper, in fact that you do hundreds of things of which you were not conscious.

It is not necessary to multiply examples. Teachers are familiar with the facts. In the effort to teach children pronunciation they must struggle not only against the difficulties inherent in right vocalization, but also against the conditions of locality, of home, and of companionship.

When Reading was in Favor

TO attain the end in view, the teacher must give formal training in vowel sounds and consonant values. In this formal training, I suppose, reading will never cease to have the largest part. We whose school days were passed in the remote antiquity of thirty-five or forty years ago were taught to read, for reading was then a very important branch in the curriculum of the parish school. In the advance and progress of education since those barbaric times, other studies, the invention of a more enlightened pedagogy, have usurped in great measure the time and place anciently given to reading. Whatever may be said of the substitutes, it is likely that reading has suffered, and with it pronunciation. I think too that during the last twenty-five years, pronunciation and reading have suffered from various newfangled methods of teaching spelling. The old-fashioned schoolmaster taught us to spell Constantinople by instalments. You remember the method: "C-o-n, Con; s-t-a-n, stan, Constan; t-i, ti, Constanti"; and so forth. There was something humorous about the method, but this old-fashioned schoolmaster turned out boys who could see the syllables in a word, and who were not hopelessly stalled in pronuncation by every new word of more than three syllables. The teacher in the high school or the professor in the college who today must help his pupils to articulate every long word which occurs in a reading, longs for the return of that old-fashioned schoolmaster to our primary schools. Syllabication has its scientific shortcomings, but I doubt whether it has been succeeded or replaced by any method of spelling which has given results as satisfactory in pronunciation, in reading and in writing.

Some Obstacles

WE must remember, however, that no matter what method we employ in what we call the formal teaching of pronunciation, we will work largely in vain unless we insist on correct pronunciation in every subject which may enter into the curriculum. We may go farther, and say, that not only in the class-room, but out of it as well, we must show the same insistence. The child must not be allowed to unlearn in the class of arithmetic or geography, or even on the playground, what it has been taught in the reading class. This danger of unlearning what is correct makes it more important in the elementary school than in the high school or college for teachers themselves to be careful and exact in pronunciation. The pupil in the high school or college, who is grounded in pronunciation, knows enough to see an error, and therefore not to suffer much from an instructor whose pronunciation is imperfect or incorrect, while the child in the primary school cannot be expected to do anything but imitate its teacher.

The evil effects which should follow from the imperfections of the teacher may be offset by fortunate circumstances of home and other surroundings. This is a piece of good fortune which falls to the child in spite of, and not because of, his schooling. Very frequently, the excellence of a school and of its teachers is measured by results with which they have had little to do. We that labor in the mines have seen numerous examples of this.

Prohibition Legislation and Religion

RECENT communications and articles published in AMERICA, touching upon the extent to which prohibition laws, and more particularly the pending Federal Constitutional Amendment, may affect the keeping and use of wine for sacramental purposes, seem to me to miss the only real and practical point upon which protection against serious interference with religious practice can be established.

It is undoubtedly true that the guarantee of religious freedom and toleration contained in the Federal Constitution, does not prevent State legislation destructive of freedom and equality of religious rights. Nor does the Fourteenth Amendment cover the case in hand. Notwithstanding the silly sneer of a correspondent in AMERICA at the States rights views of "Jeff" Davis and the old school of Southern statesmen, the fact remains, absolute and impregnable, that the Constitution of the United States is an instrument of grants and not of limitations, that all powers and functions not expressly delegated to the Federal Government by the Constitution, are reserved to the States. That instrument itself so declares in the Tenth Amendment, and the courts have so often and so emphatically affirmed the doctrine, that the point is not debated by competent lawyers and publicists. If the scoffing critic of the Confederacy's great leader knew history, to say nothing of law, he would know that this fundamental constitutional axiom has no relation whatever to the doctrine of secession.

THE LETTER AND SPIRIT OF LAW

THE strict letter of the prohibition legislation, both State and Federal, no doubt seriously endangers the purchase, shipment, keeping and use of wines, for the Sacrifice of the Mass, and for the communion services of other Christian bodies in this country. But there is a well-considered and thoroughly established line of decisions by the Supreme Court of the United States, and by many of the State courts of highest resort, which appears to negative any such radical and drastic application of these restrictive regulations. In the discussion of the subject, I have not seen any reference to these judicial precedents, and it seems to me that they are well worthy of study, not only in reference to prohibition, but to other lines of current and threatened invasion of religious freedom.

Perhaps the latest decision is that of The Church of the Holy Trinity vs. United States, 143 U. S. 472, in which Justice Brewer delivered a lengthy and scholarly opinion, completely covering the questions at issue in that case, as well as those that must arise in almost any case involving the free exercise of religious belief and practice, especially among Christians. In that case Trinity Church in New York City was proceeded against for violation of the Federal statute prohibiting the importation of alien laborers under contract for service. The church authorities had contracted with an English clergyman of the Anglican Establishment, at an agreed salary, to act as rector and pastor, and to remove from his home in England to the United States, for that purpose. There was no dispute about the facts, and it was admitted that the letter of the statute had been violated. The lower court inflicted a fine upon the church, and writ of error was prosecuted to the Supreme Court. The latter tribunal, in what must be regarded as a monumental and triumphant declaration of religious faith as well as of religious freedom in the very constitution of American society and government, reversed the judgment of conviction, and announce the fundamental rule that "No purpose of action again religion can be imputed to any legislation, of State or natio because this is a religious people."

THE UNITED STATES, "A CHRISTIAN COUNTRY"

THE principal parts of Justice Brewer's magnificent argume and conclusions furnish the soundest and clearest Christi doctrine in matters of law and government and social philosoph that is to be found in all the literature of recent times. Th opinion was delivered in 1891, and in the passing years we ha traveled far afield in many directions of political, religious a social theorizing and experimentation. But the real sentime of American religious toleration and liberty, as well as the ve soul of American and Christian civilization, are embodied that vital judgment of the highest court in the land, and th still abide in the heart of the American people when proper aroused to expression and action. The court reviews at leng the history of the discovery, colonization and final liberation America, and at every step of the long and heroic processi towards the present nationality of our country, traces the lan marks of a deeply religious and distinctively Christian characte dominant at all times, and underlying and controlling by i necessary implications, all the legislation and governmental co duct of our people, at every stage of their development. Upo this historical foundation of inheritance, tradition, legislati policy and judicial precedent, the court bases its conclusions follows: (1) That this is essentially a Christian country, a all of its laws and institutions must be considered and inte preted as favoring, and not as abridging or destroying, Christi beliefs and practices; (2) That no law, State or Federal, c be construed as intended to deny to any one liberty and equali of religious rights, and especially no law will be deemed to ha been intended to interfere with the essential rights of Chri tianity, which is the fundamental faith of the American peopl (3) That although the letter of a statute may appear to invad this domain of Christian belief and practice, all presumptio are against such intent, and the real intent must be arrived subject to these presumptions, as well as subject to the gener rules affecting statutory interpretation.

THE RULE OF INTERPRETATION

THE foregoing is an abstract of the decision in the ca referred to, and in concluding the opinion, it was sai

> The construction invoked cannot be accepted as correct. It is a case where there was presented a definite evil, in view of which the legislature used general terms with the purpose of reaching all phases of that evil, and thereafter, unexpectedly, it is developed that the general language thus employed is broad enough to reach cases and acts which the whole history and life of the country affirm could not have been intentionally legislated against. It is the duty of the courts, under those circumstances, to say that however broad the language of the statute may be, the act, although within the letter, is not within the intent of the legislature, and therefore cannot be within the statute.

The reasoning and decision in the above case are supporte by an abundance of authority cited in the opinion of the cou notably by the decisions in Updegraph v. Com., 11 Serg. & 394; People v. Ruggles, 8 Johns. 290; Vidal v. Girard, 43 U. 127, 198; U. S. v. Palmer, 16 U. S. 610, 631; U. S. v. Kirby, U. S. 482, 486.

It is not conceivable that the courts will hold that constit tional or legislative acts intended to prohibit the evils intoxication and the traffic in liquors, for the purpose of pr tecting the health and morals of the people and increasing t efficiency and economic production of the social and politic organism, will be construed to prevent or to interfere with t free and customary exercise of the oldest and most sacred all Christian religious rites, in a country whose whole civilizatio is based upon the fundamental truths and ceremonies Christianity.

NOTE AND COMMENT

American Chaplain Honored

MONG the first heroes of the American army to be decorated with the croix de guerre in France is the Catholic plain, Rev. Osiah Boucher. With six other priests he was overseas by the Knights of Columbus to join General shing's forces at the front. All details are withheld by a rous censorship, but it is well known that the French wars is awarded only for signal bravery in action. Father cher and his six priest companions were volunteers with official status, receiving their maintenance from the Catholic Fund through the Knights of Columbus. Semi-official ding was however given them by General Pershing, and an rly and a motor-cycle were assigned to each man. They e sent to the very forefront of the American position where have been laboring since January 1. Everywhere they were tily welcomed by the men and have already rendered notservices. Father Boucher is a native of Canada, but was cated for the priesthood at St. Bernard's Seminary, Rochesr N. Y., served first as an assistant at St. Anthony's Church, Bedford, and volunteered from St. Roch's Church, Fall er.

Catholic Federation Not to Meet

HE annual national convention of the Catholic Federation of the United States has been suspended for the present . Such was the decision arrived at during the recent meetof the Executive Board held at Chicago, March 6. All ated societies are urged instead to cooperate enthusiastically the Catholic War Council. The Federation itself is placed rely at the Council's disposal for any service with which ay be honored. In the report of the national secretary rence was made to the protests filed with the Saturday ning Post, the Red Cross, and other papers and magas for the publication of matter offensive to American Cath-. Of particular interest was a cablegram received from Confederation of England asking the American Federation ooperate with English Catholics in calling the attention of British Government to the campaign of misrepresentation nst the Pope, as a matter seriously detrimental to the cause he Allies, and to protest in the name of Catholics against continuance of this propaganda. In answer the following egram was sent:

> The Catholic Federation of England is authorized to represent the Catholic Federation of the United States in the protest filed with the British Government calling attention the campaign of misrepresentation against Pope Benect XV.

ne members of the executive and advisory boards and of various national committees will hold a meeting at a later , not yet determined. Mr. Thomas Flynn, national presi-, and Mr. Anthony Matre, national secretary, were elected epresent the Federation in the Catholic War Council.

The Laetare Medalist

HE Laetare Medal for the year 1918 has been awarded by the University of Notre Dame to Hon. Joseph Scott, of Angeles, a well-known lawyer and lecturer. Mr. Scott, gh born in England, 1867, is of Irish parentage. He was llow-student, at St. Cuthbert's, Ushaw, of the late Wilfrid d, and numbered among his professors Cardinal Merry del In 1889 he came to the United States and continued his ies at St. Bonaventure's College, Allegheny, N. Y., where eceived his master's degree and held the post of professor of rhetoric. In 1894 he was admitted to the bar and soon after settled at Los Angeles where his public-spirited labors gained for him general recognition. Santa Clara College honored him with his degree of Ph.D., and his own Alma Mater conferred on him the degree of LL.D. He has been prominent in the various activities of the Knights of Columbus, and at present is lecturing on the reason of America's entrance into the war. He has won particular esteem by his fairness towards all classes of American citizens at a time when, as he says, the air "is full of suspicions of anti-Americanism and pro-Germanism," and hardly any one, no matter how distinguished his public services, may consider himself immune from false suspicion. "Let us write," he urges, "the history of the Catholic citizen and the Catholic home in the hearts of our non-Catholic fellow-citizens, so that when the war is over there will be an end to the detestable campaign of prejudice and bigotry."

Desolation

"WITH desolation is all the land made desolate!" The heartrending plaint of the Prophet is repeated in the letter of a Togo missionary, held in British captivity. It was allowed to pass the English censor. In it he thus writes to one of his religious brethren in America:

> Dear Confrère: After a six years' stay in Togo I have been led into British captivity, together with seventeen other missionaries, on October 11 of last year. With a bleeding heart I bade farewell to the beloved Togo country. The parting was made doubly bitter by the order to board the steamer within two hours. Now all the missionaries have been led away from here. The churches and chapels stand empty and desolate. The "perpetual lights" have been extinguished throughout Togoland, and more than 22,000 Christians, who, thanks to much hard work, had been won over to Christianity, are now left to relapse into paganism. The last Fathers and Sisters are expected to land in England this very week.

The flourishing Togo mission, founded in 1892 by the Fathers of the Divine Word, numbered before the outbreak of the war, one Bishop, fifty-one priests, seventeen Brothers, twenty-seven Sisters, 217 teachers, 8,460 pupils and 22,000 baptized Christians. There were seventeen churches, sixteen chapels and 156 prayer houses. Must all this now be left to decay and the Word of God no longer be heard in the desolate land? Cannot some means be found by warring nations to consider the interests of immortal souls?

A New Anti-Catholic Forgery

TIMELY attention is called by the Knights of Columbus' Commission on Religious Prejudices to the latest Lincoln forgery which recently appeared in the New Age Magazine, the official publication of the thirty-third degree Scottish Rite Masonry. The martyred President is credited with saying:

> I have the proof that Archbishop Hughes, whom I had sent to Rome that he might urge the Pope to induce the Roman Catholics of the North, at least to be true to their oaths of allegiance, and whom I thanked publicly, when under the impression he had acted honestly according to the promise he had given me, is the very man who advised the Pope to recognize the legitimacy of the Southern Confederacy and put the weight of his tiara in the balance against us in favor of our enemies. Such is the perfidy of Jesuits.

The only authority cited for this imposition is a book of the Menace type, professedly written to besmirch and discredit the Church. In reply the Knights of Columbus' Committee states the following facts:

> It is a matter of common familiarity to all who know anything at all about the subject, first, that Lincoln did not send Archbishop Hughes to Rome, but to France; second, that his mission had no reference to the Catholics in this country, but was to help to prevent France and England from forming an alliance to recognize and aid the South, as was being discussed in foreign diplomatic circles at the time; third, that the Pope did not recognize the Southern Confederacy, but on the contrary refused to accord it recognition, and on the whole acted toward our Government in a manner probably more satisfactory than any of the great European powers; fourth, that Archbishop Hughes was not a Jesuit, as none would know better than Lincoln and Secretary Seward, one of his most intimate friends.

The Knights of Columbus are to be congratulated on the excellent work they are carrying on in defense of the Church. The latest calumny recalls the forged Lincoln utterance about the dark cloud he saw on the horizon, signifying the presence of the Jesuits in these ill-fated United States. The utterance was discredited by Robert Lincoln after a careful examination of his father's writings and papers.

Pastoral of the Bishop of Savannah

THERE was no proclamation of universal peace made by the Angels on Christmas night, says the Bishop of Savannah in his Lenten pastoral. There was a message of peace that was meant for the heart and soul of every individual man who would avail himself of the means which Christ would offer to the world. There is no need today of a new religion, as many claim, but of an application of the religion of Christ, which the world has failed to put into practice. "In the last days shall come deceitful scoffers," the Apostle St. Paul predicted, and to these words the Bishop adds: "There are numbers of deceitful scoffers in the world today, and those who have departed from the Faith are very anxious to start a new religion." In the meantime there is but one voice that dares to speak in fearless language of the peace of Christ:

> What voice has been raised in the world begging warring nations to put an end to this dreadful war and arrange some satisfactory terms of lasting peace? What voice has been pleading for the wounded and disabled soldiers of every army in the many prison camps that they might either be returned to their homes or harbored, until the war is over, in some neutral nation? What voice has sent messages of inquiry to every place where these miserable prisoners of war are found and obtained news of them and then sent the word which so often changed mourning to rapturous joy when those at home who had lamented a member of their household as dead, now heard the echo of that voice, assuring them that, though kept in prison, he would one day be returned to them? It was the voice of the Visible Head of the Catholic Church, the voice of the Vicar of the Prince of Peace.

That his paternal love and solicitude for all his children should be misunderstood and maliciously misrepresented was to be expected. So the world had treated the Divine Master and so it will treat all His servants who walk, fearlessly and faithfully, in the blood-stained footprints that lead to Calvary.

Dr. Carroll's Statistics for the Year 1917

AN official review of church membership for the year 1917, by Dr. H. K. Carroll, is published in the Christian Herald. It is interesting to note that no fewer than thirteen denominations are set down as "Catholic," not including the Anglicans who lay claim to this name. There is obviously all the more reason why we should insist upon our simple name of "Catholics," without the appellation of "Roman," which Protestants insist upon giving us and which is persistently misunderstood. The "Catholic Church," is the world-church. The number of "communicants" (sic) assigned to us for the United States is 14,618,197. The number of Catholics given in the "Catholic Directory" as officially ascertained (not for 1917 but for 1916, as the former figures are not yet ready) is 17,022,879. The actual number, as we know, approximates more closely to 20,000,000. Dr. Carroll again states that he has not included the children in the figures given by him: "It must be remembered," he says, "that infants young children, also persons mentally incapable of choice, can with a few exceptions, such as the Roman Catholic, the Eas Orthodox, the Latter-Day Saints, qualify for church membership, and these classes are not included in the tabulation." his own basis therefore he thus computes the actual propor of church members in the United States:

> The number of infants and children of nine years of ag and under was, according to the United States Census o 1910, 20,391,996 in a total population of 92,000,000, or abo 22 per cent. Some children of nine are treated as com municants, or members, how many the United States Censu of 1916, shortly to appear, will show. Taking on this a count, a lower percentage, say, twenty, as probably safe, w have as applied to the population at the end of 1916, estimate by the Government at nearly 103,000,000, 20,600,000 who ca not be considered as possible candidates for church mem bership, at least in 1917. This leaves, not considering idio and insane, about 82,261,000 as possible church member under the rule of the denominations generally. As there ar according to the returns for 1917, 40,515,126, it follows th the proportion of church members is a little less than on half, or the number of church members in every thousan of persons qualified for choice as church members is abo 493, which is by no means as bad as it is often represente nor is it nearly as good as it ought to be.

The following is a condensed summary drawn up by Carroll from his detailed statistics. It may be observed Catholics are merely included among the three bodies of Wes Catholics whose total is given as 14,663,342. Of this num about 45,000 "communicants" are assigned to the Po Catholics and the American Old Catholics.

Chronicle

The War.—On Thursday morning, March 21, what ppears to be the long-awaited German offensive burst gainst the Allies in France, the enemy attacking the British troops on a front of over fifty miles, extending roughly from a short distance southeast of Arras where the ensée crosses the battle line east of Croisilles, to the eighborhood of La Fère on the Oise. After a heavy tillery preparation along this front the Germans unched their infantry attacks in dense formation, not venly along the line, but at various widely separated oints. On the first day their main efforts were directed gainst the British positions on either side of the Cambrai-apaume-Amiens road, not far from the scene of the cent Cambrai battle and extending to the ground of e battle of Arras. By March 22, their activities had ifted to the other end of the engaged front before St. uentin and along the St. Quentin-Noyon-Paris road. he thrust of the German armies indicated that they ere endeavoring to bring into play their favorite strategy a double turning movement. The fighting continued n March 23 with unabated fury and by Sunday, March 4, the first stage of the battle, in which at least 1,250,000 en were involved, was finished. The result was a sub-antial German gain. The Germans claimed the ad-ntage all along the line from Monchy, near Arras on e north to La Fère on the south, where the British ctor ends and the French begins. Berlin stated that a considerable part of the British army was beaten" nd also asserted that up to that date the Germans had ken 25,000 prisoners in addition to 400 field guns and 00 machine guns, a number later increased to 30,000 risoners and 600 guns. The greatest penetration of the ritish line by the enemy by March 24 was just below t. Quentin where it was nine miles. When the German ttack on the first two days of the battle reached its aximum near the northern end of the line west of ambrai, it was shifted suddenly to the southern end, ith such an enormous mass of men and metal hurled gainst the British lines that here the British line broke nd as the enemy poured through Haig's troops had to etreat to previously prepared positions. The enemy pur-ued, the British making a desperate stand at Ham about even miles southwest of St. Quentin. The Germans apparently intended to drive a wedge here between the British and French armies. In the north where the fighting was most intense, the British were more steady. At Mory, northwest of Cambrai, the Germans attained their greatest penetration in this section, about four miles. Terrific fighting took place around the little town of Mory, which in the course of the battle changed hands several times. Marshal Haig's last reports indicate that his forces were obliged to retire south and west of St. Quentin to new positions. According to the latest bulletins the tide of battle was running against the British. Berlin states that the Kaiser's troops have driven part of the British army across the Somme and have taken Péronne, Chauny and Ham. American troops were erroneously reported in action at Chauny.

lletin, Mar. 18, p.m.-Mar. 25, a.m.

On March 23 and 24 Paris was officially reported to be under bombardment of long range guns. On that date shells of 240 millimeters (about 9.5 inches) reached the capital and its suburbs at intervals of twenty minutes, killing and wounding several persons. The shortest distance from Paris to the front is over 100 kilometers (62 miles). A monster cannon supposed to have hurled these shells has been located in the Forest of St. Gobain, west of Laon and 76 miles from Paris.

In a proclamation issued on March 20 President Wilson directed the Secretary of the Navy to hoist the American flag on the Dutch ships now in the territorial waters of the United States. Imperative military needs of the nation, the President stated, required that there should be no further delay, and he held that the act was in accordance with international law and practice. The Navy Department and the Shipping Board were vested with full power to man and arm the vessels, send them through the submarine zone carrying soldiers and war supplies, or put them to any other use expedient. Arrangements had been made whereby coincident with the action taken by the President, the Dutch shipping now held under the control of the Allies should be taken over. It has been estimated that there are approximately 500,000 tons of these ships in American waters and an equal amount of tonnage within the jurisdiction of England and France.

Seizure of Dutch Ships

In the last stage of the negotiations between the United States and the Government of the Netherlands for the transfer of the ships, the Netherlands Government stated that it did not feel that it could acquiesce in the use of the ships in carrying troops and munitions through the submarine zone. In a statement supplementing his proclamation, President Wilson reviewed the negotiations which had been carried on between the United States and Holland and made it clear that he sympathized with Holland's precarious position as a result of Germany's defiant attitude, which, he said, made impossible "the meeting of free wills." The interests of Holland, he said, would be safeguarded in every respect. The ships she sends here for coal will be freely bunkered and will be immune from detention. The "Nieuw Amsterdam," which came to our waters under an agreement for her return will be released and she will be allowed to take back a cargo of food. Germany has threatened, if Holland consented to the transfer of the ships, to sink any vessels that were sent to America for food. The text of the President's proclamation ordering the seizure of the ships is as follows:

WHEREAS, The law and practice of nations accords to a belligerent power the right in times of military exigency and for purposes essential to the prosecution of war, to take over and utilize neutral vessels lying within its jurisdiction; and

WHEREAS, The Act of Congress of June 15, 1917, entitled "An act making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the military and naval establishments on account of war expenses for the fiscal year ending June thirtieth, nineteen hundred and seventeen, and for the other purposes," confers upon the President power to take over the possession of any vessel within the jurisdiction of the United States for use or operation by the United States;

Now, therefore, I, Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States of America, in accordance with international law and practice, and by virtue of the Act of Congress aforesaid, and as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, do hereby find and proclaim that the imperative military needs of the United States require the immediate utilization of vessels of Netherlands registry now lying within the territorial waters of the United States; and I do therefore authorize and empower the Secretary of the Navy to take over on behalf of the United States the possession of and to employ all such vessels of Netherlands registry as may be necessary for essential purposes connected with the prosecution of the war against the Imperial German Government. The vessels shall be manned, equipped, and operated by the Navy Department and the United States Shipping Board, as may be deemed expedient; and the United States Shipping Board shall make to the owners thereof full compensation, in accordance with the principles of international law.

The act of the President, though in strict accordance with the "lex angaria" recognized by the Hague Peace Congress and acted on by Germany in the Franco-Prussian war, has stirred up a certain amount of resentment in the Netherlands against the United States. A diplomatic break between Holland and this country is spoken of in some political quarters in the Netherlands. In the diplomatic circles and official departments at Washington no such complications are looked for.

The Supreme War Council of the Allies issued on March 18 a statement condemning Germany's pol crimes against the Russian and Rumanian peoples, r ing to acknowledge Germany's p treaties with them and decla "We are fighting and mean to tinue fighting in order to finish once for all with policy of plunder and establish in its place the pea reign of organized justice." In speaking of the cr which under the name of a German peace were comm against Russia the Council's statement which was is through the London Foreign Office says:

Russia was unarmed. Forgetting that for four years Ger had been fighting against the independence of nations an rights of mankind, the Russian Government in a mood of s lar credulity expected to obtain by persuasion that "demo peace" which it had failed to obtain by war. The results that the intermediate armistice had not expired before the man command, though pledged not to alter the dispositio its troops, transferred them en masse to the western front so weak did Russia find herself that she dared to raise no test against this flagrant violation of Germany's plighted

What followed was of like character, when "the Ge peace" was translated into action. It was found to involv invasion of Russian territory, the destruction or capture Russia's means of defense, and the organization of Russian for Germany's profit—a proceeding which did not differ annexation because the word itself was carefully avoided.

Meanwhile, those very Russians, who had made military o tions impossible, found diplomacy impotent. Their repres tives were compelled to proclaim that while they refused to the treaty presented to them, they had no choice but to sig so they signed it, not knowing whether in its true significa meant peace or war, nor measuring the degree to which Ru national life was reduced by it to a shadow.

For us of the Entente Governments the judgment whic free peoples of the world will pass on these transactions w never be in doubt. Why waste time over Germany's pl when we see that at no period in her history of conquest when she overran Silesia nor when she partitioned Poland she exhibited herself so cynically as a destroyer of national pendence, the implacable enemy of the rights of man, an dignity of civilized nations.

After referring to the threatened partition of Po by Germany and to the fate of Rumania overwhel by Germany's "merciless passion for domination," statement adds that the Allies cannot and will not re nize such peace treaties as these and proclaims that will continue to fight on in order to finish this po of plunder and to establish in its stead "the peac reign of organized justice." Almost at the time that statement was issued it was reported that German tr were advancing on Moscow from three directions shortly after they had occupied portions of the Tr Siberian Railroad.

was ordained to the priesthood in 1654. He was ointed Archbishop of Armagh July 9, 1669, was con- rated at Ghent November 30, 1669, and received pallium July 28, 1670. In 1673 the persecution of Irish Church took on new fury and writs for the est of the Archbishop were often issued by the Gov- ument. He was arrested December 6, 1679, and after hort time he was taken to London for trial. Before sing sentence of death the Chief Justice set forth at there could be no greater crime than to endeavor propagate the Catholic Faith; than which there is hing more displeasing to God or more pernicious to nkind in the world." At the beatification Mgr. Riordan, rector of the Irish College, in speaking of persecutions in the United Kingdom, declared:

Recent press dispatches announce the death of the st Rev. John Healy, Archbishop of Tuam, since ruary 7, 1903. He was born in Ballinafad, County Sligo, November 14, 1841, was ordained to the priesthood September, 1867, became coadjutor Bishop of nfert in 1884, and succeeded to this See in 1896, rising r to the Archbishopric of Tuam. th of Archbishop Healy

The country is in a state of great and continued tation; the people are demanding that they be allowed till the pasture land and on meeting with a refusal they seize the land and plough it in preparation for planting. During the week land raids, as the Irish papers m them, have increased in the South and West of and, notably in Clare, Sligo and Leitrim. Heavy ms for damages have been lodged with the Clare unty Council by victims of the raids and of cattle ves, one claimant demanding £2,000 for loss by the ves. The Chief Secretary of Ireland, Mr. Duke, has tten an open letter on these subjects, in which he de- es that the new manifestations are inspired by a ire to injure the Convention; Sinn Fein retorting that s anxious to feed the people immediately issued a clamation which read:

ational Turmoil

> o increase the food supply and safeguard our people against horrors of famine this year and next year it has been de- d on Wednesday, 20th inst., at a meeting of the combined mittees of the Sinn Fein Clubs of Ballaghaderreen and dis- to secure for tillage purposes to labourers and farmers hav- 10 acres or under the use at £4 per acre of the land situate at tlemore, Brooklawn, Colebrooke, Levelick, Aughurine, Augh- tia, Edmonstown, Lung and Lisene.
> The owners of available land in the aforementioned districts have been asked to co-operate with the clubs in allotting the land. The work of allotting will be begun at 10 a. m., Tuesday, 26th inst., and carried on in the districts in the order named above. Every person entitled to receive an allotment must be present when the division is being made in his district, and failure on any man's part to attend will leave him without an allotment. All the men are requested to bring spades or other farm implements, and the work will be carried out in the name of the Irish Republic.

The situation is critical and bloodshed is not improbable. A rather serious riot occurred in Waterford when Captain William Redmond, son of the late leader of the Nationalists, was elected to the House of Commons over Dr. White, the Sinn Fein candidate. Meantime the English, but not the Irish, papers are taking an optimistic view of the Convention. The Westminster Gazette, however, remarks that public hopes should not be pitched too high, since there are many stages and pitfalls between a draft and a final agreement. These remarks are apropos of an announcement that Sir Horace Plunkett is preparing a report of the work of the Grand Committee for presentation on April 4. An official statement says that decisions have been reached on all material points.

Rome.—Following the precedent set by himself last Christmas, the Holy Father has addressed to the people of the United States through the medium of the Associated Press, an Easter message, which reechoes the greeting given by the risen Saviour after the agony of the first Holy Week:

The Pope's Easter Message

> The first message of the risen Saviour to His disciples, after suffering the torture of Passion Week, was "Peace be unto you." Never has the world for which He sacrificed Himself needed so poignantly that message of peace as today. On this solemn occasion no better wish can be made to the country so dear to our hearts than that the Divine Redeemer may grant a realization of the desire of all, that is, a healing of the existing hatred and the concluding of a lasting peace based on the foundations of justice, fear of God, and love of humanity, giving to the world a new organization of peoples and nations united under the ægis of true religion in aspiring to a nobler, purer and kinder civilization. It is thus we desire to fulfil our Master's last injunction to His apostles: "Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature."

The Holy Father's reference to his affection for the American people, which is quite in line with many of his previous utterances, will be welcomed not only by Catholics, but also by non-Catholics in this country; and all alike will be struck by the lofty moral and intensely Christian tone which pervades the message.

English newspapers, of the last part of February, which have just arrived in this country, contain interesting items of information concerning the discussion of the notorious Article XV of the Secret Treaty in the House of Parliament. Mr. McKean complained of the British Government's treatment of the Vatican on two grounds: the lack of courtesy shown the Holy Father in the matter of the Pope's peace proposals, and the offense given the Vatican in Article XV of the Secret Treaty. Lord Cecil replied to Mr. McKean, and stated that, if the Government, after assuring the Pope that the Holy See's note should be studied with "the closest and most serious attention," sent no further communication on the subject, the reason for its action was that it believed "that there would be nothing gained by adding anything further to what had been said by President Wilson." The London Tablet finds this explanation far from satisfactory:

It was open to the Foreign Office to explain that the Government, having given full consideration to the Papal Note, felt unable to accept its suggestions. If this had been done, there could at least have been no question of discourtesy, but to promise that the proposals of the Holy See should receive "the closest and most serious attention," and then never to say another word, is difficult to justify. Apparently the Holy Father's Note was acknowledged respectfully, put into a pigeon-hole, and then forgotten.

The Tablet contrasts President Wilson's courtesy with the Foreign Office's "strange neglect." Nevertheless Lord Cecil's explanation, if not satisfying, contained several passages which Catholics will read with pleasure:

The honorable member appears to think that the Government is committed to some anti-Papal policy. This is an entire mistake. The Government, as everyone in the House is perfectly well aware, is trustee for the good administration of an Empire which contains many tens of thousands, many millions, of Roman Catholic subjects, and quite apart from any personal feeling that one member of the Government or another might have on the subject, it would be failing in its duty if it launched out into action disrespectful or injurious to the Holy See. . . . I say once again that the terms of the Secret Treaty, the action with regard to the Papal Note, and the other matters to which the honorable member has alluded, were not in any way dictated by any anti-Papal feeling on the part of the Government, and were not intended as, and did not constitute in the opinion of the Government, any insult or disrespect to the Pope or the religion over which he presides, and I hope that the honorable member will assure his friends that that repudiation is made in absolute sincerity on behalf of the whole Government.

The Universe in its issue of February 22, commenting on Lord Cecil's reply, endorses the opinion of Mr. McKean, that there is more than a suspicion that the Government was terrorized by the press into trying to gag the Pope, but believes that "the old no-Popery cry of Lord John Russell's day will not be galvanized into life even by the joint efforts of those eminently mid-Victorian organs, the Post and the Spectator."

The Tablet accepts Lord Cecil's explanation of the meaning of Article XV of the Secret Treaty, namely, that the clause was intended merely to put on record the settled purpose of the belligerents to limit attendance at the Peace Congress to the Powers which had waged the war. Accordingly it acquits the Foreign Office of anything but a gaucherie. It gives expression, however, to criticism of the action of the Government, which is practically identical with that of the Osservatore Romano, and asks very pointedly why the clause, if it was aimed at all non-belligerent Powers, was not expressed in terms applicable to all—to Spain and Holland and Scandinav as well as to the Holy See:

Could anything be more stupid or needlessly offensive than single out one Power by name for exclusion, when the same r was to apply to all the Powers of the world except the bell erents? Italy, no doubt, in her dread of the influence of t Vatican, had no time to think of anything else, but surely might have occurred to the Foreign Secretary of an Emp which includes many millions of Catholics, that such a law proscription, pointed solely at the Pope, would arouse the de est feelings of anger and resentment. What a little imaginati and regard for the feelings of others were needed to convert particular exclusion which was effected into the general exc sion which was intended!

The explanation of Lord Cecil is undoubtedly rath lame, it palliates but does not remove the offense. had, however, one very good element, for it called for a very frank expression of esteem and appreciation the services rendered by the Pope in the war. In t course of his reply to Mr. McKean, Lord Cecil said:

The honorable member quoted a number of cases in which Pope had assisted in connection with the war. That has only not been objected to, but it has been gratefully received the Government, and there are many occasions on which Pope has interfered in connection with the war, and interfe most benevolently, and in a way which has earned the gratitu of every person in this country. There are other cases to wh I could refer, cases in which His Holiness obtained better ter for prisoners, the repatriation of prisoners, where he has r dered services in regard to hospitals, and in regard to the gra of our soldiers in Italy. He has also taken action with rega to matters of civilian relief, and so on, as to which we have h many diplomatic conversations in this country, and as to wh we have always treated all his representations with the utm respect, and we are grateful for the many things he has done alleviate the condition of our prisoners and others who have s fered through the war. The idea that we were precluded by t clause from allowing the Pope to interfere in any matter w the war is clearly and obviously untrue, and equally untrue reference to the bigger matter such as the Papal Note.

Like the Tablet, the Universe accepts the explanati of Lord Cecil at its face value, and quotes with appro the statement made by Cardinal Bourne in his sermon the Lourdes celebration:

I know that those who in an unguarded moment consented such a clause in that treaty had certainly no thought or intent of showing any disregard to or want of respect for the Ap tolic See. . . . There would seem to be no one among statesmen to grasp and understand the historic place which Holy See possesses in all great events.

The Universe characterizes the incident as a "very b blunder."

It is the same story of that want of insight, imagination, p vision and the finer tact which has involved our nation, now always, in so many difficulties, so much odium, and also v often in the commission of injustices only remedied after enormous amount of unnecessary suffering to all concerned.

It is pleasant to note that both Catholic papers, wh reserving to themselves the right to disagree with Pre dent Wilson's answer to the Holy Father, agree in payi tribute to it as "admirable in tone," and in accordan with "the most exacting code of courtesy."

The Ferrer Schools Then and Now

JAMES J. WALSH, M.D., PH.D.

A FEW years ago, about the time of the execution of Francisco Ferrer for direct participation in anarchistic propaganda which resulted disas-ously in Spain, the first Ferrer schools were estab-shed in this country. It was declared that their system education had caught the true significance of liberty d pointed the only way by which people could obtain eir rights. Ferrer's methods were the very last word radical education. Spain could not, of course, tolerate enuine education, least of all, such as would secure erty to its citizens. The Spanish priests recognized ry clearly that Ferrer's doctrine would surely under-ine their influence, destroy faith, eliminate superstition, d hence make their occupation a thing of the past. herefore, Spain put Ferrer to death.

Happily, the present state of war has helped many who ere allowing themselves to coquet with radical doc-ines, to understand the value of conservative opinions, pecially at times of crises in national affairs. The ectacles that war has put before Americans have en-bled them to get a better view of the real significance a number of novel notions that were popular, mainly cause they were novel.

That is what has happened with regard to the Ferrer hools. At one time these centers of disloyalty may ave seemed good to certain people, and many others ay have thought that at least they should be given a ial. But now all loyal Americans have nothing but spicion for them. American opinions with regard to errer himself have changed even more decidedly. His aching was decided by the Spanish Government, after perfectly fair trial, according to all due forms of panish law, to have been an active factor in a number bloody riots, and he himself was declared a causative gent. His trial attracted a great deal of attention in reign countries, indeed much more than the person and e cause involved at all merited. Many foreign news-apers and magazines declared the anarchist's conviction d execution a definite demonstration of the obscurant-m of the Spanish Government, due to bitter opposition progress and above all to genuine education. It was r this reason alone, they proclaimed, that this founder free schools had been condemned. It was also em-natically declared that the Spanish Church, especially panish prelates, had used all their influence to bring out Ferrer's death. There was absolutely no proof any such thing; on the contrary there was abundant vidence that neither Church nor prelates had anything do with the case.

Certain supposedly fair-minded magazines in this coun-y took up the case and exploited it for their readers. hey appealed to hostile Protestants, by declaring that e Spanish Inquisition, though suppressed supposedly a century ago, was really still active, while the Church was at her old tricks of persecuting liberal opinions with the intention of keeping the people as ignorant as possible in order that they might remain faithful to their religion. So Ferrer was made a bleeding martyr. Even Protestant ministers held up the anarchist for public sympathy, and that hater of Christianity became a sort of idol.

Despite all the press-propaganda their founder enjoyed, the Ferrer schools have not exactly flourished in America. In fact those who came to know anything about them soon ceased to wonder why the Spanish Government would have none of them, for it was seen that the Ferrer schools inculcated anarchy, insisted that patriotism was foolishness and that obedience to law was a humiliating slavery. In fact, these schools were founded with the idea that if a determined group of men could succeed in teaching children resistance to organized authority there would soon be a generation of men who would not only refuse to submit to law but would take means to destroy all government. It is very surprising now that such destructive propaganda was ever tolerated at all. In the past we were quite ready to try anything novel, but the new discipline of war-time has taught us some very important lessons, and among others our serious attention has been called to the teaching of the Ferrer schools.

One of these hotbeds of anarchy in New York bears the alluring title "The Ferrer Modern School." Its principal has been roaming about proclaiming the merits of this new, and, as he insists, marvelous system of education. He was in Buffalo not long ago, talking on such very vital questions as conscription, patriotism and obedience to government and laws. He barely kept within the bounds of law and was well outside the bounds of prudence. The police were present, but did not interfere, though surely some of the speaker's utterances called for interference. The audience was small and composed chiefly of Socialists, otherwise it is possible that the speaker might have found himself in need of protection.

In the light of these facts we can now appraise at their true value the charges made against Spain because Ferrer was put to death. The principal of the Ferrer Modern School, for instance, thinks that a great wrong is done by conscription in this country. The United States Supreme Court has declared conscription, even for foreign service, entirely constitutional and indeed has emphasized that government would be impossible without it, but the exponent of Ferrer's doctrines disagrees with our highest Court's decree and, according to the newspaper report, "expressed his dislike for the way the country is run at present" and said "that there are hundreds of people under conscription to support this country which is supposed to give them the enjoyment of life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness—on paper."

His favorite heroes are the Bolsheviki. They are the only ones who have done anything in this war worth while. Other people have been led astray to fight a capitalistic war, but the Russian armies disbanded and the common people of Russia properly educated, of course, by methods corresponding to those of the Ferrer school had refused to fight and thus began the liberation of the masses. "We wish well to the Bolsheviki" he said. "I am a Bolshevist myself. The Bolshevist movement in Russia and the freeing of the masses there has been the great benefit to civilization which the war has brought about." He insisted that all our education in this country was a mistake and that the only real system of education for the people was that of his school which would give them a proper sense of their own rights and not let them submit tamely to the impositions that were practised on the people by those above them, or by those who have secured authority over them without any real justification.

What particularly came in for the principal's severe deprecation, and indeed utter condemnation, in the present school-system was the teaching of patriotism. He thought that to teach the young to salute the Flag and to repeat the oath of allegiance was all nonsense or worse. This Ferrer schoolmaster said that true patriotism could not be jammed down the throat of the young that way. He declared, according to Buffalo papers, that "The salute of the flag was a senseless practice which took up time that might be much more profitably employed." He ended by denouncing it as a scheme, on the part of the upper classes, to keep the masses in subjection. According to one of the Buffalo morning papers, he said that such practices "result in a lot of grown people falling victims to scheming bosses and unscrupulous politicians."

The whole drift of his talk was to the effect that all our doctrines about nationality and the flag were cunning devices and elaborately worked out schemes to keep the poor contented and enable the rich to get richer, while preventing the proletariat from knowing its own rights and proceeding to get them. At present there are not many cities in this country which would provide an audience that would stand very much of this sort of talk in war-time. It is indeed rather surprising that Buffalo permitted as much of it as was reported. Certainly the meeting must have been neglected rather thoroughly by the Irish-Americans in Buffalo or the speaker would scarcely have come off so easily.

It is very evident from the reports of the lecture though, of course, this fact had been abundantly known to all those who were familiar with Ferrer and his schools that the basic idea of the Ferrer system of education is to fill children with disregard for law and order, to harp continually on rights and to say nothing about duties. Rights, real and supposed, are exaggerated to the greatest possible degree and duties are pushed into the background. The all-important thing is that each individual shall get as much as possible for himself and not give a thought whether anybody else gets anything or not.

It will not be long, in all probability, before the Government finds that it will have to suppress such loose talk as the foregoing, but in the meantime what a light these ravings throw on the Ferrer incidents and Ferrer's execution. Is it any wonder that when such teaching led to riot, murder and destruction of property the Spanish Government executed the anarchist? The International Workers of the World, the I. W. W., sprang directly from Ferrer and his principles, and yet William Archer defended the anarchist and insisted that the Spanish Government was all wrong and Ferrer right. Indeed, the interest in the latter made it perfectly clear that there is a secret society, some form of the International, so-called, which influences newspaper opinion widely for purposes decided on by an international committee.

What a wonderful revealer time is! I wonder how many people who were interested in the Ferrer incident when they seemed to indicate a new argument against the Catholic Church will heed this revelation of time and realize that the ancient Church must always maintain its thoroughly conservative position against teachings which are subversive of authority?

War Camp Community Service

Richard A. Muttkowski, Ph.D.

AMERICAN soldiers are wont to repress, not express, their sentiments, and it is therefore not surprising that we find it difficult to ascertain their exact thoughts on any matter concerning their comfort and welfare. If asked directly, they will give a flippant and evasive reply. Yet behind the flippancy there lies the germ of the correct answer. Some months ago I met a number of soldier friends on their first leave of absence and deprecated my inability to entertain them at the time as I was as new in the city as they themselves.

"'Nuff said, Sir," one voiced it slangily. "Just to see you and think and talk of old times is enough for me."

"And rock in a rocking-chair while you do it," said another.

"In a real room," added the third.

"And a real woman in it," said one of the four shyly referring to my landlady.

"And be fed real food from real china with all the other real trimmings. Oh, boy!"

Somewhat later, after several visits, they admitted their initial brief, but violent, spell of homesickness, and stated frankly how they felt about it all. To the soldier drafted from a comfortable home the cheerless monotony of the barracks and the sameness of camp-life are oppressive, and he is bound to seize the first opportunity to get away from the camp for even a brief spell. What he wants he does not know, and he does not care particularly. He has wants, but why bother to analyze them? Above all he desires to get away. That was the experience of my friends in their first weeks at Camp Funston. Since then I have met many others, both officers and privates, and their wants and desires seem to center around three ideals: home comforts, home cookery and home company.

But this is not what I set about to write. Rather I intended to show how the cities near the camps discovered these wants and how they tried to meet and satisfy them. For the reason that this particular phase of the war activities is entirely in the hands of the people themselves, it offers opportunity to study the response of a democracy to war-time needs. Furthermore, a problem that is only an incident in the routine of a large city has taken the form of a distinct civic movement here in Manhattan, Kansas, and in the other camp communities, such as Junction City and Ogden, in the environs of Camp Funston, and Fort Riley.

Let me consider the war communities and the development of their service chronologically. Coincident with the rapid growth of the national encampments the cities near the camps found themselves confronted with several distinct problems. Quiet cities, for the most part, these communities were suddenly plunged into war activities. It was a distinct shock. The easy-going customs of life in small cities had to be exchanged for the clangor and hurry of metropolitan activity. Everything was "speeded up." There was a great demand for rooms, eating places and amusement places, and for equipment and paraphernalia of the most varied types. Things were wanted in quantities for immediate use. Perhaps these problems seem negligible to people accustomed to life in a metropolis that can absorb two or three simultaneous conventions without further external signs than some scattered bunting and a little congestion at the hotels; but to the average small American town a convention is an important and rare event, for which it makes one splendid effort and then relapses into its previous dormant state, to rest contemplatively for another far-distant occasion. Yet there is aptness in this simile, for the cities of the camp environs are at present in a more or less constant state of "conventionitis," and they are only gradually becoming used to it.

There are three definite lines of effort along which the camp communities have been forced to extend themselves. They are, successively, (1) the housing of officers' and privates' families, (2) the housing of soldiers and their relatives and friends on a week-end, and (3) the entertainment of soldiers on leave or furlough,—of those that seek an evening's change from camp life and those that come to meet relatives, friends and sweethearts over Sunday.

The housing of officers' and privates' families was perhaps the first and more perplexing problem. As a problem it is constant. To a city like Manhattan, with a normal population of a little over 6,000 and an annual added population of 2,500 students, the sudden influx of several additional thousands meant a confusing difficulty. The city was meant to hold 9,000 at the most. How, then, accommodate 12,000 or more?

Yet this perplexity was the least troublesome of all. A careful canvass of all available room and the further solicitation of rooms from people who were not in the habit of entertaining strangers resulted in ample quarters for all during the winter months. Naturally, the demand has increased the rentals, and some landladies have taken cruel advantage of the helplessness of the people. But, to the credit of the Manhattan women, it must be said that the increase does not originate entirely from this source. Congestion is great and competition for rooms keen, and rather than continue what seems to them a futile search, would-be tenants become importunate and try to force people to keep them by insistent offers of high and even exorbitant terms. Some can afford to do so, but a standard is set which reacts injuriously on the rest. To a great extent, therefore, the high prices for the visitors are of their own choice. To relieve the congestion "roomers" have been taken by business men and professors who would, under ordinary circumstances, hardly consider such an arrangement, and in this case a sense of duty is stronger than pecuniary profits. It is a kindness which is perhaps little appreciated, for it means the sharing of the privacy of home life with strangers. To say, as an officer sneeringly remarked, that "this kindness is well paid for, and as for pride, money is a splendid salve," is a sop to cynicism and not indicative of the truth. As a matter of fact, the added burden of caring for strangers has proved too much for more than one woman, and indeed a fair number have been obliged to give up their houses altogether.

Under the circumstances, the relations between landlady and roomer are often complicated and may give rise to ludicrous incidents. For instance, there was the lieutenant's wife who refused to attend to her bed. Said she: "You can't expect the wife of a lieutenant in Camp Funston to do her own work." Replied the landlady: "And therefore the wife of an overseas captain should do it for you." This only indicates that snobbishness may meet rebuff from rather unexpected quarters, and that it is equally inappropriate among the soldiers' relatives and the soldiers themselves.

The week-end housing still awaits a satisfactory solution. During the winter the cold weather and the several epidemics kept the visitors down to moderate numbers, but the return of warm weather has again filled the streets with visitors, chiefly soldiers and their relatives. A repetition of the autumn conditions is probable. Congestion was then so great that people slept on bare floors, in barns and garages, on porches, in automobiles—wherever there was shelter. Some slept in the open park. What the summer will bring no one can say, but congestion such as never was seen before is sure to reign.

But the really vital problem was that of entertaining the week-end visitors from Camp Funston and Fort Riley, and their relatives. It was natural that the soldiers and the community should turn to the customary agencies, such as the Y. M. C. A., for relief, especially since the Government had placed these societies in charge of that very phase in the camp themselves. But camp and city presented different problems. Camp buildings and their personnel were organized for war service and were therefore efficient, while in the small cities the Y. M. C. A. was barely sufficient for local needs and never intended to cope with a sudden influx. Indeed the Y was unable to cope with the situation at all. This was recognized at once. A few attempts were made to relieve the situation, but only after the National Recreation Association took charge of the community service throughout the country and organized the efforts, was any real success achieved. It is of interest that the representative sent to Manhattan, Mr. Barnes, is responsible for the present national interest in camp community service. Mr. Barnes quickly recognized the fact that a city of 6,000, although sharing the responsibility of entertainment with another of the same size, could not be expected to finance the recreation for a national camp of 42,000, exclusive of officers, men in medical training camps and the regulars stationed at Fort Riley. He therefore brought the matter to the attention of the Rotary Clubs of Kansas, which, together with the national Rotary Clubs and the Chambers of Commerce, have aimed to make the movement general, on a plane perhaps with the K. C. and Y. M. C. A. work within the cantonments. A fund was collected for a community hall, over half of which was subscribed by Manhattan. Pending the construction of the new building, an edifice costing over $25,000, a hall was rented for temporary entertainment.

In an early part of this paper I said that the soldier desires an approximation of home life, and to him this means home cooking, home comforts, home company. To supply these, or to organize the supply, is the aim of the National Recreation Association. Soldiers on leave want to eat. Lunch-rooms, lunch-wagons and "lean-tos" sprang into existence over night to supply the needs. But professional cooking did not appeal to the soldiers. What they wanted was home cooking. Here in Manhattan, and in neighboring camp communities like Junction City, Ogden, Topeka, the ladies' gilds of the various churches cooperated. In shifts, each denomination taking some week-end, they fed the soldiers and their friends with home-cooked suppers. The popularity of the suppers is best attested by the fact that on several occasions, with relays eating from five to nine o'clock, hundreds had to be turned away, till finally the cooks and the food gave out.

For amusement the soldiers may seek the professional sources, such as the "movies" and vaudeville theaters, and the dance halls. Or they can go to the community hall and indulge in dancing, in cards and other games. Again, a definite number may be invited by some of the various rooming clubs, student clubs, and fraternities, and the soldiers will be entertained in various ways. On these occasions the American girl is in her element. Of this there can be little doubt, for the supply of girls seems ample enough for the soldiers.

On Sundays the entertainments in part take on a religious tone. Of course, all churches welcome the soldiers for their Sunday services. A special feature here at Manhattan has been an arrangement by which about a dozen truck-loads of soldiers have been taken out for an afternoon service and luncheon. Sunday dinner offers to many, who cannot otherwise help the men, excellent opportunities to be charitable. This feature has been systematized and many hospitable people regularly ask for a definite number on their hospitality cards.

The entertainment of colored boys must not be forgotten. The local churches for colored folk have taken complete charge of their own people and regularly entertain a number over Saturday and Sunday. Segregation is thus complete within and without the camps, and a difficulty that might have been serious is thereby readily solved.

Over all the Government keeps careful and rigid inspection. As announced at the time the cantonments were built, the Government holds itself responsible for the morals of the soldiers, and its work is both corrective and preventive. Dives and vicious resorts were abolished from the camps and their environs. Cities in the vicinity were closely inspected to keep away the ghouls of both sexes that prey on the morals of the soldiers. This inspection has been kept up strictly. Offenders are confined, suspected houses are watched and lewd women are transferred to detention camps. The supervision aims to be corrective and preventive, yet it could not have been really efficient unless the proper substitutes had been provided both within and without the camps. The work of the K. C. and the Y. M. C. A. in the camps lies without the scope of this paper and has been widely heralded while the work of the camp communities has been overlooked, more so because of its civic ramifications than because of any intended slight.

Thus far I have dealt with the problem from the historical standpoint. What is its sociological or civic bearing? Naturally, one asks: "What do the soldiers think of it, of the city, of the people, of the entertainments? Basing my opinion on the statements of the soldiers as made to me directly, and not on newspaper accounts or on the claims of those interested, the attitude of the soldier can be best designated as "heartily appreciative and sincerely grateful." That is the feeling expressed toward the people and the city in general, but not always so toward the business men. It is unfortunate that the sight of a uniform means to some merchants a stimulus to exact higher prices. This charge has been made, and justly so. Unfortunately, because of a few unpatriotic men hants, the city has been accused of rapacity, unfairly so, t seems to me. Manhattan folk resent the imputation, vhich, by the way, seems to be made against all camp ommunities, be they East, South or West.

Both soldiers and citizens, particularly the former, have ound the local Sunday-closing law very irksome. As in o many Southern and Western communities, all amuse- nent places are closed on Sundays. Various agencies, and he soldiers too, have agitated for a relaxation of this aw for the duration of the war, and for a time it seemed s if pressure would be strong enough to force a less rigid naintenance of the law. Yet church and private enter- ainments are the only kind in progress on Sundays. Just vhy it should be commendable for a church organization o put on an amateur concert-vaudeville-picnic on a Sun- ay afternoon for the benefit of a limited number, while he professional entertainment places must remain closed or the general body of visitors, is an incongruity that nly the Kansas mind can adjudicate and reconcile. For he general visitors there remains only a small community all; yet the administration persists in a rigid enforcement f the ordinance.

Entertainment has brought forth an excellent quality f our new army, democracy. There is no place for snob- ishness. Reversals of peace-time positions are too fre- uent and too pronounced to be conducive to its spread. Where officer and private meet outside the camp they hare the social advantages and help entertain each other and their friends. This democracy is reflected among the citizens as well and is full of promise for the future.

There is the final query: Is all this worth while? What will be the results? As to that, wherever a person does something for his fellow-men, even from a selfish motive, can anything but good come from it? Those who enter- tain find the sacrifice in time and effort well repaid in the gratitude of the soldiers. Aside from this, there is the fact that camp-entertainment in a small city has come to mean a major enterprise, one that needs the cooperation of the whole people to make it a success. Everyone is drawn into its service, and all must enter to make it a complete success. It is a splendid manifestation of democracy, although, like all democratic movements, it exhibits various degrees of perfection. But in the build- ing men have builded better than they knew. For in the mingling of the various civic elements a better under- standing has come which eventually will bear rich fruit. Better than that, the planning, sharing, and enacting of programs has forced a collaboration by the churches which has awakened a healthy mutual respect and has silenced bigotry. The latter would be particularly out of place at this time, as the efforts of the municipality are so ably led by the Rev. A. J. Luckey, the Catholic priest. Catholic soldiers have expressed their gratification at this fact. They are indeed enthusiastic over the public service of their clergy, such as community service, State councils of national defense, and similar activities.

The State and Wages

JOSEPH HUSSLEIN, S.J.

THE masses of the people are aroused. They demand an adequate share in the prosperity which they help to create. Radicalism is in the air, but he voice of impartial justice is likewise heard and will ot be silenced again. The choice for the nations lies etween anarchy and the social teachings of the Church. Happily sane economic opinion daily converges more and nore towards Catholic tradition and Catholic doctrine. n the van of all progress, at the very height of the social novement of our day, stands the Church.

The appeal of the laborer for justice comes close to er heart. It is above all a demand for an equitable vage. Any just and reasonable method that will enable s to secure for him this inalienable right must meet with er hearty approval. But there is one way only by vhich we can attain this end, and that is by legal mea- ures. It is as vain to hope for the conversion of a ominant class of selfish capitalists as to depend upon the nethod of social revolutionists who would overturn the illars of authority and plunge the world into hopeless narchy. Human nature, even at its best, is never to be rusted too far, where gain and profits are in question. The most fair-minded employers best realize, moreover, ow difficult it is to carry out their lofty Christian ideals while forced into competition with unconscionable rivals, uncontrolled by any curb of law.

What of the labor unions? Cannot the fight for justice be confidently committed to them? They have accom- plished much. But there is question mainly of fair wage for the unskilled workers. It is the great mass of the labor population which stands in greatest need of our assistance. These have not been successfully reached by trade unions. Organization has made little progress among them, except where they have been momently swept into some revolutionary movement, a peril which is always imminent. Skilled labor, on the other hand, can sooner or later exact justice for itself where it has not already attained this end. There is danger rather that such labor may in turn become tyrannical and abuse its power to the detriment both of the consumer and of the unskilled operator. Of this too we have had examples in the past.

Labor unions, based upon Christian principles, are per- haps the greatest economic necessity of the day. But even when animated by the most altruistic motives they will find it difficult to come to the assistance of the vast mass of the labor population, except by promoting intel- ligent legislation. This brings us back to the very point from which we started, the need of State legislation.

The case of unskilled labor has been summed up in a paradox, or what may appear to be a vicious circle. Yet the statement expresses the exact truth of the matter: The masses are unorganized because of their low wages, and their wages are low because they remain unorganized. Organization, in other words, is not likely to be successful while unreasonably low wages destroy initiative, energy and intelligence on the part of the worker. Yet without organization wages can never be raised by the workingmen themselves. Extraordinary conditions may for the time create a scarcity of labor, but the period of unemployment, which is certain to follow, will immediately depress wages to their former level. There can consequently be no hope for a decent living wage, to be enjoyed by all the workers at all times, except through legislation.

Wage legislation is a tradition in the Church. Minute regulations for such legislation were drawn up by the Catholic gildsmen. State sanction was given to these regulations, and gild officials were authorized to inflict summary punishment upon all offenders. The difference of remuneration between employer and employee was often very slight, and the benefit of the consumer was never lost to view in determining the wage-scale. It was not a question of securing the highest wages the union could enforce, but of deciding upon the wages that would be fairest for all. No work, no pay, was the rule set down for employer as well as for employee. No employer could draw profits without actually engaging in the occupations of his single trade. These rules, we should note, were drawn up by the Christian employers themselves.

The special wage legislation required for our own day is clear. The principle of a living wage has been laid down by the Holy See. It can be made practical only when enforced by law. The conclusion is obvious. Rhetorical effusions upon the doctrines of the Papal encyclicals, from the pulpit or the platform, will never solve the social problem. The masses will rightly ignore them if no practical application is made. That application depends upon us and must be adapted to the changing conditions of place and time.

In the question of wages the nature of this application seems now beyond dispute. Past experience enables us to proceed without hesitation. There is apparently but one course open, as a logical beginning, and that is to unite solidly upon a minimum wage legislation. It was a Catholic priest—be it said to the glory of the Church—the Rev. John A. Ryan, D.D., who first effectively championed the minimum wage legislation in the United States, and it is another Catholic priest, the Rev. Edwin V. O'Hara, whose name, as Dr. Ryan himself remarks, "Is written in the annals of the United States Supreme Court as the official upholder of the first minimum wage law."

The principle itself is plain. Every toiler has the right to a living wage, a right which takes precedence over every other consideration, excepting only the right which the employer himself has to a remuneration which will enable him and his family to live in reasonable and moderate comfort according to their position in life. It is important moreover for both employer and employee that the continuance and welfare of the industry itself be wisely consulted. Beyond this there can be no question of any profits until the living wage has been paid to the employees. It is not in the name of charity, be it remembered, but in the name of justice that this demand is made. Yet, according to statistics drawn up before the war by social workers and economists, three-fourths of the adult male laborers of the United States were not receiving a living wage. Since only an impossibility can excuse the employer from paying a living wage, and since millions of dollars were at the same time garnered in profits, it follows that there existed a condition of social injustice which urgently clamored for State interference and correction.

What then is a living wage? In general it is defined by Pope Leo XIII as a remuneration "sufficient to support the wage-earner in reasonable and frugal comfort." For the adult male worker, according to the spirit of the Encyclical, it is a wage "sufficient to enable him to maintain himself, his wife and his children in reasonable comfort." For the adult woman worker it is a wage whereby she can reasonably and decently support herself away from home. There is question now, however, of the wage only which is the very least that in the sight of God and man the employer is bound to give. The worker, moreover, should be able, when all expenses have been paid for family or personal maintenance, "To put by some little savings and thus secure a small income." Both he and his family must be provided against the day of dearth, of sickness or unemployment.

The plea recently made by the Chicago packers, in a local court, that the cost of maintaining a family should not be considered in determining wages ignores the dignity of the worker as a human being. A "fair" wage, according to the standard proposed by them and recognized by the capitalistic system of the past, must be ascertained by the market rate of labor in the community. If therefore wages are below the living line in other industries, the packers claim the right to employ their workers under the same conditions. They fail to understand that robbery cannot be justified because it is likewised practised by others. Such immoral principles can evidently be combated in no other way than by Christian legislation. It is the absolute duty of the State to protect its workers under such conditions. The principles enunciated by these men are the strongest argument for the need of setting a legal minimum wage. It would be necessary, if for no other reason than to protect Christian-minded employers in their competition with criminal profiteers.

"But what," the reader may naturally ask, "is the nimum of reasonable comfort which we have a right demand for a family, that it may live in accordance th its Christian dignity?" In answer a single detail y suffice. The very least requirement for a suitable me, as Dr. Ryan says, are three sleeping rooms—one r the parents and one each for the boys and girls of e family—besides two additional rooms for all other rposes. Food, clothing, furniture and opportunities r recreation should all at least measure up to this ndard of decency and self-respect. This surely is a derate demand for any family that would lead a true ristian home life. Yet to bring about even this much may be necessary for the State, besides setting a nimum wage, to regulate also the housing problem. It not just that the entire burden of expense should fall on the employer and consumer, while the landlord ses his rents wherever the need is greatest, because rkmen are obliged to accept his terms. This is a estion too extensive to consider here. In radically stroying the abuses arising from the unearned incre- nt it may be necessary to offer compensation to present ners.

The objections to the minimum wage need not be dis- ssed at present. Experience has sufficiently disproved em. Women, as a rule, have not been thrown out of mployment, wages were not depressed to the level of e legal minimum and prices did not soar appreciably a result of such legislation. The accidental hardships at fell upon some are far outweighed by the good re- lts. As for workers who are not considered capable earning the full minimum wage, special permits have en devised, authorizing them to work for less. Simi- rly, where the payment of a proper minimum wage is possible for a time in any industry, wise allowance can adily be made for the sake of both employers and mployed.

The first step must be the establishment of minimum age boards, such as have now become sufficiently com- on. Under State control these boards decide upon the st minimum of remuneration according to time and ace. Such legislation, however, will prove to be only e beginning of economic readjustments. Its ultimate ject must not be to keep the workers in permanent de- ndence upon a capitalist class. The aim to be kept eadily in view by every Christian man and woman is enable the workers themselves to share, so far as ssible, in the ownership of the land they till and of the dustry in which they toil. This is not Socialism, but its ry opposite.

Over the doors of every State Legislature, over the all of Congress and the Senate Chamber, over the gust tribunal of the Supreme Court of the land, over ery council-room in which the people's representatives semble, should be written in letters of gold the epoch- aking message of Pope Leo XIII, the most important gislative principle ever promulgated for the promotion justice and good will throughout the earth: "Let the law favor ownership, and let its policy be to induce as many as possible of the laboring classes to become own- ers." Here is the only solution, the bridging-over of "the gulf between vast wealth and sheer poverty," the reconciliation with one another of all classes of society, the social basis of lasting concord and Christian charity.

A Prophet Out for Profit?

MICHAEL WILLIAMS

UPTON SINCLAIR, author of "The Jungle" and many other books of Socialist propaganda, has issued the first number of a new monthly magazine called "Upton Sinclair's." It is devoted to the purposes of a "Clean Peace and the Internation." It also contains a great deal of autobiographical details written by its editor. And it begins the publication of a new work by Mr. Sinclair which is later to be issued in book form. It is particularly this new work which should interest Catholics, because of the violent attack it makes upon the Church, which is described in the first number of this new magazine as "this blackest of all Terrors, transplanted to our free Republic from the heart of the Dark Ages."

"The Profits of Religion: an Essay in Economic Interpretation" is the title of this work. Its central thesis is very simple. According to Upton Sinclair, "Man is an evasive beast, given to cultivating strange notions about himself. He is humiliated by his simian ancestry, and tries to deny his animal nature, to persuade himself that he is not limited by its weaknesses nor concerned in its fate." This is an amiable weakness "when it is genuine." But generally it is not genuine, according to Mr. Sinclair; for it can be explained in the main as part of a never-ending deliberate system of deception and terrorism maintained since the dawn of history, and still maintained, by "priests," that is, by a special class of men who make their living in this special way. And though ancient forms of this priestly profiteering were bad enough, of course, the top-pitch and climax of iniquitous priest-craft, referred to as "The Priestly Lie," is necessarily the Catholic Church, "this blackest of all Terrors, transplanted to our free Republic from the heart of the Dark Ages."

Mr. Sinclair assures us, however, that he does not mean to impugn the honesty of "the heroes and madmen of history," or the "sincerity of all who preach the supremacy of the soul." All he asks of the preacher is that he shall make an effort to practise his doctrine. And, lest we be left in the dark as to those who are Mr. Sinclair's preachers of the supremacy of the soul, he continues: "Let him be tormented like Don Quixote; let him go mad like Nietzsche; let him stand upon a pillar and be devoured by worms, like Simeon Stylites—on these terms I grant to any dreamer the right to hold himself above economic science." Nor does Mr. Sinclair attack religion itself. He generously defines it for us: "Religion is the most fundamental of the soul's impulses, the impassioned love of life, the feeling of its preciousness, the desire to foster and further it." What "an evasive beast" is doing with a "soul," and how he got such a thing, and what the soul may be, Mr. Sinclair does not inform us; but we must give him time; there are to be eleven more instalments of the new revelation. New revelation? Yes. Precisely that, for Mr. Sinclair tells us that if here he has "set to work to tear down an old and ramshackle building"—all forms of modern religion, he means—"it is not from blind destructiveness, but as an architect who means to put a new and sounder structure in its place. Before we part company," that is, if you go with him to the end of the twelfth chapter, "I shall submit the blue print of that new home of the spirit."

Only think of it! Oh, sursum corda! Only twelve more months to wait, and then with the Catholic Church, and all other forms of ramshackle superstition demolished, we may enter the new home of the spirit, planned, built, and, I presume, managed, by Uppy Sinclair. (Pardon my seeming note of irreverent familiarity with the new prophet; but when I lived with him in Helicon Hall, he was always "Uppy" to those who watched his career with continual amusement; funny little Uppy!) Nor does he immodestly ask us to accept his new revelation on blind faith. On the contrary, he informs us with firm precision as to his qualifications. "All the world is suffering from a disease: and it happens that I am an expert on that particular disease. I have lived all my life in a laboratory, where it has been under the microscope; I know the germ, and have the serum ready. So in this world-decision I think I have something to say. So I come with my offer of a magazine. It stands for Social Justice." To be sure, at this point he does slip backward a few centuries into the Dark Ages of Faith, for he proceeds to tell us what—really, now, Uppy—there is no means of proving—except possibly by means of the X Ray—namely, that, "as Queen Mary said when she died they would find Calais written on her heart, so on my heart you will find two words, burned in by the acid of pain: Social Justice!" But he quickly rallies from this atavistic relapse, and brings forward positive evidence to support his claim. He quotes Frank Harris, who tells, so Uppy reports, that "to set bounds to his (Sinclair's) accomplishment would be merely impudent." Also an anonymous literary agent in London said after reading the manuscript of the new book: "I want to say how much of a revelation your essay on the economic interpretation of religion was to me . . . I say this in spite of the ties of twenty years' close and intimate communion with the Non-Conformists."

This matter thus satisfactorily settled, and a firm foundation of authority placed under his feet, Uppy adds a few details to complete the self-portrait of the new prophet. For example, he relates how "before I was of age" he was a "watcher" for the Reform party in New York city, "and stood in a polling place on Third Avenue for six hours and carried on a partly verbal and partly physical warfare with a dozen Tammany officials and a howling mob of Tammany thugs to get thirty-four anti-Tammany ballots counted." The picture of little Uppy Sinclair fighting a mob of Tammany politicians conjures up, for anybody who knows him, a "scrumptious" "close-up" of a really dauntless hero, one, therefore, who has no trouble at all in tumbling down the ramshackle structure of the Church, and building a new home for the spirit on its ruins.

What a pity, then, what a pity, that on the last page of this first instalment of the "economic interpretation of religion," in which Uppy Sinclair prepares the ground for his doughty deed, he should himself . . . pass the hat. "I think," he says, "that I have proven my sincerity by my years of labor as a teacher; therefore I have no hesitation in asking for support." In other words, the laborer is worthy of his hire. "I ask you to subscribe. I ask you to subscribe for your friends; I ask you to subscribe for bundle orders . . . I will receive donations." In short, the new prophet is out for the profits.

Is this unjust? Do I say there is nothing in Upton Sinclair's frenzied attack upon religion but the desire to make a comfortable living in bourgeois and comfortable Pasadena? Do I judge him by his own economic theory by means of which he sees the Church of God, the home of martyrs, the mother of countless millions of heroic men and women who left all things and gave up all to follow Jesus Christ, as predominantly a system for enslaving and robbing the poor so that "priests" may live in fatness and ease?

Knowing the man; knowing his perverted idealism; his starkly fantastic whirligig of a soul, I answer, No, I do nothing of the sort; but I merely show by a cursory glance at his own foolish attack on Holy Church how readily anything may be basely judged, if you attack that thing from a base point of view.

But, more than that, I give this much time and space to poor, bewildered, blinded, suffering, disappointed, egotistical Upton Sinclair, not merely for the easy sport of turning his farrago into ridicule, but to give Catholics a peep into the cloud of dust and rubbish which is blowing up before the approaching storm. Make no mistake; I am no prophet or son of a prophet, but I know the spirit of the Socialist world, and the spirit of State-idolatry which is spreading its evil reign so rapidly among men, and I know that this hysterical, foolish assault on the part of Upton Sinclair has ominous importance as a sign of what is coming upon the Church in the United States and which will do frightful harm unless Catholics awaken and prepare themselves for the struggle.

Our First Catholic Editor

THOMAS F. MEEHAN

IN the course of the numerous contributions to the elucidation of the long discussed problem, the Catholic daily paper not much was said about that interesting and really enterpris ng personage, our first Catholic editor. Some stickler for exact terms may remark that "our first Catholic editor" does not strictly convey the idea intended, but we shall let the expression stand for the purpose of drawing attention to the fact that a tardy tribute is paid to this editor's work and accomplishments by Professor James Melvin Lee, Director of the Department of Journalism in New York University, in his recently published book, "History of American Journalism."

The editor in question was the Rev. Gabriel Richard, one of "the Gentlemen of S. Sulpice," that, happily for the needs of the infant Church in the United States, the French Revolution drove into exile across the ocean to these shores.

In the introduction to his history Professor Lee describes the evolution of the modern newspaper from the Acta Diurna of Cæsar's time, down through the ages of written Gazettes and Town-Criers' spoken communications. In the course of this narrative Dr. Lee says:

> America has not been without its spoken newspaper. The clergy of New England frequently related or referred to items of news. The bellman, as he made his rounds, sometimes told other things besides giving the hour and informing the public that all was well. The spoken newspaper probably reached its highest development in the United States in Detroit, Mich. The Reverend Father Gabriel Richard, a priest of the Order of Sulpice, who first came to that place as resident pastor of the Church of St. Anne, was its conductor. To arouse the public and awaken an interest in the affairs of the Government, he appointed a town-crier, who every Sunday, at the doors of his church, told the public in general and the congregation in particular all the news that was fit to speak. In addition, this public crier mentioned the auction sales and related other advertising announcements. Later to supplement the spoken newspaper, a written edition was posted at a convenient place near the church. Father Richard was assisted in his news enterprise by Theopolis Meetz, the Sacristan of St. Anne's Church, but later a printer and publisher.

Dr. Lee refers again to the enterprising Father Richard when, in relating the beginnings of the press in Michigan, he says:

> Journalism in Michigan began with that most interesting precursor, the spoken newspaper, conducted under the auspices of the Reverend Father Gabriel Richard, a priest of the Order of Sulpice who came to Detroit in 1798 as resident pastor of the Roman Catholic Church of St. Anne. Mention has been made in an earlier chapter of how he appointed a town-crier whose duty it was on Sunday to stand on the church steps . . . Out of this spoken, and later written newspaper, grew the first printed sheet in Michigan, entitled The Michigan Essay, or Impartial Observer. It first appeared in Detroit on August 31, 1809. As editor and publisher Father Richard selected one of his parishoners, James M. Miller. The French section, not a half, as has so often been asserted, but about a column and a half, was undoubtedly written by the Father himself. An editorial announcement informed the public that the paper would be published every Thursday and handed to city subscribers at five dollars per annum, payable half yearly in advance. It stated its policy in the following words: "The public are respectfully informed that the Essay will be conducted with the utmost impartiality; that it will not espouse any political party but fairly and candidly communicate whatever may be deemed worthy of information, whether foreign, domestic or local."

Although Professor Lee thus gives Father Richard credit for the enterprise that made him the pioneer journalist of the then Northwest, he has deprived his readers, because of want of space probably, of any further details from the interesting career of this remarkable priest, educator and statesman, who was a man, according to Judge Campbell's "Outlines of the Political History of Michigan," not only "of elegant learning, but of excellent common-sense and a very public-spirited citizen," an ideal but rare combination for an editor. However, the Rev. John J. O'Brien, wrote for "Records and Studies" of the United States Catholic Historical Society (November, 1909), a paper which gives an up-to-date and comprehensive resumé of Father Richard's life. From this we learn that he was born in Saintes, France, October 15, 1767, and entered the Seminary at Angers at the age of seventeen. Early in 1790 he became a member of the Society of St. Sulpice, and he was ordained a priest in October of the following year. Another year and the Revolution sent him with Fathers Maréchal, Ciquard and Matignon to Baltimore, where they arrived on April 24, 1792. The missions in Illinois were then in a sad state, and Bishop Carroll assigned Father Richard to take charge at Prairie du Rocher and Kaskaskia, where he spent six years, then being transferred to Detroit in June, 1798.

One of Father Richard's first cares in Detroit was to provide for the religious and secular education of the young. He opened a Young Ladies Academy in 1804, and also a seminary where young men were taught Latin, geography, ecclesiastical history and church music. In addition to the ordinary course the girls were instructed in the use of the loom and spinning wheel. For the young men he aimed to establish a school for higher education, and he joined with the Rev. John Monteith, the pastor of the Protestant Church, in putting into operation the act of August 26, 1817, establishing the "Catholepistemiad or University of Michigan," with thirteen professorships. The Rev. Mr. Monteith was chosen president and held seven of these professorships, and Father Richard, as vice-president, held the other six. The annual salary of the president was fixed at twenty-five dollars, and of the vice-president at eighteen dollars and fifty cents. Each professor was to receive twelve dollars and fifty cents. When on April 30, 1821, a new act incorporated the University of Michigan with twenty trustees Father Richard's name was included among those first selected. He was the first priest in the United States to give a series of religious discourses to non-Catholics, which, on invitation of the Governor and other public officials, he delivered during 1807, at noon on Sundays, at the court house. "I was sensible of my incapacity," he wrote to Bishop Carroll, "but as there was no English minister here of any denomination I thought it might be of some utility to take possession of the ground." In 1808 Father Richard visited Baltimore and there purchased the press and the type which he forwarded over the mountains, by wagon-train to Detroit, for the printing of the Essay and the other publications he brought out.

His interest in public affairs made Father Richard the chaplain of the First Regiment of Michigan Militia, April 30, 1805, and sent him to Washington in 1823, as Territorial Delegate, the only instance in our history of a priest having a seat in Congress. His only important speech during his term was made on January 28, 1825, in behalf of a bill to authorize a road from Detroit to Chicago. In this he called attention to the commercial importance of a road which "would connect the east of the Union with the west," and afford facility for transporting troops and military provisions, and the lack of which, during the War of 1812, had cost the Government an expenditure of ten or twelve million dollars. It is a curious fact that he was in jail when he was elected to Congress, because he had refused to pay a judgment of $1,116 damages against him, the result of a suit brought by a parishioner he had declared excommunicated for having obtained a civil divorce and then remarrying. Three friends gave a bond for him and he set out for Washington.

The end of this good priest was a fitting crown for his eventful career. There was an epidemic of cholera in Detroit, during the summer of 1832, and ministering to the sick and dying of his flock with the tireless devotion that marked his whole sacerdotal life he fell a victim to the dread disease on September 13 of that year. His death was regarded in all circles as a public calamity. "He would have been a man of mark," said Judge Cooley in one of the many tributes paid to his memory, "in almost any community and at any time."

Plays for the Camps

To the Editor of AMERICA:

How potent a factor the spirit of Christianity still remains in our national life has had a fresh illustration in the high moral standard set up for the army and navy and the honest, sincere effort of our soldiers and sailors to live up to that standard. Public sentiment has vigorously endorsed the stern repression of evil resorts in the vicinity of the camps. The laymen of the Y. M. C. A. and of the Knights of Columbus have cooperated in efforts to provide necessary recreation and entertainment for our soldiers. It goes without saying that it will not be easy to shut out all the outside forces of evil which are hostile to moral discipline and restraint. Our soldiers must have amusements appealing to manly men and should not be bored with tame, namby-pamby forms of so-called entertainment. It will be a desperate resource, however, if they are left to the mercies of the average theatrical manager who would not hesitate to transfer to the camp, from its habitat on the Great White Way, the kind of play which the critic tolerant of suggestiveness is wont to describe as "skating upon thin ice." Since our country entered upon the war we have been made aware of an alien and un-American spirit which, under one pretext or another, strives to lend aid and comfort to the enemy. We cannot shut our eyes to the fact that such a spirit, godless, un-American and anti-Christian, seeks to control the sources of our public amusements. It is a spirit subtle and insinuating enough to entrap in entangling alliances some of our good Catholic people who, unwittingly, become apologists for evil. If the Knights of Columbus can, as it is planned, exercise a real control over the character of the plays to be offered at the various encampments they will add to the great good work they have already accomplished for the Catholic soldier and earn the gratitude of their fellow-countrymen.

Catholic Books and Public Libraries

To the Editor of AMERICA:

One of your correspondents lately made the discovery that Catholic books are not on sale at book stores. The Catholic people are not taxed to support book stores. They are taxed to support public libraries. Let your correspondent go into any public library, into the section of "Philosophy and Religion," where, if anywhere, Catholic books should be found. If, among the hundreds of books in this section, he finds one by a Catholic author, he will be fortunate. Priests and laymen are doing nothing to change this condition. The needed change can best be effected by having placed on the boards of management of the libraries genuine Catholics, not spineless, nominal Catholics. Jews and Socialists have over-representation in public libraries because they go after it. They demand it till they get it. Catholics are satisfied with exclusion.

Brooklyn. M. F. GLANCEY.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Presuming that the letter of Mr. M. F. Glancey, to which you draw my attention, has been written in good faith the answer seems simple. If he cannot now find on the shelves of the Brooklyn Public Library any book that he needs, a request to Dr. F. P. Hill, the librarian, or to any of his efficient assistants, will secure it for him, if it ought to be in the library. The experience of those who have anything to do with libraries usually is that the difficulty lies, not so much in getting Catholic books for readers, but in getting Catholics to read the books. A case in point: I am using just now two standard books that ought to have a wide and active circulation in these patriotic days. They are Hassard's "Life of Archbishop Hughes" and Dr. White's "Life of Miss Eliza A. Seton," founder of the Sisters of Charity. The records however show that, during the past seven years, the first-named book was taken out of the library six times and the second book three times. I could give equally discouraging statistics concerning a number of other deservedly attractive books but this instance will do to point the moral of the tale. If Mr. Glancey reads Brooklyn's diocesan paper, the Tablet, he will find it printing every other week or so, a column list of new books of special interest to Catholics, that have been added to the Public Library. As for the anatomical animadversion of Mr. Glancey the three Catholic members of the Library Board are quite willing to submit to an X-ray investigation and abide by the consequences.

Recollections of the Oratorians

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I have always been a great admirer of Cardinal Newman and the Oratorian Fathers, and the reminiscences of the Cardinal by Mason Redfern recently published in AMERICA interested me exceedingly and gave me great pleasure. They awakened in my mind many recollections of the Fathers of the Oratory: Newman, Faber, Roe, Stanton, Wells and the two Bowdens. Father Newman I did not know personally, as he came only occasionally to the old Brompton Oratory, a frame building then on the site of the present handsome edifice. A large congregation of all classes attended this humble church, including the Duke of Norfolk, the Earl of Shrewsbury and other noblemen. In my youthful judgment, Father Faber surpassed them all in eloquence. Such a felicitous flow of words, the thoughts of an elevated soul, almost poetic in their beauty, I never expect to hear again. I had welcome access to the Fathers' house adjoining the Oratory. Well do I remember seeing Father Faber walking up and down the corridor with a damp towel round his head preparing a sermon, and as he smilingly passed by he sometimes laid his hand on my head. Dr. Manning, afterwards Cardinal, preached at the Oratory, but he could not compare in eloquence with my boyish favorite. I also heard Cardinal Wiseman, but I suppose I was too young to appreciate his learned discourses. The congregational singing of Father Faber's beautiful hymns was a special feature of the evening devotions, and even after the long lapse of years I remember the charming melodies, "Sweet St. Philip," "The Day Is Done," "The Good Shepherd," and others.

St. Vincent de Paul Society

To the Editor of AMERICA:

To have followed the correspondence in AMERICA apropos of Vincentianism and to have concluded therefrom that the Society "in New York is chiefly a relief-giving organization" is a violation of the most elementary rule of logic as well as a typical example of Catholic criticism. The discussion has been confined to the material phase of the Society's work; it originated in a statement of the threefold criticism of relief, records and cooperation, and all subsequent correspondence has dealt with these points exclusively. There has been no question of the spiritual aspect. Let us hope or at least presume that there is no room for improvment on this score, the best being always provided. To deduce that the spiritual is neglected from a discussion of the ways and means of perfecting the relief-work of the Society is to derive more from the discussion than is warranted by the facts stated.

A more logical conclusion would be that there is need of more systematic organization in our work. So reckless and indiscriminate is some of the relief-work that it is not an exaggeration to state that almost fifty per cent of it is ineffective. We do not ke the most of what we give; too frequently we follow the s of least resistance by doling out sufficient to meet present ds without endeavoring to forestall a repetition of that need. s may ease one's conscience, but it is not charity as taught practised by St Vincent de Paul.

n order to do thoroughly effective work the Society must ve into causes, find and urge the adoption of remedies. The ble field of social endeavor is a "forest primeval" to the Vin-tians, with a few exceptions. Occasionally we find a record one who has left the beaten path of merely feeding the needy who has endeavored to better their social condition. Who-r heard of a conference of the Society making public pro- against housing conditions? How many letters on official centian stationery are on file in the local Board of Health? long litany of neglected opportunities could be recorded ereby the effectiveness of the relief-work could be multiplied ond estimate. In this sphere of social work we are totally psed by every other organization in the same field, and it is cisely here that improvement can be made.

We welcome all kinds of criticism provided it be just; if it be sible all suggestions for improvement will be tried and adopt-if worth while; but all this is restricted to the material work, nely, relief and social betterment. There are very few, if , in a position to judge of the spiritual; the modern charity rker never does; whenever the question does come up the lty one is always the Catholic.

A Worthy Object of Charity

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Forty years ago was laid the humble foundation of what now es rank amongst the most useful of those metropolitan itutes of Catholic charity, where without ostentation or blare trumpets, every human misery is solaced. St. Mary's, occu-ng two spacious dwellings at 141-143 West Fourteenth Street, rs a shelter to homeless women without distinction of class creed. The respectable working girl temporarily out of em-yment, or convalescing from an illness, the stranger in the , the reduced lady, will be received without the formality of roductory letters, entirely on the merits of the case. There provided comfortable quarters, with no other restrictions n those of a well-ordered home. There girls may learn rative work of various kinds, or through the intelligence artment obtain employment. Reasonable recreation, absence irksome restraint and a wholesome cheerfulness of osphere, are the characteristics of St. Mary's. It is under aegis of a rarely gifted woman, Miss Susan M. Osborne, o brings to the task broad sympathies, unerring tact and cacy, largeness of heart, excellent judgment, in a word, rity thrice refined in the crucible of trial and suffering.

Now St. Mary's being for respectable women, was not sufficient the all-embracing charity of the foundress. So it has its plement, in the quite distinct work of the Night Refuge, No. 144 West Fifteenth Street; where women of every sort, vided they be not under the influence of strong drink, are eived. The Refuge is open all night. No questions are asked, note of introduction is needed and the homeless wanderer o reaches that haven is given food, a warm bed and break-t the next morning. She may depart without revealing her ntity. She may return again, or even find employment at institute.

The metropolitan police could tell many a thrilling tale of ruin or the suicide averted by that harbor of refuge with blue light ever burning and its always open door. In every ice station a notice of that Refuge is posted and numberless es have kindly officers pointed the way to comfort and safety some despairing waif of the night.

Could the wealthy or the well-to-do but realize what it is to be homeless and hungry, exposed to manifold dangers, in the pitiless nights of winter and in the desert of a great city, there would be no need to advance a plea for St. Mary's and its dependency. They would readily understand its urgent need of the help it so richly deserves, especially in these strenuous years of high prices and reduced production. There are many ways of assisting this work which seems to embrace in itself the spiritual and corporal works of mercy. Money, food, furniture, linen, clothing, all are required. For the homeless women of the Refuge are usually in dire straits for clothes. And it must be borne in mind, that not only those who are sheltered by these institutions are assisted, but hundreds of men, women and children, to whom warm meals are served. Sometimes entire families have to be given temporary lodging in cases of eviction. Much outside charity is done, radiating from St. Mary's and the Refuge, as from a luminous centre.

Well may His Eminence, Cardinal Farley send his blessings and congratulations to Miss Osborne, for "the splendid work of charity for the city, carried on since 1877." Archbishop Ireland writes: "It is wonderful how the Lord has blessed your undertaking and how much good you have been able to accomplish. I am glad to know that you are still at the helm, strong and helpful as ever. May the Lord keep you there a long time."

For forty years St. Mary's and the Night Refuge have been a blessing to New York. During the decades to come, it requires only the generous cooperation of its many faithful friends and of the numberless others who, knowing the work, must surely be attracted by its beneficent results, to increase its usefulness a hundredfold and extend the already wide sphere of its blessings.

The Church and the Convert

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The convert will rightly feel indebted to Mr. Charles Phillips for his timely article on "The Convert and the Church," in the issue of AMERICA for February 23. But there is another aspect of the situation to which "bred-in-the-bone Catholics" would do well to take heed in these transitional days, when out of the seething pot of social and political revolutions preparations are being made for those things which are coming to pass upon the earth. If the Divine prayer "That all may be one" is to be realized; if the Lord's Prayer, "Thy Kingdom come" is to be fulfilled in a large way, then must the relation of the Church to the convert assume an importance comparable with Apostolic and ante-Nicene days. It is only to emphasize this fact that the writer presumes to review certain facts and throw out a few historical suggestions, valuable chiefly because history, however original in the making, is not so in the telling, if it is to retain its worth and be insistent in its warning.

It is not to be thought strange that Cardinal Newman, after his conversion, could say: "I have never had one doubt"; for it was through a long and trying series of doubts that he and most converts passed to the valley of decision and knew the hour of conversion. The last ditch of doubt had been taken. That was as necessary to conversion as it was essential to the light of faith and to the dispersion of the darkness of error.

'Tis true, no doubt, as has been suggested, that a certain few Catholics "to the manner born" may think, and even speak, of converts with a sense of personal religious superiority. But, why should they not? All the advantages of being Catholics are not to be reserved for the converts, who possess their full share. One rejoices in the fact that he was born and brought up in the Catholic Church; the other that he has known the travailing pains of seeking the truth at all costs and can draw sweetness out of the carcass of doubt as Samson did honey from the bones of the lion he had slain. One gives thanks because his father before him was a Catholic; the other because God called him, like Abram, to forsake his father's house and go into a land which He should show him. Our Blessed Lord said to the Jews of His day: "Do not begin to say, We have Abraham for our father, for I say unto you, that God is able of these stones to raise up children unto Abraham." He had little patience with those who said: "These which know not the Law are accursed." He even made a parable out of the pharisee and the publican in which He justified the latter rather than the former, in order that self-complaisance might ever remain far from His followers.

The root of the matter lies deeper than any merely personal experience. It involves the first principles of the doctrine of Christ. It challenges the Divine commission to the Apostles: "Go ye into the whole world and preach the gospel to every creature." It is, perhaps, stating the case fairly to say that the Catholic Church is the Church of converts and that it belongs peculiarly to them. All the Apostles were converts. The thousands taken into the Church on the first Pentecost were converts "out of every nation under Heaven" who came to Jerusalem to observe a Jewish feast but were converted from Judaism to Christianity. Christianity conquered the Roman Empire through the blood of converts and through its vast fruit in innumerable conversions in the first ages of the Church. This was only the bitter but glorious beginning. The Irish, who are not the least among those to the manner born, have St. Patrick himself as a witness to the fact that they are converts. St. Augustine once gave the same testimony concerning England, and St. Boniface as to Germany.

The last two nations, above all others, suggest to our minds the great upheaval of the sixteenth century. Who were they, those thousands, hundreds of thousands and millions, who apostatized from the only true Church of the Living God, the pillar and ground of Truth? They were Catholics to the manner born. Who were they who originated Protestantism? They were Catholics to the manner born. Who led merry England astray? It was a Catholic, to the manner born, and one who in earlier and more innocent days had won special Papal recognition for his defense of the true Faith. Who led the great falling away which revealed the son of perdition in Germany? It was one not only to the manner born but one who seemingly had at his disposal all the treasures of Catholic learning, or, at least, a representative mass of them. Who created in France that Gallicanism, which might be dubbed neo-schism, if it was not those very much to the manner born; and who are the infidels of France today but the children of a Catholic ancestry?

Whence then comes that sense of security on the part of those who have never known what it was to be outside the Catholic Church nor what it costs the average convert to follow the accumulating light of conscience? If "leakage" be taken into consideration, rather may the convert rejoice in the fact that he has been called by God to enjoy the goodly heritage and birthright which the first born or "born-to-the-manner" Catholic has been pleased to sell for a mess of pottage. There are some very good Catholics who go to sleep in the confidence that "the gates of hell shall not prevail against the Church," which may be a species of faith which seeks to excuse itself in case the gates nearly prevail. It is no pledge that the gates of hell may not prevail against them as individuals, or, perchance, against the whole nation to which they belong. We must bring a more active faith than that to the whirling social, religious and political maelstrom of the day if every wind of doctrine is not to reap the whirlwind of confusion worse confounded.

We feel very proud that our knights and ladies are amassing millions for welfare-work at the battle-front which daily witnesseth afresh that the flesh profiteth nothing, that it is the Spirit which quickeneth. Why are not these millions raised annually, as among Protestants, for the extension of Christ' Kingdom; for the glory and exaltation of our Holy Mother th Church will be found in ten thousand times ten thousand con verts. The war-fund may serve that end in a measure and wil not testify to a miscarriage of justice if it proves itself th measure of what Catholics are going to do henceforth for th extension of the true Faith among all nations, until the Catholi vats shall overflow with "new Catholics" far outnumberin the "old."

Self-complaisance will not accomplish this God-given mission It can only be realized by that aggressive going and doing whic heeds the Divine mandate: Go ye into the whole world Lengthen the cords. Strengthen the stakes. Let the Taber nacle of God be with all men, and all nations become the King dom of our Lord, and of His Anointed One.

Some Irish, Old and New

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In reference to the many expressions of opinion printed i AMERICA concerning the faults and virtues of the Irish peopl may a "mere Irishman" be permitted to say: (1) Irishme have all the faults and failings common to the human race i every quarter of the globe. (2) If any abnormal failing b discovered in individuals or in families it should be attributed t its proper cause, viz., several centuries of enforced dependence attended by persistent and carefully directed efforts at extermina tion. (3) The fact that an Irish race and an Irish language ar still in existence is at least marvelous, if not miraculous. (4 Hence, remembering that the explosive hurrah is sometime pronounced hurray, the following lines written by the late T. D Sullivan are pretty nearly perfect in rhyme and in reason:

We've heard her faults a hundred times,
The new ones and the old,
In songs and sermons, rants and rhymes,
Enlarged some fiftyfold.
But take them all, the great and small,
And this we've got to say:
Here's dear old Ireland
Good old Ireland
Ireland boys, hurrah!

The entire poem would repay a calm and studious perusal.

New York. WILLIAM LIVINGSTON.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The communication in AMERICA for March 9 from J. J. Mc Dermott was good reading for a rainy afternoon. Befor handling Mr. McDermott's amusing remarks, let me state tha Mooney is not classified today among first-rate Irish historians However, fearing lest my knowledge of Irish history might b a trifle distorted, I was fortunate enough to resurrect a cop of Mooney. Mr. McDermott's knowledge of Irish histor seems to be confined to the prefaces of Irish histories; for a his statements, save one, were taken from Mooney's preface.

Let us now examine his letter: "The roof of Westminste Abbey is Irish." Yes—Irish oak. (Cf. Mooney XII.) "Th violin is of Irish origin" perfected by Stradivarius. I admi that the old crude fiddle is of Irish origin, but perfected b Stradivarius—a German. What follows from this? So th paintings of Barry and Barrett are "equal to Michael Angel according to Campbell." Evidently Mr. McDermott is not wel acquainted with the leading art critics, otherwise the well-know retort of Signor Bizzazaro would not have escaped his notice "Quest è absurdo a prima faccia. Se il grand ed emenentissim Signore Tomasino Campbell sapesse qualche cosa della füttur egli giamai avrebbe detto cose cosi false,—"

From the present condition of the Alleghanies, Dougherty di not "annihilate many mountains." To substantiate the statemen that "the Irish have accomplished no work worthy of the world' admiration," and seem never capable of doing anything, I ca close with no more appropriate words than those of Mr. Mc

Dermott's cited author: "If the Irish have one addiction more damning to their freedom than another it is their pride, which renders them jealous of each other, and therefore unwilling to obey each other. Any coxcomb of another nation can lead or command them; but to each other, howsoever fitted by nature and acquirements some may be to lead in council, or in battle, the most ignorant will hardly yield obedience——" (p. 996).

Daylight Saving

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In reporting on the Daylight Saving law may I suggest that you comment on the fact that those who have charge of public worship will be among the first to conform to its provisions? To this end clergymen should remind their congregations that on Sunday, March 31, and thereafter during the summer, services will be one hour earlier by the sun, and advise, in order to be in accord with the new arrangement, that all timepieces be set forward one hour on Saturday night before retiring. Then by the readjusted clocks, services will be held at the usual hours.

It is not within the province of the Federal Government to regulate time except for departments of the United States and for railroads between States, and while the law is binding only in these applications, it is the patriotic duty of everyone to move all tasks which are habitually performed at stated times one hour earlier by the sun, and this can be done most conveniently by setting forward the timepieces by which he is governed. Only in this way can the change go into effect without inconvenience and confusion.

The Precursor of St. Patrick

To the Editor of AMERICA:

St. Patrick's Day always brings out something new about old Ireland and that something is nearly always fresh and green. Hence we hail with delight the following statement of sober fact made by Dr. Ryan in his paper, "The Mission of the Celt in America," and the careful reader will note that no qualification whatever is allowed to weaken its dogmatic force: "Palladius, the precursor of Patrick, was sent to Ireland, not to convert pagans to Christianity, but to bring back heretics to orthodoxy." How simple that is and how convincing! Long before St. Patrick's arrival, long before the coming of Palladius in the year 431, the Christian religion had been so well established as to produce a crop of heretics large enough to excite alarm in Rome. This is quite evident from the further statement that the later Christians in Ireland "atoned for the momentary lapse in the early fifth century that brought Papal missioners hurrying to their shores."

In future, therefore, when we read the words of St. Prosper of Aquitain, we must be careful. He wrote: "Ad Scotos in Christum credentes ordinatur a Papa Celestino Palladius, et primus episcopus mittitur." "To the Scots believing in Christ is Palladius ordained by Pope Celestine, and is sent as first Bishop." We must be careful also when we read what George Metlake says in his recent Life of Saint Columban: "It is possible that the Irish Christians themselves asked for a Bishop; for the Pope would hardly have sent them one unless they had intimated that they wanted one."

It is said, apparently on the sole authority of Archbishop Ussher, a very learned but very bigoted Irish Protestant, that in the year 360 a Christian priest had been sent from Rome to teach the Christian Faith in Ireland. If this be true, and we see no very cogent reason for denying it, the seventy years intervening between the coming of that nameless Christian teacher and the arrival of Palladius gave sufficient time for the growth of some alarming heresy that sent Palladius on the jump to the County Wicklow, perhaps. And Palladius proved to be an efficient missioner. He stamped out the heresy in less than a year and then set forth into oblivion. He certainly must have been a wonderful stamper-out of heresy, for through all the ages since his time such a thing as heresy was never heard of in Ireland. St. Patrick does not mention its existence—but after all we cannot prove much from his silence, since some of our Protestant friends insist that the good man Patrick was a strong heretic and never had anything to do with Rome.

Before many weeks, no doubt, we shall learn more about the heresy of pre-Palladian days, its nature, its extent and its mysterious vanishing quality. Perhaps it might be wiser to keep the learned exposition as something fresh and green for next St. Patrick's Day.

Gossip in the "Washington Post"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I respectfully request a brief space in your columns to express vigorously my dissent from certain assertions contained in an article in the Washington Post of March 13, under the signature "Ryley Grannon." This gentleman alleges that:

> Between thirty and forty priests who aided the enemy in spreading the propaganda of "mutual laying down of arms" were executed. Twenty-six of Cadorna's generals were court-martialed and shot. This information is given me by an Italian officer who obtained it at the front.

No wide notice, of course, of these two startling allegations will be taken by persons well informed as to the situation in Italy, and aware of the hysterical lack of judgment or critical ability among certain rumor-mongers recently posing among us, and imposing on newspaper editors, as publicists and diplomatic experts. But there will be persons likely to be misled, perhaps, because of the prominent space given such statements in an important metropolitan newspaper. For that reason, I feel impelled to challenge the writer to produce his "Italian Officer who obtained" the information (sic) "at the front." If he declines to do so we shall have to apply the ancient but useful rule of argumentation, that an assertion gratuitously made may be quite as gratuitously denied. Only on the German or Austrian front could the soi-disant officer have acquired the astonishing "information" that twenty-six Italian generals had been court-martialed and shot.

Mr. Grannon's informant has a poor opinion of that publicist's knowledge of human nature, Italian or otherwise, or his acquaintance with the number of general officers in the Italian army, otherwise he would not have told him in all soberness that such wholesale treason existed, or if existing in such degree, could have failed to succeed. When Mr. Grannon's authority shall have been disclosed, is it asking too much that he identify for us his thirty or forty priests "executed" for peace propaganda? Many Italian priests in military service are known to the writer, and he is anxious to learn whether any of them has thus fallen from his duty, and paid the penalty.

Seriously speaking, how can anyone have the temerity to write such nonsense, seeing that on December 22, 1917, in the Chamber of Deputies, Prime Minister Orlando himself declared attacks made on the Italian clergy to be wholly unjustified by their conduct in the war, and due to partisan prejudice? Signore Nitti and even Ernesto Nathan have paid tribute to the attitude of the Italian clergy in the war. Mr. Marconi, when recently interviewed by the New York Times, stated that the clergy of Italy, as a whole, had given praiseworthy evidence of their national loyalty.

It is idle to cite further evidence in this regard; one can only reflect apropos of Mr. Grannon's whole attitude, that international gossips would do well to wait for the report of the mixed commission appointed to investigate the Italian military disaster of October before presuming to explain it.

The Glorious Tomb

A GREAT fact stands out in the history of the world. There is an empty tomb on a hillside in Palestine. That tomb is the center of the world's love. On its rocky bed 2,000 years ago a Man was laid. That Man had died in ignominy and shame on the Cross. He had died amid the jeers of the surrounding throng. For He had proclaimed himself the Messias long awaited by his people. He had claimed to be God and the Redeemer of a fallen race. He had proved his claims by the most astounding miracles. He had healed the sick, had given sight to the blind, walked upon the waves of an angry sea. Thrice He had burst the cerements of the grave and summoned the dead back to life. These miracles He had wrought not with the arts of the sorcerer or the magician. He had worked them in the sight of thousands. There were no tricks in the simplicity and the majesty of His acts. These wonders were an answer to the appeals of the sorrowing, of the outcast and the suffering. No stage was set for their performance. They were the ready answer to the appeal of the helpless and the poor, of the widow and the heart-broken father. They were performed by this extraordinary person not so much for Himself as for others. They conclusively prove, it is true, His Divinity, the Divinity of His mission and of the Church which He came to found. But they were wrought rather for others than for Himself.

But one miracle He claimed to be especially His. This one miracle He reserved for the Son of Man and Son of God. He claimed it as His own. In doing so He was true to the voice of the Prophets who had foretold His life, His ignominies and His death. But they had also foretold His glory and His triumph. They had announced His resurrection from the dead. Isaias had triumphantly proclaimed that His tomb would be glorious. Osee had said that He, the Holy One of God, was not to know the corruption of the grave. Christ Himself had solemnly proclaimed that He would rise from the tomb. That Resurrection was to be His miracle. It was His challenge to His foes, His own proof that he was God, the Lord and the Master of life and death. On that fact as on a rock He based His claims. It is not by any means the only proof of His Divinity, but it is the most tangible, the easiest to grasp. For as St. Augustine says, though eminently reasonable and containing nothing that contradicts reason, the religion of Christ is not based on a long and intricate train of reasoning. If it were so, says the great Doctor, the ignorant would not understand and the proud and the learned would be sure to pick flaws in the argument.

But the religion of Christ, in its most startling miracle is based on a great fact. It is based upon a fact which hundreds might, so to say, see with their eyes and touch with their very hands. Christ claimed to be God. As a proof of His claims, He said that He would rise from the dead. He had died in the presence of thousands on the Cross. The whole of Jerusalem knew that He had been laid dead in the rocky tomb at the gates of the city. On the third day, as He had foretold, His tomb was empty. Neither trickery, force or fraud, nor connivance of friend or bribed foe can account for that fact. That empty tomb proclaims with a voice that the whole world has heard, and which has shaken it to its very foundations, that the sleeper who was laid on its rocky bosom, was the very Son of God and that it was by His own Divine power and because He was God that He rose from the dead.

That empty tomb is the world's center. That tomb is glorious. From its hallowed recesses as from the throne-room of the King of Kings have gone forth the words of power and the deeds of love which have changed all history and all time. To that hallowed rock the Apostles came before they separated to teach the Faith of their Master to the four quarters of the world. On its hard floor they laid their heads in reverence and in love. And as their brows came into contact with the stones on which their God had lain in the majestic slumber of His victory over sin and death, they felt something of His strength infused into their own hearts and souls. Then strong in their faith in the Resurrection of the Son of God they went forth and preached to bond and freeman, to rich and poor, to consul and slave, in Rome, in Athens, in Corinth, in Ephesus and to tribes beyond the Danube and the Rhine that Christ was risen from the dead. When asked for their credentials and their proofs, they pointed to that empty but glorious tomb. By that empty tomb, they could swear that their Master and their Lord was the Son of God.

The Faith of the Apostles is ours. The glorious tomb is in our midst. It eloquently proclaims to us the same message it gave to the Apostles and which they carried to the nations of the pagan world. Its voice is a voice of triumph. The Angels that guarded the tomb on the morning of the Resurrection of the Son of God, still stand at its rocky doors, proclaiming that Christ is risen indeed. That tomb is truly glorious. It has conquered the world. From the haunts of death, the very abode of impotence and weakness, have gone forth the power and the might of God. With the tomb all mortal glories end. In the tomb the triumphs of the Son of God begin. The great mystery of the Resurrection of Christ is the central fact in the history of the world. It is our glory and our pride. As fact and as miracle, as the foundation of our hopes and our faith, as the triumph of the Man-God over death and sin, over the passions and the pride of man, it is the masterpiece of God's power and love.

England, Ireland and America

THIS is a plea for the cause of the Allies, for the honor of unsullied America especially. Whatever may be said of the other nations at war no man can point a finger of scorn at us and charge that we threw ourselves into the conflict with a desire for money or land. Our motive lies clear before the world and can be written across the heavens without causing a blush of shame to mantle any cheek however sensitive. The war is ours for freedom's sake, that small nations as well as large may enjoy the right of self-determination, and thus work out their destiny according to high purposes. From this it follows that the welfare of every nation now under arms has become an American issue, the welfare of Serbia no less than that of France, of Ireland no less than that of Belgium. America is pouring out blood and gold for a principle of universal application, and our people are not in a mood to suffer restriction of freedom according to the whim or fancy of any particular people. Our blood is for all, so too is our gold. And our honor is more precious than either or both.

For this reason late news from Ireland is a matter of grave concern to millions of our most patriotic citizens. As before the fateful Easter week, so now, the cable trembles with warnings of impending difficulty, even of bloodshed. Should the worst come to pass the cause of the Allies will all but totter under the blow. The blood of Easter week made many of England's best American friends sad and angry beyond measure, and our country was not then at war that "all nations may enjoy the right of self-determination." Can it be that Britain intends to strike once again? If so, it were well for her to remember that the war is not hers alone, nor yet is the cause of the war hers only. America is now in the field that all men, even Irishmen, may enjoy the measure of freedom necessary for national prosperity and happiness. Neither England nor America nor France nor Belgium has a right to perform any act that would weaken the bond that binds us together against a common and ruthless foe. But England will all but break the bond by another slaughter in Ireland.

Can it be, too, that Great Britain does not see the quandary in which she is placed? For four years now she has filled the world with a cry of freedom for small nations, and all the while Ireland has been at her back, still misgoverned, still deprived of the liberty which is hers by every right. Meantime men have smiled and repeated over and over again: "What about Ireland?" How long will England permit her sincerity to be flouted by this sneer? Not long, it is to be hoped. The present crisis is far too serious for a play at justice, to say nothing of threats against a nation which has only one desire, a share in the liberty in whose cause the world is drenched with blood.

Prohibition on the Hustings

QUITE recently the population of the peaceful city of Baltimore was increased by the addition of a man and a woman who deprived Albany of much sweetness and light by flitting thence to Maryland for the sake of bringing salvation to the Orioles, through a prohibition bill. Both of the gentle creatures were of the Methodist persuasion: as a consequence they talked and talked again and then again, and their topic was as ever the iniquity of Rome. The man Methodist gave an interview and apparently forgot to allow his emotions to filter through his brains, for he dropped wisdom intended for the elect only. Said he:

> We must have prohibition in order to end this Catholic Church business. They cannot exist without booze. The streets of Baltimore are going to run with blood within a year, and it is going to be over the question of this Mass business. Why, they are having Mass in the Y. M. C. A. huts. One of our members wrote us from Texas that Mass was said in the Y. M. C. A. huts at Camp Funston, and we have continued complaints from other sources. What is the matter with the Y. M. C. A.? I intend to find out, and we are going to keep the wine from going to those huts, if we cannot stop this Popish business in any other way. The Catholic Church cannot live without liquor. Their Mass goes to the dogs when the National Prohibition Amendment is written into the Constitution. . . . We have a powerful movement on foot and we won't have to wait for national prohibition to stop this business. We will soon be able to stop the shipment or possession (sic) of wine at the front, or in or near the army or navy. . . . We are here to stay until we put an end to popery and to the Catholic schools, and when we get rid of this Mass business, we have finished our work. . . . The Anti-Saloon League held its convention in a Methodist church at Washington. The League has a Roman Catholic priest on its Board, but it made him speak in the Methodist church, though he squirmed about it. He wanted to talk at the meeting held in the theater, but he was not invited to the stage there. He had the unique position (sic) of speaking in a Methodist church, followed by Governor Catts of Florida.

This and much more did the man Methodist say, for he told of a great secret Order of which Bishop Burt of Buffalo is "State Master of the Lodge in New York" and announced that this particular Bishop who has been engaged in political work for years, was looking for a Catholic woman who might help do away with the "Mass business."

All this is so clear and instructive that it were a shame to gloss it. However a remark or two will not detract from its clarity and didactic power. The Methodists are in an uproar because Catholics follow the example of Christ and use wine in the celebration of the Mass. A noble example of zeal. The country is rotting at its roots from divorce and birth-control and other moral filthiness of like nature, and the Methodist Church is silent. There is no question of a well-financed campaign against divorce and remarriage, for any and every cause. There is no question of a great Order, secret or otherwise, with State lodges presided over by Methodist Bishops, for the suppression of birth-control. Moral filthiness of this nature may be as great as rotten hearts can make it and the Methodist Church will remain dumb. But when there is a question of something that Christ taught and practised, that is another matter.

The Position of the Pope

"THE Pope is necessarily neutral in this war," says the Archbishop of Toronto in an excellent paper on "The Pope and the War" which is printed in the current Catholic Mind. "He is in justice obliged to be impartial."

> If the Pope publicly condemned either group of belligerents at the outbreak of the war or at any stage of it, he would thereby place many millions of Catholics in the agonizing necessity of choosing between their Church and their country, and he would favor one section of the Church at the expense of another. The war would go on in any case. Civil war would add to its horrors, for all countries are divided in religion, and the remedy would only increase the disease. Besides, a public condemnation would involve a judicial investigation, and this is practically impossible in war times. The Pope has publicly condemned particular acts of cruelty and injustice, like the invasion of Belgium; but as to the war in general, he is strictly neutral. One proof of his impartiality is the fact that he is abused by daily newspapers and prominent individuals of both sides.

In 1913 the Catholic population of the Central Powers was estimated to be 57,466,130, while that of the Allied Powers, including the United States, was 111,089,571, so it is clear that the Holy Father has millions of spiritual children among all the belligerents. The Pope's first duty, as every reasonable man must admit, is to promote and safeguard to the best of his ability the unity of the Church. In this connection Archbishop Neil well observes:

> National sentiment and the influence of civil governments have at times drawn millions away from the Church, even when there was no war, and the Holy See is ever watchfully on guard against this danger. Now that the forces in question are at highest tension in the greatest of all wars, it is absurd, on the face of it, to say that the Holy See is intent on anything but the unity of the Church. . . . The great preoccupation of the Holy See is to prevent divisions in the Church along the lines of national or racial cleavage. The Pope is not now treated as a foreigner in any of the Allied nations. The Catholics in each of them can freely accept his control of Church affairs. It is unthinkable that he would voluntarily endanger or forfeit this position in the Allied nations in return for anything Germany could possibly offer, much less for anything which the Lutheran majority of Germany would allow their rulers to offer. The amount of national and racial hatred in the Christian world at a given time is the measure of the danger to which the unity of the Church is exposed, and the highest interest of the Holy Father, as the guardian of this unity, is the removal of the causes of hatred by a just and lasting peace.

As for the recent attempts, which happily proved futile, to make the Holy Father seem a pro-German pacifist, they were engineered, as the discerning now believe, by statesmen and journalists in the Allied countries who were filled with chagrin and shame by the publication of the "secret treaty" in which three great Powers of Europe bound themselves "to support Italy in her desire for non-admittance of the Holy See to any kind of diplomatic steps for the purpose of the conclusion of peace or the regulation of questions arising from the present war." With detestable hypocrisy the movement to prove the Pope responsible for Italy's military disaster was then started, it would appear, in order to make the public forget about that precious secret treaty.

"Marble Time"

THE winds are variable and the skies uncertain; but there is a faint warmth in the breeze that presages the passing of winter. Quick to anticipate, the young generation is on its knees, and that within the roar of Broadway, not to pray but to play. For in New York it is "marble time," and mothers sigh as they picture Johnny's stockings, that have withstood the minor friction of winter sports, gaping with the characteristic rents and hiatuses of "marble time."

There was a day when a puritanic discipline frowned upon this spring flower in the world of boyish sports. It was a game of chance, decreed the dour elders, a gambling device, well fitted to turn young Christian feet into the pathways of Satan. This ancient discipline, it would seem, has fallen into disuse. Few boys, as experience has demonstrated, pass from an exciting game of marbles in the streets, to gambling halls. Perhaps a stronger reason for the mitigation of the older restraint is the fact, well known to every boy, that "marbles" is not a game of chance. If it were, John Smith's bag would not be invariably empty after a contest with Jack Brown. It is a game of skill.

Chance was always a fickle goddess, and fickleness claims no constant devotees. She has no place in a world that has learned to look upon life as "real and earnest." If life is a game, it is a game of skill, not chance, a game for which every man can prepare himself, and play with a clear eye and a cool head. It is usually the waster who complains that he "never had a chance." Now and then the excuse may have some weight, but one who plays the game hard and honestly, discerns a "chance," where the careless player sees only ruin. Like all tests, opportunity does not make the man, but shows what manner of man he is. Both in the natural and supernatural orders, chance daily knocks at all doors, but, in the words of a modern humorist, often the occupant is not at home. He is down at the corner store, telling his fellow-loafers how hard life is.

Life is hard, but it is not ruled by fate, or by chance given to the few, denied to the many. "Gi' me a chance" is the cry by which a boy elects to join in a game of marbles. In the great game of life, every man has a chance. Even the world can find a place for the man who is in earnest, and to those who ask, Almighty God, with infinite generosity, will never refuse the boon of another chance," a royal chance, to be transmuted into eternal gain by faithful service.

The Complete Converser

"IF I could only learn the art of conversation" is the complaint often heard nowadays from many women ambitious for social conquests, "what a victorious oness I would become! Though I have committed to nemory the contents of a dozen authoritative manuals on he subject, I am far from being a fascinating converser. wonder why." If this worried aspirant to social riumphs would eschew all artificial handbooks which rofess to teach their readers "How to Converse" and evote her days and nights instead to the study of those lassic conversations that history has bequeathed to us, he would soon become a brilliant converser. For skill n conversation, like success in art and literature, can best e won by studying the masters, and, without question, ne of the most remarkable conversations that ever took lace is that held by the Walrus and the Carpenter which he veracious Lewis Carroll has recorded.

In the first place good conversers try to see that the ircumstances of company, time and place are what they hould be. These important details were prudently arranged by the Walrus and the Carpenter, for before beinning their renowned conversation they chose on the unny, breeze-swept beach a spot where conveniently low ocks offered an inviting seat. The company was admirbly selected too. For that member of the Odobaenus Rosmarus family, owing to his love for meditation, was ure to have many profound truths to tell the wielder of he hammer and plane, while the highly practical character of the Carpenter's life would no doubt enable him to ive the reflective Walrus a wealth of useful information. As a conversation's success depends, moreover, no less on polite listening than on brilliant talking, the proverbially dumb oysters that attended in such large numbers that historic meeting, were probably as attentive as could be desired.

All who are eager to become perfect conversers should observe with what calm deliberation and studied order the subjects for discussion are proposed. For the text reads:

> "The time has come," the Walrus said,
> "To talk of many things:
> Of shoes—and ships—and sealing-wax—
> Of cabbages—and kings—"

It is worthy of note that the things to be talked of, while as varied in character as the most discursive mind could wish, constantly increase in interest, dignity and importance as they proceed. For under "shoes" could of course be grouped everything that is of the earth, earthy, or has to do merely with our material needs; "ships" would mount higher, suggesting commerce, travel, war and trade; "sealing-wax" would lure the conversers to a loftier flight still, for the word obviously connotes correspondence, statesmanship, government and diplomacy. "Cabbages" at first sight would seem to mark an abrupt descent in the conversation, but to the discerning it will be clear that under that term can be fittingly gathered the thoughts, words and deeds of all ordinary men. When "kings" however come on the carpet what a wide and attractive field at once opens! For the most famous achievements of all the world's leaders in holiness, learning, administration, poetry, art, literature and invention can well be called the doings of kings. It would appear, therefore, that in the wise Walrus's thoughtful quatrain, is contained such adequate though compendious guidance for the Complete Converser that every woman who follows carefully the sage counsel of the Odobaenus Rosmarus will soon become a social star of the first magnitude.

Literature

AN EVELESS EDEN

"S it not a delightful thing to discover that the roses of yester- year may be in effect the roses of today? Is it not exhilarting to capture the first fine, careless rapture of boytime romance? Thus the writer was delighted and exhilarated in reading "Against Odds," "Don Strong of the Wolf Patrol," "Captain Fair and Square," "Off Side" and "The County Pennant," Appleton) Mr. William Heyliger's five juveniles. The reviewer took up the reading of these books as a duty, but as uty sometimes has its pleasant surprises, the perusal of one hapter in "Off Side" aroused his keen interest, and that interest ever flagged until he had devoured the last chapter of the last ook.

Mr. Heyliger is essentially a boys' writer. He sees nothing ut boys, thinks their thoughts, and fuses himself so dramatically with these creatures of his imagination that he becomes boy again, and brings back his reader, should be happen to be n adult, almost to the time when > "The breeze of a joyous dawn blew free

> In the silken sail of Infancy."

For Mr. Heyliger, girls do not exist. In four of the five books under review there is no girl to be discovered. A few women, mere mothers, are allowed to speak their lines and make their exit, but the girls are not even "back stage." Nor are they missed.

Mr. Heyliger is dramatic. He puts himself so thoroughly in the place of his boy-characters, that, not content with producing their dialogue with a realism which is not at all ugly, he also in analyzing their emotions falls into their turn of thought and of language. As a result, the author's manner of expression sometimes lies open to criticism. Thackeray, it may be objected, does the same thing, and does it delightfully. True: but Thackeray is writing for men and women. Mr. Heyliger's readers, it must be remembered, are supposed to be youths whose style is still in process of formation.

Another adverse criticism in regard to these juveniles is that ...characters sleep, study, eat and do things which have nothing to do with the national game. Nevertheless, we realize that Mr. Heyliger has come to say the logical thing as it is by boys who want to learn not. Moreover, we see that in presenting to us a story, all balls and bats and players, he is daily teaching the highest lessons of honor, fair-play, self-sacrifice, and loyalty.

These books should meet a verbal appeal at the hands of high schools. One of them, "Off Side," will enter the supervising of an absorbing tale teach our students why it is well while going on with their studies; and all the others will help our boys their preciousness with brightness, loyalty and knowledge spirit. In conclusion I beg leave to thank Mr. Heyliger for reading me an important and charming book. When I took his books I was laboring under the not over-flattering impression that I was forty-eight years of age. The reading of a few pages brought about a wondrous change: and now I know that I am only fourteen!

REVIEWS

The Conversion of Europe. By CHARLES HENRY ROBINSON. New York: Longmans Green & Co. $6.00.

"The Conversion of Europe is an event which lies still in the future. The events that have occurred during the last fifteen years have seemed to some to justify the assertion that Christianity has been tried by the nations of Europe and has failed. For the student of Christian Missions in Europe this statement needs no refutation. It is impossible for him to accept the suggestion that Christianity has been tried and has failed in the case of nations, the conversion of which was accelerated by massacre and persecution; nor can he admit that Christianity has been tried and failed in the case of other nations or peoples who have never (yet) understood its fundamental teachings, and have supposed that a verbal acceptance of its doctrines, apart from a conversion of character, could entitle them to the name of Christians."

Most readers of the foregoing statement would naturally imagine that it was meant as a description of what actually took place at the Reformation in every country where Protestantism was allowed to gain a foothold. To infer thus, however, would be to credit the Hon. Canon Robinson with an ability to draw accurate historical conclusions; whereas in reality he would seem to have been debarred from any such salutary exercise of his powers by the unenviable task he evidently believes has been imposed on him of having to defend an indefensible position. Protestantism has failed, as the war bears ample witness, because Protestantism is Christianity and Christianity has only apparently failed, because it has not been tried, therefore the Catholic Church is to blame. Such is the author's process of reasoning. The fact that Protestantism and modern infidelity, its logical outcome, has prevented the Church from exercising its full and saving influence on European affairs must not be thought of for a moment. To admit it would mean the destruction of every preconception dear to the set and firmly protesting mind.

"There was something lacking either in the contents of the message delivered by the pioneer missionaries of Europe or in the methods by which they sought to proclaim their message. In the words of Carlyle, "The man of theory twangs his full bent bow; nature's fact ought to fall stricken; but does not. His logic-arrow glances from it as from a scaly dragon and the obstinate fact keeps walking its way. How singular!" Protestantism has yet to show even one instance of having ever converted a nation. Its best claim so far is Prussia and Mr. Robinson himself does not seem very proud of the result. From a few instances of forceful conversion scattered over 1400 years and which Popes and clergy always condemned, the author concludes that "The Church made haste to enroll converts and to extend its boundaries." The assertion that the

...is the use of situations which involve the clashing of wills. Few juveniles, so far as the reviewer's reading goes, are distinguished in this respect. Their authors string adventures together, or hold the reader's interest by the complexities of a clever plot. Mr. Heyliger needs no adventures; Mr. Heyliger uses motive rather than plot. His characters too are differentiated. In the five books there is no runaway accident, no watery rescue, no robbery, no murder, no fight. In fact, there is no adventure, strictly speaking, at all. But there is in each much clashing of wills, save possibly in his Boy Scout story, "Don Strong of the Wolf Patrol," which, by the way, has one girl, and which, apparently made to order, does not compare in excellence with the other four. And yet, even with its shortcomings in construction, this tale is far superior to the average juvenile of the day.

Just as there are no adventures in Mr. Heyliger's books, there are no villains, either. The author presents us with two classes of boys: the agreeable and the disagreeable; and, as regards these latter, their condition is not permanent. In fact, Mr. Heyliger has the rare gift of presenting us with a boy whom at first we should like to annihilate, but he finally fills us with love and admiration for him. The two most likeable boys in the stories under review were originally villains.

If the lapse of forty years has worn off the thin veneer of religion, it has also brought about its compensations. The boy-hero of the past started out at the age of fourteen or less to support his mother, reform his father, and do other wondrous things. The boy-hero of the past began by quitting school. Mr. Heyliger's boy begins by going to high school, and his one ambition is to attend college. The boy-hero of the past had a sense of honesty; Mr. Heyliger's has a sense of honor. Adventure was the meat upon which the boy-hero once fed; with Mr. Heyliger's, it is athletics.

Reading one of this author's baseball stories, one would fancy that the boys slept baseball, studied baseball, ate and drank baseball. Nothing else would seem to matter. Our author handles his baseball story, "Captain Fair and Square," as though it were an epic. Released from the spell of his writing, we realize that the story is, in a sense, out of proportion. We know that the essage of the pioneer missionaries was defective in its con-nts is supported by numerous quotations and authorities who re as adept as the author in manipulating the facts of the past. he greatest obstacle in his way were the Popes. To discredit em he has resorted to false interpretations and in one instance e has actually garbled the authentic words of St. Columbanus order to show that the Celtic missionaries refused to admit ne supremacy of the Bishops of Rome. But then no one is pposed to look up references. The real passage in full, read the original, proves to be a most emphatic assertion on the art of St. Columbanus of his filial submission to the Pope as ne successor of St. Peter and the head of the Church. Ab uno isce omnes! Scientists with European reputations have been nown to attack the cause of religion by means of deliberate alsifications but we hardly expect such methods from one who onsiders himself a churchman.

The Tideway. By JOHN AYSCOUGH. New York: Benziger Brothers. $1.50.

French Windows. By JOHN AYSCOUGH. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. $1.50.

Readers who open "The Tideway," as did the reviewer, expecting to find a new novel by Mgr. Bickerstaffe-Drew, which would renew the pleasure they received from such books as "Faustula" or "San Celestino," will be somewhat disappointed, for his latest volume is made up of fifteen short stories, none of which is entitled "The Tideway." Perhaps the best of them from an artistic point of view is "The Sacristans," which tells of the rivalry between Maso, the old Sicilian miser who had charge of Santa Venere's church, and Tito, the handsome, unbelieving sacristan of the neighboring church of the Pietá. The story's ending is tragic. If John Ayscough could have given a more satisfactory explanation of the way that "The Lady of the Duneshore" survived her fall from the cliff his second story would be better, but it will hold the reader's interest to the end. The manner in which two begging Sisters brought about "The Awakening of Miss Girvan" is well told, "Fring" is a good character-study, "By the Way" a clever piece of apologetics, and "Maneuvers" has an amusing figure in Mrs. Tumblin.

"In a class by itself; one of the most moving books that the war has inspired," was AMERICA's appraisal of "French Windows" when the book first appeared. It has now gone through eight editions in England, and this "New Edition" of the work has been printed from type set in the United States. The book relates experiences that the author had while a chaplain in France during the first year of the war and is rich in pages of description, humor and pathos that no one but a literary artist like John Ayscough and a priest like Mgr. Bickerstaffe-Drew could write. "French Windows" is one of the few war-books that everybody should read.

The Science and Art of Teaching. By D. W. LA RUE, Ph.D. New York: American Book Co. $1.00.

A Parent's Job. By C. N. MILLARD. Boston: The Pilgrim Press. $1.00.

Despite the flood of books, purposing to explain what education is and what it is not, we do not seem to be growing in our grasp of this important art and science. In the recently published report of the Commissioner of Education, Dr. P. P. Claxton sorrowfully remarks that, although Americans annually "spend hundreds of millions of dollars on public education, we have little accurate and definite information about the value of the various forms of education." If the Commissioner is correct, and there is little reason to judge him in error, it would seem that in this matter, at least, the American reputation for shrewdness has been vastly overrated. For a good many years we have suspected the existence of a vague "something wrong" with our educational systems, but we have been too busy with other interests to stop long enough to isolate the factor of evil.

It can hardly be said that Dr. La Rue's book will do much to dispel the ignorance of which Dr. Claxton complains. Like all experienced teachers, he is able to arrange the time-honored "methods for strengthening the memory" in a somewhat new form, and to give a number of hints which undoubtedly will be found helpful by the younger members of the profession. But this done, his usefulness, it must be confessed, is at an end. One who sets himself the difficult task of composing a treatise on teaching as an art and as a science should be well grounded in psychology, and it is in precisely this subject that Dr. La Rue is lamentably weak. So deplorably broad are his attempted definitions of such terms as "perception," "sensation," "idea," "judgment," that to discover the specific difference between the four would tax the subtle intellect of the Stagyrite. On the other hand, Dr. La Rue's plan of "the whole field of knowledge" is decidedly narrow, since his "schematic view of all knowledge," presented in a circular chart, finds no place whatever for religion. Ethics, he thinks, is "a possible science," but "still in a very crude state of development," while the biologist will probably regard Dr. La Rue's reliance on heredity as a factor "largely influencing truthfulness" with excusable mirth. An act is rated "bad" or "good" according to its effect upon society, and hence "the grinning fool and the clever rascal are different, but both 'bad,' since their presence is a harm to society."

Written for parents, Dr. Millard's modest volume will be read with amusement and profit by every teacher. Dr. Millard does not undertake to lecture on psychology, but his insight into the workings of the mind of the child, and his often fond parent, is sharp, and in the main accurate. As an advocate of corporal punishment, judiciously decreed and mercifully administered, Dr. Millard is justly suspected of the taint of mid-Victorianism, while his insistence on retaining the short word "don't" in every code of law is clearly a return to primitive barbarism. Nevertheless, teachers, whether emeriti or still in active service, will recognize that this stimulating little volume is the work of no theorist, but of one who has served with distinction on the field and in the trenches.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

"The Red Cross Barge" (Doran, $1.25) by Mrs. Belloc-Lowndes is an excellent war-story. Its central figures are Jeanne Rouannès, a French Red Cross nurse, and Max Keller, a young German surgeon; the scene of the tale is the invaded town of Valoise-sur-Marne, and the time August and September, 1914. With remarkable skill this Catholic author describes how the "Herr Doktor" who has fallen in love with the French maiden, is slowly forced to realize that the German army is by no means the chivalrous body of men he thought it to be. There are well-drawn pictures of the town and its inhabitants, and the Germans' retreat from Paris is vividly described. The story's end is quite artistic.——The "Impossible People" (Houghton, $1.50) of M. C. E. Wemyss's latest novel are a kind-hearted Anglican curate and his wife who had adopted Hope Blent when she was a baby. After growing up she meets her much more "impossible" parents and then makes a foolish marriage. Milly is another interesting girl in the story, but its pages often grow dull and its humor rather flat.

"First Call: Guide Posts to Berlin" (Putnam, $1.50). the new book by Arthur Guy Empey, the American machine-gunner who "went over the top" with his British comrades, is packed with practical advice for the soldier in the trenches and a quantity of information for those at home who are interested in him. The author gives descriptions of all the departments in the army, tells how the men are trained, what weapons they use, and how they live in the trenches. Blacken your face and hands before making a raid; don't look up at enemy planes; tea can be used for shaving; "never trust a Fritz," are some of his counsels for our inexperienced soldiers. As for the way the author's information is given, his style is profane, crude and vulgar; his creed seems to be a crass fatalism, and unchristian hate his animating motive for fighting bravely. Let us hope that most of our soldiers in France have much more religion in their hearts than has the author of "First Call."

These seasonable stanzas on "Easter Night" are taken from Mrs. Alice Meynell's recent volume "A Father of Women and Other Poems":

All night had shout of men and cry
Of woeful women filled His way;
Until that noon of somber sky
On Friday, clamor and display
Smote Him, no solitude had He,
No silence, since Gethsemane.

Public was Death, but Power, but Might
But Life again; but Victory,
Were hushed within the dead of night,
The shutter'd dark, the secrecy,
And all alone, alone, alone
He rose again behind the stone.

The seven "Portuguese Portraits" (Longmans, $1.75) in Aubrey F. G. Bell's interesting little book are those of "King Dinis (1261-1325)," "Nun' Alvarez (1360-1431)," "Prince Henry the Navigator (1394-1460)," "Vasco da Gama (1460?-1524)," "Duarte Pacheco Pereira (1465?-1533?)," "Affonso de Albuquerque (1462-1515)" and "Dom Joao de Castro (1500-1548)." These sketches of Catholic worthies of Portugal's palmy days who made their country independent, who won her deathless fame as a nation of intrepid explorers, who built up a great empire in India, and brought Christianity to innumerable heathen peoples will suggest to the thoughtful reader a melancholy contrast with the weak, decadent, persecuting Portugal of today. That a country of only some 1,500,000 inhabitants should figure so prominently in sixteenth-century history the author thinks was due to the fact that the motto of the Portuguese of that time was "God, King and Country" and that "Each man among them relied under Heaven, on himself, not on this or that sect or party or philosophy, election promises or political programs. They did not wait and watch for some wonderful Ism" to change the world but they persistently set to work as individuals and changed it themselves.

"The Door of Dreams" (Houghton Mifflin, $1.00), Jessie B. Rittenhouse's little book of "short and singing love poems" keeps but a mediocre level of conception and execution. The picture in the following stanzas show the author at her best:

In Venice once I saw a funeral barge,
I had not dreamed death could so lovely be,
Nor that one might in peace so utter calm
Float to infinity.

Under a black-plumed canopy he lay,
Upon a velvet dais, flower-sweet,
Two boatmen rowed in silence at his head,
Two boatmen at his feet.

And softer than a breast of feathered bird
The great swan barge moved downward to the sea,
While singers following made all the air
Sweet with a threnody.

"Conferences for Men" (Wagner, $1.50), by Rev. Raymond Kuehnel, is a series of fifty-two clear, practical talks intended for Holy Name Societies. They treat of the duties of fathers to the State, to their children, to their wives and to themselves. The members are eloquently exhorted to be well-informed on the Catholic viewpoint of the social questions of the day, and to fulfil faithfully their obligations as citizens. Joseph is continually held up as the inspiring ideal and model for the head of the family. While the feminist movement is of course to be severely condemned it is unwise to condemn roundly woman suffrage too. In woman-suffrage States, to vote is now a duty rather than a privilege and our Catholic women must be warned not to leave the fort in the hands of the enemy.——"Le Vén. Jean-Claude Colin et la Société de Marie" (Tequi, Paris, 2 fr.) is a brief life of the Marist Fathers' saintly founder. With humility the keynote of his own life and works the holy old man instilled this fairest of Christian virtues into the members of his little society, proposing to them as their chief end the humility of the Holy Family at Nazareth and exhorting them to live as he himself wished to live and die, "inconnu avant, inconnu après." Favored with a vision from the Mother of God, and, as is thought likely, with direct revelation from God Himself, he gathered around him at Lyons a little band of soul-seekers. This band was later approved by Pope Gregory XVI and appointed to labor in the islands of Oceanica.

In a critical paper on "Poets Militant," contributed to the March Bookman by Jessie B. Rittenhouse, she quotes from the Touchstone these stanzas by the late Francis Ledwidge, the Irish poet:

When I was young I had a care
Lest I should cheat me of my share
Of that which makes it sweet to strive
For life, and dying still survive,
A name in sunshine written higher
Than lark or poet dare aspire.

But I grew weary doing well;
Besides, 'twas sweeter in that hell
Down with the loud banditti people
Who robbed the orchards, climbed the steeple
For jackdaws' eggs and made the cock
Crow ere 'twas daylight on the clock.
I was so very bad the neighbors
Spoke of me at their daily labors.

And now I'm drinking wine in France,
The helpless child of circumstance.
Tomorrow will be loud with war.
How will I be accounted for?

It is too late now to retrieve
A fallen dream, too late to grieve
A name unmade, but not too late
To thank the gods for what is great:
A keen-edged sword, a soldier's heart
Is greater than a poet's art,
And greater than a poet's fame
A little grave that has no name.

And Lieutenant-Colonel John McCrae, a Canadian soldier poet who died in France, will be remembered best for these lines, called "In Flanders Fields":

In Flanders fields the poppies blow
Between the crosses, row on row,
That mark our place; and in the sky
The larks still bravely singing fly,
Scarce heard amid the guns below.
We are the dead, short days ago
We lived, felt dawn, saw sunset glow,
Loved and were loved, and now we lie
In Flanders fields.

Take up our quarrel with the foe.
To you from failing hands we throw
The Torch—be yours to hold it high!
If ye break faith with us who die,
We shall not sleep, though poppies grow
In Flanders fields.

EDUCATION

Teaching Them What to Read

DURING the last few months the subject of creating an interest in Catholic reading has received some slight attention in the pages of AMERICA. The writer had hoped to be favored with further advice on this subject from the experience of some of our Catholic teachers who have the opportunity of giving first-hand information on a topic which is of paramount importance, particularly at the present time. This information did not appear to be forthcoming, and the desire to keep before the mind of our Catholic teaching-body a subject which deserves the careful attention of every true educator has led the writer to advance his views on the subject.

Two correspondents who commented on the editorial entitled "Teach Them What to Read," that appeared in AMERICA for December 8, 1917, have given us a rather dark view of the matter. M. C. in the issue of January 19 says: "I myself am a convent graduate, and I cannot recall that in the school I attended any teaching was ever done along this line. I do not think I ever saw a Catholic periodical in that school. I know I never read one." This is surely a serious indictment of any institution that lays claim to giving its pupils a Catholic education and we sincerely hope with M. C. that this "may not be true of other schools." That it is not true of many schools we can vouch for with absolute security. This statement is not made in a spirit of mere contradiction, but simply to contrast M. C.'s individual case with others of an opposite type.

DUTIES TOWARD THE CATHOLIC PRESS

THAT there are schools which are doing splendid work in leading the children under their charge to drink at the fountains of the best Catholic thought no one at all acquainted with our parochial schools and higher institutions can reasonably question, and that unfortunately such examples as those brought forward by M. C. continue to exist is likewise beyond contradiction, and in some cases, perhaps, beyond correction. For as long as types of teachers continue in office who consider the reading or discussion of Catholic newspapers during the regular class hours as "a loss of time," so long shall we have a Catholic laity ignorant of the power that is wielded by an efficient Catholic press. Our children are taught their duty of attending Mass and of contributing to the support of church and school, and the crowds that throng our places of worship and the splendid Catholic edifices devoted to religion and education are the fruits of this teaching. Under similar conditions what could we not expect from teaching the children their duties towards the Catholic press? There can be no doubt at all that the habit of reading Catholic books and magazines must be begun in our parochial schools in order to affect the great mass of Catholics; moreover only when such conditions prevail can the best results be obtained in our higher institutions of learning.

The ideas brought forward in this article have been found to work out successfully in an average Catholic high school for boys; and they can be carried out, quite as successfully, most probably in other institutions. The writer agrees thoroughly with M. C. that conditions such as the latter describes are due in large measure to the reluctance of Catholics in general to admit criticisms against Catholic schools, and that "teachers in these schools should be the first to give consideration to such criticism." However, we may add that constructive criticism is what most thinking teachers are looking for; there should be more of the helpful spirit, a sharing of ideas that have proved successful in all departments of education.

TEACHERS SHOULD BE READERS THEMSELVES

NEEDLESS to say, the beginning of "teaching them what to read" must necessarily be almost entirely the work of the teacher; his or her enthusiasm in the undertaking must be the power that presents the subject in an attractive light. This may be done in a variety of ways. In the first place, the teacher himself must be thoroughly acquainted with the best there is in Catholic literature, and should constantly replenish his mind with the Catholic news of the day as it appears in magazines and newspapers; from these storehouses he can glean selections suitable for the class for which they are intended. This practice of bringing items of interest to the notice of pupils should not be made a matter of simple reading; the teacher should furnish a complete background to every article and supplement the dead print with living comment that will breathe spirit into an otherwise isolated item of news, more or less interesting. The possibilities of a further discussion by the pupils themselves will vary with the age and attainments of the class and the nature of the article. There is, however, a practice which the thoughtful teacher will not fail to appreciate in this connection, particularly with beginners in such work: Let him confine his selections to a certain class of writers and to special periodicals, preferably such as deal with local associations; this practice will establish a circle of familiar names to which the teacher should constantly revert whenever an opportunity offers. Once this circle of acquaintances has been made and the names of our Catholic leaders in literature and journalism have become household-words among our pupils, there remains a life-time in which to cultivate this acquaintance further, and to enlarge the circle of literary friendships until it assumes an international character.

CATHOLIC PERIODICALS AS TEXT-BOOKS

A NEGATIVE suggestion may very well find place in this connection: It is not well to read selections of the kind described above solely as a reward for good conduct or for faultless recitations. It is better to make the practice an integral part of some course, preferably the English, and have the pupils keep a record of the title of the article read, the name of the author, the periodical from which it is selected, with the date of the issue. Some of the more important items may then be incorporated in the questions for the monthly tests or examinations. This will stimulate the work and be a powerful inducement towards keeping the proposed selections fresh in the minds of the pupils. Moreover, it leads directly to a further step, namely, the inauguration of a Catholic-press hour. This consists in devoting at least a full period of the English course each week to the perusal of a Catholic paper or magazine. This naturally supposes the introduction of some Catholic periodical as a regular text-book on the school program; for such a plan a weekly, chosen with consideration for the mental development of the class, will be found to serve the purpose very well.

For the first, second and even the third year of high school, the writer would suggest the use of the diocesan organ, as being, in the first place, about as much as the average student of these classes can handle, and tending, in the second place, towards creating an active interest in the works of the diocese. There is hardly any doubt that many of our Catholic weeklies leave much to be desired when they are required to measure up to the standards of a modern high-school text-book. Others again are admirably adapted to such a purpose, being at the same time models of journalistic English and exponents of healthy Catholic thought and activity. Among the latter class we cannot forbear to mention the Catholic Standard and Times of Philadelphia, which among other distinct advantages devotes an entire page to the interests of home and school from the pen of the gifted Honor Walsh. For the fourth year of high school the pages of AMERICA furnish the finest kind of material for class-reading and discussion, not, however, to the exclusion of the diocesan organ. At this stage, that paper ought to have taken its place in the lives of our pupils as a regular weekly necessity. Besides serving as the text-book for one course of English each week, a periodical of the kind above described would be a valuable adjunct to courses of oral English and current church history.

Reading Catholic Apologetics

THERE is still another step towards which the zealous advocate of the Catholic press will constantly aim. Inculcating the habit of reading literature that deals with the exposition and defense of the Faith is an excellent means of inspiring educated young men with the zeal of modern apostles. It is the armor that should enable them to become workers in the field of the Church. In other words, we want to see the fruits of our endeavors, and we can reasonably expect this only if we first plant the seeds of such an apostolate in their hearts. Whilst still under our care, they should be initiated into the practice of spreading Catholic literature among those less fortunate than themselves; in fact, they should be taught by every means in their power to aid the cause of the Catholic press, which at its best has always had an up-hill fight for a mere existence. Work of this kind can most readily be accomplished by the members of the school sodality, operating in Catholic literature sections and reading circles. Such fields of activity are especially vast at the present time with the heavy demands for reading matter made by the various cantonments all over the United States. In an article of this kind it is hardly possible to do more than indicate the amount of work that awaits the earnest worker in this field. The records of any live sodality are a sufficient text-book for any person not yet acquainted with this line of work, who desires further information on the subject.

SOCIOLOGY

The Question of the Hours of Labor

THE new Code of Canon Law, which comes into force this year, embodies as legal enactments points that were advocated by Pope Leo XIII in his Encyclical on "The Rights of Labor." There are in the Code canons which enjoin upon the employer not only the duty of paying a fair wage to the workers, but the further obligation of so arranging the hours of work that he will have time for the care of his family and for the fulfilment of his religious duties. We may put the matter thus: The employer must see that the worker has reasonable opportunities for leisure outside the factory or the workshop. The worker is not a mere piece of machinery. It follows that excessive hours of work are wrong even if the workman is induced to give them by extra pay. Long hours may be necessary in an emergency, but they should not be normal, and there is solid evidence to show that in times of emergency a continuance of long hours does not give good results even from the point of view of increased production.

The Normal Working Day

FIFTY years ago twelve hours and more of work was regarded as the normal day. I believe it was my friend, the late William Allan of Gateshead, who first introduced the eight-hours day in a British iron works. He had risen from the ranks and had himself been an engineer workman before he became first works manager and then owner and employer. The day-shift of men used to come on at 6 a. m. and knock off work later on for breakfast. He was convinced that the double start in the morning meant loss of time, and that not much effective progress was made in the first short spell of work. He put the start later and divided the day into two "spells" of four hours each, and found that there was a better output with this eight-hours day then with the ten hours of work on the previous system, and the men were in better condition. Lord Leverhulme, better known as Mr. Lever of the Sunlight Soap Works, has lately put forward a proposal that six hours should be the normal day. He holds that this would give sufficient output. One must of course recognize that the movement for shorter hours has in some cases been really directed not towards obtaining more leisure and a more human life, but to some extent has had the object of securing more opportunities of counting additional hours of work as overtime at a higher rate. But in the main it has been an effort towards social betterment.

The War-Workers' Day

THE greatest revolution ever effected in the matter of the time exacted or purchased from the worker was that carried out by the Church when it succeeded in making the weekly rest on Sunday the law of all Christian lands. In Catholic England in the days before the miscalled "Reformation," work also stopped at noon on Saturday in honor of Our Blessed Lady. It was only in the second half of the nineteenth century that the English workers got back their Saturday half-holiday. In the first year of the great war in the British shipyards and in hundreds of factories and workshops, not only the Saturday half-holiday but the Sunday rest also disappeared and overtime was often worked day after day. It was an emergency, and the necessities of a state of war were supposed to be ample justification for this unceasing toil. But it was soon found that the results were disappointing. Under the continued strain the output did not keep pace with the hours worked. Accuracy and quality of work not only diminished in many cases, but there was also an unpleasant increase in accidents and in the breakdown of health among the workers. By the end of the year the Government ordered that no one be obliged to work more than six days out of the seven. There has further been a widespread reversion to the forty-eight hours a week which was the standard time in Government works and in numbers of iron works and engineering works before the war. It is remarkable that in the years prior to the present conflict many employers made a persistent stand against the eight-hours day, but as Sir Robert Hadfield, the chairman of the great Hadfield Engineering Works, put it not long ago, "Now, under war conditions, when it is necessary that we should produce at a maximum, we have turned to it as a means to just that end, and find it most efficient."

Results of Over-working

IT is quite true that in many factories longer hours are worked, but the tendency is to the shorter period. There is evidence of this in the reports issued from time to time by the Home Office authorities, which include interesting data of the results obtained by longer and shorter working days, as ascertained by careful observation under scientific-test conditions. One of the latest of these scientific official reports frankly admits that the hours originally suggested for munition work—65 to 67 hours per week for men and 60 for women—were far too high and that there should be a considerable reduction, but on account of the diversity of conditions in different localities and trades the commissioners hesitate to fix one standard time for all. The evidence they have collected points, however, some approximation to the 48 hours week as the best. Statistics of the earnings of women on piece-work (engineering), where the amount earned represents so much work done and approved, show cases of a rise in the earnings and output on the reduction of time from 56 to 48 hours. In one case the workers' earnings and output rose 25 per cent., i. e., as much work was done in four weeks of 48 hours each as had been turned out in five weeks of 56 hours. The evidence collected bears upon many occupations outside the engineering trade, but always points to the same conclusion.

A Works Manager's Report

AN interesting report on a large printing works tells how the hours were reduced from 53 to 50 per week, and the works manager notes that in spite of difficult war conditions which meant changes in personnel, there was a better output. He remarks that overtime is of no use except for a brief period. A fortnight is beyond the useful limit. At the end of the second week there is always a marked falling off in the quality of the work, and overtime has to be stopped. The short spell of work before breakfast, formerly on the time table, is, he says, "quite useless." In some of the textile works in Yorkshire the hours had to be reduced at times on account of deficiency of raw material, but it was found that with the shorter hours the output increased. In one big mill the hours were dropped from 55 to 45 per week. This gave at first a 10 per cent. reduction of output, but the deficiency presently diminished to 5 per cent., and as material became available the hours were raised to 50 and it was found there was a higher output than when 55 hours were worked. For most trades 48 to 50 hours per week seem to give the best results.

Here we have one more interesting social experiment resulting from war conditions, and the conclusions it points to show that the reasonable shortening of the hours of labor, originally advocated for social ends, is also a measure more than justified even from the more material standpoint of industrial efficiency.

NOTE AND COMMENT

Pontiff Praises Article on Papal War Policy

THE following news item from Rome appeared in the various New York dailies during the past week:

> Monsignor Ceretti, Assistant Papal Secretary of State, has submitted to Pope Benedict an article written by Cardinal Gibbons on "The War Policy of the Pope." After reading it the Pope expressed his approval of the article and his appreciation of the clear and exhaustive manner in which Cardinal Gibbons had explained the attitude of the Holy See during the war and pointed out the innumerable ways in which the Pope had striven to alleviate the sufferings and sorrows of the struggle and his untiring efforts in the cause of order, civilization and peace.
> The Pope ordered that the article be translated and widely published, considering it to be the most able exposition that has been given of the circumstances of his unique and difficult position.

The article in question was written for AMERICA and published in our issue of February 23. It was widely reprinted in the secular press of the country and will now serve to make clear "The War Policy of the Pope" in other lands as well.

The Value of Lent

THE New York Times offers the following eulogy of the Lenten spirit and of the advantages it brings to the nation:

> Lent has stood the test. It has something worth while to give. In this time of trial it gives spiritual strength, it sustains the soul. The hard-pressed man finds in its message and discipline something he needs to meet the sacrifices of war. The flippant assertion that the man in the street cares nothing for religion, that he has cast it aside as an outworn garment, is false. The average man is at heart religious. Lent appeals to his religious instinct. It reminds him that there are other worlds than this. Lent survives because it serves.
> Thus again is the Church justified in the wisdom of her practices even in the eyes of the world.

Third Liberty-Loan Honor Flags

TO the service flags of the war and of the Red Cross is now to be added a new liberty-loan honor flag. Every city or town subscribing more than its quota of liberty bonds will be privileged to float the new emblem that is to be awarded by the Treasury Department. The flag will be white, bordered with red, and will carry three vertical stripes of blue, denoting the third liberty loan. There is also to be a national honor flag for each State, to be unfurled at the State capitol, with the names of all towns and cities listed upon it that oversubscribe their quotas to the liberty loan. A national honor flag is further to be preserved in the United States Treasury with the record of each State. A star added to the local honor flags will denote that the city's quota has been doubled; two stars, that it has been tripled. Window cards will be displayed and names of subscribers are to be registered in a public honor roll, without however mentioning the amount subscribed. Thus no efforts are spared to make of the third liberty loan an extraordinary success. The date set for the opening of the campaign is April 6, the first anniversary of America's entrance into the war. All Catholics are urged to invest as much as possible in these bonds.

Novena of Grace and the World War

THE Novena of Grace in honor of St. Francis Xavier met with wonderful response in the city of Baltimore during the present year. In many of the churches it was conducted with two, three and even four exercises each day. In the church of St. Ignatius of Loyola it became necessary to hold the devotions nine times daily in order to accommodate the throngs eager to attend them. The average daily attendance was estimated at 7,775. No slight degree of this fervor was due to the war, and the anxiety existing in so many Catholic families whose sons are even now at the front or preparing to take their place in the great army. Parents, sisters and other relatives of the enlisted men prayed with special earnestness for the first intention of the novena, which was to secure "a world-wide and permanent peace," the supreme desire of the nations of the earth today. The following impressive prayer was recited each day at the closing of the devotions:

> Dear St. Francis Xavier, bearer of good tidings of peace to the nations seated in darkness and the shadow of death, intercede, we beseech thee, with the Prince of Peace that inspiring rulers and peoples with meekness and right, He may bring men to live together in loving harmony.
> Beg the gentle Mother of Christ, and our Mother, to throw the mantle of her motherly protection over our boys in army and navy and bring them safely home. May she be a Mother of Consolation to those in whose homes shines the service star, symbol of loyalty to the country and confidence in the Lord.

Surely the great apostle of modern days whose soul burned with the consuming desire of world-conquest, not for himself or for his nation but for Christ alone, cannot be deaf to this mighty and beautiful petition. In God's own way those prayers will be splendidly answered.

Our Catholic Soldiers in France

FROM "Somewhere in France" come interesting letters written by the chaplains now with the American Expeditionary Forces. They show how vital and profound a factor in the life of our soldiers at the front is the Catholic Faith. "With my heart's desire fulfilled," writes Father de Valles, "here I am right in the danger zone." He is chaplain of a Massachusetts regiment of 3,700 men, "seventy per cent. of which is Catholic." For four months officers and men had clamored for a Catholic priest, and we can therefore imagine the reception Father de Valles received on his arrival in their midst. His letter, printed in the Chaplains' Aid Bulletin, thus describes the coldness of the village churches in winter time, and the fervor of the men who crowded them from altar-rail to door:

> The regiment is quartered along three neighboring villages, in which there are medieval ice-cold stone churches, without even the luxury of old-fashioned stoves. The men do not however complain, even after waiting three or four hours on confession nights for their turn. I go about from village to village and to the battalions and companies of the regiment to cheer and administer to the men, especially the sick at the base hospital. The men are delighted to see the priest. They want the chaplain to read the letters from home and to write for them. We are suffering hardships and privations, but I wouldn't exchange the experience for the best parish in the land. It is an inspiring sight to see these churches filled to every inch of space with our soldiers in khaki. Every evening they file into church for rosary and night prayers. In these medieval inland villages, far from theaters, dance-halls and saloons, these men are closer to God than ever before.

What more delightful and encouraging news could be given to their parents and friends at home? The chaplain urgently asks for beads, medals and prayer books, for which the men are "clamoring." He closes with an account of our soldiers' devotion to Sœur Thérèse, which has proved to be of great assistance and is very popular among the men of the regiment. "The Protestant boys have often asked me for her medals and are wearing them." Equally interesting is the statement made by Father Delaux, likewise of the American Expeditionary Forces, when he says:

> We had a meeting of all the chaplains of the Division, presided over by General Edwards. At that dinner meeting the non-Catholic chaplains from many and divers denominations decided to provide themselves with a chaplain's kit after the Catholic pattern: chalice, candle, crucifix, alb, vestment, etc., etc. . . . This may indicate the drift of the times.

It shows the craving of the human heart for those outward expressions of religious worship, which Protestanism has blindly rejected, ignoring their profound meaning and the corresponding internal spirit of faith and devotion. The Divine Founder of the Church has taken into full account all that is in man and His guidance abides with her today. Father Delaux writes of his work for the One Hundred and Second, a Connecticut regiment, whose "Catholic elements are far beyond seventy per cent of the whole." He, too, refers to the "crying need of catechisms, prayer books, beads and scapulars."

Cardinal Farley Opens War-Fund Drive

OPENING the Catholic war-fund drive in New York Cardinal Farley eloquently referred to the recent news that the old Sixty-ninth, "the embodiment of Catholic New York's ardent Americanism," had gone "over the top." He saw in this a fitting prelude to the patriotic movement that was then to be inaugurated by New York Catholics at home. Addressing himself to the Secretary of the Navy, who represented the Government at the great Catholic rally, the Cardinal alluded to the fact that scarce one in all that audience was without some tender ties to a lad in khaki or one of our brave boys in blue. The mingling of hope and fear in the hearts of all present was thus beautifully described by the venerable prelate:

> It is not strange, then—nay, it would be unnatural if the sentiment which animates this meeting were not a commingling of joy and sorrow, a blending of gladness and anxiety, a mixture of hope and fear. Already some of our brave lads have made the sacrifice of supreme devotion, either on the battle-scarred soil of France or in the depths of the trackless sea. Many more must die that this nation may live. We grieve for the brave men who have fallen, for the heroic deaths which have destroyed the radiant hopes of fond parents, for the broken staffs upon which old age had hoped to lean.
> Sobered and saddened we realize that a great national treasure of youth must redeem the nation. Anxieties sway us and fear clutches our souls at the thought of the sorrows and the separations which must be endured. Strongly outlined by memory's art before the mind of practically every lady and gentleman here tonight is the fond face of a dear son, a loving brother, a soldier sweetheart, a trusted friend who has answered his country's call.
> Yet our grief, our anxieties, our manly fears are bittersweet. The powerful incentive which has nerved the men who have gone pervades this meeting, tempers our sorrow with joy, relieves our anxiety with gladness and brings hope to our fearful hearts. Beyond all ties of family and of friendship, more vital than private interests and individual concerns, dearer than our lives, more precious than our treasures is our country, whose Government, Mr. Secretary, you so ably represent.

The patriotism displayed by the Catholic soldiers in the field was to be seconded by the splendid patriotism of the Catholics at home in that memorable drive for $2,500,000 in which all records were to be broken at its very opening day "over the top."

A Frowzy Journal

THE frowzy Methodist journal, the Christian Advocate, is still "a-yapping." At a "halleluiah" meeting held no doubt in the Jersey mews it discovered that the editors of AMERICA are Irishmen and Germans not very long out of Rome and it has determined that its quarry will be exposed to the whole world, if yelps can accomplish so noble a purpose. Meantime the three editors of AMERICA who are in direct descent from the original colonists are regretting the misfortune which deprived them of at least a drop of the good old blood that stirs the bark, and the other editors, all of American birth and education, console them by pointing to another article in the frowzy journal which condones Irish blood when by some freak of nature—for surely it is not of grace—it happens to be "Methody-like." But imagine Irish and German editors not long out of Rome! Can it be that the frowzy journal thinks that the Kaiser and Sinn Fein captured the imperial city some time since? As to the ethics of the frowzy journal's article, it is of the usual kind found in inferior catchpenny papers; wild statements without evidence or attempt to get evidence; absolute neglect to answer the statement of the New York Times that "leaders of the New Jersey Methodist Conference" declared "that the courses of study laid down by the commission which maps out the teachings for new ministers of the faith are 'nothing more than another form of German propaganda teachings that have their organization in Germany'."; and lastly a silly piece of camouflage worthy of an intellectual huckster to the effect that the Methodist Book Concern which, according to Senator Gallinger, perjured itself in order to mulct the Government of some $70,000, a theft never atoned for even partially by a return of the money, has no connection with the Methodist Episcopal Church. The frowzy journal has missed the point in the last issue. It is this: now and then, at census time, the Methodist Episcopal Church boasts of the "Methodist Church" which committed the theft through perjury as one of the great branches of Methodism, and whether the alleged thief is a branch or the root of Methodism, it is at least nearer the Methodist Episcopal Church than the Pope. Hence the frowzy journal should not waste its energy in calumniating the latter but should expend all its strength either in convincing Senator Gallinger that he is wrong or in attempting to get the thief to repent of its perjury and restore the stolen goods. It is amusing to note that the frowzy journal of turgid rhetoric which sets itself up as a teacher of foreign editors—foreign to Methodism and reckless diatribes—has apparently forgotten the distinction between Greek Uniate and Orthodox Churches. Hear the scurry for an encyclopedia in the frowzy journal's office! For the rest President Lincoln was given to charitable speeches and so though he might have told of the division in American Methodism over slavery, he did not do so, but simply praised the "Methodist Church" for its soldiers, nurses and prayers. It is to be hoped that he did not include the perjurer and thief in his eulogy, for "halleluiahs" are dear at some $70,000.

Chronicle

The War.—When the present German "super-offen-ve" began on Thursday, March 21, the Kaiser's divi-ons were drawn up on a line extending from the Sensée, south of the Cojeul, to a line east of Fontaine and Flesquières, southwest of Cambrai, then southward by Gou-aucourt, Gauche Wood, Villers and Hargicourt, then est of St. Quentin, and thence southeast of Vendeuil and Fère. By Monday, March 25, these forces after the rrific fighting recorded in our last week's chronicle, had ached a line stretching from Bapaume, taken after a ubborn resistance, southward through Péronne and am to Chauny to the east of La Fère and a little north the Oise. At that date it was also announced that the ermans had crossed the Somme at several points be-ween Péronne and Ham. In the northern sector of the ttlefield from the Scarpe to Péronne the advance of the emy was slower, while southward it was more consid-able, for here it reached Nesle and Guiscard. At these ints French reinforcements joined the British. On arch 24 Berlin announced that the German troops d taken Noyon, Roye and Lihons, two miles west of aulnes, and that they were in pursuit of the British, who were retreating on a wide front," and that Ger-an forces were threatening Albert. On the same date eld Marshal Haig announced that his line north of the mme ran: Bray, Albert, Beaumont-Hamel, Puisieux, iry, Henin, Wancourt, just west of Monchy, to the arpe and thence along his original front. He stated the same dispatch that the line south of this ran from éricourt on the Somme, through Rosières west of Roye d west of Noyon.

lletin, Mar. 25, p.m.-Apr. 1, a.m.

The bulletins of March 28 brought news of the cross-g of the Ancre by the enemy and of the capture by his oops of Albert. He had also won a foothold in Ablain-le half-way between Albert and Arras. Though hard essed, the British were strong enough to counter-at-ck north of the Somme, between the angle of the ncre and the Somme, and were able to win back for a nile from the enemy the town of Morlancourt and ipilly, while south of the river they advanced to oyart. West of Roye, where the French were hold-g the line and where the enemy hoped to break through d destroy the cohesion of the Franco-British troops and possibly outflank them, in spite of their gallant stand, the French had to withdraw westward towards Montdidier. But the onslaught of the enemy was so fierce in this section of the field that they soon took Montdidier and pushed their lines as far as Pierrepont, on the Avre four miles northwest of Montdidier. While in this territory this dangerous thrust of the enemy to break through the Franco-British lines was being painfully but at last successfully resisted, the British were making heroic but fruitless attempts to retake Albert.

The last movements of the enemy had made it evident that his immediate objective was Amiens, so vital as a railroad center and the connecting link between Calais and Paris, and all-important for its control over the lines to Havre. The capture of Amiens would be a blow of the heaviest kind both to the French and the British armies. By March 29-30 the battle line ran from Arleux, Fampoux, Neuville-le-Vitasse, all three to the east of Arras and covering the town, down to Morlant in the angle of the Ancre and the Somme, thence to Marcelcave, about eleven miles east of Amiens and from Marcelcave to Demuin. South of Demuin, on the French front the line was reported as running through Mézières, La Neuville-Sire-Bernard and Gratibus, just east of Montdidier. The latest dispatches report that the enemy exerted the heaviest pressure on the Allied lines in the region between the Somme and the Avre and southward around Montdidier. Six villages on the Montdidier front were wrested from the French troops, Ayencourt and Le Monchel, south of the town; Mesnil St. Georges, about two miles to the west; Cantigny, Aubvillers, and Grivesnes to the northwest. Grivesnes is less than five miles from the railway running from Amiens to Paris via St. Just. Dispatches of March 31 show the German Crown Prince's army beaten back in the southern sector from Moreuil to Lassigny, on a front of thirty-eight miles. North of Moreuil the British have reestablished their positions in the Luce valley, and retaken Demuin. Heavy fighting is going on between the Luce and the Avre. North of the Somme Marshal Haig's forces advanced near Serre, seven miles north of Albert, and recaptured Feuchy, directly east of Arras. American troops are reported as starting for the battle-front.

The fighting front at the beginning of the offensive was approximately fifty miles and was substantially a straight line. It now extends over a stretch of territory of ninety miles and is elbowed out, with its furthest point, just west of Montdidier, about thirty-seven miles west of the starting point, at St. Quentin. The exact numbers of men engaged in the colossal contest is not known; experts place it at about 2,000,000 men, crediting the Germans with something like 1,200,000. The fighting has been everywhere of the fiercest kind. Nowhere in spite of the heavily-massed assaults of the German troops has the British line been broken nor has the cohesion of the Franco-British troops been disrupted. They still present an unbroken front to the foe. German official reports claim about 60,000 prisoners and the capture of more than 1,000 guns. It is almost impossible to give in accurate figures the number of the dead or the wounded on either side. The German losses are supposed to be exceedingly heavy. Some reports mention as many as 400,000. Paris has been shelled several times by long-range guns. In one instance the victims numbered 165. Of these 75 were killed and 90 wounded. The shells fell on a church during the Good Friday services.

It has been for some time evident that greater unity of action in the field and closer coordination of effort were necessary for the success of the Allied cause. This led to the appointment of General Ferdinand Foch, Chief of the French General Staff and the French military member of the Inter-Ally Supreme War Council at Versailles, as Generalissimo of all the Allied forces on the western front. It is not clearly known whether his authority extends to the Allied armies on the Italian front. Immediately after the appointment of the new Commander-in-Chief. President Wilson cabled his congratulations and General Pershing put at his disposal the entire forces of the American army now serving in France. It is understood that the appointment of General Foch is in no sense to be regarded as a reflection upon Field Marshal Haig or General Pétain, whose services and devotion to duty are everywhere recognized. It is the inevitable outcome of the present situation. The London Daily Chronicle declares that "Since a Generalissimo is to be appointed, the claims of Foch to that position are indisputable. He is the best living representative of the finest French military tradition. A writer of the highest reputation on the art of war, and also a brilliant commander in the field, he has added to his fame by his achievements in this war."

Foch, Commander-in-Chief

General Foch was born at Tarbes, in the south of France, in 1851, and is of Basque origin. He was educated in the schools of his native town and at Metz. On leaving the Ecole Polytechnique he served as a subaltern in the Franco-Prussian war, and later filled important colonial posts in Madagascar, and then became Director of the famous Ecole de Guerre. He is the author of two authoritative works on military science, "The Principles of War" and "The Conduct of War." In the present war his services to the Allied cause are well known, those particularly at the battle of the Marne, where with quick intuition and heroic daring he found out the weak spot in the German lines and hurled his worn-out troops against it, and those on the Yser, at the first battle of Ypres where he flung in his French reserves to stop the tide of German inundation which threatened to overpower the Belgian and English troops. Marshal Joffre has called him the "best strategist in Europe." Like Castelnau Pau and Pétain, General Foch is a practical and devout Catholic. In spite of the fact that he has a brother a Jesuit priest, he is warmly admired by Premier Clemenceau, and it is to the influence of this thoroughgoing opponent of all that savors of "Jesuitism" that he was placed at the head of the Ecole de Guerre. For the first time the 5,000,000 soldiers of the Allies are welded together under the newly-appointed Generalissimo into one force to meet an enemy who from the beginning of the struggle has been fighting under the supreme command of one directing head. General Foch can fight on the defensive, as his great race to head off the enemy from the channel ports splendidly proved in the first months of the war, but he prefers a vigorous offensive.

France.—There is a growing feeling in France that diplomatic relations should be resumed with the Holy See, and that the example of England, Holland, Japan and Russia should be imitated. Aside from the fact that the heart of France, the eldest daughter of the Church, and of all her children perhaps the most honored by the Father of Christendom, is yearning to return, like the prodigal, to its ancient heritage of love and confidence, there are many diplomatic reasons which are being urged in favor of such a step. The French protectorate in the East, the Far East, and especially in China, all depend on the Vatican; and the just settlement of the delicate questions connected with Alsace-Lorraine, which must come up for adjustment after the war, will need the beneficent intervention of the Holy See. The position of France is felt to be abnormal, and among Catholics and non-Catholics a quiet but effective propaganda is being carried on to secure the resumption of the old friendly relations. One of the most eloquent advocates of the movement, Mgr. de Cormont, the venerable Bishop of Aire and of Dax, addressed a recent pastoral nominally to his diocese, but in reality, as the Irish Catholic points out, to the Catholics in France.

Diplomatic Relations

When we see the heads of the various States seeking means to organize the Society of Nations in order to curb the guilty ambitions of the Central Powers, and when on the other hand we see peoples hitherto strong and powerful become the prey of very marked disunion as the result of the extravagance of demagogues, we feel that the power which should unite all divergent interests and by the force of its appeal lead all minds consciences, hearts and wills back into the way of justice and civilization, is no other than the power which by common agreement is the highest in the world and speaks in the name of indefectible principles.

La Croix, commenting on the pastoral and quoting the Bishop's assurance of the Pope's unchanging affection for France, points out that the Vatican, by the letter sent to M. Denys Cochin by the Cardinal Secretary of State concerning the French protectorate in Syria, has paved the way for direct contact of France with the Vatican and urges that before the preliminaries of peace have been entered into, France should resume official relations with the Holy See. Should she do so, her position would be more honorable and frank and would afford her no mean material advantages.

Ireland.—Unrest still continues in Ireland. The harsh treatment of prisoners, numerous arrests and scarcity of food are increasing the turmoil. The Dublin Weekly Freeman reports a mass meeting in Dublin to protest against the violation of promises made by the Government in favor of political prisoners. The Lord Mayor admitted that pledges had been broken and promised to lay the matter before the Municipal Council. Meantime "hunger strikes" are in progress. At last reports the Dundalk prisoners were nine days without food and a similar condition existed in Mountjoy and Cork. The Weekly Freeman thus reports a speech delivered by Count Plunkett at an Emmet Commemoration concert in the Mansion House, Dublin:

National Unrest

> Instead of thinking of England, except as their ancient enemy, they [the Irish] should think of themselves and the future before the people. They wanted to build up a free Ireland, because they wanted to exercise their own rights, and live as men in the sight of God, and not as slaves. When they had their freedom they should develop their country, and create that kinship which should exist amongst one crowd, and unite into one the desires and the aims of the whole people, and to see that certain moral principles were made supreme. Until they had a free nation they could not develop the qualities of their race. Though his son was probably in prison at that moment, he could not refuse to come there to address them, for penalties were not things that could strike down the soul of a man. He was there to assert the principles for which his son died, and it was their business, however personally they might suffer, to keep before the world the names of the men who died.

The "land raids" and "cattle drives" are still going on. County Clare is under martial law and no one may enter or leave the County without a permit. Lord French has been in Ennis consulting military officers, and numerous arrests are chronicled not only in Clare but in many other counties, such as Mayo, Tipperary and so on. During all the disorder Sinn Fein continues to insist that the remedy for the present state of affairs lies with the British Government, which is denying Ireland its fundamental rights. England, on the other hand, is agitating for conscription in Ireland. The Daily Telegram declares:

> The question of extending the operation of the military service act to Ireland must call for reconsideration by those who realize how magnificent has been the contribution of Irish regiments to our past success in this war and how priceless from every point of view would be a fuller participation of Irish manhood in the salvation of Europe. In this hour Irishmen will be conscious, if they never were before, that it is that and nothing less from which so many of them are standing aloof.

Despite this opinion, both Sinn Fein and the Nationalists remain obdurate.

Rome.—It is gratifying to note that the reply of the people of Poland to the Holy Father's peace proposals is no less enthusiastic than that of that other Catholic martyred country, heroic Belgium. The Polish note addressed by the Bishop of Gresna and Posnania to the Cardinal Secretary of State is in part as follows:

The Pope and Poland

> We Poles, attached by all the stormings of the heart to the Holy Apostolic See, full of the deepest gratitude towards our August Pontiff can now more than ever, in these times of trouble and horror, appreciate the kindness and paternal goodness shown to us so bounteously by the common Father of all. As long as a Polish heart beats we shall not forget the sublime words in our regard contained in the exhortation to the heads at the belligerent States. The Supreme Pontiff urged them to examine in the spirit of equity and justice the questions relating to the countries forming the ancient Kingdom of Poland, whose noble historical traditions and the sufferings endured by its people, especially during the present war, ought to win for it the sympathy of all the nations.

These words, it is true, owing to the fact that Poland has not a recognized place among the independent and sovereign nations of the world, lack the official character possessed by the replies sent by regularly constituted Governments; but they express the clear fact that the heart of that great people now, as ever, is loyal to the Holy See.

Russia.—"Wholesale murder is now a normal feature of Russian life," wrote Harold Williams from Moscow to the New York Times not long ago. He reports that in the small town of Glukhov, in the Government of Chernigov, 500 members of the local middle-class were massacred in one night. In Sebastopol also sailors murdered the residents of two streets where most of the city's well-to-do inhabitants lived. The bodies of the victims were thrown into the sea with stones tied to their feet. The money shortage is so acute in Petrograd, Moscow and other Russian cities that the transaction of business is practically impossible, small change being particularly scarce. The nationalization of all the banks has only stimulated hoarding. The large quantities of paper money which have constantly been issued only made matters worse. Trade is chiefly confined to foodstuffs, and the peasants hide what money they receive. Owing to the utter failure of transportation, legitimate trade has changed to speculation, exploiters are selling goods at fabulous prices, and small shops of all kinds are closing.

Massacre, Want and Disintegration

Mr. Sterling H. Bunnell, an engineer who has recently returned from Russia, gives in an article published by the New York Evening Post the following account of conditions in that country:

There has been no active Russian army on the war front since July last. Along the lines occupied by the Russians, and far to the rear, in place of an army there were hundreds of thousands of uncontrolled soldiers in dilapidated uniforms, living on army stores where there were any, and plundering their fellow-countrymen where army supplies were lacking. To live without work was their only aim. They had no officers other than those chosen temporarily, according to the soldiers' caprices, from among their own ranks.

They did no drilling or any other form of work, but employed their hours of idleness frequently in selling army stores to whomsoever would buy, or peddling about the streets, at high prices, articles they bought by standing in queues with civilian purchasers awaiting their turn at shops. The mob of soldiers, intermingled with felons freed by the revolution from prisons, passed beyond the control of any government long before the present group of ultra-radicals seized their slight and precarious hold on the Russian capital cities. . . .

Regular work in factories ceased long ago. Some corporations were able to close their shops in an orderly manner, having already seen their fuel and materials exhausted, and most of their workmen wandering off into idleness. Others were forced by their employes to abandon control of their plants and leave them to the workers to run or ruin unhindered by any authority.

Mr. Bunnell says that the two great material wants of the Russians today are clothes and tools and he sees no hope of the people's getting them except from the Allies, but with Germany now invading the country the prospect of relief is darker than ever.

The evacuation of Petrograd has been steadily continued, the Government bureaus being removed to Moscow, Nizhninovgorod and Perm as fast as the condition of the railways would permit. The heavily-guarded trains had to force their way through soldiers returning from the front and refugees fleeing before the advancing Germans. All available rolling stock was used for the evacuation of Petrograd. The Putiloff munition works and the Shlusselburg powder factory which are near the capital and employ some 40,000 men, were moved to Omsk and Tobolsk. The western end of the Trans-Siberian Railroad was congested with trains loaded with machinery, guns, ammunition and automobiles, and Government employees, factory workers and thousands of German and Austrian prisoners were sent to Siberian cities to re-establish and work industrial plants. Vologda, a provincial city where the American Embassy is now located, has suddenly become a congested transfer-point with a large floating population. Military missions from many nations, hordes of disbanded soldiers, and innumerable refugees have gathered there and struggle for accommodations on trains that will carry them south.

Writing later in March, the New York Times correspondent in Russia summed up the present situation of the country thus:

Russia for the time being is passive. Her physical collapse is most amazingly complete. The only Government in the country is a peculiar tyranny whose hold is precarious, which has displayed no constructive ability whatever, and which has only succeeded in throwing into the melting pot all the political achievements and civilization of the Russian Empire. This Government promises new and higher forms of civilization. So far we see no signs of them. We see only the wreckage of old Russia. Agriculture, commerce and industry are paralyzed. The chief sources of material supplies are in alien hands.

The Soviet Government was secretly reported to be rapidly disbanding the old army, and ending its influence in public affairs. The Moscow Soviet has removed from its Executive Committee all soldier representatives and like action has been taken throughout Russia.

Early last week Lenine, Trotzky and others addressed meetings held in Moscow for the organization of defense. Trotzky said that the terms of the present peace left Russia under a continual threat from Germany, Japan and other imperialistic Powers, so the peace was not likely to last. The immediate task of the revolution, however, was to prepare for armed resistance against internal enemies. He then observed:

The New Army

General mobilization is impossible. Meanwhile we must limit ourselves to general obligatory instruction in the use of arms and the formation of volunteer detachments as skeleton for the new mass of the army. The officers and generals were a danger to us while they controlled the mechanism of the State. Now they are powerless to harm or undermine the Soviet.

Officers of the old army will be used as instructors of the new, but they ask for a free hand in the matter of discipline. The Soviet insists, however, that they be merely instructors. It is also proposed that the Commissariat Department and the military units should remain, as heretofore, in the hands of a committee. The Soviet hopes to have ready an army of 500,000 by fall, and to secure from America the necessary equipment. The Assistant Minister of War, in an address urging the creation of a regular army at once, declared: "Russians must take a rifle in one hand and a hammer in the other, submit to the most strict discipline, and work sixteen hours a day if they hope to combat the menace threatening them."

The purpose of this new army, according to Trotzky, is to fight East and West alike. "We cannot preserve the illusion," he said, "that European capital will patiently suffer the fact that in Russia the power is in the hands of the working class." And the Bolshevist paper, the Pravda, asserted:

Hitherto the revolution has profited by the war and now the war hopes to profit by the revolution. The endless world-war will rouse the millions of labor against the imperialist adventurers. Our task is to send to join them an army of the Soviet Republic, not to strengthen, as the imperialists calculate, this or that bourgeois front, but to turn the front of the world-war into a front of the workers and soldiers' revolution.

Trotzky has published an appeal calling on the people to co-operate in the organization of the army and he announces a coming decree of universal obligatory military training.

The Ape's New Father

JAMES J. WALSH, M.D., PH.D.

NOT long since the New York Times announced in a special cable from London that a well-known British scientist called for a reconsideration of he teaching of man's comparatively recent emergence rom the brute kingdom. He insisted that human beings vere highly developed ages before the period at which, ccording to the popular theory of recent science, man vas supposed to be a mere brute. A number of news- apers through the country have been agog with the idea ince. They are at last awaking to some of the conclu- ions that have been finding their way into science during he past ten years. The new theory, however, is not early so sensational as the evolutionary teaching that ad in the past helped to promote the cult of the animal an. Hence the announcement made by the London cientist will very probably receive but scant attention, hough a few newspapers may deem it worthy of some- hing more than passing notice.

Some years ago I called attention in AMERICA to the act that the last book on anthropology translated from he German into English before the war, insisted that man vas not descended from the monkey, because the monkey vas descended from man. This new theory, expressed y Von Buttel-Reepen in "Man and His Forerunners," vas a restatement of the doctrine advanced by the well- nown German anthropologist, Klaatsch. The same heory is formulated by Professor Wood Jones, professor f anatomy in the University of London, when he declares hat "The missing link of Huxley, if ever found, would ot be a more ape-like man, but a more human ape." There is just as much, or as little truth in the new theory s in the old. It is interesting, however, to note that the London professor emphasizes the fact that man in his resent condition is older than many of the missing links hat were supposed to represent his connection with the rute.

In a word, recent science teaches that all real traces of an, hitherto discovered, show him to have always been onstituted as at present. It maintains that there is no vidence of any human stage or pre-human status much earer to the brute.

I have likewise called attention in AMERICA to Pro- essor Arthur Keith's expressions in this regard: "As he result of the discoveries of the last ten years," he says n his book "The Antiquity of Man" published two ears ago, "it became impossible to believe that the Nean- erthal man represented a stage of evolution of modern an." "Further," he adds, "when we came to review ritically the facts relating to the earlier discoveries, made n England, France and Italy, we were compelled to admit that men of the modern type had been in existence long before the extinction of the Neanderthal type."

Professor Wood Jones calls emphatic attention to the discoveries of very early human remains in Australia which make it very clear that, though there were many very low races of human beings in that continent in later years, the earliest man was a clever hunter who had trained dogs and probably domesticated other animals and "who was a boat builder and a navigator and the reasoning master of his own fate." So far from being the mere toy of his environment, this man or his ancestors had evidently ventured out on the ocean, taking his family with him, and so came to Australia to avail himself of whatever opportunities might be afforded him there. Some of his descendants doubtless afterwards degenerated, for degeneration rather than progress has always been a process to be counted with in the story of humanity. Many scientists have seemingly forgotten this fact in their absorption in a presumed constant upward evolution. Not a few, however, agree with Professor Dwight when he insists, particularly in his last book, that many of the low orders of human beings furnish evidence of degeneration from a higher state.

A few days after the London announcement a professor at the University of Chicago at once fell in with the current phase of science by making the suggestion that we are not descended from apes, because we are all descended from lizards. There, that settles it! I remember once hearing a rather well-known professor of biology suggest that the reason why little boys liked to sit down and wiggle their toes in the mud along the beach is because this action represents an atavistic reversion to the time when they were crawling creatures and played in the mud.

All that is necessary for mankind at any time is to have a firm belief in anything and then trifles as light as air become proofs quite as strong as Scripture. Beliefs in various forms of the evolutionary theory have set people to myth-making just as heartily and as frequently as beliefs of other kinds set their less well-informed, but equally intelligent ancestors, to myth-making and fairy stories and all the rest. Distant analogy became the strictest evidence, and long-distance saltations from the vaguest premises became the logical conclusions of science, God save the mark! Why not let the little boy wiggle his toes just because he likes it without appealing to crawling ancestors? Why not let us try to ascertain facts before we jump to conclusions which scientists know are only theoretic, but which others proceed to adopt and use as the bases of their reasonings with regard to the practical issue of life? Considerably more than half of the theories that are ruining education and creating difficulties in sociology are founded on such uncertain scientific hypotheses.

When knowledge was very scanty and theory could be depended on to take its place it was easy to talk of missing links and of their discovery, actual or presumptive, and of prehuman stages of man. All the evidence that has been accumulating, however, points to the existence of human beings like ourselves long before these presumptive ancestors. The story of the cave man indeed shows us man as we first knew him in Europe, and that too in Southwestern Europe. He was then the contemporary of the reindeer in France as well as of the hairy mammoth, the cave bear and the saber-tooth tiger. As an artist, he was already producing art-work of high value. He had invented some kind of artificial light of excellent quality, without smoke, for there are no traces of smoke on the walls of his cave. These caves are long galleries like the caves of Kentucky, the Mammoth Cave and others. On their walls the very earliest man of whom we have any knowledge painted, in oil colors, such vivid pictures of animals, so true to life and in such characteristic attitudes, that it has been declared no living painter of animals in our time is quite his equal much less his superior. Before he became a farmer, before he was a tailor and fashioned garments other than the skins of the beasts he hunted, before he was a carpenter and protected himself more perfectly from the inclemencies of the weather, he was an artist and satisfied his sense of beauty. Only when he had acquired possessions do we find him pictured as lined up in ranks with bows and arrows, ready to fight in defense of his life, his family and his property.

The absence of the missing link from all geological records did not discourage scientists in their eagerness to jump to a definite conclusion and to make sensational announcements. The teaching that man was descended from the monkey served so many purposes that the assumption was gladly made. Materialism in science, determinism in psychology, lack of responsibility, and arguments for the meaninglessness of religion were all bolstered up by the assumption. Men wanted it very badly for other purposes, why then should it not be made?

And now after a generation of foolish toying with the notion, and deception of the public and of the rising generation, the fact is definitely proclaimed that not only is there no evidence for this theory, but that a great deal of evidence is accumulated against it. The evidence for it indeed was at all times so negligible in its significance that it was very clear that only for ulterior motives, only as a help to bolster up materialistic persuasions, could it ever have been accepted. It is a commonplace among scientists to declare that if a man has religious convictions they must affect his evolutionary ideas, and that therefore his opinions can have no weight in scientific circles. The plain fact, on the contrary, is that the man of no religion is more likely than any other to exaggerate the significance of scientific aspects of truth that seem to him to favor his own materialistic views. He is without the mental balance that religion gives, and is consequently to be far less trusted in his conclusions. How else did it come to pass that the theory of evolution was accepted on evidence so paltry as now to appear to us quite ridiculous? Was it not because many were anxious to believe that man was only a developed brute? We have heard much of religious prejudice, but very little of irreligious prejudice on the part of so-called scientists. Let us have the facts such as they are and leave the conclusions to be drawn when we know enough about the subjects we are investigating.

A Bolshevist Meeting in Chicago

JOHN WAGNER

THE meeting was held during the latter part of January at the time the enigmatical Bolsheviki held temporary sway as the theoretical exponents of an extreme Socialist economy, the feasible tenure of which is now totally discredited by a military autocracy that refuses to be cajoled by the whimsical Utopian fancies of Marx and certain disciples of Marx. The program was arranged by a committee and advertised among the precincts of its intellectual following. Lincoln Steffens had just returned from Russia and was to be the principal speaker, and quite naturally many Russians, probably the most radical of Chicago's foreign population, were found among a comfortably large audience.

My anticipations were fully realized when I was ushered into the theater by youths whose every feature stamped them as foreign-born or of recent foreign descent. Their speech too carried the alien accent. But with all it was somewhat American and I mused that our miraculous melting-pot was already exerting its leavening influences, and for this I was thankful. Presently, dainty damosels escorted me further to strategic seats. These young ladies were not foreigners, but most probably college students bent upon doing something in the vay of social uplift, and engaged, incidentally, in that nodern intellectual process of thinking forty-four-caliber houghts with twenty-two-caliber brains.

A casual survey revealed that many women were mong the audience. No doubt, whatever, existed about he composition of the assemblage. It was foreign, and he novel, alien atmosphere was further accentuated by he fact that nowhere was the American flag in evi-ence. Perhaps, I thought, the committee would redeem ts negligence by opening the program with the "Star Spangled Banner" sung ensemble. But my ardor for ountry withstood another shock!

Brushing aside these preliminary reflections, I re-iewed a copy of "Comparative Peace Terms" pur-hased at the door. It was a well-organized tabular state-nent of various war-aims. President Wilson's fourteen oints were effectively contrasted with the pronounce-nents of Lloyd George, the Russian Soviet, the Russian rmistice requirements, and those of Foreign Minister Czernin. We are justly proud of the tenor of our Presi-ent's address, but I was distinctly disappointed that he vho originally enunciated the keystone principles under-ying alike the worthy peace aspirations of America, the Allies, British Labor and the Bolsheviki, was not ac-orded a place in "Comparative Peace Terms." Has the vorld forgotten the Papal peace message of August 1, 917?

While thus occupied, the chairman introduced a noted ocial worker of Chicago as the first speaker. Apart rom his remarks on the "cold realism" of the Russian eople in "dealing with human equations" I consid-red the address stale and commonplace. But to pass on o Mr. Steffens. In beginning he corroborated the "real-sm" of the Russian people, their distaste for abstrac-ons, their devotion to the active solution of the practical roblem at hand, the consummation of a peace and the ull participation of the non-bourgeois peasants and vorkers of Russia in the fruits of the revolution. Ker-nsky's downfall was ascribed to his failure properly to epresent the "gentle mobs," which demanded a peace, nd as it seems, at any price. Trotzky and Lenine will lso have to go if their leadership fails to represent their onstituency. Lenine, in an article accredited to him nd appearing in this country, professes that the Bol-heviki may yet have to assert "power and authority" ver the Russian people. There is no doubt that the eader of the Russian people in bringing the various dis-runtled factions together into a regime where they will e masters of their own lives, must eventually employ uch prerogatives irrespective of their discord with Bol-hevist ideas of freedom of speech and action. Indeed, he German army is today asserting its autocratic domi-ance over disintegrated Russia which foolishly persists n its civil seances while refusing to fight the common oe. Meantime, the political complexion of European ussia points to a Russia split up into the independent epublics of the Ukraine, Finland, West Russia, Poland, Caucasia, Kazan-Astrakhan, and Northern Russia, all probably more or less under German dominion unless the true exponents of democracy and not the mere lip-wor-shipping Bolsheviki are able to bring the war to a suc-cessful issue.

But returning to vaunted free speech. Trotzky a year ago quailed under the restrictions placed upon radicals in this country. Propagandists should be accorded full license of speech according to this American Bolshevist. How serene in theory yet how different is the "realism" Steffens described! In his own words, the Constituent Assembly was dissolved. To prohibit this body from representing the Russian people because it gave little promise of instituting the nefarious schemes of the minority Bolsheviki, is rather poor logic. But Steffens dismissed the contradictory procedure with a clever statement that the Constituent Assembly did not rep-resent the wishes of the Russian people!

The audience was apprised that the Brest-Litovsk peace negotiations were pure camouflage and that Trotzky was playing for a revolution among the prole-tariat of the Central Powers. As events have transpired the Bolsheviki seem to have been camouflaged. Osten-sibly working for an early peace, the Maximalists wrecked the effective prosecution of the war through the elimination of Russia as an opponent of autocracy, and that, too, against the sincere efforts of the Minimalist element under Kerensky to maintain a combatant Russia. The sum-total of this stage of the revolution thus seems to be: Postponement of an Allied victory from 1917 until 1918 or later, the German dominance of Russia, and the beneficial result of the restatement of Allied war aims under pressure of the British Labor party. Had Russian participation under Kerensky on the east-ern front been unhampered by the revolutionary opposi-tion of the Bolsheviki, it is conceded that Allied pre-ponderance of men, artillery and aeroplanes would have brought victory in 1917 on the western front, and peace.

Furthermore Steffens' remarks respecting our democ-racy were rather disparaging, the sentiment being un-deniably reflected in the approving applause from the audience. This is unfortunate and meetings which are the occasions of such misplaced sentiment are more unfortunate. The people of America possess political democracy, and economic democracy to some degree; more so indeed than any other people in the world. To frown upon our present institutions while approv-ingly magnifying by indirection the untried formulæ of Russian radicals is rather an evidence of smoldering, disloyal and revolutionary tendencies which ascribe pres-ent unsatisfactory economic relations to wealth and the possessors of wealth alone. The extermination of wealth and the wealthy would not consummate the millenium.

One more point respecting Bolshevist philosophy. Marx with Bebel babbled internationalism. Lenine and Trotzky imbibed freely of their sophistry, which is work-able in academic discussion but incapable of practical application. Confirmed internationalists propose nationalism through the extension of plebiscite and self-determination. At least, Trotzky must be credited with this sensible version of human relations.

Finally, Steffens professed that Bolshevism was less interested in political democracy than in industrial and economic democracy. This distinction has often been sensed in labor and minimum-wage discussions and it is now apparent that the world was asleep when that astute economic scholar, Pope Leo XIII, wrote the "Encyclical on Labor" about a quarter of a century ago. It seems only remotely probable that the Bolsheviki are leading a purely economic revolution. The industrial group is by far in the minority in Russia and therefore not powerful enough to constitute an ultimate social revolution. The Russian peasants are but little interested in the eight-hour day for the working classes and still less in the socialization of the means of production. On the contrary, they hitherto have been regarded as small bourgeoisie by the Marxian Socialists. The peasants are still primarily concerned with increases in their limited holdings, i.e., in the further extension of private property, and will never support the extreme program of the Bolsheviki, who, even though turning political opportunists and crying "all land to the peasants," are spuriously enlisting the sympathies of the small bourgeoisie. The disillusionment of the latter is only a matter of time as private landed property is not an economic tenet of Socialism. Resolutions expressing approval and offering moral encouragement to Lenine and Trotzky were then adopted by the meeting. Our Government therein was petitioned to extend its diplomatic recognition to the Bolsheviki as the properly constituted Government in Russia, and release supply ships bound for Russian destinations.

Let it be observed in conclusion that doctrinaire maximalism is guilty of the futile and innocuous peace negotiations of the kaleidoscopic Lenine and Trotzy with a too-prosaic war government. Posing as the representatives of the Russian people, these reformers were so busy "driving a wedge between the German people and their Government" and so fascinatingly enveloped in their dream of staging a revolution among the proletariat of the Central Powers, that the stolid German commissioners at Brest-Litovsk inveigled them in the octopus of their militarism.

True, the Bolsheviki had negotiated. Their amateur Marxian wits apparently spun webs about the German emissaries. But the latter lightly brushed the webs aside, dictated a peace of German making and have since imposed its acceptance by force of arms. In the words of a western daily, not a confirmed conservative by any means:

> The last and most shameful surrender is apparently about to be consummated. To civil war avowedly started for the purposes of overwhelming all who objected to the extreme ideas of the Socialist extremists is now added a complete surrender to the foreign foe. None of the ideas so loudly put forward at Brest-Litovsk will be accepted by the conqueror. Russia accepts German dictation to the last point according to the statement signed by Trotzky and Lenine.

President Wilson has sent a consoling message to the Russian people extending the same sympathy America already tenders Belgium, Northern France, Roumania and Serbia, now under the heel of Germany. Some day, it is hoped, Russia will awaken from the horrible nightmare into which Russian dreamers and abetting German agents have plunged her.

Thus the real democracies of the world are obliged to pay the penalty of the Bolshevist faux pas. Americans are far more practical in the solution of peace and world democracy than the Russian experimentalists. We at least realize that social and economic evolution, much less peace, is not to be gained through revolution. Indeed, we desire peace and in this limited sense are pacifists, but unlike the "gentle mobs" of Russia, we and the Allies recognize that peace maneuvers are not spread in idealistic quotations over the pages of a "Das Kapital."

The Irish Death-Rate in America

AUSTIN O'MALLEY, M.D.

THERE is a remarkable difference both in resistance to disease and alcoholism, and in the tendency to suicide and insanity among the people of the various nationalities in the United States, if we accept the statistics of New York City as a standard of comparison, and I can find no reason for not applying the statistics collected by Guilfoy and Kirby in New York to any populous region of the northern United States.

The population of the Borough of Manhattan in 1915 was 2,089,771. Of these people 938,991 were born in the United States; 282,681 were Russians, mostly Jews; 196,888, Italians; 193,452, Austro-Hungarians, largely Jews; 150,624, Irish; 117,601, Germans; and 36,540, English. There were more Irish born in the borough than Germans, but the Irish and Germans instead of being the most numerous among the nations represented, as they once were, are now in the fifth and sixth places.

In the aforesaid year there were 26,181 deaths. Of these 10,827 were among the native-born. The Irish came next in absolute numbers, 4,220 deaths, but they had the highest general death-rate per 1,000 inhabitants in both the male and female lists. The Irish rates per 1,000 were, male, 19.04, female, 14.22; American males, 17.40, females, 12.46; English, 14.32, 10.24; the general population, 14.17, 10.84; German, 12.31, 8.11; Austro-Hungarian, 10.74, 8.50; Italian, 10.24, 9.57; and Russian, 9.51, 7.93. There were nearly twice as many Russian as Irish inhabitants, but there were three times as many deaths absolutely among the Irish as among the Russians. The total death-rate for all males was 1,091, but this is exceeded by the Irish, 1,750, and the American, 1,510. The Russian males are down to 839. The rate among all females is 748, but this is exceeded by the Irish, 1,012, the Americans, 994, and the English, 850. The German females have the lowest rate, 450.

In the group of degenerative diseases, that is, cerebral apoplexy, organic heart diseases, chronic kidney diseases, and arteriosclerosis, the Irish death-rate again is higher than that of any other nationality. Irish, males, 5.03, females, 5.13; American, 4.81, 4.23; English, 4.43, 3.32; the general population, 3.97, 3.73; Austro-Hungarian, 3.40, 3.04; Russian, 3.01, 3.12; German, 2.79, 2.96; Italian, 2.74, 2.96.

In tuberculosis the Irish women have the highest death-rate and the Russians the lowest, but the Irish men are in the second place. The death-rates in tuberculosis for males are: American, 5.11; Irish, 4.94; the general population, 2.98; English, German, and Austro-Hungarian, 2.05; Italian, 1.66; Russian, 1.41. The rates for females are: Irish, 2.04; American, 1.69; the general population, 1.35; Italian, 1.15; English, 1.12; Austro-Hungarian, 0.96; German, 0.93; Russian, 0.55. The total death-rate for tuberculosis among Irish males is 620, or more than four times the rate among the Italians, almost four times that of the Russians, and three times that of the English and Germans. In Philadelphia at the Phipps Institute for Tuberculosis the Irish are at the top of the death-rate of white men, although the hospital is in the Jewish quarter of the city.

The death-rate per 1,000 for the acute respiratory diseases, like the pneumonias, are led again by the Irish. Males: Irish, 2.42; Americans, 2.04; English, 1.80; the general population, 1.65; Italians, 1.63; Germans, 1.20; Russians, 1.02; Austro-Hungarians, 0.99. Females: Irish, 1.93; Italians, 1.62; English, 1.54; Americans, 1.49; the general population, 1.28; Russians, 0.75; Austro-Hungarians and Germans, 0.72.

The death-rate from alcoholism begins with the Irish. Males: Irish, 2.90; the general population, 2.01; Americans, 0.29; Austro-Hungarians, 0.28; Germans, 0.27; Italians and Russians, 0.03. Females: the general population, 1.38; Irish, Germans, Americans, and Austro-Hungarians, 0.08; English, 0.07; Italians and Russians, 0. The Irish are almost as startlingly in the lead for suicide from alcohol as the Germans are for suicide from other causes. Cirrhosis of the liver is nearly always caused by alcoholism. The rates for males are: Irish, 0.21; English, Italians, the general population, Austro-Hungarians, 0.19; Germans and Americans, 0.18. Females: English, 0.15; all others, 0.13.

The statistics given so far are from a pamphlet by Dr. William H. Guilfoy of the New York City Department of Health, "The Influence of Nationality upon the Mortality of a Community." Kirby (Journal of the American Medical Association, July 1, 1911) reported a study of 1,762 cases of alcoholic insanity in the Manhattan State Hospital. The numbers of the cases of insanity in general among the nationalities considered, including men and women, were: Jews, 455; Irish, 336; Americans, 222; Germans, 193; Italians, 123; Negroes, 90. The percentages of alcoholic insanity among these cases were: Irish, 20; Germans, 9; Americans, 5; Italians, 5; Negroes, 4; Jews, 0.6. That is, the percentage of alcoholic insanity among the Irish was more than twice that of the Germans, four times that of the Americans and Italians, five times that of the Negroes, and over twenty times that of the Jews. The percentage of alcoholic insanity for the males was, of course, worse: Irish, 30; Germans, 12; for the Irish women, 15, or three above the German men; for the German women, 3. Curiously, the same ratios hold for a group of 2,127 insane patients whose parents were Irish, German, Italian, Jewish or Negro. The Germans were in the second place, and although there were since 1820 22.71 per cent more Germans than Irish immigrants in the United States the Irish men exceeded the German in alcoholic insanity two and a half times, and the Irish women exceeded the German women five times.

The death-rates from cancer were in the males: Austro-Hungarians, 1.09; English, 1.08; Americans, 1.04; Irish, 1.00; the general population, 0.97; Russians, 0.96; Germans, 0.83; Italians, 0.68. In the women: Americans, 1.35; Irish, 1.32; the general population, 1.15; Austro-Hungarians, 1.14; English, 1.12; Germans, 1.04; Russians, 1.00; Italians, 0.79. So far cancer is the only pathological condition in which the Irish have not the worst death-rate, but even here the Irish women are in the second place. In diabetes the Irish are well down on the list. Males: Irish and English, 0.17; all others, 0.18. Women: Americans, 0.26; all others, 0.25.

As to suicides, the Germans have an enormous rate in comparison with the other nationalities. German males, 3.70; the general population, Russians, and Irish, 0.37; Americans, English and Italians, 0.36. The German women, 1.10; the Italians, 0.05; all the others, 0.11. The Germans are ten times more likely to commit suicide than any race that comes here.

The Irish, then, in America have by long odds the poorest resistance to diseases of all the leading nationalities that come to this country; the Italians and Jews the best. This is another confirmation of the contention I have been making for twenty years that northern Europeans do not thrive in our climate, and the Irish least of all. In a study of fifty families of the best class of immigrants that came here from Ireland after the famine of 1847 I found a retrogression of more than 86 per cent as early as the second American generation. The natural law governing the migration of northern races suddenly to the south for 700 miles or more is that they disappear in from 60 to 200 years—the Celts in Greece, the Goths in Italy and Spain, the Vandals in Africa, and so on. A man coming from the north of Ireland to Philadelphia to live moves south 1,000 miles; a Norwegian going to Texas moves south over 2,000 miles.

The people that will survive here are the Italians and other southern races. The northern nationalities must disappear as soon as the immigration ceases, as they have always disappeared under similar conditions. The reason for the decadence is chiefly the climate as I showed in the Dublin quarterly review Studies (December, 1916), and in my book, "The Cure of Alcoholism."

The strange fact that the Irish are over twice as prone to alcoholic insanity as any other nationality which comes here is not so readily explained. There are several reasons, but the chief seems to be that from about 1585 to 1651 Ireland was constantly harried by savage guerilla warfare, famine, and religious persecution. Then the period of the penal laws followed to crush further the spirit of the people. After nearly a century and a half of these evils, which were worse than the present treatment of the Armenians by the Turks because the Irish were more susceptible to suffering, the entire Irish nation was necessarily neurotic. Next Parliament permitted anyone in Ireland to make whisky in private stills, and the free use of alcoholic drink was prevalent for generations. As late as 1870 even in this country every social call in the homes of the Irish was an occasion for the making of punch. If a people rendered neurotic by perpetual war, famine, and religious persecution is actually encouraged to drink distilled alcohol without stint, and that for generations, it is evident the descendants of these people will be predisposed to the alcoholic psychoses. That seems to be the reason why of every hundred crazed Irishmen one-third have an alcoholic insanity. That is also the reason why Father Matthew was one of the most important Irishmen that ever lived. He was the real Liberator, but there is considerable liberating yet to be done.

A Four-Million-Dollar Campaign

J. C. WALSH

WHEN, several months ago, the necessity was seen for the expenditure of millions to follow Catholic soldiers and sailors to camp and field, those who were studying the subject discussed the possibility of raising some $7,000,000 in the whole country. On the basis of population this would have meant about $600,000 to be raised in the New York archdiocese. A distinguished vicar general, who had made the calculation, remarked: "It looks like a lot of money, and many will tell us we can't raise it, but we can." Since that time, collections actually made in other places have made the early calculations look very timid. When, therefore, the time came for New York to move, it was thought to be not overbold, and yet bold enough, too, to try for $2,500,000. When the results were posted on the last day of the active campaign over $4,000,000 had been paid or pledged. With what is still to come it is now morally certain that the New York archdiocese will have a sum seven times as large as that which the optimistic vicar general was ready to pledge only a few months ago.

What a few then foresaw everybody now sees is easy enough to account for. Only the thousandth man has the gift of imagination, but the other 999 can be influenced by what is before their eyes. The Knights of Columbus had to raise their first $1,000,000 on the strength of blue-print plans of buildings; before the New York collection the buildings were up in all the camps and the boys were writing home about them. One of the first pressing needs for money came when Mgr. Lavelle arranged to send seven volunteer chaplains to France to help out the solitary Catholic chaplain who was there with 20,000 Catholic soldiers. While the New York campaign was on, one of these priests, Father Boucher, was decorated for valor on the field and his picture was in all the papers.

All this helps to account for the splendid response that was made to Cardinal Farley's appeal. The people in the parishes were ready for it, and came forward in a way that must have given occasion for very great satisfaction on the part of the pastors. The parishes were asked to raise in a week sums equal, in many cases, to their total annual revenues, and they did it. There were mistakes made in levying the quotas, as was inevitable for lack of definite information about relative financial ability. The errors were adjusted in a simple but none the less noteworthy way. The parishes which were assessed too high nevertheless reached their assessments. The parishes which were assessed too low calmly proceeded to double, treble or quadruple the amount.

Such a proceeding is easy to state, but to produce it there must be powerful pressure from within. The pressure was there. Every church had its enlistment roll. Every parish was ready to follow its men with anxious solicitude for their welfare, with gratitude for their sacrifice, and with affectionate concern for their spiritual welfare. Of all this the outpouring of money was the sign and the measure. The parishes contributed more than the Cardinal asked of them, and the great sums raised by special committees in the financial district, while counted upon originally as a margin of safety, came finally to be registered as surplus.

It would be a mistake to assume, however, that spontaneous giving requires no direction. The organization effected in New York to bring into expression the feeling that was in all hearts was more extensive and more closely directed than any organization possible in a political campaign. The parishes were uniformly organized. So many families, so many teams of ten workers to make sure none would be missed; for each team a captain; for each set of parish captains a chairman; for very so many parishes a district leader; for so many district leaders a zone director; and at the head of all his, planning, guiding, stimulating, and supporting, a entral organization. Into this army, for the numbers enaged did reach to army proportions, and the uniformity nd discipline exacted did approach army standards, lergy and laity took their places and held them. I suppose there are thirty of the younger clergy whose services would be snapped up at once if tomorrow they were ree to engage professionally in one or other of the great national enterprises whose success depends on organization.

The work revealed some curious emotional reactions. For example, what was everybody's business was, for once, everybody's business. The fact that a high mark had been set was taken as a sufficient reason why it must be overshot. The man who would give $100 when it seemed as though a few people would be required to furnish most of the quota, would raise it to $200 when he found everybody giving and that the quota would be doubled; the youth who offered $5.00 when the prosperous pew-holder gave $100, would pledge twenty when he saw wealth doing its share. The masses were gratified when they learned that some of the wealthy men had contributed in five figures; and in the end, when they saw the parishes doing so splendidly, those who could give great sums gave them. There seems to be magic about when everybody is doing the same thing at the same time.

This is not the place to specify the part borne by individual Catholics in a work in which all did well according to the measure of their ability. But a word of appreciation ought to be written in respect to two non-Catholics. Mr. Harvey J. Hill, who gave the organization its expert direction, did so in a spirit for which hundreds of the Catholic clergy and other hundreds of the laity will always hold him in affectionate regard. And Mr. William Fox, who organized the participation of the Jews, working voluntarily and unremittingly, labored so effectively that it would be indeed a pity if he were not always able to feel that he was right when he said, at the closing meeting of the Down-Town Committee, that he "had done a good work for his own people" in doing what he did for the Catholic War Fund.

Sinn Fein and France

JEAN MALYE

IN the first half of the nineteenth century the debris of time had covered many of the ancient landmarks of the Holy City, and verbal tradition had acquired the unreliability with which long ages often endow it. So after a short stay in Jerusalem it was possible for Chinese Gordon—he who later added imperishable glory to England as the hero of Khartoum—to propose with some semblance of reason a reversal of many of the current beliefs concerning the identity of various holy places. Yet the doubt about landmarks, and even the complete disappearance of important sites, did not detract from the essential sanctity of the Holy City: Jerusalem still remained the city beloved of God, the cradle of our creed, the stronghold of our Faith. In like manner, time had changed the outward aspect of France. The growth of materialism, which like a fungus spreads over our modern industrial civilization, had covered the essential Catholicism of France: and Latin and other cultures with which as a continental nation we come in contact, had formed a veneer over the Celticism that is the essential racial attribute of France. Excavators in Jerusalem uncovered the old-time landmarks and verified the accuracy of our Biblical statements. Similarly, the upheaval of war once more brought to light in France the spirit which made men proudly point to her as the fille aînée et aimée de l'Eglise, and revealed to a marveling world the courage, the chivalry, and the genius for self-sacrifice that is France, a chaplet of virtues distinctive of our Celtic origin.

This revelation of our Celtic nature did not astonish me. I have always believed that France is a Celtic nation. Before war broke out I had only one aim in life, the revival of the dormant Celtic national spirit of France. To fit myself for the achievement of this purpose it was necessary that I should study Celticism in a country which had not been contaminated by the alien cultures that had affected France. I therefore went to the land where Celticism has shown its greatest vitality, and where the Celtic genius reigns in its purest form. I went to Ireland and spent there a most happy and profitable year, studying the Gaelic language, learning Irish history, and gaining insight into the national traits of the Irish people.

I was delighted to find in Ireland many souvenirs of the close friendship which for centuries has linked the Irish and the French. As a Frenchman I had been taught gratefully to remember the debt that the arms of France owe to the valor of the Irish; the memory of Fontenoy and of the Irish Brigade is enshrined in the heart of every Frenchman. Similar memories are cherished today in Irish hearts. I chanced to spend a few weeks in an Irish-speaking district of Connemara. The peasantry there told me that I was the first Frenchman who had been in these parts since the days of the '98 Rebellion. Old white-haired peasants, who had heard of these days at their mothers' knee, streamed out to welcome me with a cead mille failte, and escorted me amidst a forest of waving hats to a spot where a fine, tall, young fellow stood, singing in Gaelic, "The French are Coming on the Sea" for the sake of the Shan Van Vocht.

These friendly relations between France and Ireland long antedate the Rebellion of 1798. It is from France that St. Patrick went to Ireland and it is from the land of the saints and the poets that St. Colum came to France. For centuries Irish missionaries, poets and teachers gave freely to France the benefits of their unrivaled culture, and traces of their famous schools still remain to remind France of these bygone days of Irish greatness.

In Ireland I soon became absorbed in the Irish national movement, especially in the unprecedented language and literary revival that was rapidly placing Ireland among the most notable of the cultured nations of the earth. I learned to know the Irish writers, poets and thinkers—men like Yeats, Douglas Hyde, A. E., Padraic Colum, P. H. Pearse, men of whom any nation would be justly proud. I worked with them, I played with them, I shared their hopes, and I felt their sorrows.

They welcomed me to the Sinn Fein movement because I was a Frenchman, and because to their clear vision I was a unit of a nation that held ideals of nationalism identical with their own. They were making a supreme and a successful effort to change by their mystic power the poor old jaded woman into the young and beautiful Kathleen ni Hoolihan. They fought against the emigration that was draining them of their life blood; against tuberculosis which was the consequence of their economic degradation; and against the drunkenness in which the weak of heart sought to forget their state. They supported Irish industries; and they encouraged cooperation among the peasantry. In other words, they strove to make Ireland young, healthy, prosperous and free. Where is the true Frenchman who would not honor these patriots, who would not applaud such a national effort?

The Sinn Feiners were not pro-German, otherwise as a Frenchman I could not have found myself in harmony with them. On the contrary, as I have already mentioned, wherever I went in Ireland I found that my French nationality was a passport to their favor. And the Sinn Feiners were always eager to know France better and to be better known in France.

Returning to France I worked to make the Irish revival known in France; I founded a small newspaper devoted to the interests of Celticism; I established the Gaelic League of France; and I planned for young French students to go to Ireland; and for Irish Gaels to come to France.

Then war broke out; and from the first day of the mobilization I have had perforce no other interest than to aid in the defeat of Germany. I therefore lost touch with Ireland. But in the trenches I found the school of Celticism. There we daily learn that the racial attributes of the German are alien, and destructive, to the racial attributes of the Celt: and our gallant soldiers constantly reveal by their deeds that the Celticism of their ancestors is the fundamental force in their souls. They are indeed the inheritors of the chivalry of the knights of old, the knights of the Holy Grail, the knights of the Fiana of Erin. They fight not for themselves, not even for their own, but for France and for liberty, that plain peoples everywhere may live and be free.

This then is our compelling reason. I conceive it to be also the essential purpose of the Sinn Feiners whom I have been privileged to know. At the end of the war, should I survive, I feel that as a Frenchman I can then best serve my country by returning to Ireland and by laboring there to strengthen the friendship that does exist, that has always existed, and that, happily, ever shall exist between the Irish and the French. That friendship contains much that is of good augury for the future of Ireland, and for the future of France. The nationalism which the Sinn Feiners were preaching in Ireland when I was among them is the nationalism that France is now fighting to defend. I therefore consider that every true Celt is an enemy of Germany; and hence that every Sinn Feiner who is true to his essential principles is necessarily a friend of France in her present struggle.

Mother Seton's Baptism

To the Editor of AMERICA:

With the title "Incidents and Anniversaries," the Rev. T. J. Brennan, S. T. L., is contributing to your contemporary, the Ave Maria, a very interesting and valuable "Dictionary of Dates" for Catholics. In the issue for March 9, and under the date March 14, Father Brennan notes: "This date recalls the conversion of Mrs. Eliza Ann Seton. Her Baptism took place in St. Peter's Church, New York City, the Rev. Matthew O'Brien performing the ceremony."

Mother Seton's spiritual daughters have just completed a century of their work for education and the Faith in New York, and I am aiding them in compiling the record they have made during that period, which, it is hoped, we will have ready for publication before the summer comes. Father Brennan's paragraph touches on two obscure points which happily he may be able to clear up.

The standard life of Mother Seton is that by the Rev. Dr. Charles I. White, and I am quoting from the third edition (1879) in which the Emmitsburg authorities add an appendix to the original volume (1853), bringing the contents and history of the Sisters of Charity down to date. On page 152 of this history we read:

> Under these conditions, Mrs. Seton applied without delay to be admitted into the "one Fold under one Shepherd." For this purpose, on March 14, Ash-Wednesday, she went to St. Peter's Church in a spirit of entire consecration of herself to God.

Then, quoting Mother Seton, herself, Dr. White says:

> If I could have thought of anything but God there was enough, I suppose, to have astonished a stranger by the hurrying over of the congregation; but as I came only to visit His Majesty, I knew not what it meant till afterward—that it was a day they received ashes, the beginning of Lent.

Continuing his history Dr. White records:

> After the service Mrs. Seton made a formal abjuration of Protestantism and profession of the Catholic faith at the hands of Rev. Matthew O'Brien, and in presence of Mr. Anthony Filicchi, her devoted friend.

To this is appended the following footnote (p. 153):

> In memory of this joyful occasion Mrs. Seton gave to Mr. Filicchi, who had been so instrumental in her conversion, a copy of the "Following of Christ," with this inscription: "Antonio Filicchi, from his dear sister and friend Eliza A. Seton, to commemorate the happy day he presented her to the Church of God, the 14th March, 1805."

It will be observed that this says Mrs. Seton, "made a formal abjuration of Protestantism and profession of the Catholic faith," but nothing about Baptism. With the present rector of St. Peter's, the Rt. Rev. Mgr. McGean, I have gone over the carefully preserved register of New York's first church, and we have been unable to find any record of Mrs. Seton's Baptism, conditional or otherwise, on March 14, or on any other date. Of course it is not to be thought for a moment that Father O'Brien did not comply with all the regulations required by the Church in this instance, but such is the record. Neither has Mgr. McGean been able so far to find a baptismal entry in the Trinity church (Episcopalian) register.

Another curious incident: Dr. White quotes Mrs. Seton twice in recording this event as happening on Ash Wednesday, March 14, 1805. A reference to the calendar will show that Ash Wednesday, 1805, fell on March 13! Whether Mrs. Seton made this slip in dates herself, or whether it was made in Dr. White's manuscript and was not caught before his book was printed in 1853, there is no way of finding out now. But there it is, and everybody who has written about Mrs. Seton's conversion since has been repeating the error. If Father Brennan can now solve these difficulties he will be doing a special service for our local history, and incidentally a not unimportant bit of work for those engaged in promoting the process for Mother Seton's beatification.

Human Respect

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I am a Catholic priest. On my way to the post office in my home town on Sunday last I met three gentlemen walking towards me on the opposite side of the street. There were two non-Catholics and one Catholic. I determined to use the occasion to make an observation on human nature and to test the power of human respect in the shaping of a man's conduct. The result was more than a surprise; it was a thorough shock to me. The two Protestant gentlemen very politely saluted me by raising their hats, while the Catholic did not even turn his eyes nor give any sign of recognition, though he could not but have been aware of the approach of his priest. And this man is also a Knight of Columbus.

Beating the Air?

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In AMERICA for March 9, C. P. gives another exhibition of shadow-boxing in dealing with the young men's problem. He chides the cure-the-root-of-the-evil Catholics and suspects that such fossils must dwell in a desert. The writer is a cure-the-root-of-the-evil Catholic and hopes to remain one. He can even recommend the desert as a resort for any person who wishes to obtain a wide and clear view. History tells us of some famous persons who were fond of retiring into the desert. C. P. then enumerates the evils of two continents and declares that "the man is yet to be born who is to point out the cause of all this evil." The little catechism points out the cause of all evil. Here we are discussing but a single phase of the social evil.

Our question still reads: Is the Catholic Y. M. C. A. a cure for the young men's problem? C. P. answers that half a loaf is better than no bread. We admit that an end even partly attained is better than the end never attempted. But here there is no question of the end. We all want to attain the end either in whole or in part. Our question concerns the means to the end, the means C. P. proposes, a Catholic Y. M. C. A.

It has become quite the fashion to catch at a name, some beautifully sounding thing, without stopping to examine how empty the thing is. Now such the writer suspects is our Catholic Y. M. C. A. A house built upon the sands, grand to look upon, apparently safe under some favorable conditions; but when the rain falls, and the floods come, and the winds blow, and beat upon that house, it falls and becomes a death-trap. In principle, like the elective system in education, it is another form of the fad of following the lines of least resistance. We would coax the boy away from sin and its occasions with the bait of wholesome amusement. But the moment we step off the rock of duty, discipline, and authority and suggest the motive of pleasure and amusement we are building on the quick-sands of certain failure. The spirit of God cannot compete with the spirit of the world in the amusement business. You might erect a magnificent building, equip it with the finest apparatus, put it under able supervision, and fill it for a while with young men. But when the novelty wears off, the apparatus is destroyed, the building defaced, you will look for your young men and you will find them in the public theaters, dance-halls, skating-rinks, pool-rooms, and saloons, where they can give unlicensed rein to their undisciplined appetite for pleasure.

C. P. would "weed out the undesirables" from his model Catholic Y. M. C. A. These are the very ones that should not be weeded out. The good boy does not need the Catholic club. His Catholic home is his Catholic club. But here lies the thorn. The "undesirables" are not wanted or will not come. The "desirables" under pretext of the Catholic club are led away from the home, taught the club-habit, and in the end are lost to both the Catholic club and the Catholic home. If half of this be true our grand Catholic Y. M. C. A. sizes up as a gigantic failure.

Prohibition and the Mass

To the Editor of AMERICA:

If we must have prohibition, let us have the right brand thereof, the "bone-dry" kind. A so-called prohibition which allows the manufacture, sale and importation of alcoholic liquors for sacramental purposes, and for other purposes, is not prohibition but regulation. The prohibition law of West Virginia allows the importation of "a quart a month." The legislators who enacted this law, did not want to be "bone-dry." They reserved to themselves and the people of our State the right to get beastly drunk at least twice every month. A quart of the "demon rum" is supposed to bring about this "glorious" effect. Yet West Virginia is generally counted as one of the "bone-dry States!

If prohibition is right in principle, prohibition laws should contain no exceptions. If wine is the root of all evils, "a concoction of the devil," "liquid damnation" and "hell in solution," it ought to be banished from the church first. Some say that the wine, employed in the celebration of the Mass, is not used as a "beverage" and that, therefore, the ratification of national prohibition will not interfere with the celebration of the Mass. They launched this assertion for the manifest purpose of catching fools among the Catholics. They will be the first ones to expose the sophistry and falsehood of their assertion. Christ, giving His disciples the Chalice, said: "Drink ye all of this." Altar wine is not used for anointing, nor for any other external application.

The resolution for national prohibition contains no exception in favor of the manufacture, sale and importation of wine "for sacramental purposes." If this resolution is ratified by thirty-six States within seven years, it becomes the common law of the country. No State legislature will have the right to enact prohibition laws allowing the manufacture, sale and importation of altar wine. For such laws would be in conflict with the common law of the country. A number of Catholics have openly advocated, and are still advocating, absolute prohibition. Let them stand for the consequences! It is stupid to blame the Catholics of Oklahoma for their difficult condition in regard to procuring altar wine. If they voted for prohibition, they simply followed the advice of many priests and of some Bishops.

Why does not Rome come out and tell us plainly what stand we must take concerning prohibition? Evidently because Rome supposes that we know what that stand is. The Encratites, the Aquarii, and other Manichaean sects, taught the identical prohibition which our "dry" spouters are teaching now. The Catholic Church condemned their doctrine as a heresy. But what do our "dry" agitators care for the decisions and laws of the Catholic Church? Not a straw.

The American Issue, the principal organ of the Anti-Saloon League, for March 2, contains a vicious attack on our beloved and generally venerated Cardinal Gibbons. The attack is written by John F. Cunneen, of Chicago. Mr. Cunneen stigmatizes Cardinal Gibbons as a man "too old to talk with authority on the question of prohibition," and as a prelate "with a woful minority among the clergy of the Catholic Church." He thus winds up: "The people [the prohibitionists are, of course, the people] will not stand with his Eminence when it means standing with the liquor traffic." "The people" must stand with Mr. Cunneen, not with Cardinal Gibbons, if they want to be saved! Church history and the teachings of the Catholic Church concerning alcoholic liquors are unknown quantities to Mr. Cunneen and to most of the "dry" agitators. These fanatics strive to substitute the policeman's club for the Cross. They want to place on our shoulders the Turkish yoke of prohibition, instead of the sweet yoke of Christ who made wine for others to drink.

Mannington, W. Va. C. J. KLUSER.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I have Methodist relatives whose religion is made up of prohibition, anti-cards and anti-tobacco tenets, and who refuse to allow a Greek to sell ice-cream on Sunday. I am just as earnest a friend of temperance as any of that brazen, vociferous crowd, and I tell them so. One of them asked me why the Church could not use grape-juice in the celebration of the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass. I answered: "(1) Because the Catholic Church does not wish to do so, and this reason is quite sufficient, if my rights are as sacred as yours. I do not dictate what you shall or shall not do in your religious services. (2) Because Our Blessed Lord did not use grape-juice. He used wine, wine that would intoxicate if used to excess. The word used in the Greek original is oinos, and designates the substance which Christ changed into His Precious Blood. Now oinos means wine, not grape-juice. If you wish to use buttermilk and five-o'clock-tea crackers and call your service the Lord's Supper, I shall only smile, sadly and quietly, but nothing more. I will not agitate for an amendment to the Constitution, prohibiting crackers and buttermilk.

I should like to have you announce that my answer was substantially correct. If your learned contributors would tell us why the Church insists on wine, the exposition of the Church's doctrine would be very timely.

The Chapel at Annapolis

To the Editor of AMERICA:

At Annapolis, Md., a beautiful, costly chapel graces the Naval Academy grounds. The services held in it are those observed by the ritualistic branch of the Protestant Episcopal Church. Midshipmen are not obliged to attend, if they prefer to go to a church of their own denomination, out in town. But why should Catholics, Presbyterians, Methodists, etc., have to suffer this inconvenience, or else attend a service unfamiliar, and often, as I have been informed, repugnant to them?

The reply will probably be made that the present prevailing service is a compromise. In an institution where there are as many creeds as shades of color, a church cannot be erected for each denomination. And so a mean is reached in the Protestant Episcopal service. But in religion there can be no compromise. Any attempt therefore to foist another religion upon any individual is unjust. We have in the case a national institution presumably non-sectarian, not favorable to one belief to the disadvantage of another. Is it fair, then, that a magnificent chapel with all its conveniences, should be consecrated to Episcopal service, while Catholics and Protestants of other sects, must either join in the Episcopal service or seek elsewhere for the comforts of the religion they deem to be the true one?

Just where the blame lies is hard to say. What is to be done for the many other sects of Protestants, I leave to be solved by others. My point is this. West Point has a Catholic chapel, built if I'm not mistaken, not by the Government, but by Catholics. Why cannot our Catholic "middies" have the same? At present, in the Naval Academy, where, it may be safely asserted, at least one-sixth of the student-body is Catholic, the men go out in town to Mass. I have it on good authority that our Catholic boys at Annapolis are such that the Church may well be proud of them. Among them are many frequent communicants. To go to Holy Communion, under present conditions, means a considerable sacrifice which is unstintedly made. But owing to regulations, these communicants are at best weekly. Most of the present prevailing impediments would be removed by the erection of a Catholic chapel on the grounds. If this were done many could and would receive Our Lord daily. What a help to the faith of them all would even the presence of such a chapel be! Many would make the visits they now cannot make. Who knows what conversions would be wrought? And would not the few whose faith wavers or in any way needs strengthening, find here the prop they need? Moreover, the advice and presence of a Catholic chaplain would be a very salutary thing.

The priests in town are doing noble work, but for many reasons they cannot accomplish the same results as they could were they resident at the Academy or could they come to say daily Mass, and hear Confessions. Finally such influence, made possible by a chapel, would be wide-spread. We know a large percentage of our sailors are Catholics. They certainly are helped in untold ways by officers imbued with a lively Catholic spirit. Now this spirit could undoubtedly be more readily inculcated and extended under the conditions I have described. Is not the matter worth agitating?

A Masonic Attack

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The New Age, the official organ of the Supreme Council of Scottish Rite Freemasonry in the United States, continues to show itself hostile to Catholics. In its February number it reprints an editorial from the Masonic Chronicler, of Chicago, of January 5. This editorial states that Cardinal Gibbons, when he was asked what he thought was the most essential thing to be done to win the war, evaded the question, and replied that the best way to end the war would be for the Central Powers to make a definite proposition "embracing all their aims and demands," and for the officials of the American Government "to put themselves in a receptive mood for the generous consideration of any peace offer" from the Germans.

Of course the Cardinal never made any such statement. But the Masonic Chronicler goes on to say:

> Reduced to plain English, it means that the Kaiser should formulate his demands and the United States should accept them. . . . If it is the avowed purpose of the Roman Catholic Church to instil in the minds of the American people that the war should end regardless of the terms, its purpose will fail. . . . Cardinal Gibbons may recommend surrender to the Kaiser, but there will be no surrender. It might be well to suggest that the Pope keep his hands off.

These are a few sentences from the Masonic Chronicler's article. The New Age quotes the entire editorial and asks:

> And now, brethren, what do you think of all this? Did the Cardinal really say these things? If so, why should he be so anxious to save the German autocracy from the ruin that the rest of the world has prepared for it? Does it occur to him that if the German autocracy goes down, a certain other would-be spiritual and ecclesiastical autocracy is going down with it? Does he wish to secure another chance to prepare for the "next war" that the Germans seem to desire so much?

And so on and so on, for about as much more.

Do decent Freemasons want to be represented by such an organ? Do they believe in spreading falsehoods about Cardinal Gibbons? Do they think this time of national crisis opportune for the supreme leaders of Masonry to foment enmity and dissension among American citizens? If sincere members of the Masonic society do not approve of the anti-Catholic policy of the New Age, ought they not to let its editorial committee know of their objection thereto?

Some Irish Old and New

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Does Mr. James McDermott wish to be understood seriously? The history he quotes in his contradiction to my statement of February 9, is not a history but a series of lectures on Ireland "interspersed with Irish melodies set to instrumental music." Most of the heroes mentioned would have been the last men in the world to assert that they were Irish. Sir Hans Sloane was the son of a Scotch planter in Ulster. Scotch plunderers were not Irish. Andrew Jackson was the son of Ulster Scotch, who at the date of their emigration were not yet assimilated to the Irish. The painting which made James Barry famous was the landing of St. Patrick. The "Encyclopedia Britannica" claims that he was an English painter. Sir Charles Barry, the architect of the Parliament buildings was born in London. The paintings of McClise the son of another Scotchman "were marred by harsh and dull coloring, and frequent touches of the theatrical in the actions and attitude of the speakers." McMahon was Irish only on his father's side, the ancestor coming from Ireland during the reign of Louis XIV. What is Mr. McDermott's notion of an Irishman?

The very necessity of appealing to such isolated and dubious facts shows that Mr. McDermott is desperate for proof. From the general consent of mankind we know that the Irish are espected the world over for their propagation of the Catholic eligion, and their cooperation as a race in that apostolate. It as of the Irish as a race that I wrote. Of individual Irishmen's urely material achievements I could make a more plausible brief an my critic. But my point was, as could have been gathered om an unpredjudiced view of the contents of my letter, that the ish, as united Irish, have never accomplished anything worthy the world's admiration which was not motived by some end the Catholic Church considered as a custodian of souls. I eant by "world's admiration" the admiration which all men ve to any work of extraordinary import. The world is too rge to be enamored of Irish conceits and trifles. The Ameri- n people are fair enough judges. How much attention is paid them to Irish non-apostolic claims? Apostolic work is any ork directed by the workers to the salvation or sanctification souls. This is my meaning.

The Irish who served for France in the American Revolution ere mercenaries. The world never has and never will admire e Irish avocation of fighting other nations' battles. Let me add at the conclusion that the Irish should imitate the English was ot contained in the premises of my February 9 letter. No facts ave been forthcoming to disprove my universal statement.

The Stage and Catholicism

o the Editor of AMERICA:

The stage and moving-picture drive on Catholicism continues gain in energy because of the weakness of Catholics. At the oment it seems centered on the Blessed Virgin. In cities here Catholics are strong numerically there are exhibited oductions with such titles as "A Painted Madonna," "The adonna of the Future," etc. If Catholics have any spirit of yalty to their Faith, let them effect a "big drive" against ese productions.

Mr. Goldstein's Street-Preaching.

o the Editor of AMERICA:

The success of Mr. David Goldstein's street-preaching in alifornia has prompted me to write to AMERICA to tell those its readers who may be interested something of the recep- on that was accorded this novel venture in the city of Oakland. Mr. Goldstein gave his first open-air talk in California on a unday afternoon in the civic center of San Francisco. Wel- med by the Most Reverend Archbishop Hanna, who delegated e of the principal pastors of the city to introduce the noted nvert, it was only to be expected that in a city so strongly atholic, as is the city of St. Francis, Mr. Goldstein's audience ould be large and appreciative, but in Oakland, and in some the surrounding cities and towns, where the percentage of atholics is comparatively small, and where the spirit of anti- atholicism is aggressive and powerful the prospects for Cath- ic street-preaching were, to say the least, distinctly discourag- g, if not forbidding. Hence when it was suggested at a meet- g of the Oakland branch of the Federation of Catholic Socie- s to invite Mr. Goldstein to speak in the streets of Oakland e proposal was vehemently opposed. It was objected that ch preaching degraded the sacred doctrines of the Church to e level of soap-box Socialism and similar "isms" of the rb-stone. But the chief objection which was in everybody's ind was that such public defense or propagation of Catholic aching would drive the alert and powerful bigotry of the y to acts of greater aggressiveness and repression. The sest thing, in the judgment of many, was to leave bad enough one, and not make it a great deal worse.

Fortunately, however, better counsels prevailed, and Mr. Gold- ein came to Oakland. He drew up his auto-van on one of the principal street-corners of the city, and from its platform under the street lights he addressed a crowd of 2,000 people for almost two hours. During the entire time he was listened to with most respectful attention, and at the close, after answering some objections he disposed of a large number of copies of Father Martin's "Catholic Religion." So unexpected and so gratifying was the success of this experiment that at the next meeting of the local branch of the Federation of Catholic Societies it was unanimously voted to request Mr. Goldstein to give another lecture in Oakland on a Sunday afternoon, when it would be most convenient for the people to attend, and it was also decided to rent the municipal auditorium, and by handbills and otherwise to give the affair all the publicity possible. The members of the Federation who were most enthusiastic for Mr. Goldstein's return, and who wanted to make the best possible preparations for it regardless of expense, were the very people who in the beginning so strenuously opposed him for fear of the consequences of his visit. The incident shows that the remedy for bigotry is not silence and inaction but truth, truth properly presented.

Mr. Goldstein very kindly returned to Oakland, and on the Sunday afternoon of his lecture fearlessly drove his Ford auto-van upon the stage of the Auditorium. He was greeted by a vast concourse of all denominations who packed the spacious hall to its capacity, and who from all appearances were representative of the best elements of the city. For an hour and three-quarters he held the interest of that motley gathering, and when he finished he was plied with objections, the character of which showed how seriously and how thoroughly many of his audience had been examining the claims of the Church. A great deal of Catholic literature was disposed of, and when all was over the crowd departed, evidently well satisfied that they had spent a pleasant and a profitable afternoon.

Plainly, of course, the chief factors of Mr. Goldstein's success were his message, and his manner of delivering it. While Oakland was conspicuous for its bigotry and intolerance it nevertheless contained a large and silent number of non-Catholics who were dissatisfied with the uncertainty and confusion of error, and who were honestly but timidly seeking the truth. Many of these were anxious to hear what a famous convert from Socialism and Judaism had to say for himself. And when they heard the eternal truths of salvation, especially the great fundamental doctrine of church authority, explained and proved in language so simple, so clear, and so convincing that a child could understand them, when their inquiries were sympathetically considered and answered, and when throughout their feelings were honestly and scrupulously respected they were most favorably and deeply impressed. They were convinced of the earnest sincerity of Mr. Goldstein, and they felt from start to finish that his only motive was not to argue or to condemn, but to enlighten and to guide. Indeed I myself, and others too, as we sat listening to him, could not help imagining what might be the magnitude of blessed results if instead of one we had one hundred Catholic truth auto-vans manned by laymen as able and as zealous in the cause of the Saviour as Mr. Goldstein.

Since Mr. Goldstein's lectures in Oakland he has spoken in the streets of a great many cities and towns in California, and he has been uniformly successful everywhere. On his own initiative and that of another famous convert, Mrs. Martha Moore Avery, he has now demonstrated the practicability and value of this form of missionary effort, and as he has already been invited and welcomed by no less than eighteen or twenty Archbishops and Bishops from California to Massachusetts, his numerous street-lectures on his way back to Boston are certain to be productive of enormous good. "Is no one found to return and give glory to God but this stranger?"

No God for the Child

OUT in Michigan, an aggregation of individuals with an avowed fondness for the "social uplift," are plotting against the peace, dignity, and continuance in good order, of the Peninsular State. Their efforts will probably fail, yet their schemes should awaken at least a passing show of interest among American Catholics. The association in question was founded to give the good people of Michigan a ready and easy means of promoting the welfare of the State, by securing desirable constitutional amendments. It proposes to promote this welfare, first of all, by taking God out of the heart of the child, as far as an education purely secular can attain this desirable end. How a Godless generation will benefit the State of Michigan is a question to which the association has given no answer.

The plotters repeat some ancient and long-discredited stratagems. In this there is no danger. Catholics, in some respects, are sluggish folk, yet once bitten, they are twice shy. But some of the devious devices employed by the Michigan association foreshadow a dangerous campaign against the welfare of both Church and State. For the plotters are determined that no longer shall American children be allowed to reverence and worship Jesus Christ in any school. All, without exception, Jew and Gentile, agnostic and atheist, are to be herded in State schools, that is to say, in schools from which Jesus Christ would be summarily expelled, did He enter to teach the saving doctrines, given Him from on high by His Eternal Father. To keep God out of every department of education the Michigan plotters are circulating a petition for an amendment to the Constitution, which will make attendance at the State schools obligatory upon all children between the ages of five and sixteen.

It is not urged in support of this petition, that all wisdom begins and ends in the public schools, or even that, supported as they are by public funds, the State schools have scored an unqualified success in the difficult art of teaching. Nor are the parochial schools indicted on the ground that they impart a training of so inferior a kind that they must be suppressed in justice to the young. Nor, apparently, has attention been directed to the trifling circumstance that the parochial schools, besides giving all that is given by the public schools, and more, represent an annual saving of several millions of dollars to the opulent citizens of Michigan. In fact, the case of the Catholic schools is not discussed at all. To the gentry urging the proposed constitutional amendment, the case is closed. The parochial schools are founded on the principle that Jesus Christ, and not a secularized State, must take the first place in the heart of the child. "What further need have we of testimony? You yourselves have heard the blasphemy."

The Michigan attack may be clumsy, or again, it may hope to carry all before it by its very boldness. Hitherto it has never been held good public policy in this country so to strengthen the State as to destroy what few rights modern social and religious conditions have left within the parental domain. No one denies that the State has not only the right, but the duty, to care for the education of the child when the natural guardians are unwilling or unable to fulfil this function; but the law which makes the child merely the ward of a secular State is conceived in a spirit of insolence and gross tyranny. It is a return to that paganism, set forth so eloquently by certain German philosophers of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, which would tear down God, to set in His place a bureaucratic State, supreme in every sphere of human activity.

Only time can make manifest whether the plan of taxing the parochial school out of existence, a proposal which finds favor in the East, or the bold Michigan scheme to bring up all children, as wards of the supreme State, in the mephitic atmosphere of godless schools, will put God out of the heart of the next generation more quickly and more completely. Meanwhile, even in these days of stress, Catholics will do well to keep a watchful eye on all legislation affecting education. The atheism which would ruin the faith of the children whose fathers died for France, is active in our country. The plotters are not enrolled in their country's service; therefore are they free to extend their nefarious designs against Christ and His Mystical Body, the Church. It would be fatal to suppose that they will spare the little ones left at home, when American soldiers lay down their lives on foreign fields, that liberty, even liberty of conscience, may be made a reality among the nations of the earth.

Catholics and Social Reconstruction

IN his notable pastoral letter on social action the Cardinal Archbishop of Westminster calls attention to the magnificent opportunities open to Catholics at the present moment. He speaks of a transformation that is certain to come, "a new order of things, new social conditions, new relations between the different sections into which society is divided." In this tremendous change, ich will not be confined to England, the Church is re perfectly qualified than any other institution or fac- to play a leading part.

He clearly points out, as has already been maintained the pages of AMERICA, that many of the utterances of dern "unrest" are merely an exaggerated and con- ed expression of Catholic principles. Ours is not the icy of despair, based upon the overthrow and de- uction of the existing relations of society, advocated Socialism. We have on the contrary a doctrine of so- reconstruction to which the world will gladly listen. e public attitude towards us, as the great Cardinal tes, is fast ceasing to be one of indifference. Men interested in our doctrines and practices. With them feel keenly "the inequalities and injustices which too en affect their lives." A bond, stronger than links of n, is thus established between us and the people. Our ial traditions, together with the teachings of the Holy , enable us to bring out of the existing confusion and eatening chaos a new Christian order of social stability liberty, the goal which all right-minded men are seek- in our day.

The Catholic Church, as Cardinal Bourne splendidly s, is not afraid of enthusiasm. She can satisfy the st ardent advocates of social justice with more coher- and satisfying ideals than they could ever invent:

> if they take their stand upon the dignity of man, whether or poor, we can show them how every human being, created God and redeemed by Christ, has a much greater dignity than had dreamt of. If they claim for every human being a t to share in the fruits of the earth, a right to live a life thy of man, we endorse that claim with Divine sanctions. If protest against industrial insecurity and the concentration capital in a few hands, we point out how they are suffering n the blow aimed at the Catholic Church in the sixteenth ury. If they have had a hard fight to establish the right of ciation in trade unions, it was because the Catholic voice was nced in the land. If their instinct for self-realization has stirred, it is but the awakening of an instinct developed ng the people in Catholic days before our universities and ndary schools were diverted from their original purpose.

Thus will their aspirations be rightly directed by us, ve ourselves have fully mastered the social traditions teachings of our Church and are able calmly to view existing conditions and tendencies.

The Flower and Fruit of Knighthood

SOCIETY directly descended from the Pharisees published some months ago a series of stories at- king the moral character of our soldiers in France. Iso- d instances of disorder were represented as character- , and certain forms of amusement which ordinary consider legitimate means of recreation, were cited as icating "a grave deterioration of moral fiber." Easily uted by the testimony of unimpeachable witnesses, se lurid tales have long since lost, except perhaps, ong the Pharisaic following, even the small credence en them on their first appearance. From the very out- of the war, military officers, and chaplains alike, found in the general good-behavior of our troops a source of gratitude and hope. Two letters recently received from American soldiers witness, when taken in conjunction with thousands of similar missives, that the uniform and the new manner of life, have strengthened, rather than weakened, the ties which bind our young men to home and to religion.

The first of these letters reached its destination only a few hours before a communication from the War Department, announcing the death of the writer in France, changed a household's rejoicing into sorrow. Writing to "Dear Brother Bill," the young soldier poured out his heart, the heart of a boy who loved the things that were good and pure, his parents, his brothers and sisters, his sweetheart, and all the old associations that clustered about his home. Every American will understand how much pathos and real love lies under the slang phrases in which he speaks of his betrothed, "Say, how's my girl? Isn't she some girl?" and throb in sympathy with the tenderness of the boy's love for his mother. "Be good to Mom, Bill," he writes. "I know you will. You've always been good to her. She always gave up everything for us, so be good to her, Bill, and I'll be home soon, and we'll all have fine times together."

Equally appealing, and of a finer temper, is a letter received from a young Sergeant, who had been sent to a training camp far from home:

> Last Sunday I was able to go to Confession, hear Mass and receive Holy Communion. The facilities for the religious care of the boys are not many, but we try to make use of what we have. This war will bring back many a young fellow who has unfortunately strayed from the right track. It is indeed a beautiful sight to see so many hundreds of our young Catholics going to the altar to partake of the Body and Blood of Jesus Christ. It is a sermon in itself, and it attests the faith of the men, a faith as strong, I truly believe, as virile, as sincere, as that of the early Christians themselves. . . . My health keeps good, thank God, and I long for the day when the word will come to move "over there." If you can, I wish you would drop in home, and give my tender love to Aunt Kate and Uncle Ben.
> Remember me at the altar, Father, that I may do my duty, without blemish, to my God and to my country.

"Be good to Mom." "Remember me at the altar, that I may do my duty, without blemish, to my God and to my country." Is knighthood yet in flower? More than in flower. These simple letters show the fine fruitage of Christian knighthood in the hearts of our young soldiers.

Philosophy or Domestic Science?

THAT the shortest way to any man's heart lies through his stomach, may be a thesis too cynical to be true. Nevertheless, as the serious historian of social institutions has long suspected, many a promising matrimonial venture has come to grief in the kitchen. Bad cooking undoubtedly fosters indigestion; indigestion leads to a craving for alcoholic stimulants, and one need not be a prohibitionist to admit that the use of alcoholic stimulants often leads to jail. From the jail to poverty and the divorce court is frequently a short and easy step. But perhaps the whole blame should not be sought in the kitchen; there are other rocks upon which the craft borne lightly by soft breezes across the matrimonial sea may split. Disorder in the kitchen is usually accompanied by disorder in the other departments of the domestic establishment. Soon the home is not the oasis towards which the father of the family gladly turns his thoughts in the heat of the day, and his tired feet at the set of sun. To invoke a variety of similes, it is anything but a haven and a refuge, a cool hand laid on a fevered brow, an altar dedicated to peace and concord. The ruffled temper of the unskilled housewife, aware of, yet unwilling to admit, her failure, prompts words that cannot truthfully be likened to oil poured out upon troubled waters. Father presently seeks surcease at a neighboring corner, where there is always a quiet game for congenial souls, and a soothing bottle to top off the end of a perfect night. The occasion of all this inversion of the proper order is a foolish girl, once too proud to learn cooking, sewing and sweeping, and now utterly unable to make what should be "home," a fit place for a domestic society.

An experienced Chicago social worker reports that "much marital discord may be traced to marital incompatibility," and the cause of this incompatibility is "the school which lays much stress upon academic subjects, and very little or none at all, upon the education of girls in the household arts. Experience proves to us beyond all doubt the absolute need of training in the household arts in our schools." What are our parochial schools and our academies offering in domestic science courses? Through their general courses they are preparing a splendid race of women, well instructed in religion and in secular learning, but there is reason to believe that not all have grasped the importance of imparting to our Catholic girls an equally sound and practical training in the household arts. This failure is sometimes due to lack of financial resources; in other cases, however, there is an unfortunate disposition, arising from a complete misapprehension of the factors in the case, to regard domestic science as a mere time-wasting fad. Yet even the elementary school must help to "fit the child" for life, and, unfortunately, "home-making" is a subject not taught in many modern families. To give in the schools a necessary training unobtainable elsewhere, is surely not to exploit a fad or to waste time.

Let us teach little Cissy to read, write and cipher, and if at all possible send her to college. There is no intrinsic reason why even a doctor of philosophy should not be an excellent cook, a woman well-skilled at the needle, and a successful strategist against all manner of domestic inconvenience and unsightliness. But if a choice must be made, a thorough training in the difficult art and science of managing a household is far preferable to a degree based upon proficiency in the humanities and philosophy. B. A.'s butter no parsnips, but a home-maker is beyond all price.

The "Farmerette"

WE have with us the suffragette and the "conductorette." To these has now been added the "farmerette." May her tribe increase! The occupation is not new to her. When Adam was placed in the paradise of pleasure, "to dress it and to keep it," Eve was given him as "a help like unto himself." Her first experience in gardening must then have begun. When later, in their outcast state, "Adam delved and Eve span," as the old couplet veraciously assures us, Eve doubtless often forsook her task to help her stronger mate in conquering the stubborn soil, that now bore thorns and thistles.

By the side of man, woman has always taken her place in the field and on the farm. Ruth following after the reapers, and gleaning the stray ears of grain, has been immortalized in Holy Writ and in the poet's song. Not in competition with men has woman pursued this occupation, but usually as a member of the household, varying her tasks in the home with her healthy outdoor labors.

In European countries almost the entire responsibility of tilling the fields and harvesting the fruits was in many places cast upon woman by the dread necessity of war. We behold her drawing the plough itself in her patriotic duty of supporting the nation, while the men are engaged at their iron task in fields ploughed with far other furrows, whose crops are bayonets and whose dews are blood. The very horses have been drafted from the rich, productive acres, to toil and struggle in the service of another reaper whose awful swathes are cut with the sweeping fire of machine guns. On woman devolves the task of preservation.

In America, too, the Government appeals to all its citizens to utilize every fertile inch of soil, in suburb and in city. American women, we are told, are little inclined to handle the spade or to soil their fingers in the newly-turned loam. But war-time conditions may bring back to us again an earlier, healthier and happier state. While the men at home, if not called away by sterner duties, may perform the harder tasks, there are many details of gardening which might profitably be learned and practised by every city woman who holds sway over even a small plot of ground in which a seed can quicken or a flower bloom. So will our Government be effectively helped in its present crisis and our cities be beautified hereafter in time of peace, while thrift and comfort will be promoted and a more Christian simplicity of life and manners introduced.

The immediate patriotic purpose of home-gardening is not merely to meet the shortage of food products, but also to ease the excessive burdens of the transportation system. The earnestness with which the Government is urging this matter can best be made plain from the fact that every priest, minister and rabbi in the country is soon to be personally requested to aid in this campaign. Every effort will be made by the Department of Agriculture to spread information upon the subject.

RECOLLECTIONS OF DORA SIGERSON

ORA SIGERSON—Mrs. Clement Shorter—who died in London on January 6, this year, was a true daughter of nd, as well as a variously gifted and most lovable personality. was the elder daughter of a remarkable man, Dr. George rson, of Dublin, and her mother was Hester Varian, sprung Quaker family of Cork, several of whom, including Mrs. rson herself, had written poetry, while Dr. Sigerson is a a Gaelic scholar, a scientist, a man of affairs and a patriot.

ra and I were young together, and for many years I went in out of No. 3 Clare Street, Dublin, like a second home. A of the gay and stirring days of my youth are bound up with hought of Dora Sigerson. During the years between 1887 1893, when I married and went to live in London, we had of our joys together. Let me recall the circle amid which ived. The salon was not a Dublin institution. With the ordinary religious and political differences, which make an cial social difference in Dublin, such an institution must be restricted. The Sigersons' house, and my old home, White-Clondalkin, Co. Dublin, made some approach to the salon. was a peaceful time in Ireland. Things had settled down the Land League. There was a union of hearts between rish Nationalist party and the English Liberals. Gladstone ntroduced a Home Rule bill in 1886. When it was defeated not think anyone minded very much, but it made for friend-

All sorts of people seemed to be visiting Ireland in those besides the Liberals, and the rain held off. They were fine ners, for Ireland was in one of her periods of ease between lts, which seem to succeed each other with the regularity of wing of the pendulum.

r guests, I think, were almost interchangeable. We had spirit of hospitality that if Dr. Sigerson met a notable person y circle that person was at once free of his, and vice-versa. y Americans came to our firesides. There were the Piatts, and and wife and children; there were Louise Imogen ey and Alice Brown; there was George Pellew; there was ed Williams, of the Providence Journal; all manner of peo-editors, artists, poets, politicians, priests; and the same is of those who were English.

e Irish literary revival, as it was called, was in the making. s shaking off the trammels which had made the budding poet eland before that time adopt a convention as artificial as d English poetry in the reign of Queen Anne. There were, urse, big exceptions; but after poetry had become somewhat rical, as with the bards of '48, who used her for a political aganda, the young writers were going back for simplicity and ness to as stale a formula: that which obtained in the trans-ns of the Irish bards made at a period which was nothing if rtificial, that is, the end of the eighteenth and the beginning e nineteenth century.

the new group there was W. B. Yeats, there was A. E., was Douglas Hyde, there was Dora, and for a time Rose nagh, and various other young writers under the benignant of some no longer young: the great old Fenian, John ary and his noble sister, Dr. Sigerson himself, Mr. J. B. s, my own dear old father, who was not literary in expres-but well-fitted to be the occasion of literature. We used eet at Dr. Sigerson's house or at Whitehall; and there would uch talk of and reading of poetry, many political discussions, of minds, friendly arguments, humor and wit; delightful erings they were.

marriage in 1893 closed one of those happy meeting-places. s at the first home of my married life, The Laurels, Mount Avenue, Ealing, a still, countrified suburb of London, that Dora met her future husband, as it was through me that Hester Sigerson met Donn Piatt, whom she afterwards married. I was some few years Dora's senior, and my first book was already eight years old when her earliest volume of poems was published. My review of it in the Illustrated London News, accompanied by a photograph, had led Clement Shorter, one of the most distinguished of London editors, to seek this beautiful girl's acquaintance, for Dora was very beautiful in those days.

No woman could have been more loved and cherished than she was in her happy marriage, yet she was never at home in England. For her to express a wish was for her tender husband to gratify it. They had a beautiful house in London, but she desired a country house, and it was given to her at Great Missenden, Bucks, in one of the most beautiful parts of the Chiltern Hills, within easy reach of London. There was a certain look of Irish country about Missenden, something dark in the color of the hills and vales, a little somber on a grey day, unlike the garden-like beauty of England. I was with her when she was planning her garden at Missenden. She was making a fountain and a pond when last I saw her, and much of her soul must have gone into the planning of that garden. Dora Sigerson was one of the most variously gifted people I ever knew. All the arts came easily to her, except perhaps music. In my knowledge of her she was not a musician, but she wrote, she drew and painted and she was a sculptor, naturally, and as it seemed, without preparation.

She never struck roots in England, however. She refused to from the first. The beauty of England, the real kindness and goodness of many English people, did not appeal to her. The whole panorama of English life passed her by, unheeded. She was always brooding upon Ireland. The Irish rebellion and what followed it broke her heart. What had been there always, dimly apprehended, took shape. She felt herself in an alien country during the agony of that Easter week, and the weeks following, although even beyond her tender husband she would have found many English people to share her grief. She refused to be comforted and she died of it.

She had published several volumes of poems, and she had made her place in literature. I am sure if she could she would have written in Gaelic. As it was she contrived to get into the English in which she wrote the wild note of the Gael. From the volume of selections from her poetry called "Love of Ireland" I take this poem, called "The Hill-side Men":

Oh, were my heart a little dog
  I'd call it to my side,
To hold it with a silken lead
  And would not be denied.

For, oh, it wandered far from me,
  By mountain, vale and glen,
How glad it marched the weary miles
  Among the hill-side men!

Oh, were my heart a singing bird
  I would not let it free.
It dare not dream of sunrise skies
  Or chant of liberty.

For ah, it sprang cloud-high to sing,
  From mountain vale and fen.
When first it heard the secret drums,
  The hearts of hill-side men.

My hopes are lost, my dreams are fled;
  How lone are vale and fen!
My heart lies cold within the grave
  That holds the hill-side men.

The faithful heart that always felt every motion of hers brought all that was mortal of her home to rest as she wished it, "I could sleep well, near where O'Leary lies," and Glasnevin, that Irish Pantheon, is the holier because she lies there, though her homesick spirit has found its ultimate home. There was a fitness in her dying at Epiphany. Her offerings were gold, frankincense and myrrh: the gold of her poetry, the incense of her praise, the myrrh of her sorrow.

IRELAND

Libertatis restitutae dulce auditu nomen.

Though God hath thee with gifts and charms supplied,
Misgovernment, want, famine, each in part,
Tore half thy loved ones weeping from thy heart
And scattered them imbittered far and wide.
On bloody fields, in vain, thy sons have died
Self-government to gain. Detraction's dart
Hath hurt thee much; but steadfast still thou art,
In quest of justice, now too long denied.

Abroad, thy sons rise high in any State;
At home, they fail, by sullen Discord bound.
A crafty Stuart planted on thy shore
Ancestral foes to mar or rule thy fate.
In Ulster e'en now, these would hush the sound
When radiant Hope is knocking at thy door.

REVIEWS

The Life of John Cardinal McCloskey, First Prince of the Church in America, 1810-1885. By His Eminence JOHN CARDINAL FARLEY. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. $3.50.

Fortunately for the future a number of books—Cardinal Gibbons' "Retrospect of Fifty Years"; Dr. C. G. Herbermann's "The Sulpicians in the United States"; the biographies of several distinguished laymen, the histories of several religious Congregations and the lives of the founders of others—have recently made a substantial addition to American Catholic history. Cardinal Farley, who has always been a zealous promoter of the preservation and study of our records, now makes his second practical contribution to them himself in this life of the first Prince of the Church in America. It preserves the details of a career that "spanned almost the whole of that wonderful nineteenth century which was crowded with triumphs in the cause of religion in this country." Twelve years of daily companionship with the man of whom he writes, and the forethought of jotting down their many interesting conversations, gave Cardinal Farley, not only an intimate insight of his subject, but enabled him also to present a historical result that is largely autobiographical. In the opening chapters we have a delightful picture of Italy, social, political and religious, in the thirties, and later during the stirring episodes of the Vatican Council. With the whole story is presented a view of Catholic New York for three-fourths of a century after 1810, based on personal narratives and the most authentic documents and letters and from archives in many instances hitherto unpublished. Bishop McQuaid described Cardinal McCloskey as "a prince among princes, a man of learning and of fine parts, devoted to his Church work, and well adapted to smooth over the asperities of the past and quell opposition by the meekness and gentleness of his manner."

In summarizing the life story he has just told, Cardinal Farley says of his predecessor:

> He filled a position alive with difficulties with a dignity and a success which stand out prominently in the story of the Catholic Hierarchy of America. All the troubles which threatened the stability of Church organization in the time of his successor—the school question, Cahensleyism, the problem of American methods and viewpoints—these and many other thorny subjects which need not be mentioned here, existed in his time, but his consummate prudence and his profound knowledge of men kept him from giving issue to movements which he felt could best be trusted to the gentle hand of Time.

The Cardinal quotes Archbishop Corrigan, because "of all the friends who surrounded Cardinal McCloskey during the last years of his life none knew him more intimately," as saying in his month's mind panegyric:

> It was Cardinal McCloskey's privilege to grow up with Catholicity in this diocese and to be spared to witness, both in the Church and in the land of his birth, a progress and a development unparalleled in history. . . . He was the first native priest of this State of New York who, as a secular priest, devoted himself to the service of the altar. . . . It is not too much to say that if one virtue were more conspicuous than another in the career of the illustrious Cardinal it was the virtue of prudence.

Thus the first American Cardinal will go down in the history of his country.

Collected Works of Padraic H. Pearse. Plays, Stories, Poems. New York: Frederick A. Stokes Co. $3.00.

Every lover of the beautiful in literature should promptly secure a copy of this remarkable book. For in it the principal of St. Enda's school, who died for his country in the Easter week revolt, lays bare a soul on fire with spiritual passion and expresses in a gifted poet's language thoughts of singular loftiness and beauty. Almost everything in the volume was written originally in Gaelic. The plays and some of the poems Mr. Pearse himself subsequently translated into the language of the Sassenach, and the stories Mr. Joseph Campbell has turned into English. As Father Browne well says in his excellent preface to the book "The work of Padraic Pearse seems to me to constitute a mystical book of the love of Ireland." Certainly in such plays as "The Singer," "The King" and "The Master," the author unfolds to us his heart's history and writes a prophetic prologue to the tragedy of Easter week. In the following passage from "The Singer" the rare beauty of Pearse's thought and language can be discerned:

> I have lived with the homeless and with the breadless. O Maoilsheachlainn, the poor, the poor! I have seen such sad childings, such bare marriage feasts, such candleless wakes! In the pleasant country places I have seen them, but oftener in the dark unquiet streets of the city. My heart has been heavy with the sorrow of mothers, my eyes have been wet with the tears of children. The people, Maoilsheachlainn, the dumb, suffering people, reviled and outcast, yet pure and splendid and faithful. In them I saw, or seemed to see again the face of God. Ah, it is a tear-stained face, blood-stained, defiled with ordure, but it is the Holy Face!

One of the most striking characteristics of Mr. Pearse's genius is the tenderness and fidelity with which he depicts little children and the wonderful "love he has for the cleanest and most beautiful thing that God created—the shining soul of the child." "The Roads," "The Thief," "The Priest," "Barbara," "Eoineen of the Birds" and the play and the tale about "Iosagan" all have sweet children as their central figures, while the coming of her long-desired babe to Maire, which was Our Lady's Christmas present for her, and the tragic story of "The Dearg-Daol" also have the love of children for their theme. Moreover, every sentence this author penned proves him a consummate artist. This talent appears not only in his unerring rendering of the Irish idiom and his faithful interpretation of the Gaelic mind but especially in that austere restraint he always shows, which is the mark of all the world's great literature.

The score of poems with which the volume closes reveal the soul of the author almost as fully as the plays. "The Fool" is certainly autobiographical and so is "The Rebel," while "The Wayfarer" and "The Lullaby of a Woman of the Mountain" one but a true poet could have written. These lines, entitled The Mother" are a good example of Mr. Pearse at his best:

I do not grudge them, Lord, I do not grudge
My two strong sons that I have seen go out
To break their strength and die, they and a few,
In bloody protest for a glorious thing,
They shall be spoken of among their people,
The generations shall remember them,
And call them blessed;
The little names that were familiar once
Round my dead hearth.
Lord, Thou art hard on mothers;
We suffer in their coming and their going;
And tho' I grudge them not I weary, weary
Of the long sorrow—and yet I have my joy:
My sons were faithful and they fought.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

The six novels, according to the Bookman, that sold best uring February are these: "The U. P. Trail," Grey; "The ajor," Connor; "The Tree of Heaven," Sinclair; "The welling Place of Light," Churchill; "The White Morning," therton, and "Missing," Ward. And the six most popular ar-books during the same period were: "Over the Top," mpey; "Private Peat," Peat; "All in It," Beith; "Under re," Barbusse; "The Land of Deepening Shadow," Curtin, d "My Four Years in Germany," Gerard. All the foregoing orks have been reviewed in these columns except "The White orning." Mrs. Gertrude Atherton's new novel is a feminist act of very questionable morality in which the author, with tle artistry, and with a fine scorn of the probabilities, deribes how a revolt of the women of Germany brings the esent war to an end.

Under the captions, "Saints and Scholars," "Undying Nationod," "The Leaven of Democracy," "The Sea-divided Gael," Wit and Grit" and "Irish Idealism," Dr. Humphry J. Desond has gathered together a wealth of tributes to the gifts and rtues of Erin's sons and daughters and offers the book as a tisfying explanation of "Why God Loves the Irish" (Devindair, $1.25). He tells, for instance, how pleased Mr. Davitt was learn that there are three times as many Irish-American achers in this country as there are Irish-American policemen. It is racial!" Mr. Davitt exclaimed. "We belong to the schooloms of the world!" "Every man should love his native land," id one of Boston's Irish aldermen, "whether he was born ere or not." Dr. Austin O'Malley's definition of "Scotch ish" as a "term used in American obituary notices to convey e information that a Connaughtman died a Freemason" is also positely quoted. Next year's St. Patrick's Day orators will glad to know of Dr. Desmond's little book, and many of those ho are writing letters to AMERICA on "Some Irish Old and ew" could also read it with profit. Joseph T. C. Clarke, presint of the American-Irish Historical Society, writes the foreord and Maurice Francis Egan, our Minister to Denmark, conibutes an "appreciation."

If some friend of Patrick MacGill could have persuaded him ot to publish "The Brown Brethren" (Doran, $1.35), that ish soldier's literary reputation would be higher than it is now. he book is composed of the ribald conversations and coarse anks of a party of British trenchmen.——"Two Towns—One ty" (Dodd, Mead, $2.00) is a volume of nineteen light papers, escriptive of life and scenes in Paris and London before and uring the present war, contributed by the late John F. Maconald to various London journals. The early pages of the ook show how popular Edward VII was with the Parisians, d some of the later chapters give good pictures of the two pitals under the stress and strain of war.

Municipal Ownership

FOR a long time we have been suffering from the unregulated or improperly regulated ownership of our industries by capital. One of the solutions offered is ownership by labor, restricting the ownership of each industry to the workers of that industry. Granting that this might be an improvement, in one way, over unregulated capitalism, yet, while the latter is two-thirds wrong, the former is still at least one-third wrong. That is, while it is an improvement in the interest of certain workers, it does not provide for the persons most vitally concerned, namely, the consumers, the persons for whom the industry exists, and by whom it is supported. However, the consumer is beginning to realize his peril.

Ownership by Consumers

ONE of his efforts to protect himself is the simple expedient of ownership by consumers. Municipal ownership falls under this heading. It is ownership by the "users" of a public utility, operating through the agency of the local government. It is merely ownership by an association of "users" for their own immediate benefit, and is, of course, liable to all the troubles, as well as the benefits, that are possible to such an association. In the abstract, there is no valid reason why a community should not own the facilities for supplying its own needs. That the community acts through public agencies already existing, is not an argument against municipal ownership.

Municipal ownership is a question of expediency, and must be determined by the facts of each case. Positively, however, it must be based on neither Socialistic nor collectivistic doctrines, but entirely on cooperation. In the first place, the property acquired under municipal ownership should be paid for at a just price. Secondly, the purpose of such ownership must be neither government ownership of the means of production, nor the isolated benefit of the workers. The ideal is the welfare of the members of the community as individuals; which, of course, includes all workers. The theory of municipal ownership is that the "users" have the best right and may be most safely trusted to take care of their own interests. From this is derived the idea that "users" can get the best service when they own what they use.

Conditions of Municipal Ownership

MUNICIPAL OWNERSHIP is justifiable only when the use for which the utility is organized, is local, public, personal, exclusive and immediate. Local use is the identifying of the use with a definite community, as for example, New York City and the question of water supply. Public use is the use by the public taken as a whole. Our public parks are for public use. Personal use signifies that the utility is established for the personal use of the members of the community owning it. In other words, the people of New York City would not be personally interested in the use of the public utilities of the city of Buffalo. Exclusive use demands that the operation of the utility by the community shall not unjustly interfere with other communities. For example, apart from questions of interstate commerce and franchise, that portion of a trunk-line railroad included within the boundaries of a community should not be taken over under municipal ownership. Immediate use requires that the immediate purpose for which the utility is operated, is the general public welfare. Hence it would be very difficult to justify the operation by a municipality of a factory for making automobiles.

Governmental Authority

MUNICIPAL OWNERSHIP is not the same thing as collective bargaining, nor should it be used as a wedge for communism. Under normal conditions for a municipality to purchase and distribute the coal or grain for its citizens, is objectionable paternalism. But for a community to maint adequate facilities for receiving and storing fuel and food is question of expediency and reasonable foresightedness.

Finally, when we seek the aid of governmental authority solving our problems, we must not lose sight of three very go rules. First, while it is true that the Government should do the individual what he cannot do for himself, yet the conve is also true, that the individual should not permit the Gove ment to do what he can do for himself. Secondly, priv ownership, even of the means of production, is always to encouraged as the very foundation of liberty. Thirdly, t condition whereby the ownership of our industries is distribu among workers in general, will ordinarily guarantee a safe a peaceable state of society.

EDUCATION

A New Morality Code

THE National Institution for Moral Instruction has award to an Oberlin professor, Dr. William J. Hutchins, a pr of $5,000 for a code of morals. Touching this proceeding, British cousins might remark that it is delightfully Americ but I can confess to no such assurance. To live up to his rep tation, no American must pay money for anything new, unl it is altogether better than the old thing in his possession. N a certain code of morality, fairly well known to all civili nations, was promulgated on Mount Sinai some centuries a As its Author is Almighty God, I have no doubt whatever t the Mount Sinai code is as superior to the code of Oberlin Almighty God is to Dr. Hutchins. Furthermore, since Almig God, an infinitely wise law-giver, legislated in that code for times and for all peoples, I refuse to believe that we need new code in 1918.

The Oberlin Anachronism

THE Oberlin code is considerably more of an anachroni than Cicero's "De Officiis." In moral elevation, it can risk comparison with the heights attained by such pagans Plato and Aristotle, and its superiority to the teachings of C fucius, as far as these have filtered through my intellect, n be fairly questioned. For Cicero, Aristotle and Plato least acknowledged some divinity, apart from man, and C fucius was not utterly self-centered. If the Oberlin profes has ever heard of Almighty God as a moral teacher he has mind to communicate that knowledge to his fellows. Perf success has crowned his efforts to bar all mention of Go Holy Name, and all direct reference to His will and teachi from this new code of morality, which opens with the dog that the first law is the law of health, "to be physically f and ends with the dogma that the highest law is "to be lo to humanity." Thus is completed a course in man's whole d of which any enlightened pagan of the Porch would be hear ashamed.

The Essential Fault

PROVIDING that many of its abstract phrases, "humanit for instance, were omitted and replaced by some refere to an external legislator, I can conceive that this code might an excellent thing for young persons just emerging from b barism in Russia or in the far reaches of the upper Nile. would, at least, serve as the nucleus of a course in etique until something better could be procured. But as the basis moral training for the youth of a supposedly Christian coun it is a scandal, a delusion and a snare. For it refuses acknowledge Almighty God as the sole object of man's high loyalty, substituting for the Divinity that vague abstract "humanity." As this code is written for the particular ben of beginners in the elementary school, I will ask the pati teacher to consider, observe, and then report what idea the av age seven-year-old will form of "humanity," as an object of loyalty. To take no higher ground, for psychological reasons, here is a fatal defect in a project which calls for the supremest loyalty. Men are loyal to men, to definite causes and to definite principles, but they do not die, or live, either, for an abstraction.

An Irrational Code

IN the preparation of this code, much of love's labor has been lost, and perhaps, $5,000 as well. It contains nothing that has not been far better said in the Ten Commandments, and much that can only lead to the destruction of the child's spiritual possibilities. In a pamphlet issued more than two years ago, the Institution stated that "The moral education of children is the fundamental need of this nation," and that "Morality and character are first in education." With this position, every Catholic will find himself in complete agreement. Long since he lifted it from the easy realm of facile theory, into the domain of hard fact, by establishing and maintaining the parochial-school system. Instruction in the purely secular subjects, the pamphlet continues, cannot form character, "cannot produce the personal qualities essential to a happy life." Even from a financial standpoint, moral training at home and in school is worth while.

> We pay a numerous police force to compel lawless people to refrain from thieving, murder, gambling, and vices. We stand the loss from burglaries, swindles and non-payment of debts. The expense of character-education for all school children will not be a tithe of that of our present system of letting many of them grow up dishonest, lawless and ne'er-do-wells, and then looking after them with charities, policemen and detectives.

However new to heretical tympani, all this threnody is an old song in Catholic ears. The Catholic gladly concedes that the Institution's avowed purpose is good, but he has long suspected that what the Institution understood by "moral training" could not be moral training in any rational or Christian sense.

The publication of the Institution's favored code, proves the correctness of his suspicions. Man, by the light of reason, can attain to some knowledge of Almighty God, for, as St. Paul says, God has never left the world without some intelligible witness to Himself. Man is bound by his nature to seek this knowledge, and, acquiring it, is not at liberty to assume towards it, much less enshrine in a code, an attitude of indifference. With this knowledge, inchoate and imperfect, it is true, yet knowledge, comes man's realization of his duties towards the Supreme Being. This bond between man and God, a legislator distinct from and superior to man, was recognized even by the pagan philosophers, notably by Aristotle and Plato. But the Institution can find no place for the Almighty in its moral code, no recognition of His existence, His dominion, of man's duties consequent upon God's supremacy. In this the code is clearly irrational.

The Rejection of the Supernatural

FURTHERMORE, we now live in the age of revelation. What man saw but dimly in the light of reason has been more sharply outlined through the revelation of God in Christ Jesus. The world is not, and cannot possibly be, what it was before His merciful coming. He has changed the destiny of nations, renewed the face of the earth, has given to life new purpose and impulse, widening its horizon to the flaming bounds of the earth at the edge of eternity. God Himself has walked with us, and, lifted up upon the Cross, has sent forth an influence that will draw all hearts to Himself. His Divine lips have taught us the way, the truth, and the life. He understood us, because He knew us, as only the Creator can know the work of His hands. Acquainted with our infirmities, He will not impose a yoke that our weakness cannot bear. His touchingly beautiful life, so full of strength, of gentleness, of sweetness, of pity and compassion for the lowly, of infinitely patient love for the sinner, has given us the model upon which, with His help, we must fashion our lives, even as it has called forth through the centuries that enthusiastic personal love, the strongest motive for unswerving loyalty which the human heart can know. There can be no more perfect Model, and nothing more practical, more in keeping with our needs and possibilities, than the moral code which He has promulgated. As the first and greatest Commandment of the law, He bids us love with all our hearts, a God who is our most loving Father. Upon this law He founds our duty to ourselves, and to every child of our common Father in heaven. All things shall pass, save only His words. Whatever code of morality ignores, or purposely obscures, the first and greatest Commandment, however high the intentions of those who write it, must lead to destruction. For it is not sown in faith, and can have no fruitage of hope and charity.

The Code's Highest Model

TURNING from the perfect moral teaching of Jesus Christ, to the code fashioned in Oberlin, we find nothing beyond a low, depressing naturalism. Divine revelation, the inspiration and support of unfailing generations of saints and heroes, is brushed aside for the work of man. That revelation proposed to make all men good citizens of this world, by fitting them to become citizens of our lasting country. As is apparent from the opening paragraph, clearly setting forth the ultimate aim which the Oberlin code hopes to achieve, the new revelation can conceive no more sublime moral greatness than that modicum of natural virtue which suffices to make a good American citizen.

There is much humor in this concept, a rich vein, which may be explored more fully at another time. But there is a world of sadness in the thought, that earnest, upright men, so far from discerning the danger connected with proposing these low ideals, find a godless code sufficient for the moral training of the generation that is to come.

NOTE AND COMMENT

Catholics and the Liberty Loan

CATHOLICS are again reminded by the director of publicity of the Government Liberty Loan Organization that the "big push" for the success of the Third Liberty Loan opens April 6, the first anniversary of our entrance into the war. "It has been estimated," the official Catholic press bulletin of the Publicity Division of the Organization states, "that from thirty-five to forty-five per cent of the soldiers and sailors of the United States are communicants of the Roman Catholic Church." While Catholics courteously request that the word "Roman," which is not an official title of their Church, should not be inserted in public documents of any kind, they have "just cause," as the bulletin says, "to be very proud" of their record. It is true that this implies a far greater difficulty on our part to make financial contributions to the war, since so great a part of the wage-earning Catholic population, out of all proportion to our numbers, is withdrawn from the gainful occupations of industry and commerce. Yet the recent Catholic war drive, which has netted almost $5,000,000 in New York alone, makes it plain that Catholics are likewise doing, not merely their "bit," but a very great part of bearing the financial burden of the nation in this gigantic struggle. It is safe to say that, according to their means, they will also be found among the most generous subscribers to the Third Liberty Loan.

Monument to the "Nuns of the Battle-field"

THE passage of a bill authorizing the Ladies' Auxiliary of the Ancient Order of Hibernians to erect a monument in Washington in memory of the Catholic Sisters who served as nurses in the Civil War was recently secured in the House of Representatives by the Hon. Ambrose Kennedy, Representative in Congress from Rhode Island and a graduate of Holy Cross College. While many monuments and memorials have been erected to perpetuate the memory of so many other heroes of the Civil War, "Not a stone or tablet has ever been raised on public ground to bear testimony to the generous and heroic sacrifices of these dark-robed messengers of sympathy and love who came voluntarily to the assistance of the wounded and dying soldiers on both sides of the struggle." Since every congregation of Sisters that rendered services on the battle-field, in the hospitals and on the floating hospitals during the course of the war is to be commemorated, Mr. Kennedy rehearsed in detail before the House of Representatives the heroic history of the sacrifices made by each of these Catholic Sisterhoods. He has thus collated, with the assistance of Mrs. Ellen Ryan Jolly, the most valuable Civil War document that we possess upon this important subject. The eloquent recital of events by the Congressman brought into notice before the House of Representatives the names of nearly 400 war Sisters. "And I would it were possible," he added, "to give the names of all that splendid assemblage of patriotic and devoted women whose ministrations among the soldiers shed glory and light unfading upon the many thrilling occurrences of the Civil War." The funds to build the monument in memory of the "Nuns of the Battle-field" are to be raised by the Ladies' Auxiliary of the Ancient Order of Hibernians in America, and no more profoundly patriotic work could be undertaken by them. It will be more than a passing contribution, it will be a lasting inspiration to that highest and noblest idealism which the world needs so sadly in our day. It will be a "war work" of more potent influence in the present momentous struggle than many other more direct contributions.

Italian Catholic Society Defends Italian Army

AT a special meeting held by the officers of the Società Cattolica Italiana, of Washington, D. C., to consider the recent publication of reports implying widespread disloyalty and lax discipline in Italy, the following resolution was adopted:

> Resolved: That the Italian Catholic Society, organized to promote a wider and better understanding of the aims and achievements of Italian Catholics in the United States, hereby makes a solemn protest—and directs its officers to convey a record of the same to the Committee on Public Information and the Secretary of War—against the false and mischievous statements contained in an article of Ryley Grannon, in the Washington Post of March 13, slandering the Calabrian soldiers, who have ever borne an honorable name as patriots and loyal, well-disciplined soldiers, and otherwise insinuating widespread disloyalty in Italy. Such statements are calculated to cause dissension and unrest not only among United States citizens of Italian descent, and Italian residents in the United States, but, what is even more serious, among our Italian co-belligerents.

It is well that Catholic societies should everywhere be active in defense of truth and justice. In proportion as the Church is gaining recognition and esteem she will likewise be subjected to the public attacks of envy and malice. Every Catholic society should be trained to alertness and activity.

Georgetown University and the War

GEORGETOWN UNIVERSITY has just issued a remarkable bulletin of information. We learn from it that there are at present about 1,085 Georgetown men in military service whose names have been recorded at the college, while several hundred have not yet been reached. The director of the Knights of Columbus war work in France is Walter N. Kernan, of the class of 'eighty-five. The Government has recognized the University as an approved R. O. T. C. College, and Major E. V. Bookmiller, U. S. A., has been appointed instructor of military science and tactics. A course in navigation and a course in aviation have furthermore been introduced. The following names of Georgetown men are given as of interest to those who are called to foreign countries:

Robert E. Acorn, American Embassy	London
Raymond J. Bowling, American Embassy	London
William L. Hurley, American Embassy	London
Jay Keegan, American Embassy	London
James K. Lynch, American Embassy	London
John M. Cunningham, American Consulate	Paris
Charles E. Davis, American Embassy	Paris
John W. Lenahan, American Embassy	Paris
Robert E. McNamara, American Embassy	Paris
Richard M. Hamilton, Vice Consul	Havre
Wm. Dulany Hunter, Consul	Nice
John Edward Jones, Consul	Lyons
Lewis W. Haskell, Consul	Geneva
Wallace Hill, American Legation	Berne
Willis Ruffner, Vice Consul	Rome
William Linden, American Embassy	Madrid
The Hon. Maurice F. Egan, American Minister	Copenhagen
Phil S. Cheney, American Legation	Copenhagen
Everett B. Ansley, Vice Consul	Vladivostok
Charles E. Bourk, American Legation	Athens

There could be no better evidence than this honorable list to show the efficiency and public spirit of the men nurtured and trained by Georgetown University. Notice has recently been received that the French Croix de Guerre has been conferred upon Henry Blodgett Warren, class of 1912, "for conspicuous coolness and courage in driving his hospital ambulance for fifty-five consecutive hours under fire" during a drive of the French army. We are further told of the commendable practice of holding special devotions in the Dahlgren Chapel every Saturday morning to pray for the safety of the Georgetown men in service.

Bigotry at Large in Canada

THE wave of anti-Catholic bigotry, which has for some time past been felt in the United States, is now breaking in Canada. No less a person than the registrar of McGill University, Montreal, recently opened a venomous attack upon the Church with such ignorant accusations as the following quoted from the Montreal Gazette:

> The government of the Roman Catholic Church is autocratic, and is based on the principle that in religious matters the people must suppress every suggestion to think for themselves. It is not their business. They are not competent to do so. They must take their faith ready-made, and accept it without question. . . . The State is secondary, and consequently the country occupies, I fear, but a very humble place in their educational program. Again I ask is such teaching desirable in a democratic country, where duty to the State should be a primary consideration?

This penny-a-liner effort, worthy of the mental caliber of a Menace scribe, was heartily applauded by a "select" audience. The same evening Mr. L. I. McMahon, secretary of the Catholic Literature League, refuted the charges brought against the Church and her institutions. An energetic letter of protest was likewise written by the Archbishop of Montreal to the principal of McGill University, with the result that a profound apology was offered. On the following Sunday, according to a letter written to us, "the registrar's apologetic manner was so extreme as to be unmannerly." He had been taken to task by the president of the University, who disclaimed knowledge of what his registrar was to say. "Men of his kind," adds our correspondent, "are not half so guilty as the indifferentism of Catholics which permits such attacks." Hence the value of the Canadian Social Service Gild, which is preparing itself to repel such assaults in the future.
